Our life is in Gods hand, he hath ſet the bounds, which no mans malice can ſhorten, nor any cowardiſe of our own lengthen. As none could bring us into the world, ſo none can thruſt us out, till the time appointed. Let not perſecutors take away the truth from us, which God hath given us to believe, for they cannot take away a day from us, which God hath given us to live. This is an excellent ground of courage, but no ground of careleſsneſs: Were we perſwaded of this truth, it would eaſe us of much inordinate fear, though it ſhould not at all abate our orderly care of this preſent life. Paul was in deaths often, but he died not once, till his day came. Paul was in the lions mouth, but the lion could not eat him, becauſe he was not then meat for death.

Laſtly, God is moſt exact to his own numbers.

As he is exact concerning duties by him commanded to require them, ſo he is exact concerning dayes by him appointed, that we may enjoy them. My Spirit (ſaith the Lord) ſhall not alwayes ſtrive with man, his dayes ſhall be an hundred and twenty years (Gen. 6.5.) The flood came not upon the old world an hour before this number of years was run out, and the old world could not paſs that number of years an hour, the deluge comes, and all are drowned. The Lord foretold Abraham (as was toucht before) Gen. 15.13. Thy ſeed ſhall be a ſtranger in a land which is not theirs, they ſhall ſerve them and they ſhall afflict them four hundred years (beginning the account at the birth of Iſaac) The fulfilling of which prophecie is reported in the holy ſtory (Exod. 12.40.) It came to paſs at the end of the four hundred and thirty years (beginning the account from the day in which the promiſe was made to Abraham) the ſelfſame day it came to paſs that all the hoaſt of the Lord went out of the land of Egypt. God did not only not fail them a day, but he did not fail them a piece of a day; for they came out in the night, becauſe the four hundred and thirty years were expired that night, and when the time was out, though it were night, God would not ſtay till morning or break of day: he would rather provide them a Torch, an extraordinary night light (then ſtay for day-light) that ſo his word might be fulfilled in its perfect ſeaſon. The Babyloniſh captivity continued ſeventy years and no longer. And ſome give that for the reaſon why Belſhazzar was ſlain in the night, becauſe then the years of that captivity were expired. The collation of times proves it, that Daniels weeks were fulfilled to a day at the death of Chriſt. God the great diſpoſer of time and numberer of dayes, hath alſo calculated all the times of the Churches troubles and deliverances in the book of the Revelation: and there the dayes of Babylon are determined, and her bounds are ſet which ſhe ſhall not paſs. We have a ſaying, much like our ſelves, A day breaks no ſquare: but it is not ſo with God, he keeps time with us to an hour. All the viſions of God are (as the Prophet Habakkuk ſpeaks of that viſion, chap. 2. 3.) for an appointed time, but at the end they ſhall ſpeak, they ſhall not lie, though they tarry, wait for them, becauſe they will ſurely come, they will not tarry. The viſions of God do tarry ſometimes beyond our time, but they never tarry beyond Gods time. He hath ſet a bound to all the affairs and ſtates on earth, which they cannot paſs.

Job having thus aſſerted the certainty and irrevocability of Gods decree about the dayes of man, grounds an earneſt petition upon it in the next verſe,

Verſ. 6. Turn from him that he may reſt, till he ſhall accompliſh as a hireling his dayes.

But is this a good petition? Doth Job pray in faith or according to knowledge, when he prayeth the Lord to turn from him? Is not the preſence of God moſt pretious and deſirable? Is not the departure of God the ſaddeſt affliction of man? why then doth he deſire the Lord to turn away, ſeeing it is our happineſs to have God near us.

I anſwer,

God may be ſaid to turn away from man in two reſpects, Firſt, In diſpleaſure, when he ceaſeth to do us good, Secondly, in favour, when he forbeareth to lay any further evil upon us, it is this latter turning away which Job prayes for.

ἀπόστα ἀπ᾽ αὐτοῦ. Sept. Diſcede ne tua præſentia cōſerves me, neque morti permitte. Aquin. Abſiſte ab eo ut deſinat, cum jā grato animo excipiet diē fatalē, tanquā mercenarius. Tygur.

Yet ſome interpret him in the firſt ſenſe, turn away, that is, withdraw thy preſence from me, even thy ſupporting and ſtrengthening preſence, which while it remains with me I cannot die, therefore withdraw it, and let me die, let me go to reſt, until I may expect at the reſurrection my reward, even as a hireling doth his dayes-wages for his dayes-work.

There is a threefold truth in this expoſition, yet I cannot give it as the truth of this text.

Firſt, It is a truth that the preſence of God is the ſupport of our lives; if he do but turn away we quickly dye, and return unto our duſt. The damned would dye, but God will not turn away from them, his angry preſence is with them to hold their ſouls in life, that ſo both ſoul and body might be held in pain. The Elect muſt dye if God ſhould turn away from them; his favourable preſence holds their ſouls in life, and will hold both their ſouls and bodies together in joy for ever. As the riſing of the Sun is the cauſe of the day, and when the Sun departs and turns away, darkneſs covers the face of the earth; ſo the preſence of God is the ſupport of our lives, and when God departs and turns away, death covers our faces in the earth.

Secondly, 'Tis true, death is a reſt; death is not only (like ſleep) the parentheſis of our labours, but the full ſtop and period of our labours: There's no work in the grave.

Thirdly, 'Tis a truth, that the toils, troubles, and evils of this life make death deſirable. 'Tis beſt to deſire to dye, that we may enjoy Chriſt and God, who are the chiefeſt good; yet the fear or feeling of evil cauſe moſt to deſire death. It is ſome mercy to dye before times of judgment; and it is a mercy to dye in times of judgment (Rev. 14. 13.) I heard a voice from Heaven ſaying to me, write, bleſſed are the dead that dye in the Lord, from henceforth, yea, ſaith the Spirit, that they may reſt from their labours: Some lay the emphaſis upon thoſe words, From henceforth: John was prophecying of troubles and perſecutions to come upon the Church of God. Now, the Spirit ſaith, Bleſſed are the dead that dye in the Lord, from henceforth: As if he had ſaid, The time I am prophecying of, will be ſo full of labour and trouble, that even they who live in the Lord, may account it their bleſſedneſs to dye then, as well as it is their bleſſedneſs to dye at any time in the Lord.

But I paſs this expoſition. The words hold out rather a deprecation of, then a prayer for death: Take it thus; Job having ſaid to God, at the third verſe, Wilt thou open thy eye upon ſuch an one? here intreats God to turn from him: As if he had ſaid, Be not ſo ſtrict in marking who I am, or what I have done: He ſpeaks after the manner of men, who turn away from thoſe whom they intend to ſpare: If a Father would not correct his Child, who hath offended him, he turns away, that he may avoid the temptation, or provocation of doing it. Thus Job intreats the favour of God, or the forbearance of his anger, Turn away from me, let me be quiet a while; let me have ſome peaceable dayes in the world before I depart the world.

Ne me tam accurate & attente obſerves, q. d. ſimula te non videre.

Turn from him that he may reſt.

The word ſignifies to ceaſe or give over action (Ezek. 3. 2.) He that heareth let him hear; and he that forbeareth let him forbear. (Gen. 41. 9.) Joſeph took account of the corn, till there was ſo much that he left numbring, he numbred no more. God is ſaid to ceaſe from the work of Creation, becauſe he reſted from that kind of action, he created no more. Here, Let me reſt, is, let me have a ceſſation from ſufferings, let me be afflicted no more.

Others read, Let me alone that it may reſt; that is, let the affliction reſt: So he prayed (which may expound this place) at the tenth Chapter, ver. 20, 21. Are not my dayes few, ceaſe then and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little: As if he had ſaid, Forbear, let this poor man alone.

Ut ceſſet ſc, hæc plaga vel afflictio. Chal. Metr. Non vitam longiorem precatur ſed pœnæ relaxationẽ

Till he ſhall accompliſh as a hireling his dayes.

עד־ירצה: Verbum רצה Significat vehementer velle & delectari re aliqua. Metaphorice complere velut læto animo, res finem velut optare videntur, & gratum habere quaſi eo propendeant. Merc.

That the dayes of man are like the dayes of an hireling, was ſhewed (chap. 7. 1.) I ſhall now only open the accompliſhment of his day.

The word which we tranſlate accompliſh, ſignifies properly to deſire and will with great delight, and by a Metaphor to accompliſh, becauſe we labour earneſtly to accompliſh that, which we greatly deſire and delight in. So here, till he ſhall accompliſh with delight, with willingneſs, his day, or bring his life to that longed for end, as a hireling his day: ſo ſome render, Till the hour or time comes, which is ſo much deſired: That is (ſaith the Gloſs) till I am as willing to dye, as a labouring man is to go to ſupper and to bed. A hireling is put to hard labour, yet he comforts himſelf that evening will come, and then he ſhall have both reſt and wages: Let me alone, that I may accompliſh as a hireling (who is hard wrought) my day: That's pleaſing to him, and ſo would this be to me. Again, The dayes of an hireling, notes a time ſet out to a ſpecial buſineſs: As the dayes of a man note the whole time of our pilgrimage here on earth: And then his meaning is, let me reſt, till I have finiſhed the work for which I came into the world; let me not depart without my errand. One of the Ancients finds it thus in ſome copies, Turn from me that I may reſt and refreſh my life as a hireling, who hath breathings and times of intermiſſion granted him from his labour. But ſurely Job intends here a period, not a pauſe of his labours.

Donec optata veniet. Vulg. Hebraizantes putant Jobum hic petere, ut tam diu permittatur vivere, quo uſque ipſe ſponte ſua ſenio jam confectus optet mortem, i.e. donec ſponte moriatur. Chryſoſt.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The life of man is a laborious life.

He muſt accompliſh his dayes as a hireling: He is a labourer, not a loiterer. Sin brought pain into our labour; but the duty of labour was before ſin.

Secondly Note, We have but a day of labour.

A hireling doth not think much of it; it is but a day, and if ſome have a longer day then others, yet ſtill 'tis but a day: This day will end, and it will be as if it had never begun; we ſhall forget all our ſorrows. A woman in travel hath great ſorrow, but when the work is over, ſhe forgets all her ſorrow, for joy that a man is born into the world: When we come to the wiſhed accompliſhment of our labours, we ſhall forget that we were in labour. As our labours are little regarded by the world here, ſo we ſhall as little remember them our ſelves hereafter; we ſhall lay them all under our pillows, when we go to the grave, and talk no more of them.

Thirdly Note, This life muſt be accounted for; or, there is a reckoning to come about this life.

Every man accompliſheth as a hireling his day; a hireling hath his work viewed before his wages are paid: Every man muſt give an account of himſelf to God. Evil workers ſhall be paid with death: They who do good ſhall receive the free gift of eternal life: Our labour ſhall not be in vain, either in the Lord, or out of the Lord: all that we do ſhall be conſidered: Wicked men ſhall have their pay for what they have done, and the Saints ſhall receive their reward: Their works ſhall follow them: They ſhall not receive wages for their work; but they ſhall receive benefit by their work, worth more then their work ten thouſand times told. Though Saints are not mercinary (they work, not as hirelings for pay) yet in the iſſue they ſhall have better then pay for all their works. They ſhall receive more for the leaſt work, then the beſt works can deſerve. A cup of cold water ſhall have a reward, rivers of oyl have no merit. It were not worth while to be as an hireling, or to ſet our hand to the nobleſt works among men, if all the return were to come through the hands of men: But as whatſoever we do in this world is in the ſight of God: ſo it is alſo in the memory of God. For, He is not unrighteous to forget our work and labour of love (Heb. 6. 10.) Both the labour of our callings, and the labour of our ſufferings, ſhall have a full reward.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will ſprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not ceaſe.

Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the ſtock thereof dye in the ground:

Yet through the ſcent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.

But man dyeth and waſteth away; yea, a man giveth up the ghoſt, and where is he?

As the waters fail from the ſea, and the flood decayeth and dryeth up:

So man lieth down and riſeth not; till the Heavens be no more they ſhall not awake, nor be raiſed out of their ſleep.

IN theſe ſix verſes, Job amplifies and illuſtrates his former Aſſertion, that, The dayes of man are determined, and the number of his months, which he cannot paſs: He doth this, Firſt, By a diſſimilitude, Secondly, By a ſimilitude.

The diſſimilitude is laid down, in the ſeventh, eighth, ninth and tenth verſes: We have the explication in the ſeventh, eigth and ninth verſes, and the application of it, at the tenth. There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, &c. *ver.*7. But man dyeth and waſteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghoſt, and where is he? ver. 10.

The ſimilitude is contained in the eleventh and twelfth verſes, As the waters fail from the ſea, &c. So man lyeth down and riſeth not, till the Heavens be no more.

Verſe 7. For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will ſprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not ceaſe.

The general ſubject of this context is the ſame with the former, which hath alſo been inſiſted upon from other paſſages in this book; namely, that man dying, returns not from death in this world: So that (here being no new matter) my chief buſineſs will be to explain the terms, and clear the parts of this diſſimilitude:

There is hope of a tree.] Or, A tree hath hope, ſo the letter of the Hebrew, and ſo it is rendered by learned Interpreters, aſcribing that to a tree which is proper to a man, hope: That which hath no reaſon cannot have any hope; nor doth the Hebraiſm intend any more then our reading. To ſay, A tree hath hope, is only this, Man hath hope of a tree: or, There is hope of a tree. A tree hath a natural aptitude to ſprout up after it is cut down, and therefore man hopes it will. There are three opinions concerning the ſcope of theſe words.

Quia eſt arbori ſpes. Pagn.

Firſt, Some conceive Job expreſſing his hope of the reſurrection by this compariſon: And then the words are a ſimilitude, not a diſſimilitude: As a tree cut down ſprouts again: ſo, though man be cut down by death, yet he ſhall revive and riſe again. What the Prophet ſpeaks of the reſtoring of the people of God, the Jews, from the grave of their civil death (their captivity in Babylon) is as true of the reſtoring of all the people of God from the grave of a natural death. Thy dead men ſhall live, together with my dead body ſhall they ariſe. Awake and ſing ye that dwell in the duſt, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth ſhall caſt out the dead, Iſa. 26. 19. In purſuance of which expoſition, the queſtion at the cloſe of the tenth verſe, And where is he? is read with an admiration, which gives the ſence thus: Doth the tree grow when cut down? And doth man dye, waſte away, give up the ghoſt? And, Is he no where? What? Is he no where? That's incredible: man is ſomewhere when he is not here, and in due time it will appear where he is. Some of the Ancients expound the words as a holy triumph over, or ſcorn of death, as if he had ſaid, What? ſhall ſenſeleſs trees and ſhrubs grow up again? And ſhall not man the nobleſt of the creatures? Is this good Reaſon, or good Divinity, that trees ſhall riſe, and men ſhall not? The Scripture by the reviving of a dying creature, ſets forth the reſurrection of man after death, (1 Cor. 15. 36.) Thou fool, that which thou ſoweſt is not quickened except it dye. The ſeed dyeth and then groweth, there is an argument from Nature; a tree may dye, and yet grow, there is an argument from Nature. The reſurrection of the dead is an Article of Faith, and yet our eyes may ſhew us an argument of it in Nature. We may ſee a reſurrection in the annual reviving of a tree; the tree in winter caſts its leaves, and looks as dead; but when the Sun returns, and with that the heat, the tree reviveth: Every ſpring is as a reſurrection from death. There is a truth in this interpretation, but to make out ſuch an Irony by the Grammar of the words, or ſuch an inference from the ſcope of the Text is very hard, if at all poſſible: And therefore I lay it by.

Auguſtinus docet hæc verba continere in ſe vim ſimilitudinis & exponi debere per ironiam, q. d. ſcilicet homo non reſurget cum videatur reſurgere, arbor ſic etiã. Lyranus apud Mer.

Secondly, Others interpret Job bemoaning the condition of man (as to this point) inferiour to that of trees. For firſt, The boughs of a tree may be lopt, yea, the body of it quite cut down, and yet it feels no pain: The tree is not grieved how much ſoever you hew, cut, and mangle it; but when God layes his Axe either to the boughs of man by ſickneſs, diſeaſes, and outward afflictions, or to his root by death, man feels pain: every ſtroke puts him to ſmart. Secondly, As the tree is cut and cut down without pain, ſo it will ſprout up again, and renew, which man doth not.

Hence Note, That a man in extream affliction thinks any condition better then his own.

Job ſeems to envy the happineſs of a tree. How low will the thoughts of man deſcend when he is laid low? He would even change eſtates, or (as we ſay) turn tables with ſtones and ſhrubs. There is hope of a tree; but I am (as to a temporal reſtoring) paſt hope.

Thirdly, The words carry an Argument to move the Lord to ſpare Job, or not to cut him down, though he had beaten off his leaves and fruit (his ſubſtance being ſwept away by robbers) though he had lopt off his boughs and branches (his children being ſwept away by death) yet he deſires that he would not preſs upon his perſon alſo, and cut him quite down, becauſe then he ſhould be loſt for ever out of this world. He was not like a tree, which when cut down ſhouts forth at the root again. We find ſuch Arguments uſed by Orators and Poets to ſet forth the vanity of man beyond that of other creatures. The ſun ſets (ſaith one of them) and riſeth again; But when mans Sun goeth down, it riſeth no more; 'tis alwayes night with man when this night comes. The ſnow diſſolves (ſaith another) and then the fields are cloathed with graſs, and the trees with leaves, but neither the honour, nor the eloquence, nor the piety of man can reſtore him to a ſpring after the winter of his death. There is hope of a tree if cut down, Soles occidere, & redire poſſunt. Nobis cum ſemel occidit brevis lux, nox eſt perpetua una dormienda. Catullus.

Diffugere nives, redeunt jam gramina campis arboribuſque comæ, &c. Nõ Torquate genus, non te facundia, non te reſtituet pietas, Hor. lib. 4. Car. Od. 7.

That it will ſprout again.] The word which we tranſlate to ſprout, ſignifieth to change, and renew to another, or a better ſtate. Job makes uſe of it, at the fourteenth verſe of this chapter, I will wait till my change, or my ſprouting come. Though he was hopeleſs of a change from death to this life, yet he was aſſured of a happy change in death, yea, of a change from death to eternal life.

Proprie mutabitur, inſtaurabitur.

But it may be doubted, how a tree if cut down ſprouts again. 'Tis true, when only the boughs are lopt off, it ſprouts preſently; but if the body of a tree be cut down, will it grow again? That ſeems to be the ſence of Job.

I anſwer.

The bodies of ſome trees (as for inſtance the Willow) being cut down and ſet into the ground, are every where obſerved to grow, and their tender branch doth not ceaſe. Some interpret Job not of trees in general, but of this or ſome other particular ſort of trees.

Again, Some trees though the body which is cut off will not grow, yet the root which remains will grow up into a new body. Such a tree is the (a) Laurel, whoſe deſcription given by Pliny in his Natural Hiſtory doth well agree with this diſcourſe of Job. And becauſe the Heathen did not believe a reſurrection, therefore they made thoſe trees to be Symbols and Emblems of death, which being once cut down, grow no more: It is obſerved that the Romans were wont to place a (b) Cypreſs-tree at the threſhold of the houſe of death, becauſe the Cypreſs being cut down never ſprings any more.

Laſtly, Many trees (their roots remaining in the earth) will grow after cutting, though not in a full body, yet in ſprouts, their tender branches will not ceaſe; or as ſome render the Hebrew, Their ſuckers will not leave: We often ſee young ſlips riſe at the root, when the tree it ſelf is cut down. And this I conceive to be the meaning of Job, who calls ſuch ſhoots ſuckers, becauſe they live upon the root, like little children at their mothers breaſt. Job carries on the explication yet further.

(a) Quarundam arborũ radix vivacior ſuperficie ut lauri, itaque cum truncus inaruit, reſciſſa etiam læta fructificat. Plin. Nat. Hiſt.

(b) Romani moris fuit ut potiſſimum cupreſſus quæ exciſa renaſci non ſolet in veſtibulo mortui poneretur. Serv. in Virg. lib. 4. Plin. l. 16. cap. 32.

Verſe 8. Though the roots thereof wax old in the earth, and the ſtock thereof dye in the ground.

In which words he puts a ſuppoſition of greater improbability. 'Tis much that a tree cut down ſhould grow, much more if the root wax old, and the ſtock dye in the ground. It ſhewed not only the improbability, but impoſſibility (in nature) that Sarah ſhould have a ſon when ſhe was waxen old, and her womb (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Rom. 4.) was dead. And will the dead root of a tree grow naturally again? I conceive this dying of the root is only the decaying of the root; or that he intends only a partial, not a total death. Chriſt tells us (John 12. 24.) That except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and dye, it abideth alone, (that is, it doth not increaſe or bring forth more corns) but if it dye, it bringeth forth much fruit. The death of corn in the ground is not a total death, but only a corruption or alteration of it; for if the ſeminal life and vertue of it be quite extinguiſht or drawn out, it could not yield either blade or ear without a miracle; yet becauſe that alteration of it is a kind of death, therefore it is uſed as an illuſtration of Chriſts riſing, and alſo of ours (by Paul 1 Cor. 15.) from a total death. Now as according to the courſe which God hath ſet in Nature, a corn of wheat (in this ſence) dying, bringeth forth fruit: ſo according to the courſe of nature, the root of a tree (in this ſence) dying or dead, buds and brings forth boughs, as it follows in the next words.

Verſe 9. Yet through the ſcent of water, it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.

It is an elegant Metaphor, as if a tree ſmelt the water as ſoon as it came near: And it notes thus much, That the tree upon the firſt ſoaking in, or ſpringing up of the water, is refreſhed and made fruitful. When the three Children were caſt into the fiery Furnace, 'tis ſaid, The ſmell of fire had not paſſed upon them, (Dan. 3. 27.) that is, their garments were not ſo much as touched or ſinged with fire. The fire had not made the leaſt impreſſion upon them. So 'tis ſaid, when Samſon was bound, he broke the cords, even as a thread that ſmells the fire (Judg. 16. 9.) A log will endure the fire long, but upon the firſt approach of fire, a thread is burnt aſunder. The Prophet ſaith of Chriſt, The Spirit of the Lord ſhall reſt upon him, and ſhall make him of quick underſtanding in the fear of the Lord (Iſa. 11. 3.) The Hebrew is, Shall make him ſmell in the fear of the Lord; or, He ſhall ſmell in the fear of the Lord. Smelling is put for underſtanding; and (becauſe the ſmell is a very quick ſence) it notes freeneſs or quickneſs of underſtanding, as we render, He ſhall be quick of underſtanding; he ſhall underſtand the deepeſt myſteries, and moſt difficult caſes as ſpeedily as the moſt exquiſite ſmell takes a ſcent. So then, when Job ſaith, by the ſcent or ſmell of water it will bud, it notes quick growing, or an eaſie bringing forth of a harveſt of boughs (as the Original imports) whereas man will not grow again by an application or uſe of means.

Odor levem rei alicujus contactum denotat. Suavis Metaphora. Dicuntur arbores quaſi ad capiendum aquæ odorem & ad humorem contigendũ ſe ſuaſque radices convertere. Pined.

קצר Propriè meſſis, ut palmites qui ſunt rami vitium vocantur. קצירים Pſal. 80, 12.

A tree cut down ſprings again: But how? Through the ſcent of water.

Hence Note, Firſt, Every effect hath a cauſe.

The tree will grow, but it muſt have at leaſt a ſmell of water.

Through the ſcent of water it will grow; Water is as proper to preſerve or draw out the life of plants, as bread is to preſerve the life of man.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Upon the preſence of the cauſe the effect follows preſently.

Through the ſcent of water it will grow; give it water, and you ſhall ſoon perceive a growth. How doth this ſhame man! A tree grows, ſends out both leaves and fruit through the ſcent of water; but man hath ſpiritual water, the rain of holy Doctrine from Heaven; he hath not only the ſcent of water, but abundance of water ſoaking upon him, yet how little doth he grow! Yea, how many are there that grow not at all? Many ſouls are continually digged, dreſſed, and rained upon, who ſtand like old dotards in a forreſt, not having ſo much as one green bough upon them: Is this to honour the means, or to honour God who gives the means? Trees anſwer all natural cauſes with ſutable effects, when the Sun turneth about, they put on their green ſuits, they ſend out their leaves, their bloſſomes, and their fruits: The Sun of righteouſneſs ſhines, the warm beams of Goſpel-light dart upon thouſands of ſouls, who continue in a winter of ignorance and unbelief, yielding neither the pleaſure of leaves, nor the profit of fruit. And though ſome bring forth leaves, yet how few bring forth fruit, eſpecially fruit meet for repentance from dead works, or for the hopes of eternal life? We ſee many ſpiritual helps; but how rare are ſpiritual effects? The graſs and trees of the earth will condemn thoſe who make no growth in grace, though they have been often watered with the word of grace.

Verſe 10. But man dyeth and waſteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghoſt, and where is he?

The Hebrew is, Strong and powerful man dyeth; let him be as ſtrong as he will, dye he muſt, waſte, and give up the ghoſt: Some obſerve an inverſion of natural order in the words. For man goes down to the grave by theſe ſteps. He firſt waſtes, ſecondly, giveth up the ghoſt, and then he dyes. The Spirit of God doth not alwayes exactly attend (prius & poſterius) firſt or laſt, according to the order of nature: Neither is there any redundancy in this plenty of words. There is not one tittle in Scripture but hath its uſe and elegancy; and becauſe the Spirit of God would ſhew the certainty of this thing, he heaps many words together into one aſſeveration, man waſtes, dyeth, and giveth up the ghoſt; he is all things, and ſuffers all things which ſpeak mortality.

Sunt qui volunt hic eſſe hyſteron proteron.

Ego hanc geminationem ad copiam linguæ ſanctæ facere puto. Merc.

We render, Yea, man giveth up the ghoſt; as if that implyed ſomewhat more then the former two: The particle, Yea, (in the Hebrew) heightens the ſence, man waſteth, dyeth, yea, he giveth up the ghoſt.

Some underſtand waſting and dying but as preparatories or antecedents to giving up the ghoſt: Man decayes and waſtes, yea, he dyeth every day, but he doth not give up the ghoſt every day, that's the laſt act. Paul ſpeaking of his outward troubles and perſecutions ſaith, I dye dayly; and in another place, I have been in deaths often: Natural death ſteals upon us part after part, it ſeizeth now upon the eyes, and makes them dim, then upon the ears, and makes them deaf, and ſo takes in now this member, and anon th[illegible], till it conquer the whole man. Death hath its forerunners and harbingers, ſickneſſes and diſeaſes: A ſick diſeaſe, a man hath many ſymptomes of death upon him before he gives up the ghoſt: When he gives up that all is given up, death enters his fort, and takes full poſſeſſion of him.

And where is he?] The queſtion ſeems to carry a negation in it, Man is no where. He is not tranſplanted as trees ſometimes are, and ſet in another ground. But is that goodly thing, [illegible] quite gone, and vaniſhed to a nothing when he dyeth? That which is no where is nothing: There muſt be ſome place for every thing: Every entity muſt have its ubi, every what its where: Therefore to ſay man is no where, is to ſay man is nothing, or to aſſent to a total mortality both of ſoul and body? We muſt therefore reſtrain where is he? to, where is he in the world? Look for him in the Countrey, in the City, at home or abroad, he is not to be had: Man gives up the ghoſt, and where is he?

Ubi eſt? Nullibi, ut inde redire poſſit ad eandem vitã quam ſemel reliquit. Non eſt, quia non eſt in vivis. Druſ.

I might here give Obſervations about the mortality of man, but having done it lately, ver. 1, 2. I will not do it again.

Note Firſt in general, Man is a waſting, dying creature.

He hath received a life which he muſt ſhortly render and repay.

Secondly, When man dyeth, himſelf and all his glory are gone, gone for ever out of this world.

Where is he? He and his riches, he and his honour, he and his wiſdom? what's become of all his deſigns, devices, counſels and thoughts? (Pſal. 146.) Truſt not in Princes, nor any of the children of men, their breath is in their noſtrils, they dye, and then all their thoughts periſh. The things which they have contrived in, or produced out of their thoughts, thoſe curious fabricks of the brain fall and dye with them. So much of Job's diſſimilitude.

The ſimilitude follows in the two next verſes, Job's diſcourſe moves from the root and ſprigs of a tree, to the ſeas and waters.

Verſe 11. As the waters fall from the ſea, and the flood decayeth and dryeth up.

The ſimilitude is opened in this eleventh verſe, and applied at the twelfth, So man lyeth down, and riſeth not, &c.

As the waters fall from the ſea.

The particle, as, is not in the Original. There we read, Waters fall from the ſea, and the flouds decay and dry up, man lyeth down and riſeth not. This hath led ſome Interpreters to render it (as the former) by a diſſimilitude: And they make out the ſence thus: The ſea ebbs and fails from the ſhoar, yet it returns again when the tide turns; and though the flouds decay and dry up through the extremity of heat heat and drought, yet the rain comes and fills them up again, but man (whoſe life is like water ſpilt upon the ground 2 Sam. 14. 14.) is unlike the ſea, or river water: for when he ebbs he flows not again, when his moiſture is dried up it returns to him no more.

But the ſtream of interpreters conclude it a ſimilitude, and I ſhall keep to that, it being alſo very ſutable to the purpoſe of Job.

As the waters fail from the ſea.] How do the waters fail from the ſea? The ſea is the great veſſel or receptacle of waters, God calleth the gathering together of waters ſea, (Gen. 1.) And if the waters which are gathered together fail, what will become of the ſcattered waters?

There are different apprehenſions about the making out of a clear meaning.

Firſt thus, As waters after an exundation of the ſea, or of ſome great river are (upon the reflux of either) ſeparated from the channel, and left behind upon the land, which they overflowed, and becauſe they cannot return (for then they muſt aſcend, which is impoſſible to nature) they there utterly dry up and evaporate: ſo man dieth and returneth no more unto his place; As if he had ſaid, It is as abſurd and incongruous to affirm that man ſhall return again to this preſent life, when he dieth, as to ſay the ſea-water left upon the land, can conveigh it ſelf back into that ancient channel.

Argumentū ſumi arbitror ab impoſſibili, ſc. tunc homine̅ ad hanc vitam reverſurum, cū aqua ſurſumverſus ad locū ſe referat unde defluxit. Sanct.

Secondly, Others make it an argument of the reſurrection, As if he had ſaid, juſt as the ſea decayes and dryes up, ſo man when he dies ſhall be utterly loſt: One is as true as the other. We have a Proverbial ſpeech, This is as true as the ſea burns: we may ſpeak to the ſame ſenſe, This is as true as the ſea is empty or dried up.

Thirdly, This ſence is given, as when the ſea fails from the place to which it hath uſually flowed; and leaves its former bounds, then the floods and ſtreams adjacent dry up (becauſe they are fed and maintained by the ſea, Eccl. 1.7.) ſo when natural moiſture decayes in man (which is the ſupplement and oyl o life) man fails and can no more revive himſelf, then a river can recover its ſtreams when it is cut off from thoſe ſecret ſupplies and ſprings which it receiveth from the ſea: Thus the ſimilitude is applyed in the next verſe.

Verſ. 12. So Man lieth down and riſeth not, till the heavens be no more, they ſhall not awake, nor be raiſed out of their ſleep.

As if he had ſaid, Death brings man to bed in the grave; from whence he riſeth not;

Until the heavens be no more.

What Heavens? and how are the heavens no more? there is a threefold heaven, firſt, the aiery heaven, or all that ſpace between the earth and the moon, birds are ſaid to flie abroad in the heaven, that is, in the air: Secondly, The ſtarry heaven, or the heaven where the ſtars are placed, whether moveable or fixed: Thirdly, The imperial heaven, which is called the ſeat of the bleſſed, or, which is more tranſcendent, the place of the ſpecial reſidence of God, when he ſaith, till the heavens be no more, means he the aiery, or the ſtarry, or the higheſt heaven? there is no queſtion but theſe laſt heavens ſhall continue for ever: then we muſt interpret him of the ſtarry and aiery heavens.

Until the heavens be no more.] Until hath a threefold ſignification in Scripture.

Firſt, Until ſignifieth a certain period or duration: The ſcepter ſhall not depart from Judah until Shiloh come, (Gen. 49. 10.) So, (Rom. 11. 25.) Blindneſs in part is hapned unto Iſrael, until the fulneſs of the Gentiles be come in. In theſe and many other texts, Until notes a determinate time with an excluſion or ſhutting out of ſucceeding times, or any ſtop till the acceſſion and accompliſhment of that time.

Secondly, Until notes perpetuity, and is put for, ever, Pſal. 110. Sit thou at my right hand until I have made thy foes thy foot-ſtool. Chriſt ſhall not ſit at the right hand of God till that time only, and then be put from his place; For, Unto the ſon he ſaith, Thy throne O God is for ever and ever, Heb. 1. 8. yet we muſt diſtinguiſh between the ſubſtance and the circumſtance of Chriſts Kingdom, between the thing it ſelf and the form or manner of adminiſtring and diſpenſing it. In the former ſenſe it is abſolutely everlaſting, in the latter it ſhall remain only until the conſummation of all things.

Thirdly, Until ſignifies as in ſome places, for ever, ſo in others, never, 2 Sam. 6. 13. Michol had no child until the day of her death, that is, ſhe never had a child. And ſo until is moſt generally interpreted (Mat. 1. 25.) Then Joſeph took unto him his wife, and knew her not, till ſhe had brought forth her firſt born ſon. That is, he never knew her, it being (though no article of faith, yet) a received opinion, that Mary was a virgin as before, ſo ever after the birth of Chriſt.

When it is ſaid here, man ſhall not riſe till the heavens be no more, Some conceive Job expreſſing one impoſſible thing by another, or implying that it is as impoſſible to nature for man to riſe from the grave of corruption, as it is for the heavens to corrupt. As if he had ſaid, Man ſhall never riſe by natural power, as the heavens ſhall not decay by natural weakneſs. The heavens have no ſeed of corruption in their conſtitution as not being mixed or made up of different qualities: hence heaven in Scripture notes perpetuity. To have a throne as the dayes of heaven, is to have a throne for ever, (Pſal, 89. 29.) And ſo Daniel ſpeaks in that prophecie of the Kingdom of Chriſt, (Dan. 2. 44.) And in the dayes of thoſe Kings, ſhall the God of heaven ſet up a kingdom, which ſhall never be deſtroyed, and the Kingdom ſhall never be left to other people: ſo we render, but whereas we joyn heaven to God, ſome of the learned joyn heaven to Kingdom, and read it thus, In the dayes of theſe Kings ſhall God ſet up the Kingdom of heaven, or a heavenly Kingdom, that is, an everlaſting Kingdom, for ſo he explains it, which ſhall not be deſtroyed, in this ſenſe the Goſpel is called the kingdom of heaven, becauſe of the perpetuity of it: No ſin of thoſe that profeſs it, no violence of thoſe who oppoſe and perſecute it, ſhall prevail againſt it or totally aboliſh it: The Kingdom of heaven is (in this ſenſe) above the poſſibility of earthly violence. So then mans lying in the grave till the heavens be no more, notes continuance in the grave, even as long as this world continues, or that it ſhall be night with every man that dies till the day of judgement.

q. d. Sicut impoſſibile eſt cœlum corrumpi, ita homine̅ mortuū reſurgere. Aquin. Elegans Hebraiſmus eſt, quando unum impoſſibile per aliud impoſſibile declaratur. Bold. Ex cœlorum diuturnitate probat quod nunquam juxta naturam ſit reparandus homo. Merc. In diebus aute̅ regum illorū ſuſcitabit Deus cœli regnum: ubi nome̅ cœli, nō conſtruitur cū nomine Deus, ſed cum nomine regnū, q. d. ſuſcitabit Deus cœleſte regnum.

Here 'tis queſtioned, Shall the heavens be no more after the day of judgement? or ſhall the heavens corrupt when man is raiſed from corruption?

The Vulgar Latine reads, Till the heavens be torn or worn out. As if the heavens ſhould be at laſt like old garments ſpent and thread-bare with long uſe and wearing. But the heavens are made of ſuch ſtuff as will not waſte or decay with age or uſe: when or which way ſoever they end, they ſhall end by the will of God (by which they began) not by doing ſervice unto man.

There are divers opinions in the point. Firſt, Some think that all creatures ſhall be reſtored to that perfection they had before the fall. Secondly, Others, that the heavens and elements only ſhall be reſtored. A third ſort ſay that the heavens and only two of the Elements, the air and the earth ſhall be reſtored. A fourth ſay that the old world ſhall be totally aboliſhed, and a new one created in the room of it. A fifth opinion affirms that the whole world with all the parts and works thereof, excepting Angels good and bad, the heaven of the bleſſed and hell, the place of the damned, ſhall be totally and finally annihilated; as they were once made out of nothing, ſo they ſhall turn to nothing and not return again: And theſe interpret this Scripture, till the heavens be no more, as teaching this utter abolition. To which they add many texts of Scripture, which they conceive ſpeaking the ſame ſenſe, and countenancing their aſſertion, Pſal. 102. 25, 26. Heb. 1. 10, 11. Iſa. 34. 4. Iſa. 51. 6. 2 Pet. 3. 10. Rev. 6. 14. In theſe quoted places we read, that the Elements ſhall melt with fervent heat, that the heavens ſhall periſh and vaniſh away as the ſmoak, that they ſhall be diſſolved and rowled together as a ſcroll, that they ſhall fall as a withered leaf or as a dry fig from the tree, that they ſhall paſs, yea, paſs away with a great noiſe: from all which it is collected and concluded that there ſhall be a total abolition of the viſible heavens at the day of the reſurrection.

Many arguments are brought to confirm this, chiefly from the uſeleſneſs of theſe creatures in that ſtate: when man ſhall have no more need of the heavens, why ſhould the heavens be any more? what ſhall man do with the Sun, or the ſtars to enlighten him, with earth or water, with beaſts or fouls to feed or ſerve him, when he ſhall have a ſpiritual body, and be raiſed to a ſtate of incorruption? he ſhall be lifted above the uſe of theſe things, and why ſhould that be, which will be of no uſe?

Again heaven and earth ſerve here to ſhew us the inviſible things of God, the footſteps of his eternal power and Godhead are ſeen in the things which are made. But when man ſhall ſee God face to face, when God ſhall fully manifeſt himſelf, what need we any more theſe glaſſes? He that hath a good eye cares not for ſpectacles: man who is the nobleſt of viſible creatures in his preſent condition, ſhall be above the uſe of creatures in that condition. Hence ſome ſtate the queſtion thus, That when it is ſaid the heavens ſhall be no more, The meaning is not, that they ſhall not be at all, but that they ſhall not be for thoſe ends and uſes, to which they now ſerve and were at firſt ſet up.

Vetuſtas iſta in cælis non ſecundũ diminutionẽ intelligẽda eſt, ſed quantum ad uſum & miniſterium quod poſt judicium ceſſabit. Bold.

Hæc in ſubſtantia ſemper ſunt permanſura & tantũ immutanda in meliorẽ ſtaſtatũ, electorũ ſplendori & gloriæ accommodatiorem. Merc.

Laſtly, Many reſolve it thus, that the heavens ſhall continue according to their ſubſtance, not according to their preſent quality; they ſhall not be annihilated (ſay they) but bettered. As if when God brings man to glory in heaven, he will bring the heavens to glory alſo. And that as the beauty of the creature hath been darkned by the ſin of man, ſo it ſhall receive greater beauty when the ſin of man is done away. The Apoſtles language enclines to this (Rom. 8. 21.) The creature it ſelf alſo ſhall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the ſons of God. So that till the heavens be no more is according to this poſition, till the heavens continue no more in their preſent ſtate, but are brought to one more perfect, where the alteration will be ſo great, that it may well be ſaid, they ſhall be no more what they now are. As we ſay of a man who is much changed either in mind or body, he is not the ſame man. For (ſay they) as the vile body of man ſhall then be faſhioned like to the glorious body of Chriſt, according to the mighty power of God, whereby he is able to ſubdue all things to himſelf; So the vileſt part of the frame of the world, much more the heavens, ſhall be put into a more excellent faſhion then now they are: The faſhion of the world paſſeth away, but God will put it in a faſhion which ſhall not paſs.

I ſhall not here interpoſe my own ſenſe in ſo great a variety of judgement among learned men, eſpecially, becauſe it is all one to the ſcope of the text I am upon, whether we underſtand it of a total abolition of theſe heavens, or of the reſtitution and renovation of them. For as according to the former interpretation theſe heavens will be no more at all, ſo according to the latter, theſe heavens will be no more as now they are, and ſo though then they be, they yet may be ſaid to be no more. And until the heavens in one of theſe ſenſes ſhall be no more, man lyeth down and riſeth no more, yea, as it followeth in the cloſe of the verſe,

They ſhall not awake nor be raiſed out of their ſleep.

Death is here compared to ſleep, and the reſurrection to awaking. The metaphor is very elegant, and it hath been opened at the thirteenth verſe of the third chapter, thither I refer the Reader.

Obſerve Firſt, from the former words, That the moſt durable creatures are periſhing, changeable creatures.

The heavens are an emblem of continuance: and (as hath been ſhewed) to ſay ſuch a thing ſhall be till the heavens be no more, is to ſay it ſhall ever be: yet theſe heavens are in a periſhing condition, and ſhall be, if not totally annihilated, yet ſo much altered from what they are, as will amount to this, they are no more: all thoſe Scriptures come up to that, if they reach not the other ſenſe, to which they put very hard. What is there of the creature to be truſted? earth is fading, yea, and heaven too: truſt not in the heavens, but in the God of heaven, of whom it is ſaid, in him there is no variableneſs nor ſhadow of change. God is ſo far from a real change, that he hath not the leaſt ſhadow of change. But creatures are ſo changeable that there is not in them a ſhadow of unchangeableneſs; It is no wonder to ſee the ſublunary world change, to ſee the ſtate of men change, the riches and peace of kingdoms change, the beauty and purity of a Church change, when even the heavens ſhall change and be no more what they have been; when we are taught that the moſt durable things periſh and change, how changeable are thoſe things which are moſt ſubject to periſhing?

Secondly, Conſider under what notions Job repreſents death, they ſhall not awake, nor be raiſed out of their ſleep.

Hence Obſerve, We ought to familiarize death to our ſelves, to put it under the faireſt and eaſieſt apprehenſions.

Some tranſlate death into ſuch terrible ſhapes, and repreſent it to themſelves under ſuch affrighting forms, that they live in bondage through the fear of death all their dayes; do as the ſpirit of God teacheth you: cloath it with pleaſant expreſſions, call it the undreſſing and uncloathing of your ſelves, call it reſt, conceive it under the notion of ſleep, and then you will not fear but wellcome it; Is any man afraid to go to bed? thus we ſhould allay the bitterneſs, beautifie the deformity, take off the edge, and pull out the ſting of death by ſuch ſweet and ſoft thoughts of it, as the ſpirit of God ſuggeſts. Sleep is a ſhort death, and death is but a long ſleep. The Babylonians are threatned with death under the name of a long ſleep; (Jer. 51. 57.) I will make drunk her Princes and her wiſe men, her Captains and her Rulers, and her mighty men: and they ſhall ſleep a perpetual ſleep and ſhall not awake. 'Tis a judgement to be caſt into a ſleep like death, but 'tis a mercy that death is but like a ſleep; To ſleep a perpetual ſleep and not to awake, is to die: but they who are dead ſhall awake out of ſleep. For as death is a ſleep, ſo it is but a ſleep: death is not a perpetual ſleep, though he who in ſtead of ſleeping, dieth, is ſaid to fall into a perpetual ſleep; Death compared with ordinary ſleep, is a perpetual ſleep, but death in it ſelf conſidered, or conſidered rather according to the appointment of God, is not a perpetual ſleep. There ſhall be an awakening and a riſing, we ſhall ſleep no more, when the heavens are no more. Job is expreſs for this in the ninteenth chapter, and here he aſſures us that man ſhall awake from the grave at laſt, while he ſaith it will be long ere he awake. Man hath done his work before he falls into this ſleep, but man muſt awake before he receive either his wages or reward, we muſt all appear before the judgement-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive according to what he hath done in the fleſh, whether it be good or evil. They (as was lately toucht) who have done evil ſhall receive their wages, and they who have done good ſhall receive a reward; Such as our work was when fell aſleep, ſuch will our receit be when we awake. Job was ſo full of this hope, that he ſhould both awake at that day, and receive a good reward, that he is even in haſt to go to bed, and petitions for a grave in the next verſe, to which I alſo haſten.

VERS. 13, 14.

O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave, that thou wouldeſt keep me in ſecret, until thy wrath be paſt, that thou wouldeſt appoint me a ſet time, and remember me.

If a man die, ſhall he live again? All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

JOB is an earneſt and an humble ſuiter, for that which nature leaſt deſires, yea for that which nature abhors. He petitions for the grave and woes death, as if there were ſome beauty in darkneſs or lovelineſs in that king of terrours.

Verſe 13. O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave, that thou wouldeſt keep me in ſecret, until thy wrath be paſt, that thou wouldeſt appoint me a ſet time, and remember me.

The words fall under various interpretations. Some conceive Job begging to be hid in the day of account, which is a day of wrath to the wicked, and of the Revelation of the righteous judgement of God to all. The Popiſh writers find here their Limbus patrum, or their imaginary receptacle of thoſe ſouls which died in faith, before Chriſt came in the fleſh; this, ſay they, is the ſecret place to which Job wiſhes he might retire; that by a preſent baniſhment from the world he might get out of the noiſe and ſence of thoſe evils, with which the ſcene of his life was fill'd and made uncomfortable.

Secondly, Say others, Job in this prayer for a grave, doth plainly renew that ſuit which he had made more then once before, to dye: As if he had ſaid, Conſidering my ſad eſtate, the burden and preſſures that lye upon me, death is better to me then life, and the grave more eligible then my bed-chamber; 'twere better for me to be under the earth, or in the earth, free among the dead, then to walk upon the earth, fettered with theſe afflictions, among the living.

Thirdly, That having ſaid, Man lying down ſhall not awake till the Heavens be no more; he only ſubjoyns that death would be welcome to him; nor would he move againſt it, if after he had paſſed that darkſome valley, he might in ſome reaſonable time return again to the land, and enjoy the light of the living; if a time for ſuch a return might be ſet, then he could chearfully deſcend into the grave: but as Job had often argued the impoſſibility (conſidering the Decrees of God concerning dying man) of ſuch a return, ſo I cannot conceive him aiming at the grant of it in this requeſt, and therefore I lay it by, as an unſuteable and improper interpretation.

Fourthly, That which carrieth the ſence moſt clearly is, that Job ſpeaks like a man beſieged with trouble, and compaſſed about with ſad diſtractions: who makes requeſt for this and that, and he knows not what; he looks for ſomething to eaſe his grief, and therefore wiſheth for any thing, whatever comes next to hand, or lyes uppermoſt in his thoughts, he cares not what it be, ſo it be not what it is; put me under ground, hide me in the earth, Lord, do what thou wilt with me, ſo I may be ſet at liberty, from the bonds and chains of my preſent preſſing miſeries, if I could but get releaſe from this priſon, ſend me to the priſon of the grave, and I readily ſubmit to thy good pleaſure, yea, that would be pleaſing unto me: O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave.

The grave hath been opened before, and the manner of this wiſh about it (Chap. 6. 8.) Who will give, who will beſtow the favour of a burial upon me, and put me into the poſſeſſion of the houſe of death. He ſpeaks as if his requeſt were not only difficult, but only not impoſſible: or as if it would be coſtly to the granter.

Who will hide me in the grave?] Hide me as a treaſure, ſo the Original intimates. Treaſures are hidden things, as the notation both of the Greek and Latine words teacheth. A treaſure is ſubſtance or riches laid up for the day following, or for the time to come: O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave, yet not as traſh, but treaſure; not as a rotten carcaſs, but as a precious jewel: The bodies of Believers are treaſure as well as their ſouls; their earthly part is precious as well as their heavenly.

The grave may be taken two wayes: Firſt, Strictly and literally, for the place of burial, or for the houſe of death.

Whence Note, That the grave is a hiding place; the grave is a ſure hiding place.

When we are once hidden there, we lye open to no more violence: The grave is a ſhelter from all ſtorms: We need not fear that it will either rain or blow through that houſe; that's the reaſon why they in the Book of the Revelation deſired death when the vials of Gods wrath were pouring out upon the earth. Though ſome have not been free from the rage of men in the grave, yet none have felt it. O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave: I have met with this ſtrain of ſorrow before, therefore I do but touch it here.

Secondly, As the grave in Scripture is taken for the place of the dead: ſo for any place where the living are hid, or hide themſelves.

Qui a communi hominum conſortio ſuperari, ſive ut imminentia ſibi pericula ſive debita ſupplicia declinarent, in cavernis etiam in ſepulchris habitare ſolebant. Bold.

A ſecret place is the grave of a living man.

In times of perſecution the Saints were forced to bury themſelves alive, becauſe the malicious enemy ſought their lives, (Hab. 11. 36.) They wandred in deſarts, and in mountains, and in dens, and in caves of the earth: Thus the old Believers were buried alive: It is ſaid of Obadiah (1 Kings 18.) That he hid the Lords Prophets by fifty in a cave: Theſe caves were graves of living men. Some underſtand Job's meaning of ſuch a grave: and that he did not deſire death, but the ſecuring of his life, or to be hid alive, not to be hid in death; He would be ſomewhere in ſafe cuſtody, out of the reach of thoſe troubles which annoyed him; The next clauſe doth ſomewhat favour this ſence, O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave.

And keep me ſecret.] Theſe words are but an explication or repetition of the former; Job doubles his requeſt, to ſhew how ſtrongly his heart was fixt upon it: O that thou wouldeſt keep me ſecret. How long?

Until thy wrath be paſt.] That is, the effects of wrath: The letter of the Original is, Thy noſtril, becauſe in the noſe or noſtrils wrath and anger ſhew themſelves; we breathe anger; and the breath of the Lord is nothing elſe but his wrath, which like a ſtream of brimſtone kindles the fiery Tophet, (Iſa. 30. 33.) Job deſires the Lord to let this breath paſs, and then he is willing to appear out of his grave, or to be kept no longer ſecret: As if he had ſaid, I cannot ſtand in the open view of thy wrath, or in the face of thy fierce diſpleaſure; Oh that thou wouldeſt hide me till thy wrath be paſt. God put Moſes in the clift of the rock, and hid him with his hand, while his glory paſſed by (Exod. 33. 12.) much more have we need to be hid while the wrath of God paſſeth by, or until his wrath be paſt.

Naſus, ira, quæ tumente & fumante naſo manifeſtari ſolet.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, God in his actings towards man ſhews himſelf like a wrathful man.

The wrath of God is not a paſſion in him, but an action towards us. He acts as men when they are angry; but he ſuffers nothing by his anger: He ſmites and wounds, and pulls down and deſtroyes like a wrathful, yea, an inraged man; yet he doth this in the exacteſt frame, and ſweeteſt compoſure of his ſpirit: The wrath of God never diſjoynts him, never puts him out of order, as the wrath of man doth. The wrath of man is the rage of man; but the wrath of God is the reaſon of God. His wrath toward all is full of ſerenity, and it is full of tender mercy to his own.

Secondly, Job fearing the wrath of God reſorts to God for ſhelter and hiding, O that thou wouldeſt hide me till thy wrath be paſt. When a man (whom we fear) is angry with us, we run from him, and go to ſome friend with this requeſt, O that you would hide me till the wrath of this man be over. When Rebeckah underſtood that her ſon Eſau was wroth with Jacob, and comforted himſelf purpoſing to kill him, ſhe adviſeth Jacob to flee to his Uncle Laban, and tarry there, till his Brothers wrath ſhould turn away (Gen. 27. 43, 44.) She doth not direct him to go to Eſau, and deſire protection from him till his own wrath were turned away. Were it not ſtrange if a King being wroth with one of his ſubjects, he ſhould go to the ſame King and ſay, O hide me till thy wrath be paſt; yet thus Job ſpeaks.

Hence Obſerve, That our only refuge from the wrath of God, is God himſelf.

Nothing can hide us from the wrath of God but the mercy of God. As God hides his people from the wrath of men (Pſal. 27. 5.) In the time of trouble he ſhall hide me in his Pavilion, in the ſecret of his Tabernacle ſhall he hide me. And again, In the ſhadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until theſe calamities be overpaſt: As (I ſay) God hides his people from the wrath of men, ſo alſo from his own wrath. When a Believer apprehends God angry, he knows not whither to go, but unto God: He appeals from God to God; from an angry God to a pleaſed God; from the wrath of God to the mercy of God; from God in himſelf to God in his Son. Carnal men have poor ſhifts, when God is angry they hide in man: Can the power and mercy of a creature be a covering againſt the wrath and indignation of the Creator? Yet this is all the covering which a carnal man inquires after. The Kings and Captains (Rev. 6.) call upon the rocks and mountains to hide them; that is, they apply themſelves to worldly means, to worldly helps and powers, to theſe they cry, hide us from the wrath of God; but they know not what this meaneth, to make the love of God a refuge from the anger of God. Such a ſpirit Chriſt diſcovers while he forbids the tears of the daughters of Jeruſalem (Luke 23. 30.) Weep not for me, but weep for your ſelves, and for your children: Why ſo? Sad dayes are coming, ſo ſad, That they ſhall ſay to the mountains fall on us, and to the hills cover us; not as if they ſhould think the hills would hear or pity them; but becauſe they cou'd find none to do it, and they might as ſoon make a mountain move to their help, as move men to help them.

Again, Mountains and hills may be taken there for the greateſt powers and ſtrengths of men; or for men of great ſtrength and power: In which ſence it is ſaid in the ſecond of Iſaiah, The day of the Lord ſhall be againſt the high mountains: So then, to call to the mountains for covering in a day of trouble, is at beſt but to expect it at the hand of man. Theſe are miſerable ſhifts. God doth ſo overrule the world by his providence, that ſometimes the earth helps the woman (Rev. 12. 16.) in a day of trouble; but the woman (that is, the true Church) doth not cry to the earth (meer men of the world) for help; God makes the hills and mountains cover his people in a day of his wrath; but they do not go to hills and mountains for covering againſt his wrath. David puts the queſtion (Pſal. 139. 8.) Whither ſhall I fly from thy preſence? He reſolves it preſently, that neither Heaven, nor hell, nor the uttermoſt parts of the earth could afford him a corner for ſecurity, or a hiding-place from the hand of God: We muſt look for a protecting hand in God, when we are afraid of his ſmiting hand; Only divine love hides from divine wrath. This was ſhadowed in the deſcription of the Ark, in which the Tables of the Law were laid up (Exod. 25.) There the Mercy-ſeat was put upon the Ark, the Cherubims covering it with their wings, implying that the mercy of God only protects us from his wrath. The wrath of God is cauſed by ſin (which is the tranſgreſſion of the Law) but to ſhew that mercy covers from wrath, the Mercy-ſeat was made to cover the Ark wherein that Law was reſerved, which diſcovers both the ſin of man, and the wrath of God againſt it. The wrath of God had never been revealed againſt man, if man had not ſinned againſt the Law; yet now God ſits between the Cherubims over the Mercy-ſeat, to cover that Law which through ſin cauſeth wrath: With one hand he gives a Law, and with another hand he hides us from wrath: Out of his hand went a fiery Law, (Deut. 33. 2.) and out of his hand went a ſhining Goſpel, and with that a Sun of righteouſneſs with healing in his wings: When that fire would burn us, this Sun warms us; while the flames of that would conſume us, the wings of this overſhadowed us, and hid us till the wrath of God be paſt. Thus our hiding from the wrath of God is in the love of God. Hence alſo that gracious invitation (Iſa. 26. 20.) Come my people, enter into your chambers, until the indignation be overpaſt: Thoſe chambers into which God invited his people are none other, but himſelf: When they could not build, or find out chambers to hide themſelves while his indignation ſmoaked, himſelf will be their chamber. One of the Ancients interprets thoſe chambers to be the grave, into which the Saints ſhould willingly go to hide themſelves in the time of Antichriſts rage, of which he conceives that to be a prophecy. However, we are ſure the name of the Lord is not only a hiding chamber, but a ſtrong tower; the righteous run into it, and are ſafe. O that thou wouldeſt hide me until thy wrath be paſt.

Tertul. lib. de reſur. carnis. Bold.

Thirdly, Job perceiving a ſtorm of wrath about him, dares not hide it, but ſeeks a hiding place.

Hence Obſerve, Man is not able to bear the wrath of God, or to ſtand before God when he is angry.

Job was a man of unſpotted integrity, perfect, upright, fearing God, eſchewing evil, yet he was afraid when God appeared in wrathful diſpenſations. The wrath of God as threatened in the Word, is ſlighted by unbelievers; but when it is felt either in the conſcience or upon the fleſh, the ſtouteſt run and hide: The love of God is undervalued by thoſe who know it not; but a ſoul that hath once taſted that the Lord is gracious, and lives in the love of God, this ſoul is ſwallowed up with love, and values it more then life. 'Tis ſo with thoſe who know not the wrath of God, their hearts being hardened: They ſay with Pharaoh, Who is the Lord? But when conſcience is awakened, the heart touched, the eye opened, then horror and amazement take hold of them, as pain upon a woman in travel; (Iſa. 2. 19.) They ſhall go into the holes of the rocks, and to the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his Majeſty, when he ariſeth to ſhake terribly the earth. When God comes with terrible ſhakings, they ſhall hide themſelves, whoſe terror made others ſhake. The wrath of a powerful man is dreadful, The wrath of a King (ſaith Solomon) is as the roaring of a Lyon; What then is the wrath of God? If Rebeckah was ſo ſenſible of the wrath of Eſau againſt Jacob, that ſhe durſt not venture Jacob into his angry preſence: What are they, who make no haſte to be hidden from an angry God; or to have the anger of God appeaſed, and turned away from them?

Fourthly Obſerve, There may be ſenſible feelings of the wrath of God, even upon thoſe who are deareſt unto God.

It is Job that prayes, Hide me till thy wrath be overpaſt: There was indeed more fear of wrath among Believers under legal adminiſtrations, then after that fuller breaking forth and appearance of the grace of God, bringing ſalvation under the Goſpel: So we may underſtand that of the Apoſtle (Rom. 8. 15.) Ye have not received the ſpirit of bondage to fear again. Paul (according to this interpretation) ſpeaks not of a perſon, but of the whole ſtate of the Church; giving the ſence thus, Ye have not received the ſpirit of bondage to fear, ye are under the Goſpel; the ſpirit of bondage was that which properly belonged to the times of the Law; when little of Goſpel light appeared, fear and terror held the people of God in bondage. But this is the time of grace, the day of love, the day of ſhedding the love of God abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghoſt; therefore be of good chear, live like free-men and like ſons, not like bond-men or ſervants.

Ante Chriſtum erat δουλεία, δειλία & φόβος θανάτου.

Fifthly, He prayes, Hide me till thy wrath be paſt: Job was ſenſible of wrath, but he knew aſſuredly that it was not abiding wrath.

Hence Obſerve, The wrath of God to his own people, is not an everlaſting wrath.

The wrath of God againſt wicked men is an everlaſting wrath, they cannot be hid till the wrath of God be overpaſt, for it will never paſs, (John 3. 36.) He that believeth not the Son, ſhall not ſee life, but the wrath of God abideth upon him, and ſhall abide to all eternity. The appearings of wrath are terrible, but who can abide the abidings of wrath? Who may abide the day of his coming? And who ſhall ſtand when he appeareth? For he is like a Refiners fire (Mal. 3. 2.) Wicked men cannot abide the coming of Chriſt, when he is but like refining fire to purge out their droſs; How then will they abide the day of his coming, when he is like conſuming fire, to devour both them and their droſs?

Sixthly, Job was under grievous pains, a cup of ſorrow was put to his mouth; yet he moves not ſo much to have the cup of ſorrow paſs from him, as to have the wrath of God paſs from him.

Hence Obſerve, A good heart is more ſenſible of divine diſpleaſure, then of outward pain.

He fears the appearance of wrath more then the feeling of ſmart. It is a work of grace to be afraid of the anger of God, and it provokes him as much when his wrath, as when his love is ſlighted. Many tremble at the corrections of God; but there are few who tremble at the anger of God. The holy Prophet (Jer. 10. 24.) ſeems to invite correction, ſo he might be free from anger, Correct me, O Lord, but not in thine anger: Let me ſee thou loveſt me, and then ſmite me if thou wilt: Anger ſmarts worſe then any rod upon the ſoul of a believer; but 'tis the rod of God, not the wrath of God which makes an unbeliever ſmart. Let there be no more mighty hail and thunder, take away this death, ſaith a Pharaoh; Take away thy diſpleaſure, let thy wrath paſs, ſaith a Job, a David; yet at laſt the wrath of God will be more painful then pain, more deadly then death it ſelf to a Pharaoh, wrath will burn hotter then fire in hell for evermore.

Patet hinc tam acerbū eſſe omnibus iræ Dei ſenſum, ut nihil ſit quod homines non perferre malint. Merl.

Laſtly, See Job's temper here; he trembled at the wrath of God, and was afraid: We read him full of faith and confidence, Chap. 13. 16, 18.) I know I ſhall be juſtified, and he alſo ſhall be my ſalvation: There he ſtood in the light of the favour of God; here he is clouded with fear, and compaſſed about with darkneſs.

Hence Obſerve, That the beſt of Believers do not alwayes retain the ſame degree, and evidences of holy faith.

Their eſtate is alwayes ſure; but their eſtate is not alwayes clear: Their condition is the ſame; but their apprehenſions about it vary: Now they overflow with joy becauſe they ſee the pleaſed face of God; ſoon after they are filled with fear, and would be hidden from his wrath. O that thou wouldeſt hide me till thy wrath be paſt; that's his firſt wiſh.

That thou wilt appoint me a ſet time.

This is his ſecond wiſh.

But for what? or to what purpoſe would he have a ſet time? Times relate to things or actions. As to every purpoſe there is a time ſet (Eccleſ. 3. 1.) ſo, to a ſet time ſuppoſeth a purpoſe for it: What was Job's purpoſe for which he thus earneſtly deſires a time might be ſet.

We may very clearly refer it to the wiſh foregoing, O that thou wouldeſt hide me in the grave: As if he had ſaid, as I beg to go to bed in the grave, ſo I beg of thee to appoint me a ſet time when I ſhall go to that deſired and longed for bed of the grave. O that thou wouldeſt appoint me a time.

The word which we tranſlate ſet time, ſignifies properly a Statute, a Law, or Ordinance: There is a double Law, a Law of things, and a Law of times, and the word bears both, therefore we tranſlate well, O that thou wouldeſt appoint me a ſet time, or a law concerning the time; but dares Job ask God a ſet time? God ſets us a time, but may we deſire God to ſet us a time? The Jews were reproved for this by Moſes (Pſal. 78. 47.) They limited the holy One of Iſrael; they put him to a time, or ſet him a day, by which if he did not help them, they did not believe he could help them. It is inſufferable preſumption to ſet God a time. And it wants not danger to move God to ſet us a time. All the actings of Job in this ſtate are not warrantable: Many of them are not for our imitation, but caution: Job expreſſeth a troubled ſpirit while he prayes for an abatement of his trouble: This prayer was not the breathing of his grace, but the breaking forth of his ſorrow: He would be in the grave, he would have a ſet time, he muſt have things brought to an iſſue: In all this we ſee not a rule for prayer, but an error for paſſion.

Sciamus hæc perturbatum vi mali, Jobū dicere, nec cērtè nec quicquam hinc poſſe colligi, niſi quod levationem mali quoque modo poſtulat. Merc.

Non eſt quod hæc quis accuratius ad legitimæ orationis leges exigat. Merl.

Hence Note, That extremity of pain may put a good man upon unadviſed petitions.

A diſtreſſed ſoul often makes diſtracted prayers, and deſires more that his own will, then that the will of God may be done. The will of God, his word of command, or his word of promiſe are our rule and warrant what to ask. They ask beſides all the rules which God hath ſet who ask a ſet time. Hence take two deductions.

Firſt, That it is the ſole priviledge of God to ſet and appoint times.

As God hath appointed to men the bounds of their habitation, ſo alſo he hath determined the times, (Acts 17.26.) And as he hath ſet the time of nations and people in general, ſo of ſingular perſons, My times are in thy hand (ſaith David, Pſal. 31. 15.) That is, thou haſt the diſpoſe of them: While he ſaith my times, he doth not ſpeak himſelf the Maſter, but the ſervant of time. Again, My times are in thy hand; that is, all my times, I reſerve none of them in my own hand: My times of trouble, and my times of comfort; my times of joy, and my times of ſorrow; my times of honour, and my times of reproach; when I ſhall fall into affliction, and when I ſhall be delivered out of affliction; how long I ſhall live, and when I ſhall dye; all theſe times are in thy hand. Nor did David at all deſire to have his times, or any part of his times out of Gods hand: And as it is our duty to leave our times in Gods hand; ſo it is our comfort that they are in ſo good, in ſo wiſe a hand: We ſhould not only be content, but rejoyce that our times are there. Man is not wiſe enough to uſe the times which God ſets him; much leſs is he wiſe enough to ſet his own times.

Secondly Note, It is our duty to refer all the circumſtances of our petitions to the wiſdom of God.

We may be ſuiters to God, but we muſt not be his counſellers, nor our own carvers when or where, how much or by what means we would have the mercies which we ask for. Job ſpake well in one reſpect, though he would have a ſet time; yet he took not upon him to ſet the time. It was his failing to deſire a ſet time; but it had been a great ſin for him to ſet the time. Man muſt expect a law from God; he muſt not give himſelf a law; much leſs may he give the law to God. O that thou wouldeſt appoint me a ſet time,

And that thou wouldeſt remember me.

Et conſtituas mihi tempus in qua recorderis mei. Vulg.

This is his third deſire; He would be remembred: Some joyn theſe two latter wiſhes into one, O that thou wouldeſt appoint a ſet time wherein to remember me: But for what, or in what would he be remembred? Either thus, Remember to hide me in the grave at that ſet time; or Lord when thou hideſt me in the grave be pleaſed to remember me: The grave is a place of forgetfulneſs; David complains (Pſal. 31. 12.) I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind: Job is willing to be among the dead; but not to be forgotten, or out of the mind of God: Let the world forget me, I can bear that; but I cannot bear it that God ſhould forget me: O that thou wouldeſt remember me. Heman (Pſal. 88. 5.) deſcribing his ſorrows, ſaith he, was free among the dead, like as the ſlain that lye in the grave, whom thou remembreſt no more. Dead men are, as if they were, not only out of the memory of men, but of God himſelf: Job was content to dye out of the world, but not to dye out of the memory of God: He liked a grave of earth; but he liked not the grave of forgetfulneſs: Set me a time for the grave, and remember to hide me there, or remember me when I am hidden there.

Laſtly, This prayer, Remember me, may be underſtood as a general prayer for good at the hand of God: The remembrance of God intimates all good to man. 'Tis good enough if he remember us for good, as Nehemiah prayed he would: To remember notes chiefly theſe two things, Firſt, To value and eſteem: Worthleſs things are not fit for a treaſury, much leſs for our memory: Who would keep a record of that which no man cares to know; nor ſhall be the wiſer if he do know it?

Secondly, It notes care. When we would help a friend or do him a curteſie, we remember him and have him often in our thoughts.

Aquinas putat divinam recordationem ſumi pro reſurrectione & vita. Iſta phraſis recordari alicujus in ſacro codice ſæpe uſurpatur ab iis qui prolem à Deo poſtulant, præſertim maſculinam. Bold.

A זכר quæ hic habetur venit, Zachar i.e. maſculus quaſi patris memoria.

Some reſtrain Job's requeſt for remembrance to that ſpecial act of power and mercy, the raiſing of his body from the grave. Others confine it to the repairing of his broken family, and the gift of children in ſtead of thoſe who were ſlain: As if he deplored the loſs of his ſons and daughters, and that he was as a tree cut down, which ſends out no ſuckers; or that he was (as that Eunuch ſaith of himſelf in the Prophet) a dry tree, which bears neither leaf nor fruit. And therefore prayes, O that thou wouldeſt remember me in this. The word is often uſed by God in reference to that ſpecial mercy, The giving of children; Rachel was barren a great while, yet at laſt, (the Text ſaith) the Lord remembred Rachel (Gen. 30. 22.) Hanna being barren prays in this ſtile (1*Sam.*1.11.) O Lord of hoſts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thy handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thy handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man-child, then, &c. The Hebrew word ſignifying a man-child (not that uſed by Hanna) ſprings from this root, becauſe a man-child preſerves the memory of the family; whereas the female, or daughter, looſeth her name in marriage. The anſwer which God gave to Hanna, runs alſo in the ſame ſtile (ver. 16.) And Elkanah knew Hanna his wife, and the Lord remembred her. When the Lord took away Job's children, he took from him his remembrance; or thoſe who would have preſerved his name and memory: which Bildad ſeems to aim at in his deſcription of the judgments of God upon wicked men (Job 18. 17.) His remembrance ſhall periſh in the earth, and he ſhall have no name in the ſtreets: That is, he ſhall have no ſon to bear his name, or to keep his memorial alive, when he is dead.

Now whether we underſtand this paſſage in general, or reſtrain it to either of theſe particulars, we may learn,

That there is nothing more deſirable then to be remembred of God; and that to be remembred of God is the accompliſhment of all our deſires.

We can ask no more of God but to remember us: For as our remembrance of God is the ſum of all our duty to him: ſo Gods remembrance of us is the ſum of all his mercies to us. When the Ark had floated and had been toſſed many dayes upon the waters of that mighty deluge, the Text ſaith, God remembred Noah (Gen. 8. 3.) Though our Ark be driven in a tempeſtuous ſea, yet it ſhall neither ſink nor ſplit, while we ſail in the thoughts of God. It may be much if ſome men remember us: When Joſeph a priſoner had expounded the Butlers dream to liberty and enlargement, all the fee he asked for his pains was, Remember me when thou comeſt to Pharaoh: That is, ſpeak a good word for me, do me a curteſie at Court, when thou art reſtored thither. The ungrateful Butler forgot Joſeph, but God did not: And though Pharaoh's Butler did not remember Joſeph for interpreting his dream, yet God ſent Pharaoh a dream, which at laſt cauſed the Butler to remember both his own fault againſt Pharaoh, and his forgetfulneſs of Joſeph. If God remember us, he will find out ſome way or other that men ſhall. And though a friend, who loves us and keeps us in his memory, may not be able to do us good (he may want power though he want no good will) yet the power of God is as ſtrong as his memory, he is able to do us good, and can command all, both perſons and things, to work together for our good. 'Tis a mercy, If God think upon us, though it be to afflict us, if he remembers us, though it be with a rod; (even that remembrance is an evidence of his care over us, and love to us.) Then how comfortable is it for him to remember us with a ſtaffe for our ſupport and comfort!

The thief upon the croſs gathers all his petitions into this one, Lord, remember me when thou comeſt to thy Kingdom. If we have but a place in the memory of Chriſt, we ſhall not want a place in the Kingdom of Chriſt. Let us get into the heart of God, and we are ſure enough to have all the holy deſires of our own hearts: If we once have a place in the heart of God, he will not caſt us out of his memory, though he caſt us into trouble. He remembers his in priſon and in chains, in ſick beds, and in the valley of the ſhadow of death: Though he bury us in the grave, yet he will not bury his thoughts of us. We uſe to ſay of men, Out of ſight, out of mind; but, as we cannot be hid in any ſecret place out of the ſight of God, ſo God will never let us fall out of his mind.

From all take this deduction.

> If it be ſuch a treaſure of love and mercy to have God remember us, what a treaſure of wrath and miſery is it to be everlaſtingly forgotten by God!

Wicked men ſhall never be remembred by God for good; nor ſhall they ever be forgotten for evil. The memory which God keeps of them, and of what they have done, will torment them as much as their own memory of it will. How glad would they be if God would but forget them! How would they be if they could forget themſelves! But as they can remember no good they have done; ſo they ſhall not forget the evil they have done: And as God will not remember them for good; ſo he cannot (becauſe he will not, and he will not becauſe he is juſt) forget to pour out upon them the utmoſt and extreameſt evils.

Job having preſented God with this threefold requeſt; to be hid in the grave, to have a ſet time appointed him, and to be remembred: He paſſeth from petitioning to a ſtrange kind of queſtioning, and from both to the higheſt and nobleſt kind of reſolving.

Verſe 14. If a man dye, ſhall he live again? All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.

There is much variety of conjecture about the meaning of theſe words.

Take this precaution, Job doth not ſpeak here as doubting, whether a man that dyes ſhall live any more: He is clear for the reſurrection of the body unto life, and for the life eternal of whole man after the reſurrection. It is uſual both in Scripture and common uſage to propound that by way of doubt or queſtion, which yet is held as an undoubted poſition. Job did neither doubt that man ſhall dye, nor that he ſhall live again, though he put an if to the one, and a queſtion about the other.

Non eſt dubitantis de reſurrectione mortuorũ ad vitam æternam.

The Chaldee Paraphraſt ſeems to underſtand him of eternal life, but applyes it to a wicked man: If a man dye: That is, if a wicked man dye, ſhall he live again? Shall he injoy eternall life? No, though he live eternally, yet he ſhall not enjoy life one moment. His ſecond life ſhall be the ſecond death. He ſhall live as life notes the union of ſoul and body; but he ſhall not live as life notes the communion of man with God.

Si mortuus fuerit vir impius, fierine poteſt ut vivat? Chald.

But though this be true, yet I conceive it quite beſides Job's ſcope.

Philippus.

Secondly, Others interpret it of the reſurrection in general: And render the queſtion as an admiration: If a man dye, ſhall he live again! He ſhall live; and is it not wonderful that he ſhould! The reſurrection is a miraculous work; it ſhould raiſe our thoughts about the power of the everliving God, when we hear his power can raiſe man from death to everlaſting life.

Tantum opus admiratur, non negat. Merc.

Yet uſually in Scripture when the interrogation is put with a negative particle, the ſence is negative, as (Pſal. 56. 7.) Shall they eſcape by iniquity? No, they ſhall not eſcape: And when the interrogation is put with a negative particle, the ſence is affirmative: As (Jer. 5. 9.) Shall I not viſit for theſe things, ſaith the Lord, and ſhall not my ſoul be avenged on ſuch a Nation as this? Yes, I will viſit for theſe things, and my ſoul ſhall be avenged on ſuch a Nation as this. According to this interpretation, If a man dye, ſhall he live again? muſt be rendred by a denial, he ſhall not live again. Hence

In ſcripturis interrogatio aſſerens negationi ſimilis eſt, & negans aſſertioni.

A third opinion expounds it by a plain negation, If a man dye, ſhall he live again? No, he ſhall not; that is, he ſhall not live in this world, nor return any more to a natural life. And hence

A fourth interprets Job as ſpeaking conditionally, or upon an impoſſible ſuppoſition: As if he had ſaid, I know and am aſſured, That if a man dyes he cannot live again a life of nature. But if ſuch a thing might be, and God would appoint me a ſet time when it ſhould be, how willingly would I dye and wait all thoſe dayes of my appointed time (how many ſoever they ſhould be) till my change come; that is, till God reſtore me from the ſtate of death and the grave, to ſuch an eſtate of outward comforts and abundance as I once enjoyed. But I cannot conceive Job ſo in love with a natural life, as thus to hanker after it by ſuch remote conditions, and groundleſs wiſhes; And therefore,

Conditionaliter ſumi putat Cajetanus.

Fifthly, I incline to thoſe, who expound the queſtion in the firſt part of the verſe, as an abſolute negation: If a man dye, he ſhall live no more; that is, a natural life. And the latter part of the verſe, (All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come) as a teſtimony either of his ſubmiſſion to the will of God for the time of his death, or of his faith, and full aſſurance of a reſurrection to eternal life: As if he had ſaid, Though when I dye I ſhall not live again in this world, yet I am willing to dye when God will, and I believe I ſhall live again in the world to come, and do therefore wait in faith till this change ſhall come. Hence

Sixthly, Job is here conceived correcting his former wiſh, and reprehending himſelf for it: As if he had ſaid, I indeed deſired the Lord to appoint me a ſet time, when he would reſtore me; but why do I vex my ſelf and trouble the Lord with vain wiſhes, as if this were a petition befitting me to ask, or God to grant? Why ſhould I expect that which was never granted to any man, That being dead I might live again?

Quaſi ſeipſũ reprehendat, quod talia oret, &c. Sanct.

Laſtly, Some give out his meaning thus, If thou wouldeſt grant me my wiſh, and hide me in the grave, appointing me a ſet time, when thou wouldeſt be pleaſed to do this for me; then ſhould I think my ſelf happy, becauſe if I were once dead, I know I ſhall return no more to the miſeries of this life, upon which condition I would be glad to wait with patience for the grave, what time ſoever thou ſhouldſt appoint me, till that my change by death ſhould come: or, being dead and laid in my grave, I would wait thy appointed time for my reſurrection unto life.

All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come.

That God appoints out the time of man, and that man ſhall live out and cannot outlive that appointment, was ſhewed at the fifth verſe: I will not here renew that diſcourſe.

The Hebrew is, All the dayes of my warfare. The reaſon of which hath alſo been ſhewed (Chap. 7. 1.) The dayes of man are but travel and warfare, a continual combat with temptations and tryals, as was opened there: The Scripture delights to ſet forth the ſorrows of mans life under thoſe two ſimilitudes of a wayfaring man and a warfaring man. Under both notions, the duty of the Text (waiting) is alſo ſhadowed.

Cunctis diebus militiæ meæ expectabo. Mon.

To wait hath four things in it.

Firſt, An act of patience; he that waits muſt be content to ſtay: He that believes will not make haſte; that is, he waits; and he that waits makes haſte to believe, or hope, which is the ſecond thing.

Secondly, It hath an act of hope in it; he that waiteth is in expectation to receive: He hopes mercy will come at laſt: To wait upon God implyes there is ſomewhat to be had from God. He that hath no hope will never wait.

Thirdly, An act of humility; he that is in a waiting condition is in a low condition: And as his condition is low, ſo his ſpirit ſhould be lowly; waiting ſpeaks the duty of a ſervant.

Fourthly, The waiting here intended carries in it utmoſt perſeverance, All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait. Some wait, but 'tis only for a time: They are ſhort-breath'd, and their patience quickly tires. That wicked King ſaid, This evil is of the Lord, why ſhould I wait upon him any longer? (2 Kings 6. 33.) He that waits indeed, continues waiting, he waits long, and he will wait yet longer. As a good heart will not let God wait long, no nor at all (willingly) for obedience; ſo he is willing to wait as long as God ſees good for deliverance. We muſt not let God ſtay long for our work; but we muſt ſtay as long as God pleaſeth for his work.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, It is our duty to wait Gods time fully.

All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait; and this both in regard of perſonal and of publick deſires or needs, (Hab. 2. 2, 3.) The viſion is for an appointed time, but at the end it ſhall ſpeak and not lye; that is, it ſhall not fail: All failing is a kind of lying: He that fails of truth when he ſpeaks, lyes in a word; and he that fails of performing what he ſpeaks, lyes indeed. The viſion of God ſpeaks and will not lye; but it ſpeaks not till the end; therefore we muſt wait till the end: So the Prophet adviſeth in the next words, Though it tarry, wait for it, for it will certainly come, and not tarry. It will not tarry beyond the time; but it may tarry to the very end of the time: then wait the longeſt day, and to the utmoſt of that day. It is ſaid, that the people of Iſrael were aſhamed, when they ſaw that Moſes ſtaid ſo long (Exod. 33.) they could wait no longer, they thought he was loſt in the Mount: Come, let us make us Gods, to go before us, for as for this Moſes we know not what is become of him: They who will not ſtay for God, make haſte to Idols; and they who will not wait in the way of God, run deſtructive wayes. Samuel directed Saul to go down to Gilgal, and there to ſtay for him ſeven dayes (1 Sam. 10. 8.) according to this appointment Saul tarried ſeven dayes (1 Sam 13. 8.) but Samuel came not, and the people were ſcattered from him: hereupon Saul calls for the burnt-offering and peace-offerings, and he offered his burnt-offering: And was he not to be excuſed in this? Had not he waited long enough? Samuel ſaid he could come the ſeventh day, and Saul waited for him ſeven dayes: Why then doth Samuel chide with him (at the eleventh verſe) ſaying, What haſt thou done? Saul anſwers, Becauſe thou cameſt not within the dayes appointed, I forced my ſelf and offered a burnt-offering. But would Samuel break promiſe? Was there yea and nay with him? How is it then that Saul ſaith, He came not at the time appointed: Saul ſtaid ſeven dayes, but he ſtaid not ſeven dayes quite out; he ſtayed the ſeventh day, and a great part of it, and no Samuel came, but Saul would not ſtay the laſt hour: Samuel came at the end of the ſeventh day, and ſo made his word good; but becauſe Saul waited not to the end of the ſeventh day, he fell into that great evil. Thou haſt done fooliſhly, ſaith Samuel, (ver. 13.) and thy Kingdom ſhall not continue, becauſe thy patience was ſo ſhort, thy power ſhall be ſhortened. Take heed of giving up your hopes: Say not the Lords time is paſt, he will not come. We know what they do who are obliged to pay money upon bonds, on a certain day. It ſatisfies not the Law, that they waited at the place appointed, about noon or toward the evening of that day, and the Creditor came not, they muſt wait till the going down of the Sun, and then make the tender, or elſe the forfeiture may be taken. Thus we muſt wait on God to the laſt day, and every part of the laſt day, till our changes or our comforts come. If we give over before the Sun go down, we ſhall go down in darkneſs. Ye have need of patience (Heb. 10. 36, 37.) that when you have done the will of God, ye may receive the promiſe: That is, the thing promiſed. As we need the patience of labourers to do the will of God; ſo the patience of waiters, to tarry for our anſwer and reward.

I will wait till my change come.

And one would think Job needed not to wait long for that: for, ſaid he not (chap. 10. 17.) Changes and war are upon me? Job was under perpetual changes, and his were great changes, changes from a proſperous to an afflicted eſtate, from health to ſickneſs, from honour to diſgrace, from riches to poverty, and though his afflictions hung long upon him, yet he had changes of affliction; freſh and freſh evils, changes and war, or changes of war were againſt him: As he complained (chap. 10. 17.) God brought freſh Armies to charge him every day, and doth he now want a change? And who is there that liveth and doth not change? We change (though not ſenſibly, yet) in ſome ſence or other every moment. Changes are upon us, changes of time, of place, of condition, and of affection. Man continueth not (ſaith Job at the beginning of this Chapter) we are only conſtant in changes: What then is the meaning of this deſired change?

Man hath three great changes, and they are all three taken in here; according to a threefold opinion about the ininterpretation of theſe words.

Firſt, Some underſtand the change for which Job waited, to be a change in his outward condition. A change from weakneſs to ſtrength, from poverty to riches, from ſorrow to joy; he waited for deliverances from his preſent evil, and to be re-eſtabliſhed in his former comforts. Though Job needed (if ever man did) ſuch a change as this, yet (I conceive) this was not the change for which he promiſeth here to wait. But Donec veniet rerum viciſſitudo & ſtatus hic meus mutetur in melius. Bold.

Secondly, Till my change come; that is, till death come. Many both of the Rabbins and others go this way, and judge it the moſt proper interpretation, All the dayes of my appointed time I will wait, till I dye: Or, I will live waiting for a change by death: Death is a great change, the great change, not only of this or that man, but of mankind. Death brings a change to all, to good and bad, to believers, and to Infidels, though the change which it brings to theſe differing perſons be as different as their natures. When the Saints dye, they have a change, and no change: As a Worthy amongſt us once ſaid, when he was ready to dye, I ſhall change my place, but not my company: I ſhall have a new houſe, but my old ſociety: The Saints converſe with God, they live with God; while they live in the world, they converſe with Chriſt, and have communion with the Spirit; they converſe (among men) chiefly with good men on earth, and with all theſe they ſhall converſe in Heaven; here is no change: Yet the Saints have a great change, and a bleſſed one when they dye: They change from all outward evils, all their troubles ſhall be removed; they change alſo from ſpiritual evils, all their corruptions ſhall remove, there ſhall not be ſo much as any ſin or any remnant of ſin remaining in them, when they remove from hence; here is a happy change: yea, they ſhall have not only no ſin in them, but no temptation without them; no Satan to tempt, as well as no corruption to ſide with temptation: When wicked men dye they have a change too, but it is a miſerable change; theirs is a change from evil to worſe, from bad to worſt of all; they have a change from fading comforts to laſting ſorrow; or they have a change from temporary ſorrows to everlaſting ſorrows; Son, re- member (ſaith Abraham in the parable to Dives) that thou in thy life time haſt received thy good things: thou faredſt deliciouſly every day, thou waſt cloathed with purple and fine linnen, but ſee thy change: thou who hadſt a table ſpread and furniſhed with delicate meats, thou who hadſt a cup brim full, yea running over with delicious wines, now thou haſt not ſo much as a drop of water to cool thy tongue. This is the change which wicked men ſhall have in death, from pleaſure to pain, or from ſhort pains to eternal pain, from a few moth-eaten, worm-eaten, dying, decaying delights, to thoſe griefs which cannot die, to thoſe griefs which as a worm ſhall gnaw upon their ſouls and conſciences worſe then death. Some wicked men are as miſerable as they are wicked in this world; The wicked travel with pain all their dayes (chap. 15.) yet they ſhall travel with greater pain when they die: their preſent ſorrows are but the beginning of ſorrows: now they do but ſip of that cup, which they muſt drink up dregs and all for ever. Death is a change to all, dying Saints change from bad to good, from good to beſt: when wicked men die, they change from bad to worſe, from worſe to worſt of all.

Tota enim diſputatio Jobi eo collimat, ut probat in rebus externis non eſſe ſigna iræ vel gratiæ, in hac vita non dari id quod fideles ſperãt, ideoque nihil ipſis cõvenientius eſſe, quã anhelare ad mortẽ. Thirdly, This change is interpreted of the reſurrection, Job deſires to die preſently, and would wait willingly till the reſurrection, knowing that then he ſhould be freed from all affliction; One of the ancients renders it, I will wait until my holy birth-day come: The reſurrection is a birth-day to the world. The earth and ſea ſhall be in travel and be delivered (he that is raiſed from death begins a new life) They took dead men into their womb, and ſhall (by the power of God) return them living. There ſhall not be one abortive or ſtill-born in that great birth-day. Some expound that regeneration which Chriſt ſpeaks of (Matth. 19. 28.) of the reſurrection, and give the ſenſe only with the alteration of a point, thus, Ye which have followed me, ſhall in the regeneration (or reſurrection) when the ſon of man ſhall ſit in the throne of his glory, ſit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Iſrael. Which reading Beza a learned interpreter affirms, that he hath obſerved in five ancient copies, implying that when the bodies and ſouls of the Saints ſhall be married again together, never to be ſeparated by death, that will be as a new birth-day to them all. However 'tis clear beyond diſpute that the reſurrection day of Chriſt is called in Scripture both the day of his begetting, and of his brith. For that of (Pſal. 2. 7.) Thou art my ſon this day have I begotten thee, is interpreted by the Apoſtle of the reſurrection of Chriſt, Act. 13. where having ſaid (verſ. 30.) God hath raiſed him from the dead, he ſubjoyns (verſ. 32. 33.) And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promiſe which was made unto the Fathers, God hath fulfilled the ſame unto us their children, in that he hath raiſed up Jeſus again, as it is alſo written in the ſecond Pſalm: Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. And that the reſurrection of Chriſt is his birth as well as his begetting is proved by the ſame Apoſtle, who calleth him expreſly The firſt-born from the dead (Col. 1. 18.) Now as the firſt birth-day of man into the world is a change: So this ſecond birth-day will be a greater change. As the Apoſtle diſputes it all along (1 Cor. 15.) how great a change will that be when mortality ſhall put on immortality, when corruption ſhall put on incorruption, when that which is ſown a natural body ſhall be raiſed a ſpiritual body; Hence the Apoſtle concludes at the fifty firſt verſe, We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed: which the Vulgar Latine reads thus, we ſhall all riſe, but we ſhall not all be changed, and another, as the learned Beza hath obſerved upon that place: we ſhall all ſleep, but we ſhall not all be changed. For theſe not obſerving that the Apoſtle in this place ſpeaks only of the bodies of the Elect, and knowing that the bodies of the wicked ſhall not have (though they ſhall have ſome change) ſuch a change as is here ſpoken of, upon theſe grounds they have thus boldly altered the text, to ſerve their own ſenſe: whereas both the Syriak and Arabike interpreters keep to the Original Greek, from which we tranſlate, we ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed. For the Apoſtle treating of the ſtate of all Saints at the laſt day, of whom many ſhall then be found alive, he declares what ſhall be done to them: They (ſaith he) ſhall not ſleep; that is, they ſhall not die, yet they ſhall be changed; So that, though ſome of the Saints ſhall not be raiſed becauſe they ſhall not die, yet all at that day ſhall find a change: We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed. This is the great change: In the morning of the reſurrection we ſhall all put on freſh ſuits, freſh ſuits of fleſh and robes of glory upon them, ſuch as ſhall never change, much leſs wear out, ſuch as ſhall be freſh, not only as the garments of the Iſraelites fourty years in the wilderneſs, but for ever. After this change we ſhall hear no more of changing. And that we ſhall have ſuch a change the Apoſtle ſpeaks again (Phil. 3. 23.) Who ſhall change our vile body, that it may be faſhioned like to his glorious body. The body ſhall be caſt into a more excellent mould, even as a veſſel that is broken or out of faſhion, is put into the Gold-ſmiths hand to be changed or new made; yea, there ſhall be a change at that day not only of the body but of the whole man, the ſoul ſhall be changed, not in the ſubſtance of it, but in the perfections of it, for then full glory ſhall be poured into the ſoul, and it ſhall have a better eſtate, though not in the nature of it, yet in the degree of it, then it had before. Then mans glory ſhall be compleated when ſoul and body ſhall meet again, and be re-united: the union of ſoul and body conſtitutes man, a ſoul alone is not man, as a body alone is not; Now in the day of their re-eſpouſals, what gifts will the Lord beſtow? what tokens of his royal bounty? Such gifts, ſuch tokens ſure, as will convince man that his change is come, and abundantly recompence all his dayes of waiting for it.

Again Obſerve, That the aſſured hope of the reſurrection to eternal life, will ſupport the ſoul with patience under all the evils of this life.

Job could willingly undergo any condition, becauſe a change was coming: Though we fight with beaſts as long as we live, we have advantage enough in this one truth, the dead ſhall riſe (1 Cor. 15. 31.) what though we endure hardſhip in this life, we ſhall ariſe to a better life. The Authour to the Hebrews (chap. 11. 35.) reports the courage and conſtancy of the Jewiſh Martyrs upon this account, They were tortured not accepting deliverance that they might obtain a better reſurrection. But are there two ſorts or two degrees of reſurrection? one good and another better, that he ſaith, they looked to obtain a better reſurrection?

He calls that which they expected a bettr reſurrection, not comparatively to another reſurrection, but either firſt, in compariſon of that life which they were to loſe, if they would keep the faith; or Secondly, in compariſon of that life which they might have kept if they would have let go their faith, or ſubmitted to idolatry. And their life in this latter ſenſe may elegantly be called a reſurrection, becauſe they being but as dead men in the hands of thoſe tyrants for profeſſing the faith, were offered their lives again, or ſhould have been reſtored to a free enjoyment of their lives, if they would have renounced or denied the faith. But theſe noble profeſſors thought the offer of ſuch a life too vile a price to ſell their faith for. And therefore they deſpiſed that deliverance which was only a reſurrection from a threatned death, to a tranſitory life, in compariſon of that true or better reſurrection, which would be from an inflicted death to eternal life. Now if the Saints under the old Teſtament were thus Heroical in ſufferings upon the hope of a future reſurrection, about which they had no open direct promiſe, nor any very clear evidence; how much more ſhould we who have the doctrine of the reſurrection written as with a beam of the Sun, together with the glory and the happineſs which ſhall follow? aſſurance of a change to any better ſtate, is apt to raiſe in man high reſolutions in any the worſt eſtate wherein he is. And the hope of mending our condition enables us to bear a bad condition: hope is the ſupport and pillar of the ſoul, in its heavieſt preſſures; that which adds infinitely to the puniſhment of the damned in hell, is, that as they are in an ill condition, ſo they know their condition will never mend, they cannot ſay they will wait till their change come; they muſt ſuffer, but they cannot hope; Their change ſhall never come, though they ſhould hope for it, becauſe they have no ground of hope, everlaſting wrath is determined upon them. This makes them compleatly miſerable.

ble. To be without hope of good, is worſe then the enduring of evil: the damned in hell are more pained with thinking that their miſerable condition will never change, then they are in bearing their preſent miſery. The Saints in heaven are in a happy eſtate, and they know it will never change, they joy as much in this aſſurance, as they do in the ſenſe of their preſent happineſs: they enjoy all their joyes at once, becauſe their joy is one, and ſhall ever be the ſame; Their condition is ſo good that they need not deſire a change, and ſo ſure, that they need not fear a change. It is the extremity and the height of a good eſtate to be beyond the fear, and of an evil eſtate to be beyond the hope, of change: it is an abatement of our comforts, to enjoy good which may be changed for evil, and an abatement of our ſorrows to endure evil which may be changed for good. 'Twas thus with Job, he was in a ſorrowful condition, but he believed a change was coming, and therefore he reſolved. All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

VERS. 15, 16, 17.

Thou ſhalt call, and I will anſwer thee: thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thine hands.

For now thou numbreſt my ſteps, doſt thou not watch over my ſin?

My tranſgreſſion is ſealed up in a bag, and thou ſoweſt up mine iniquity.

IN the cloſe of the fourteenth verſe, we heard Job reſolving to wait all the dayes of his appointed time, till his change ſhall come: and according to the various interpretations of that change, opinions vary about the call and anſwer of this fifteenth verſe.

Thou ſhalt call, and I will anſwer.

They who interpret that change by death, ſence it thus, when-ever thou ſhalt ſend out thy writ, or ſummons to the grave, I ſhall readily ſubmit unto it and obey: thou ſhalt call and I will anſwer, why ſhould I be ſlow-footed or faint-hearted, when I am called to the grave? ſeeing I am aſſured, that I ſhall not be loſt in the grave, no, nor forgotten there: though the grave be the land of forgetfulneſs, thy affections towards me will preſerve thy memory of me; and ſeeing I live in thy love, I cannot live out of thy thoughts: Thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thy hand.

Si me voces moriq; jubeas paratus ſum. Rab. Moyſes. Quum me vocabis ad migrandum ex hac vita, ego libens tibi reſponderem. Merc.

Hence Obſerve, That a godly man (in a due frame of ſpirit) willingly obeys the call of God to die.

The Apoſtle had not only a willingneſs, but a forwardneſs to die, even a zeal or a kind of ambition to die, I deſire to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt, which is beſt of all. The Saints receive their call to death as a call to reſt: and though the body for a while lie down in the duſt, yet they know what is prepared for the ſoul, and when they two meet together again, both ſhall be called to an everlaſting reſt. Some interpret theſe words, of calling and anſwering, by the common cuſtome of inviting, and of the readineſs of thoſe who are invited, to come unto a feaſt: How willing are we to feaſt with our friends? Saints never go to a feaſt indeed till they have done eating: the hunger of the ſoul after this feaſt conquers the fear of death. I grant there is a natural fear of death, and 'tis poſſible that a believer who (in his own thoughts) hath often acted the dying man, may yet find ſome regret and unwillingneſs to die when death comes: the very looſing of the bond, the untying of the marriage knot between ſoul and body, is unwel-come to nature, while grace bids it wel-come. Paul did not ſo much deſire to be uncloathed as to be cloathed upon: he was willing rather that mortality ſhould be ſwallowed by eternal life, then that natural life ſhould be ſwallowed up by mortality. Yet at laſt faith conquers natural fear, grace laughs while nature mourns, and a believer can with as much chearfulneſs anſwer the call of God to die, as the call of a friend to dinner when he is hungry, or to bed when he is weary.

Secondly, They who expound this change for that of the reſurrection, give another meaning of this call and anſwer. As the former take it for a call to the grave, ſo theſe for a call from the grave, and his anſwer to be a willing return from thence: he would not let God call twice, much leſs demur upon the matter, whether he were beſt come out of the grave or no. Thou ſhalt call, and I will anſwer, here I am, Lord, I come. The Septuagint render I will obey thy call. In that day God will call, yea, he will make the greateſt call that ever yet was made. Then our God ſhall come, and will not keep ſilence, he ſhall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth that he may judge his people (Pſal. 50. 3, 4.) In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the laſt trump, for the trumpet ſhall ſound, and the dead ſhall be raiſed incorruptible, and we ſhall be changed (1 Cor. 15. 52.) And again, The Lord himſelf will deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of the Archangel, with the trump of God, and the dead in Chriſt ſhall riſe firſt, (1 Theſ. 4. 16.) he ſhall deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with a loud exhortation, ſo loud that all who are in the grave ſhall hear him: the word in propriety ſignifies that encouraging voice, which is among marriners, or rowers in a galley, who are called with one conſent to buckle to their oars: the Lord ſhall deſcend with a ſhout like that, and rouſe the dead at once out of their graves. In the parable of the Virgins 'tis ſaid, at midnight there was a great cry, behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him. (Mat. 25. 6.) This is not the cry of thoſe who are called, (there will be a cry among them) but a cry from heaven calling them to meet the bridegroom. Chriſt ſpeaks of two ſorts of dead men, and of a twofold call to a twofold reſurrection, Joh. 5. The hour is coming and now is, when the dead ſhall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear ſhall live: Theſe are the dead in ſin, who are called to ariſe in newneſs of life, or to a new life, the life of grace: Marvel not at this (ſaith Chriſt) for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the grave ſhall hear his voice, and ſhall come forth, they that have done good to the reſurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the reſurrection of damnation. As a great cry cauſeth the ſpiritual reſurrection from ſin, ſo the corporal from the duſt. Both are effects of the mighty power of God. When Chriſt raiſed Lazarus, he ſpake with a loud voice (John 11. 43.) Lazarus come forth, Lazarus anſwered this voice and came forth. And as he then, ſo all mankind ſhall hear and obey the voice of Chriſt commanding them to come forth. God calls now, and few will anſwer or obey: O that my people had hearkned unto my voice, (Pſal. 81. 11.) God will at laſt ſpeak ſo loud and ſo effectually, that the deafeſt Adders ſhall hear the voice of the charmer, and appear out of their holes; The Lord commands the Prophet (Ezek. 37. 4.) Son of man propheſie upon theſe dead bones: he means it typically of the Jews in captivity, yet there the reſurrection is ſhadowed: God will propheſie upon our dead bones: And if any ask, Can theſe bones live? yes, theſe bones ſhall live. God will lay ſinews upon them, and he will bring up fleſh upon them, and cover them with skin, he will put breath into them and they ſhall live. Now a gracious heart anſwereth the call of God in the actings of a ſpiritual life (Pſal. 17. 8.) When thou ſhalt ſay ſeek my face, my heart anſwers, thy face Lord will I ſeek. Then every man gracious or without grace, good or bad, ſhall anſwer the call of God to the receiving of another life: a life to ſome better then that they once lived, a life moſt unconceiveably worſe then the death from which they are called. Thou ſhalt call and I will anſwer, that's a ſecond ſenſe.

Ἐν κελεύσματι, cum hortationis clamore. Keleuſma proprie eſt hortamen quod apud nautas eſt ſolenne, quo uno veluti concentu remos ducunt. Bez.

Thirdly, That change was interpreted by others for a change in his preſent ſtate, from ſickneſs to health, from pain to eaſe, from ſorrow unto joy.

Hence ariſeth a third interpretation of this call of God and anſwer of Job, in reference to a judiciary diſceptation or debate, which Job had profeſſed himſelf willing to abide and carry through with God, in caſe he would be pleaſed to grant him that deſired change: he ſpake that deſire before; And I find one interpreter fixing him in it here. It is manifeſt (ſaith he) that Job doth not ſpeak here of the reſurrection of his fleſh, but of that call and anſwer for the ending of his preſent controverſie: about which we read his offer (chap. 13. 21.) Withdraw thy hand far from me, let not thy dread make me afraid: then call thou and I will anſwer, or, let me ſpeak and anſwer thou me. And ſo, withdraw thy hand, is as much as this,

Manifeſtum eſt Jobū nō loqui de carnis ſuæ reſurrectione, ſed de ea vocatione, et reſpōſione de qua (c. 13. 12.) ut præſentem litē dirimat eſſe intelligendum. Eōld change my ſtate, and then I will anſwer thy citation or thy call, and give an account of my ſelf, in whatſoever thou ſhalt demand of me: I have opened his mind in this propoſal upon thoſe words of the thirteenth chapter, thither I refer the Reader.

Take only this note from it, That when the body is unburthened of outward afflictions, and the ſoul eaſed of inward ſorrows, then we have a great advantage both to plead with and pray to God.

How much the inward man is preſſed by the outward, and how the ſpiritual part of the inward man is preſſed by thoſe fears that ariſe from its carnal part, might be ſhewed from this expoſition, but (though it hath a fairneſs in it, and a learned pen to maintain it, yet) I wave it as not ſo proper and pertinent as either of the former two, to the ſcope of this call and anſwer, which this Scripture leads us to.

Job having promiſed a readineſs in himſelf to anſwer the call of God, ſhews his aſſurance of Gods readineſs to call him, and of his acceptance with him.

Thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thine hand.

It hath been ſhewed (chap. 10. 3.)
Firſt, That man is the work of Gods hand.
Secondly, In what ſenſe hands are aſcribed unto God.
Thirdly, How man is the work of Gods hand.

For the clearing of theſe particulars in a way of explication, I ſend the Reader to the chapter and verſe fore-cited, and ſhall deal with this clauſe only as it ſtands in connexion here with the call and anſwer laſt opened.

Thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thy hand.

Which ſome conceive to be the very form of words in which Job intended to anſwer God: Thou wilt call, and thus I will anſwer: O God, thou haſt, or thou wilt, have a deſire to the work of thy hand, As if he ſhould ſay, When thou calleſt me, I know thy call muſt ſpring from the good will thou beareſt me, thy affections will come forth to me, when thy voice comes forth; thou wilt therefore ſpeak becauſe thou haſt a deſire to the work of thy hand; ſo the words ſtand in oppoſition to thoſe (chap. 10. 3.) Is it good that thou ſhouldeſt deſpiſe the work of thy hand? Which ſome expound as his expoſtulation with God, upon an apprehenſion that he ſlighted him: but now he is confident God hath another opinion of him, and would be ſo far from deſpiſing, that he will have a great deſire to him who was the work of his hand.

Nūquid perdere deſiderabis? Rab. Lev.

Τὰ ἔργα τῶν χειρῶν σου μὴ ἀποποιῇς. Ne repellas opera manuū tuarum. Sept.

Operi manuū tuarū porriges dextrā, Vulg.

Secondly, Many of the Hebrew writers expound Job, as if he thought God had a mind or a purpoſe to deſtroy the work of his hand: and they read it with an interrogation, Wilt thou deſire or be forward to deſtroy that which thou haſt made? Hence alſo the Septuagint render it as a deprecation, Do not reject or unmake the work of thy hands.

Thirdly, The Original word which we tranſlate, Thou wilt have a deſire, imports a ſtrong coveting deſire, ſuch as is after ſilver. The ſame root in the Hebrew ſignifies ſilver and to covet, becauſe ſilver is ſo much coveted, thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thy hand. As a covetous worldling hath a great deſire after gold or ſilver, he longs for it, and it pleaſeth him when he can get it, ſo the Lord himſelf hath a longing, covetous deſire after man, who is the work of his hand. The Lord ſeemed to uſe Job as if he were but rubbiſh and droſs, no way deſireable, yet he believed God would look upon him as a ſilver veſſel, and as a veſſel of honour: The Vulgar Latine tranſlates wide from the letter of the Hebrew, but near to this ſenſe; Thou wilt put forth thy right hand to the work of thy hand: this departs from the letter of the words, but the ſenſe is fair to the ſcope of the words; for it is an argument of love and friendſhip, to put forth the right hand to a man; if we meet one whom we love and delight in, we cannot paſs him, without taking him by the hand; And as it is an argument of love and friendſhip to allure with the hand, ſo of charity or pity to reach out the hand: Thou wilt have a deſire, may be well expreſſed thus, thou wilt put forth thy hand to the work of thy hand, and help me up when thou biddeſt me riſe. A true friend reacheth his heart out before he reacheth out his hand. God had caſt Job into the mire and ditch (as he ſpake chap. 9.) yet he believes he would take him by the hand, and lift him not only out of the ditch of affliction, but out of the grave of death. Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That God bears much affection to man as he is the work of his hand.

Conſuevit artifex appetere opus manuū ſuarum, ejuſq; videndi cupiditate teneri. Druſ.

It argued high diſpleaſure when God ſpake thus againſt his people, He that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will ſhew them no pity (Iſa. 27. 11.) The meaneſt creature in the world is the work of Gods hand, and under that notion, the deſire of his heart; it is natural to all men to love their own works; and it is the diſtemper of moſt men to over-love and dote upon, yea, to be proud of the work of their hand; God hath a deſire to, and a liking of all his works, (Gen. 1. 31.) when he had finiſhed that great ſtructure, that noble fabrick of the world, he ſaw all that he had made, and he ſaw it with content. God did not make the world, and then take a view of it, all was one act; yea, he ſaw the idea or platform of it in his own breaſt from eternity; but the Scripture ſpeaks thus, to ſhew what price and value he put upon his work. And if the natural frame of man be ſuch as God hath a deſire to, and looks upon with delight, as it then came out of his hand in the firſt creation; what deſires hath God to the work of his own ſpirit in our hearts, which is the ſecond or the new creation? Hath he not a deſire to the new creature, who hath a deſire to every creature? If he hath a deſire to the work of his power in creation, then much more to the work of his ſpirit in regeneration, which is the moſt beautiful piece of work which he ever made? Angels are excellent creatures, being confirmed in holineſs; the Soul of a believer formed up by grace, is a creature matching Angels. When Stevens face was full of beauty, the Text ſaith, it did ſhine as the face of an Angel. If an Angel were corporal, he could not have more luſtre and beauty than Stephen's face had. Every Saint hath a heart like the face of an Angel, full of divine beauties and glorious excellencies. To ſuch a work of God, how great a deſire hath God? Daniel was called a man of deſires by the Angel; (chap. 9. 23.) we tranſlate greatly beloved, but the Chaldee is, Thou art a man of deſires: Though every believer cannot be called a man of deſires in Daniels height, yet every believer is a man of deſires, a man whom God deſires. It is an honour to man to be deſired among men (and thoſe Princes died in diſhonour, of whom the holy Story ſaith, that they died undeſired; but how great an honour is it to that man who lives deſired of God, and (whereof Job was aſſured) to whom God will have a deſire as to the work of his hands, when he is dead! Take this Corollary from it.

If God hath a deſire to the work of his hand, how ſhould they who are the work of his hand have a deſire unto him?

What deſire ſhould we have to God, who hath wrought us, when we hear that he hath a deſire to us, becauſe he hath wrought us? Shall the Potter have a deſire to the clay, and ſhall not that clay (which hath deſires) have a deſire to the Potter? One of the Ancients ſpeaks paſſionately to this point; I was made by thee, O Lord, and my heart is reſtleſs till it return to thee; the work ſhould have a deſire to the hands that made it, and that which hath received a being, to the fountain of its being. Sinful diſtempers cauſe us to depart from God, the work hath then no deſire to the hand that made it. Holy actings are all from God, and they carry us back to God from whom they are. A holy heart cannot but have a deſire to God, the work of whoſe hands it is.

Thirdly, Job was in a very ſad condition, when he ſpake this, he was pleading with God for a change, a change by death, he will needs die rather than continue ſuch a life; The hand of God had caſt him as low as a man could be on this ſide the grave or hell: and yet he ſaith, Thou ſhalt have a deſire to the work of thy hand. Hence Obſerve, Faith can diſcern ſome light of favour, ſome glimmerings of love, through the clouds of darkeſt diſpenſations.

It is the holy skill, the art of faith, to make concluſions of life in death, and of light in darkneſs; This is the right Logick of Faith: Faith can propheſie, and faith is a true Prophet, thou wilt have deſire, he ſpeaks of the time to come. The preſumption of evil men propheſies ſometimes, or dreams rather, that God will have a deſire to them; but faith makes ſure propheſies, becauſe 'tis bottomed upon the ſure word of God; Jobs faith propheſied more than once. He ſhall be my ſalvation, (chap. 13.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I ſhall ſee him, &c. (chap. 19.) Faith hath a quick eye, and ſees good in the end from the beginning. Faith ſees the movings of that holy concupiſcible appetite in God towards poor ſinners, when it feels nothing but the movings of his iraſcible appetite. While Job perceived wrath, or ſomewhat in the likeneſs of wrath, mixt with the dealings of God towards him, he promiſed himſelf (and that not coldly but confidently) not only ſomewhat in the likeneſs of the favour of God towards him, but his real favour; Thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thy hand.

But had not the Lord a deſire to Job before? Was the ſpring of his affections ſhut up till that day ſhould come? or was his love to him yet to begin? No, the love of God and his deſires had flowed to him from everlaſting; as whom he loveth, he loveth to the end, ſo whom he loves, he loved without beginning; but his love and his deſires had been a little while hidden, and (as ſome rivers) had run under ground. Job ſaw nothing in his latter dayes, but the actings of his anger, and was ſenſible only of ſeverity in his proceedings, as the complaint of the next words teacheth us.

Verſe 16. For thou numbreſt my ſteps, doſt not thou watch over my ſin?

Concluſio pathetica ex comparatione ſeveritatis judiciorum Dei hoc & ſequente verſu, cum infirmitate omnium rerum creatarum, ver. 20, 21. nominatim vero hominis uſque ad finem, Jun. צעדי greſſus meos. ἐπιτηδεύματα 70. ſtudia, ſumitur tropologicè pro actionibus tum animæ tum corporis. Numerare greſſus eſt ſtudioſe aliquem obſervare, & omnia ejus facta inquirere, quod fere fit hoſtili animo Bold. Singula facta mea recenſes & ad amuſſim metiris. Jun.

In this and the verſe following, Job makes a pathetical compariſon, between the preſent ſeeming rigour of Gods dealing with him, and that ſweetneſs which he hoped to find ere long or at the laſt: Thou wilt have a deſire to the work of thy hand, but now thou numbreſt my ſteps.

Two things are here to be opened.

Firſt, What he means by his ſteps.

Secondly, What he means by Gods numbring his ſteps. Job ſpeaks both by a figure.

By ſteps we are to underſtand his actions, all that he did, yea, all that he thought, his inward motions as well as his outward motions. So the Septuagint tranſlates, thou numbreſt my meditations, or, the workings of my heart. As the whole courſe of a man is called his way, ſo the ſeveral actions of that courſe, are his ſteps: holy actions are ſtrait ſteps, and ſinful actions are uneven ones, he went on frowardly in the way of his heart, Iſa. 57. 17. that is, in the way which his heart moſt delighted in, that was a crooked way, and ſuch were his ſteps, ſuch diſorderly walkers uſe not to number their own ſteps, but God doth.

Numbring the ſteps notes an exact account, and an accurate obſervation of our actions, we ſay of a man who goeth ſoftly, ſurely you tell your ſteps, The Lord is ſaid to number our ſteps, when he makes a ſtrict inquiſition concerning all our tranſactions, and ſets down ſtep by ſtep, every paſſage of our lives, when he keeps (as it were) a day-book of all we do, and records us to a word or a thought. David ſpeaks of his enemies, (Pſal. 56. 6.) they gather themſelves together, they hide themſelves, they mark my ſteps, when they wait for my ſoul: that is, they mark every thing I do or ſay: he that would be watcht exactly, were beſt to have an enemy to watch him: love makes us watchful over one another, leſt we take hurt, but malice makes a man obſervant enough of another to do him hurt: thus David's enemies were double diligent upon their watches, they mark my ſteps when they wait for my ſoul: And again, (Pſal. 17. 11.) they compaſſed us in our ſteps, they have ſet their eyes bowing down to the earth. It is an alluſion (as I conceive) to hunters, who go poring upon the ground to prick the hare, or to find the print of the hares claw, when the hounds are at a loſs, and can make nothing of it by the ſcent. Thus his enemies caſt about to find where he had gone, or what he had been doing, that their blood-hounds might follow the game with a freſh cry. So then, thou numbreſt my ſteps, is no more but this, whatſoever I do or ſpeak, thou art very curious and critical in the obſervation of it; I will not ſtay in the inlargement of any points from theſe words, but referr to (chap. 10. 14.) where Job ſpeaks the ſame ſenſe, If I ſin, then thou markeſt me, &c.

Only note in paſſage.

Firſt, God knows all the motions of our hearts, and the actions of our lives.

He that is unacquainted with our wayes, cannot number our ſteps: it is beſt for us to number our own ſteps, and to take heed to our own wayes, when we hear that God is ſo exact at it: it would make us cautious what we do, if we knew of a man who took notice of all we did.

Secondly, The perſon, Job was a holy man, whoſe ſteps God numbred, whence we may learn,

That God ſees the ſin of his own children.

Job was not of opinion that God ſees no ſin in his children, he knew himſelf to be a child of God, and he knew his ſteps were numbred, yea, and his ſin watched over, as he ſpeaks in the next clauſe.

Doſt thou not watch over my ſin?

Parce peccatis meis, Vulg. Hæc præcatio filo orationis non convenit. Merc. תשמור q. d. excubias agis ſuper peccatum meum; verbum de verbo, Nec cuſtodis ſuper peccatum meum. Non prætteribit te ullum peccatorum meorum 70. Verbum שמר pro expectare & differre cum magna parte Hebræorum ſumo. Merc.

Some render this as a Prayer, Do not keep my ſins, or ſpare me my ſins, that is, do not puniſh them: but this is inconſiſtent with the tenour of Jobs diſcourſe, and ſo I leave it.

The letter of the Hebrew is, Doſt thou not keep or obſerve upon my ſin? The ſenſe is the ſame with what we ſaid laſt, or we have here but an expoſition of it. Some read it without an interrogation, Thou watcheſt over my ſin, in both there is an alluſion to a ſevere creditour, who gives no day, but preſently exacts the forfeiture or penalty of his bond. So the Septuagint render, None of my ſins paſs thee, thou takeſt notice of all, to puniſh and bring me to judgment for them. Others tranſlate, Thou doſt not wait, or expect at all upon my ſin; As if he had ſaid, As ſoon as ever thou haſt ſeen me commit any ſin, thou layeſt thy arreſt and charge upon me, thou doſt not give me time, but calleſt me to a preſent account.

We may here again note, the inſpection or ſuperintendency of God over the wayes of man: he is ſo perfect a numberer, that he watcheth to number: he that will number how many ſteps another takes, had need watch him well. Let no man wonder that God numbreth his ſteps, when he watcheth to number them: and indeed, it is as eaſie for God to ſee every ſin in us, as to ſee one ſin; there is no difficulty to omniſciency, in knowing all things. Let this be alſo for our caution and admonition: if God watcheth over our ſins, how ſhould we watch over our ſelves? Chriſt gives this charge, What I ſay to you, I ſay to all, watch: we muſt watch for our own outward ſafety, though God watcheth to ſave, his watchfulneſs is no plea for our careleſneſs: much more have we need to watch, leſt we ſin, becauſe God watcheth to obſerve our ſins. His watchfulneſs ſhould provoke our carefulneſs. The Lord (as it were) watcheth advantages to bring evil upon them, who are not watchfull againſt evil; (Dan. 9. 14.) Therefore hath the Lord watched the evil, and brought it upon us: they were not watchful againſt the evil of ſin, therefore the Lord watched to bring upon them the evil of puniſhment. Have not we cauſe to watch, leſt we tranſgreſs, when God watcheth to chaſten our tranſgreſſions? The Prophet (Jer. 20. 10.) complained, All my familiars watched for my halting: God (in a ſenſe) watcheth for our haltings. He doth not watch as wicked men do, with a hope to ſee us halt, as the Prophet perſonates his unkind familiars there, ſaying thus among themſelves, or every man in his own heart, Peradventure he will be enticed, and we ſhall prevail againſt him, and we ſhall take our revenge on him. It pleaſeth wicked men to ſee the godly halt or ſtumble, much more to ſee them fall: God is infinitely above ſuch thoughts or deſigns, he watcheth for our haltings to make us know them, not to inſult over us for them. He watcheth for our haltings, not hoping to ſee us halt, but to prevent us from halting, or if we halt, then to preſerve us from falling. He at moſt watcheth for our haltings, to correct us for them, not to take his revenge upon us for them. He watcheth us to make us watchful.

There is a double watchfulneſs which this ſhould lead us to.

Firſt, A watchfulneſs in reference to God.

Secondly, A watchfulneſs in reference to our ſelves.

We ſhould watch 1. What God doth. 2. What God ſaith. And we ſhould watch, 1. What we do. 2. What we ſpeak. 3. What we think. Every thought, word, and work muſt be accounted for, and brought to judgment: and therefore it is as much our wiſdome, as it is our duty to watch over them. Thou watcheſt over my ſin (ſaith Job) And ſuppoſe God find his ſin, what will he do next? that Job ſeems to tell us in the next verſe. Our ſins are but traſh, yet Job ſuppoſed that God put his into a bagg; they are no treaſure, yet Job ſuppoſed, God ſealed up his ſins in a bagg, and leſt the ſeal ſhould not be ſtrong enough, he repreſents God ſowing up this bag-full of ſin, ſuch were the apprehenſions of this ſorrowful man.

Verſe 17. My tranſgreſſions are ſealed up in a bag, and thou ſoweſt up mine iniquity.

There are two expoſitions of theſe words.

Firſt, That the ſealing of tranſgreſſions up in a bag, implies the utter removing of tranſgreſſion: as if they were ſealed up never to be ſeen or brought forth any more: the word is uſed (Job 9. 7.) he ſealed up the ſtars; that is, he covers them with clouds and darkneſs, or overcomes them with greater light. The clearneſs of the day ſeals up the ſtars alwayes, and ſo doth the cloudineſs of the night ſometimes. Some give this ſenſe of the ſealing here, my tranſgreſſions are ſealed in a bag, that is, they are hid, and ſhall not be remembred at all for ever. Daniel prophecying of the ſufferings of Chriſt, ſaith, (*chap.*9.24.) Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and the holy city to finiſh tranſgreſſion: The Chaldee word is, to ſeal up tranſgreſſion, what that is, the next words ſhew, and to make an end of ſins, to make reconciliation for iniquity, this was done by the death of Chriſt. The death of Chriſt was the death of ſin, and when reconciliation is made for ſin, the end of ſin is made. This is a great Goſpel truth, when ſin is pardoned, it is ſealed up ſo faſt, that when it is to be ſought for, it ſhall not be found, and when it is enquired after, it ſhall not be.

Elegans Hebraiſmus pro eo quod eſt rem ita claudere, ut nullo modo eam videre aut tangere liceat. Sigillare peccata eſt eorum memoriam penitus delere. Pined.

Yet I conceive it ſutes not this place, nor anſwers the ſubject upon which Job ſtill inſiſts, for he is aggravating the dealings of God with him, as ſevere, he numbreth my ſteps; So that to ſay my tranſgreſſions are ſealed up, that is, they are pardoned and covered, is an expoſition of ſo great a variation from the ſcope of Jobs diſcourſe, as cannot be admitted in this place. Therefore to clear his meaning, I ſhall offer, that ſealing is uſed in three caſes.

Firſt, To keep things ſecret that they may not be ſeen.

Secondly, To keep things diſtinct, that they may not be confuſed.

Thirdly, To keep things ſafe (as we uſually ſpeak) that they may be forth-coming.

When Daniel was caſt into the Lions den (that he might be ſafe; not ſafe from the Lions, but ſafe that none ſhould fetch him out from the Lions (that there might be no deluſion in the buſineſs,) 'Tis ſaid, a ſtone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the denn, and the King ſealed it with his own ſignet (chap. 6. 17.) Seals were anciently put upon cheſts of goods, eſpecially of their choiceſt goods. Pliny gives it as an argument of the integrity of the times before him, that then nothing was ſealed up, ſervants might then (as we ſpeak of thoſe that are very truſty) be truſted with untold gold, but now (ſaith he) houſe-keepers ſecure their very meat and drink with ſeals, leſt their ſervants ſhould ſteal, and imbezzle them. In alluſion to this or that other ſervice of the ſeal, Job ſaith here, my tranſgreſſion is ſealed; as if he had ſaid, my tranſgreſſion is kept ſafe, that it may be ready as matter of accuſation and charge againſt me. In purſuance of which ſenſe, ſome interpret theſe words, as a metaphor taken from Sollicitors about Law-ſuits, who carry their papers and bills of inditement ſealed up, and put into a bag, which cuſtome is continued at this day. As if Job had ſaid, my inditement, or charge, is ſealed up in thy bag, ſurely thou intendeſt ſhortly to proceed to a tryal againſt me. When God tells the people of Iſrael, their vine is as the vine of Sodom, &c. he minds them preſently, Is not this laid up in ſtore with me, and ſealed up among my treaſures? (Deut. 32. 34.) that is, this evil which you have done, the ſins which you have committed, like Sodom and Gomorrah, are laid up in ſtore with me, and ſealed among my treaſures; I have taken ſure notice of all, and ſhall bring all forth in due time: you have ſcattered your ſins and wickedneſſes abroad, but I have gathered and ſealed them up. God treaſures up mercy for an obedient people, but he treaſures up wrath for the rebellious. Or, if God ſhould not do it, yet ſuch do it for themſelves, (Rom. 2. 5.) Deſpiſeſt thou the riches of his goodneſs and forbearance, not knowing that the goodneſs of God leadeth thee to repentance? but after thy hardneſs and impenitent heart, treaſureſt up unto thy ſelf wrath againſt the day of wrath. As impenitence ſeals our ſins upon us, ſo it treaſures and ſeals up the wrath of God upon us for our ſins. The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, his ſin is hid (Hoſ. 12. 13.) From whom was it hid? Not from the eyes of God, (poſſibly not from the eyes of the world) but it is bound up and hid, as reſerved to a day of reckoning. It is bound up, not let looſe by pardoning grace; it is hid, not with a covering of mercy, but with a covering from mercy; it is hid, not for protection, but (as Job thought his ſin was ſealed) for puniſhment.

Obſignate cellas, referte annulum ad me. Plaut. in Caſin.

Quæ fuit illa priſcorū vita? qualis innocentia? in qua nihil ſignabatur, & nunc cibi quoque & potus annulo vindicant à rapina. Plin. lib.31.c.1.

My tranſgreſſion is ſealed up in a bag.

Further, This ſealing up in a bag is an elegancy heightning the ſenſe: A man counts or tells over his ſpending money; but when he ſeals it up in a bag, it is an argument he means to lay it by as a ſtock. A ſtock of money is not ſcattered about, but put in a bag; and when it is in the bag, it is not only tied, but ſealed up. Thus Job ſeems to conceive, that God had taken a note of all his ſins, and laid them up till a fit time, to call him to an account about them, and puniſh him for them.

And thou ſoweſt up mine iniquity.

Job proſecutes the ſame metaphor, and hath the ſame mind in this, as in the former part of the verſe.

The words undergo different readings, ſome thus, thou ſoweſt iniquity to iniquity; the Original ſignifies to joyn, or, to make an application of one thing to another, like an artificer, who puts piece to piece in any fabrick. In which ſenſe Job ſaith of his friends, Ye are forgers of lies (chap. 13. 4.) that is, you curiouſly frame up a lie, or put one lie to another, (Pſal. 119.6,9.) The proud have forged a lie againſt me: ſo, thou ſoweſt iniquity to iniquity; the iniquity of one year to the iniquity of another; the iniquity of one relation to the iniquity of another; this is a ſowing, or joyning of iniquity. Others thus, Thou ſoweſt to mine iniquity, that is, thou ſoweſt the puniſhment of iniquity to my iniquity, thou addeſt affliction to my ſin: Job thought God heaped all his ſins upon him together, and with them the puniſhment of all his ſins. Again, Thou ſoweſt up mine iniquity, is but an explication of, thou haſt ſealed up my tranſgreſſions in a bag; or, the bag of my tranſgreſſion is not only ſealed but ſowed. Hence obſerve,

He fears there is ſomewhat in deck againſt him. And 'tis a truth, that as God hath a bottle wherein he puts the tears of his afflicted people, ſo he hath a bag wherein he puts the ſins of an offending people. God puts none of the ſins of his people in a bag to condemn them, yet he often puts their ſin in a bag to chaſten them. Hence a godly man is apt to judge all his afflictions as the fruit of his ſins: and though it was not ſo in Jobs caſe, yet he good man, put all upon his ſin. It is good to judge our ſelves when we are judged) that is chaſtened) of the Lord.

Secondly, Though this be a truth in general, yet Job is not to be excuſed in having ſuch dark thoughts of God, and ſuch black thoughts of himſelf; That ſurely God ſealed up his iniquities in a bag, and was reſolved to afflict him for them. Job miſtook his own condition, and the mind of God towards him in ſome things, as well as his friends did. God had not ſealed up his tranſgreſſions in a bag, but he had caſt them behind his back. God did not afflict him for the puniſhment of his ſin, but for the proof and exerciſe of his graces, as hath been ſhewed all along. The holieſt man on earth is ſubject to miſconceive the reaſon why he ſuffers, as well as the rule of what he ſhould do. Thirdly obſerve, Fallitur hac in re Jobus, non eſſent hæ afflictiones pœna peccati, ſed fidei probationes, quod Dei conſilium non ſatis intelligebat Job. Druſ.

> That though a gracious heart will not bear the hard cenſures of others about his ſins, yet he is ready enough to cenſure and accuſe himſelf.

Job did as often confeſs his iniquity before God, as he had pleaded his innocency before men. He would not have taken it well at the hands of his friends, if they had told him that God had filled a bag with his tranſgreſſions, and that God had ſealed it up againſt a day of account, yet thus he ſpeaks of himſelf. As his faith appeared little while he thought that God had ſealed up his tranſgreſſions, ſo his humility and ſelf-abaſement appeared very great in this acknowledgment of his tranſgreſſion.

Further, Job imployes three words in theſe two verſes about the ſame thing, the acknowledgment of his ſinfulneſs; 1. Sin. 2. Tranſgreſſion. 3. Iniquity. Theſe are taken ſometimes promiſcuouſly, as was ſhewed, (chap. 13. 23.) here we may give them a diſtinct ſenſe.

The firſt ſignifies properly a falling through ignorance or infirmity, a ſtepping out of the way beſides our intention, (poſſibly) againſt our full reſolution.

The ſecond ſignifies a diſſent from, or diſlike of that which is juſt and right.

The third imports rebellion, and prevarication, when we ſin ſcorning obedience, or judging it a thing below us. One of the Ancients confeſſes of himſelf, that when he was (in his youth) admoniſhed by his mother to take heed of ſinful wayes, and to walk with God, he was aſhamed to follow her counſel. This is rebellion indeed, and the height of of iniquity; it is bad enough to do ill, but it is worſe to be aſhamed to do good, worſt of all to be aſhamed to leave off doing evil. Job chargeth himſelf with ſin, tranſgreſſion, and iniquity, not with all of them in their full extent and aggravations, but with all of them in their kind. Hence obſerve,

פשע quando peccatum fit ex dedignatione parendi vel ex amore licentiæ. Auguſt. Conf.

That a godly man is ſubject to all ſins, even the worſt of ſins.

Not only to ſins of infirmity, but of prevarication; not only to ſins of ignorance, but to ſins againſt knowledge: he may ſin, not only becauſe he cannot diſcern the rule clearly, but even againſt a clear rule. There is no ſin but a regenerate man may fall into, except that from which no man can be raiſed, the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt. Now as the beſt diſcover ſomewhat in them productive of the worſt ſins, ſo God hath diſcovered himſelf ready to pardon the worſt of ſins: if we commit tranſgreſſion, iniquity and ſin, he proclaims himſelf, the God pardoning iniquity, tranſgreſſion and ſin; yea, his nature is infinitely more ready to pardon, than our nature is to ſin. We ſhould fear to commit the leaſt ſin, even a ſin of infirmity, but we need not fear whether God will pardon (for he certainly will) more than ſins of infirmity, even the greateſt ſins. And though now not only our iniquities and ſins, but even our leaſt tranſgreſſions, or ſteppings aſide, are ſealed, and ſowed up in a bag; yet Believers ſhall ſhortly ſee all their ſins, bag and all, thrown into the bottom of the Sea, and ſinking, like a talent of lead, or a weighty mill-ſtone, in thoſe mighty waters of free grace and undeſerved mercies.

And ſurely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.

The waters wear the ſtones, thou waſheſt away the things which grow out of the duſt of the earth, and thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man,

Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him, and he paſſeth, thou changeſt his countenance, and ſendeſt him away.

His ſons come to honour, and he knoweth it not, and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them.

But his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn.

IN this context Job gives us a proof that he had not loſt his Philoſophy, much leſs his grace, in a ſick bed. An Interpreter breaks out into admiration, that a man diſtreſſed with ſo many troubles, ſmitten with ſo many ſores, grieved with ſo many pains, could intend his thoughts ſo much about the ſecrets of nature, and the providential tranſmutations of the creature; that he, who had been confined ſo long to a chamber, could travell thus in his thoughts, for illuſtrations of his own caſe, over mountains and rocks, among ſtones and trees, through the winds and waters.

The 18th and 19th verſes are a collection of compariſons for this purpoſe.

The words are plain, but there is much variety of judgment about their ſcope, and Jobs intendment in them.

Some conceive, that under theſe ſimilitudes he bewails laſtingneſs and long continuance of his ſorrows, or rather, that he laſted and continued ſo long in his ſorrows: As if he had ſaid, The ſtrongeſt pieces of the lower world are eaten out by time, or forced into a decay by outward violence: mountains and rocks cannot ſtand their ground when the earth ſhakes: The hardeſt ſtones cannot ever contend with the ſmalleſt droppings, nor can the deepeſt roots hold their poſſeſſion againſt an overflowing deluge: all theſe are ſubject unto change, when thus aſſaulted: how is it then that I ſubſiſt under ſo many ſorrows, and yet bear ſuch burdens of affliction, who am neither mountain, nor rock, nor ſtone, nor tree? how is it that I am not waſted, and removed by the tempeſt of thine anger, and quite waſhed away with theſe inundations of thy diſpleaſure? Surely, if I had been a mountain, I might have been pulled down before this time; had I been a rock, theſe ſtrokes and diggings might have undermin'd me; had I been a ſtone, theſe continual droppings might have worn me out; and how green and flouriſhing ſoever I had been, theſe flouds might long ſince, not only have diſcoloured, but drowned all my beauty. Thus he argues from the greater to the leſs, if ſuch robuſtuous creatures fall and fail by theſe accidents, whence was it that he who was but weakneſs had held out ſo long? how was it that he (almoſt a dead man at firſt) did yet live in the midſt of ſo many deaths? Hence,

Secondly, Others conceive, that Job under theſe ſimilitudes renews his old ſuit to die; as if he had ſaid, There is nothing ſo firm, nothing ſo ſtrongly ſetled, but muſt yield at laſt unto corruption, and change its ſtate: therefore let my change come. Let me be removed, for rocks muſt remove; let me be conſumed, for mountains muſt conſume: Stones wear, and trees are waſhed away, let me be worn and waſh'd out of the world, let me paſs away, and die.

Thirdly, That Job doth here move the Lord to pity him, and haſten his releaſe, ſuſpecting that at the laſt he might break out into ſome impatiency, or diſcover uncomely paſſions: As if he had ſaid, Lord, mountains cannot ſtand alwayes, and rocks will fail at laſt; how much ſooner may my patience? My ſtrength is not the ſtrength of ſtones, (as he ſpake, chap. 6. 12.)

Fourthly, All theſe ſimilitudes are conceived to aim at the ſame point, which Job had been upon a little before; namely, to ſhew that a man dying ſhall return no more to his former ſtate, as was there opened. Death giveth us ſuch a wound as ſhall never be healed here, it is an irreparable loſs of our worldly comforts. This he ſhadows out by mountains, rocks, ſtones, trees, and fruits of the earth, which are changed and conſumed, as if they had never been. Thus in general; I ſhall now open the diſtinct parts of theſe compariſons.

Verſe 18. Surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.

Here are two ſimilitudes; Some read, Surely the high mountain, or higheſt mountain, cometh to nought, for the Hebrew word here uſed ſignifies not only to fall, but to be very high and great, ſo high and great, that a man beholding it, or looking down from it, is giddy, and falls for fear. Hence Giants (*Gen.*6.) are called Nephilim, which properly ſignifies Fallers; not becauſe they fall, but becauſe they make others fall: yea, they being ſo high, or men of ſuch ſtupendious limbs and ſtature, others ſeeing them, tremble, and fall before them: So here, for the mountain falling, we may read, the high and huge mountain, the gigantick mountain, the mountain above ordinary mountains, as much as the giant is above the ordinary pitch of men; As if Job had ſaid, the higheſt mountain comes to nought, he ſpeaks not of annihilation, but alteration, they moulder and break, they are not what once they were.

Rab Kimchi exponit נופל, non cadens, ſed altus, editus, ut נפלים gigantes, q.d. Mons editus & giganteus decidit. Lib. Rad.

The word which we tranſlate cometh to nought, ſignifies properly ro wither as a leaf, or to fall as a withered leaf: when the ſap or moiſture of the tree goes down to the root, then the leaves fall off. Thus (ſaith Job) the great mountains, the huge giantly mountains come to nought; they wither, they fall off like the leaves in Autumn: the Prophet Iſaiah prayeth (chap. 64. 1.) O that thou wouldeſt bow the heavens, and come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy preſence: by mountains he means the greateſt worldly powers, not natural, but metaphorical mountains; yet it is a truth in the letter, for if the Lord do but bow the heavens, and ſhew his power; if he bow the heavens, and comes down in the greatneſs of his ſtrength, then the hardeſt mountains, like the liquid waters, ſhall flow down at his preſence.

And the rock is removed out of his place.

A rock is harder than a mountain; a mountain is earth heaped together, but a rock is earth hardned together: but though it be not only a mountain, but a rock, yea, though it be a mountain of rocks, remove it ſhall.

עתק conſenuit παλαιωθήσεται, veteraſcit. Sept

The word ſignifies properly, to wax old, becauſe things that wax old are removing and paſſing away; Hence the ſame word ſignifies to wax old, and to be removed; that's the Apoſtle's deſcription of a thing that waxeth old, (Heb. 8.13.) that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vaniſh away; he ſpeaks to a ſpiritual point, yet from a maxim in nature. So here, the rock is removed out of his place, is the ſame with, the rock waxeth old; becauſe that which waxeth old is ready to be removed out of his place. From theſe two ſimilitudes, Obſerve, Firſt, There is no creature ſo ſtrong or firm, but is ſubject unto change.

The mountains and the rocks change ordinarily by the power of time, how much more when God contends with them by an extraordinary power? The Prophet Nahum ſpeaks this in higheſt Rhetorick (chap. 1.4,5,6.) he rebuketh the ſea, and maketh it dry. (If any thing keep water, it is the ſea, which is the greateſt veſſel prepared on purpoſe by God to keep the waters; yet God can lade the Ocean with the hollow of his hand, and dry, not only a pond or a river, but the Sea; He rebuketh the ſea, and maketh it dry;) Baſhan languiſheth and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languiſheth, the mountains quake at him, the hills melt, and the earth is burnt at his preſence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein, then who can ſtand before his indignation, and who can abide the fierceneſs of his anger? his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him. This piece of Nahum's prophecy is a clear commentary upon the Text of Job: what can be ſaid more, and nothing leſs deſerves to be ſaid, either of the inſtability of the ſtrongeſt creatures, or of the omnipotency of the God of ſtrength. He toſſeth the hills like tennis-balls, and cracks the rocks like a nutſhell; before him the hills melt, and the foundations of the earth are diſcovered. The creature will change by reaſon of its own weakneſs, though God ſhould not exert or put forth his power againſt it. Every mixt body hath the ſeed of corruption in it, and therefore muſt corrupt naturally, though God ſhould not deſtroy it providentially or judiciarily: Now if theſe creatures are changeable in themſelves, ſurely when God changeth them they ſhall be changed: all creature ſtrength muſt yield to his ſtrength, whoſe weakneſs is ſtronger than all creatures; If God ſend out a commiſſion againſt a mountain, it falls, and muſt come down; if he bids a rock remove, the rock ſhall be removed; if God ſay to the wind, blow away that mountain, or to a tempeſt, blow down that rock, it ſhall be done; ſtormy winds and tempeſts go preſently upon his errand, and fulfill his word. Faith is ſaid to remove mountains, but it is only upon this account, becauſe it engageth the power of God, who alone can do it.

Secondly, Obſerve, (which is alſo applicable to the other ſimilitudes;)

That the ſtrongeſt creatures read man a lecture of his weakneſſe.

When Job would ſhew man his frailty, he ſends him to the mountains and rocks, which are the moſt durable among earthly ſubſtances: the weakeſt creature is an embleme of mans weakneſs, and the ſtrongeſt teacheth him, there is no truſting to his ſtrength. As Solomon ſends the ſluggard to the piſmire, ſaying, conſider her wayes and be wiſe; ſo we may ſay to the ſtrong man, to the confident man, to the proud man, to all who think they ſhall never be removed; go to the mountains, repair to the rocks, and be wiſe; go to the ſtones which wear away with water drops, go to the trees which are rooted up by a deluge of waters: go to theſe, and learn the vanity and mutability of your beſt eſtate. We may learn of that which cannot ſpeak; things inſenſible may reaſon the matter with us: they have a voice, though not a tongue, to tell us what we are; For as the inviſible things of God, to wit, his eternal power and Godhead, are ſeen in the things which are made; ſo the inviſible things of man, even his temporal weakneſs and frailty, are ſeen in the things which decay ſince their making. The power of God is inviſible, and ſo is much of the weakneſs of man. The conſtitution of the creature makes the former viſible, and the corruption of it makes the latter viſible. Every thing that man ſees remembers him what he is, and what he muſt ſhortly be. And becauſe abundance of caution in this point is no burthen, Job gives further caution: And as I have opened the former, ſo I ſhall now theſe latter inſtances, by which he confirms this truth.

Verſe 19. The waters wear the ſtones, thou waſheſt away the things that grow out of the duſt of the earth, and thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man.

In this verſe we have two ſimilitudes more, together with the application of all the four, in thoſe words, Thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man, in conjunction with the twentieth verſe, Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him, and he paſſeth, &c.

Gutta cavat lapidem. Ovid. lib. 4. de Ponto.

The waters wear the ſtones.] Waters are ſoft and liquid, yet they make impreſſion upon that which is hard, and almoſt impenetrable: it is a Proverbial ſpeech, water by continual running, or often dropping hollows and dents a ſtone. This ſimilitude intimates, that though Jobs afflictions had been ſmall or light, whereas indeed they were great and heavy, though they had been but as little drops whereas indeed they were a mighty deluge, yet their long continuance and frequent repetition, would utterly weaken and wear him out at laſt: dropping will conſume a ſtone.

Hence Obſerve, That continued and repeated acts though ſmall, produce great effects.

What ſingle force doth not, many doublings of it will. Many lighter blows will kill as well as one great wound. A man may be whipt as well as club'd to death. He that goes but a little way in an hour goes a great way if he continue going many hours. A Student in any profeſſion may have got ſo little learning by one dayes ſtudy, that he cannot perceive he hath got any, yet continuing to ſtudy he may attain the higheſt degree of learning. A believer findes little or no growth in grace or in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, by ſome one exerciſe either in prayer or hearing the word, yet by a conſtant attendance upon the Lord in theſe duties, he grows to a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fullneſs of Chriſt. Smalleſt ſins lived in (which ſome do not ſo much as ſuſpect to be dangerous) deſtroy the ſoul, as well as that (whatſoever it is) which is called by this name, a ſin unto death (1 John 5.16.) The greateſt number is made up of conjoyned unities. Here a little and there a little, comes to much. The mightieſt oak is hewed down, and the ſtrongeſt wall is undermined by many ſtroaks of the axe and mattock. A ſhip may be ſwallowed up with a multitude of little ſands as well as broken upon a rock: you may make a burden of many feathers as well as of one maſs of lead. A multitude in any kind whether of actions things or perſons, though inconſiderable apart, yet put together or following each other cloſe, will carry all before them, and overcome all difficulties. The waters wear the ſtones.

Thou waſheſt away the things that grow out of the earth.

Thou waſheſt] Who is that? the antecedent is God himſelf. Thou (O Lord) waſheſt away the things, &c. Here Job expreſſeth the ſupream efficient of all thoſe alterations in the creature, who it is that pulls down the mountains, that temoves the rocks, all theſe changes are wrought by the power of God, thou waſheſt away the things that grow out of the earth, or, thou bringeſt a deluge upon them. God brought once an univerſal deluge, which waſhed away not only all that grew out of the earth, but all that lived upon the face of the earth. God hath given mankind his covenant, and ſet his bow in the cloud as a ſign of it, that all fleſh ſhall not be cut off any more by the waters of a floud, neither ſhall there any more be a floud to deſtroy the earth, (Gen. 9.11.) yet God hath often ſince brought flouds upon particular places and countreys, which have deſtroyed and waſhed away that which grows upon the face of the earth, as herbs, graſs and trees.

The word ſtrictly taken ſignifies only thoſe things which grow naturally out of the earth without the labour of man, without plowing, digging, or ſowing. So we find the things that grow out of the earth diſtinguiſhed (1 King. 19.23.) This ſhall be a ſign to thee, thou ſhalt eat this year ſuch things as grow of themſelves, and the ſecond year that which groweth of the ſame, and the third year ye ſhall plant and ſow: The Levitical Law mindes us alſo of this diſtinction, (Lev. 25. 5.) that which groweth of its own accord of thy harveſt thou ſhalt not reap. As the Jews were forbidden to ſow their field in the year of Jubile, ſo alſo to reap that (as a peculiar crop to any one of them) which grew up without their ſowing. The ſtanding corn (if it ſtand too long) ſheds ſome grains, which ſpring up without plowing or ſowing: This is ſaid to grow of its own accord; yet (I conceive) we need not take it here in ſuch a reſtrained ſenſe, but in general, for all or every thing that groweth out of the duſt of the earth, whether by or without the labour of the husbandman: Thou waſheſt away the things that grow out of the duſt of the earth. Hence obſerve,

First, The ſame thing may be both a bleſſing and an affliction.

Things grow out of the duſt of the earth, by water flowing out of the earth, or by the rain falling upon the earth from heaven; and yet the falling of the rain, and the flowing of the water, may deſtroy the things that grow out of the duſt of the earth: if the rain fall not on the duſt of the earth, nothing will grow. God threatens to make the rain of the land powder and duſt (Deut. 28. 24.) that is, to ſend ſo much drought, that the duſt ſhall riſe from the earth up into the air, and fall down upon the earth inſtead of rain. Now when the rain is duſt, nothing will ſpring out of the duſt of the earth. The earth is barren; the earth opens its mouth, and gapes to heaven for rain (as a thirſty man) to make it fruitful: yet, this water, this rain, which ſometimes is a great bleſſing to the earth, and cauſeth it to bring forth fruit abundantly, even this deſtroyes the fruit of the earth: too much of any thing in nature is hurtful: there may be too much of nature, but there cannot be too much of grace; ſome things are ſo good, that we cannot have too great a quantity of them. The dews and drops of heaven upon the ſoul in greateſt abundance, will not deſtroy the things that grow in or out of our ſouls, but make them grow more. Our ſin and the wrath of God turn our greateſt worldly comforts into curſes; but that is alwayes a bleſſing to us which cures us of our ſin, and the more we have of it, the more bleſſings we alwayes have.

Secondly, Obſerve, The Lord who makes things to grow out of the earth, makes them wither.

He who giveth us the fruit of the ground, takes the fruit of the ground away: Mercies and Judgments come from the very ſame hand, and both from the hand of God; The Lord ſaith to the fields, encreaſe and multiply: His word, yea, his ſteps drop fatneſs. Where God walketh in mercy, every ſtep he ſets is a drop of fatneſs, and where he walks in anger, every ſtep he ſets is a drop of leanneſs; He that makes the fields flouriſh, makes them droop; he waſheth away the things that grow out of the duſt of the earth.

Thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man.

As if he had ſaid, Thou who cauſeſt the mountains to fall, and rocks to conſume; thou who cauſeſt ſtones to wear, and waſheſt away the things that grow out of the earth, thou, even thou, deſtroyeſt the hope of man: that is, in deſtroying theſe things, thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man; or, as thou deſtroyeſt theſe ſtrong, durable, and beautiful creatures, ſo the hope of man ſet upon any creature. The Hebrew particle (Vau) is often put as a note of likeneſs; And thou deſtroyeſt, is, ſo thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man.

But ſhall the hope of man be deſtroyed? What hope, and whoſe hope ſhall be deſtroyed? There is a hope of man, ſtronger than the mountains, and more durable than rocks or ſtones. Though theſe conſume and come to nought, yet that ſhall not. The hope of the Saints endures for ever, and they ſhall never be aſhamed of their hope: their hope is an Anchor, (ſo the Apoſtle calls it, *Heb.*6.) ſure and ſtedfaſt: and as the hope of the Saints is a ſure anchor, ſo it is faſtned by ſuch a cable as will never crack, let the winds blow, and the waves riſe as high as they will. The word of promiſe is the cable which holdeth this anchor, that word of promiſe is ſtronger than a threefold cord, and cannot at all be broken.

Again, as this anchor is ſtrongly faſtned above, ſo it is let down upon, and is faſtned in a rock beneath. That anchor of hope will never drag which falls into Chriſt, the clifts of that rock hold it, and will not let it go. It is impoſſible to deſtroy ſuch a hope as this: The hope of Saints ſhall indeed be deſtroyed, or perfected rather, by enjoyment; but it ſhall not be deſtroyed by diſappointment. When we enjoy all things, what need we hope for any thing? Hope is ſwallowed up in fruition. Saints never loſe their hope, till they have found all that they hoped for: If in this life only we had hope in Chriſt, we were of all men moſt miſerable, 1 Cor. 15.19. We ſhall not hope any longer than we live here, but we have a hope of good beyond this life: our hope laſteth no longer than our lives, but the things we hope for, laſt longer than the mountains, yea, longer (as old Jacob ſpeaks in his benediction upon Joſeph) than the everlaſting hills: our hope will laſt, that is, we have hope of that which will laſt as long as everlaſtingneſs.

Seeing then the hope of Saints is no periſhing hope, whoſe hope doth Job mean, when he ſaith, Thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man?

He means the hope of vain men, or the vain hope of good men. God deſtroyeth all the hopes of vain men, and all the vain hopes of any man, ſuch hopes as thoſe proud men had after the floud ſhall be deſtroyed; who ſaid, Go to, let us build us a city and tower whoſe top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, leſt we be ſcattered abroad upon the face of the earth. (*Gen.*21.4.) God ſcatters their hopes, who by worldly power or policy, hope to ſecure themſelves againſt ſcattering: a hope to get our ſelves a name, and ſo to faſten our ſelves upon earthly foundations, as never to be removed, ſhall ſurely be removed. The Pſalmiſt diſcovered, that the inward thoughts of covetous men are, that their houſes ſhall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations, (Pſal. 49.11.) this is their thought and hope: God deſtroyeth ſuch hopes often, letting their houſes fall to the ground, before themſelves fall into the grave: or if their outward glory out-live them, yet their poſterity ſhall out-live their glory; their ſons ſhall either wantonly ſcatter what they have miſerably gathered, and at laſt be eaten up with wants, or the wrath of God will ſcatter what the father gathered, and the ſon hath mind enough to keep. And as God deſtroyes the hope of covetous men, that their riches ſhall abide, ſo the hope of voluptuous men, that their pleaſures ſhall be renewed: ſuch a hope the Prophet Iſaiah deſcribes the idle, idoll ſhepherds full of; (Iſa. 56.12.) when they ſay, Come ye, and I will fetch wine, and we will fill our ſelves with ſtrong drink, and to morrow ſhall be as this day, and much more abundant. The hoped for cup ſhall be pulled from their mouths, who do not drink for thirſt, but thirſt for a drinking.

Further, God deſtroyeth all their hopes, who hope in the arm of fleſh. The Jews thought Egypt help enough againſt all enemies, even while they neglected to keep God their friend. But ſee how the Prophet reproves them, or befools them for it: Why gaddeſt thou about ſo much to change thy way? As if he had ſaid, When one worldly means fails thee, thy reſort is to another: if Aſſyria help thee not, thou art confident that Egypt will, but thou ſhalt be aſhamed of Egypt, as thou waſt aſhamed of Aſſyria. That is, theſe hopes ſhall fail thee, and thy expectations, they ſhall be fruſtrate in the one as well as in the other. For God hath rejected thy confidences, and thou ſhalt not proſper in them, (Jer. 2. 36,37.) Thus God deſtroyeth the hope of vain men, and not only ſo, but

He deſtroyeth alſo the vain hopes of good men ('tis poſſible for ſuch to have vain hopes) hopes of long life, of proſperous dayes, of riches, and of great things for themſelves: They ſometimes project as vainly as the world, and joyn with thoſe in action, from whom they are ſeparated by profeſſion. The Lord in mercy blaſteth theſe hopes of good men, that they may be taught to fix their hopes on better things. He ſhews how weak and withering the creature is, though in their hands, that their hearts may be wholly ſet on him. We enjoy God moſt, when we hope leaſt in man; and God doth therefore deſtroy the vain hopes of ſome men, that they may enjoy himſelf more. As all the hope of hypocrites ſhall be deſtroyed, ſo ſhall ſome hopes of thoſe who are ſincere.

Thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man; that is, in deſtroying thoſe things upon which man hopes; thou deſtroyeſt the hope of man: the act or habit of hope is often put for the object of it. Man hopes in mountains material and metaphorical; he truſts in the rocks and ſtones of the earth? or in the things that grow out of the earth; riches and plenty. All theſe things are deſtroyable, and when theſe are deſtroyed, the hope of moſt men is deſtroyed: if the matter upon which our hopes are fixed be periſhing, our hopes ſhall periſh: We cannot raiſe a ſafe or a firm building upon a rotten or unſound foundation. Earthly things, the mountains of the earth cannot make a pillar to prop up the hope of man, when God will pull it down.

I have from former paſſages in this book, ſhewed, how great a poſſeſſion hope is; and that even the light of Nature in ſome, hath preferred it before all their poſſeſſions. I have alſo ſhewed, that it is the laſt piece which man quits the poſſeſſion of in his greateſt extremities, and that when that's gone, all is gone. Man hath nothing more to be deſtroyed, when once his hope is deſtroyed: if our hope be prevailed over, we are prevailed over for ever: Jobs diſcourſe leads us to this concluſion in the next verſe.

Verſe 20. Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him, and he paſſeth, thou changeſt his countenance, and ſendeſt him away.

This verſe explains the application of the ſimilitude, when the Lord deſtroyeth the hope of man, he prevaileth againſt him for ever.

Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him, and he paſſeth.

Thou prevaileſt] The word is, thou waxeſt ſtrong upon him, or, thou art ſtronger than he: all prevailing proceeds from greater ſtrength, either of body or mind: equality makes no conqueſt. And though (as Hannah ſings 1 Sam. 1, 9,) by ſtrength ſhall no man prevail; yet the ſtrength of God will prevail. The reaſon why no man prevails by ſtrength is, becauſe God alone hath more ſtrength than all men put together, and becauſe he hath, theretherefore he can prevail by his own ſtrength over man, and that for ever.

Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him] The word which we tranſlate for ever, ſignifies alſo in the verb to prevail, to triumph, or to overcome; thou waxeſt ſtrong over him triumphingly and victoriouſly; or, thou triumpheſt over him, and thou ſhalt alwayes triumph over him. A triumph is the ſignal of perfect victory, and where victory is perfect, it is victory for ever: God prevails ſo over man, that he may triumph, and therefore he is rightly ſaid to prevail triumphantly, or to prevail for ever.

Thou prevaileſt for ever; which may be underſtood two wayes.

Firſt, That man is ſo prevailed upon, that he cannot repair himſelf again. If God break down, man cannot build up, and if he wound, man cannot heal: both breach and wound muſt continue for ever, unleſs the ſame hand that made them make them up again.

Secondly, That, how often ſoever God taketh man in hand, he is ſure to carry the day againſt him; he prevaileth for ever. God is alwayes armed with ſufficient ſtrength to ſubdue all ſtrength unto himſelf. Nor can we ſurprize God, or come upon him, before he hath drawn out his ſtrength, and made it ready. He muſt be a perpetual Victor or Triumpher who hath alwayes ſtrength enough to get the victory, and whoſe ſtrength is alwayes ready enough to go to battel. There was never any man alwayes a conquerour, but God is. Men have been mighty conquerors, and have had conquerour juſtly affixed to their titles. Yet not one of theſe was alwayes a conquerour, the beſt of men have been ſometimes worſted, or could not prevail; Only God prevaileth ever. If he undertake a work or a deſign, whether for or againſt man, he will be ſure to have his ends: for nothing can ſtand in his way. All that is in the way is of his own ſetting, and he is wiſer than to ſet any thing in his way, which ſhall hinder him in the bringing about his own ends. What ſtrength ſoever the creature hath, it hath from God, and ſurely he hath not given out more than he keeps to himſelf. He will not be maſtered with his own gifts, nor make derivative power too ſtrong for original power. Indeed all the power which God gives is weakneſs, and the wiſdome folly, compared with that he keeps: and what is weakneſs to omnipotency? what is folly to wiſdome? what is mortal and changeable, to eternal and unchangeable, that it ſhould hinder its prevailing?

The vulgar reads differently, referring this act of prevailing, not to the ſtrength of God prevailing over man, but to the bounty of God giving man ſtrength to prevail: Thou haſt ſtrengthened him for a little while, that he might paſs away for ever. As if God exalted man only to caſt him down with a more fearful ruine: or, as if Job had ſaid, Thou didſt heretofore ſtrengthen me, but now thou abateſt my ſtrength; I was once ſet up, but now thou trampleſt me under foot. 'Tis, I grant, the deſign of God againſt his enemies, to advance them on purpoſe that he may overthrow them with greater advantage. Thus the Lord ſaid of Pharaoh, for this ſame purpoſe have I raiſed thee up, that I might ſhew my power in thee (Rom. 9. 17.) But God deals not thus with his own ſervants; for though he gives them ſtrength, and then tries them, yet he never gives them ſtrength that he may (with a greater reputation to his own ſtrength) triumph over them. And therefore I lay this tranſlation aſide, and embrace our own, as cleareſt to the intendment of theſe ſimilitudes: Thou prevaileſt for ever againſt him.

And he paſſeth.] That is, he dieth; ſo the word is uſed (chap. 10. 21.) death is our paſſage out of the world; we come in, and we paſs out: man muſt paſs when God giveth him a paſs to travel out of the land of the living.

Thou changeſt his countenance, and ſendeſt him away.

This change of his countenance is taken three wayes.

Firſt, Some underſtand it of the habit of a dying or dead man: Death brings a change upon the whole man; eſpecially upon the face or countenance: both the beauty and the feature of the face change at the appearance of death: fairneſs is then turned into paleneſs, ſweetneſs into ſwarthineſs. The noſtrils are ſharp, the eyes hollow, the ears are ſhrunk, and the jaws fallen: the dead man looks not like himſelf, not like the man he was, when he was healthy and alive. Phyſicians give us the deſcription of that change, and teach us to ſpell the letters, and read the characters of death printed upon the face. Death ſends its image as a harbinger to take up every room of our bodies, before it ſelf comes to lodge in our bodies. Standers by may ſee death in their ſick friends, long before their ſick friends feel it. Hence obſerve, Nitidum & vividum vultum cum lurido & pallente commutat. Merc. In morte tota facies redditur ſibi contraria. Acutus enim fit naſus, oculi cavi, tempora collapſa, aures contractæ,&c. ut docet Hipp. lib. prænot.

Death defaceth the beauty, and doth blaſt the comlineſs of man.

How much ſoever any glory in the beams of beauty now, ſickneſs will ſhortly eclipſe and death will totally darken it. Spiritual beauty will never change, but for the better: the countenance of the ſoul adorned with grace, changeth into glory, when a believer dies: Soul-beauty will be more beautiful, and attain its full perfection, when bodily beauty is none at all, but is turned into corruption: when the frame of nature is ruined in us, the frame of grace ſhall be compleated in us; And we ſhall be all glorious within, when there is no glory left without. Thou changeſt his countenance.

Secondly, This change of the countenance is expounded not for that inſtantaneous change which death brings into the body, or not for that only, but for that continual change which man is ſubject to in his body while he lives: the countenance is put for the whole outward man. Death is our moſt remarkable change, but it is not at all our change: Every day carries away ſome ſpoils of beauty and ſtrength from the ſtrongeſt and moſt beautiful body. No day looketh upon us, or we upon it, with the ſame face.

--Nulla non dies formoſi ſpolium corporis abſtulit. Sen. in Hypol.

Thirdly, Others take the countenance more largely, not for the face or whole body onely, but for the whole ſtate of a man: it is uſual to apply the word face or countenance to all changes: we ſay, there is a new face of things, or of affairs, affairs, when affairs whether perſonal or publick are much changed. As if he had ſaid, Thou changeſt his whole ſtate, and ſendeſt him away: becauſe all changes appear in the face, therefore in whatſoever our change is, 'tis ſaid our face is changed.

Mihi friget iſte ſenſus, melius omnino hanc faciem interpretari poſſumus generalem ſuarum rerum ſtatum. Bold.

Man hath one face in riches, another in poverty; one in honour, another in diſgrace: The copy of a mans countenance changeth, not only as his body, but as his condition and relations change. You may ſee how it is with us in our faces; for, as our conditional countenance changeth, ſo doth our perſonal. 'Twas ſhewed at the ſecond verſe of this Chapter, that man continueth not in any condition alwayes the ſame; his natural, his civil, his ſpiritual eſtate, are liable unto changes: what they are, I refer the Reader back to the verſe mentioned; Thou changeſt his countenance,

Ablegas eum hinc non rediturum, velut extrudis & amandas eum ex hoc ſeculo prorſus.

And ſendeſt him away.] He ſaid before, He paſſeth away; here he varies the phraſe, Thou ſendeſt him away, that is, he dieth, there's the end of all. Man hath many changes while he lives, and ſhortly he muſt change from life to death: the manner of expreſſing it is conſiderable.

Thou ſendeſt him away. Man dieth by diſpatch from God; God ſends him a writ to die. Thou ſendeſt him away. Death is mans diſmiſſion out of the world. The word imports a ſpecial direction. When Adam had ſinned, the Lord God ſent him forth from the Garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken (Gen. 3.23.) He bid Adam be gone out of the Garden, and he bids the ſons of Adam be gone out of the world. Old Simeon ſaid, Now let thy ſervant depart in peace; give me my diſmiſſion or my writ of eaſe. God ſends wicked men away whether they will or no: Saints would be ſent away and depart with leave. Wicked men are put out of the world, as the Leprous perſon was put out of the Camp of Iſrael, leſt he ſhould infect others. Godly men are ſent out of the world, when they have done the errand they came about, for the good of others.

Verſe 21. His ſons come to honour, and he knows it not; they are brought low, and he perceiveth it not.

Cum multi fuerint filii ejus neſcit ſin autem pauci fuerint ignorat Sept.

His ſons come to honour.] Some refer it to number; his ſons are multiplied: others, to riches; his ſons get wealth; we, to greatneſs; his ſons come to honour. Some are born to honour, and others come to it; ſome receive it from their parents, others get it by their atchievments; it runs to ſome in their blood, others riſe to it by their virtue and worth, by their parts and abilities: 'Tis better to get honour, then to have honour, and to make our ſelves honourable, then to be made honourable. It is eaſie to inherit honour, but it is hard to attain honour. His ſons come to honour;

And he knoweth it not.] An act of knowledge is often put for an act of the affection: We are ſaid not only not to know that which we are ignorant of, but that which we are regardleſs of, ſo here, he knows not when his ſons come to honour, that is, he is not affected with it: Uſually a parent knows nothing more then the preferment of his children, and he ſeldom ſtudies any point more. Job deſcribes a father ignorant or inſenſible of his ſons preferment. And as he knows not the good which his ſons come to, ſo not the evil which comes upon his ſons, as he tells us in the next words.

And they are brought low, or diminiſhed.] They are diminiſhed in number, but few are left; or they are made low and poor in ſtate, there is but little left to them.

And he perceiveth it not.] That is, He is not grieved at it. But who is this inſenſible ignorant father? or what is it that renders him thus ignorant and inſenſible of all the providences of God, whether good or bad, to his own bowels?

Some expound both clauſes of a dead father; Thou ſendeſt him away, he dies, and then his ſons come to honour, and he knoweth it not, &c. A dead man hath no knowledge at all of what is done among the living: They that are out of the world, perceive not what is done in the world; no, not with thoſe that are neareſt and deareſt to them, their own ſons; and as they have no knowledge of, ſo no affections to the world; the dead neither rejoyce with, nor mourn over thoſe that live. Solomon's deſcription of an Atheiſt, and of his falſe conceits about death, may (though not in his ſence) be applied for the illuſtrationn of this truth (Eccleſ. 9.5,6,) The living know they ſhall die. Atheiſts ſpeak thus, not from a certainty of knowledge cauſing them to prepare for death, but from a careleſneſs mixed with their knowledge, cauſing them to ſlight death; they know they muſt die, and therefore care not though they die. Death (ſay they) befals all, and therefore ſhould not trouble any. This is all the care they take about death, when they profeſs their knowledge of death. The living know they ſhall die, but the dead know not any thing. The Atheiſt ſpeaks it downright, as if when a man dies, there were an end of him. He knows no more, that is (in their divinity) he is no more. But though the dead in Chriſt know many things, they know their own happineſs and eternal life, and though the dead who die out of Chriſt, know many things, they know their own torment and miſery, they know alſo the falſeneſs of this opinion, that the dead know nothing; yet there is a truth in what they ſay, though not in what they mean: For the dead know not any thing of this preſent life, or of the things done here on earth. They know not any thing of theſe things, as knowing is taken for apprehending; and they know nothing of them, as knowing is taken for grieving at, or rejoycing in them; ſo the Preacher ſpeaks at ver. 6. in the language of his Atheiſt ſtill: Alſo their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now periſhed, and they have no more portion for ever in all that is done under the Sun. They therefore have no love nor hatred, nor envy about thoſe things that are doing under the Sun, becauſe they have no portion in all that is done under the Sun. When man dies, he hath a portion, but it doth not lie under the Sun. Wicked men have their portion with hypocrites and unbelievers: The godly have a portion with Chriſt and all the Saints in glory; as for earthly things, they are none of their portion, and therefore none of their care, and they have as little affection about them as they have uſe of them, their ſons come to honour, and they rejoyce not; their ſons are made low, and they grieve not. The Prophet Iſaiah prayes earneſtly (chap. 63. 16.) Look down (O Lord) from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holineſs and of thy glory, where is thy zeal and thy ſtrength, the ſounding of thy bowels and of thy mercies towards me? Are they reſtrained? Doubtleſs thom art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Iſrael acknowledge us not; that is, as ſome expound the place to the point in hand; though Abraham and Iſrael our forefathers are ſo far from being able to relieve and deliver us out of our troubles, that they are utterly unacquainted with them; yet we are aſſured thou knoweſt what our troubles are, and art able to relieve us. Though Abraham and Iſrael our deceaſed forefathers have no zeal, nor any ſounding of bowels, that is, pity and compaſſion towards us their bowels, though they are not grieved becauſe we are made low, yet Lord, thou liveſt for ever, and ſo do thy zeal and compaſſions to thy people; therefore look down from heaven and help us. There is another expoſition of the Prophet, which gives the ſence as a prevention of an objection againſt the former petition; why ſhould you expect to be heard though you are the children of Abraham and Iſrael, when your walk is ſo unanſwerable to that of Abraham and Iſrael, that if they were alive again here upon the earth, they would not own or acknowledge you as their children? To this the Prophet is conceived to anſwer, let it be granted or confeſſed that we are a people ſo degenerate, that even our forefathers, if they were ſent among us from the dead, would not own us for their children, let it be granted that we are unworthy in our ſelves to be counted Abraham's children; yet through thy free grace, we may be numbred among thy children. Doubtleſs thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us. Thy love changes not, though the love of men doth; thou wilt not caſt us off, though Abraham do: This is a very ſpiritual interpretation, nor is it inconſiſtent with the former; we may joyn both together thus, If Abraham were alive, he (poſſibly) would neither own nor help us, we are ſo ſinful; but Abraham is dead, and doth not ſo much as know that we want help; therefore Lord, look down from heaven, and help us thy ſelf; Abraham's bowels are not moved towards his ſons, O let not thine be reſtrained!

Let this admoniſh parents who take inordinate and immoderate care, by right or wrong to advance their children: Some live miſerably, that their children may flouriſh; yea, not a few have deſtroyed their own ſouls, that their children might be great and rich when they are dead; what a pitiful deſign is this! Thou ſhalt not rejoyce in the grave that thy ſon is rich, neither ſhalt thou grieve for thy ſon that he is poor, when thou ceaſeſt to be among men; for as thy knowledge is periſhed, ſo thy love, thy envy, thy ſorrow are periſhed as to the creature here below. A ſons preferment is nothing to the deceaſed father; therefore let not fathers venture their Conſciences, and hazard their ſouls to prefer their children: be not anxiouſly afraid, that when you are dead, your children may be poor, this trouble will never come near your heart when you are dead. God promiſed Joſiah (2 Kings 22. 20.) I will gather thee unto thy Fathers, and thou ſhalt be gathered into thy grave in peace, and thine eyes ſhall not ſee all (that is, not any of) the evil which I will bring upon this place: As if he had ſaid, I am reſolved as I have decreed, to bring evil upon this place; but it ſhall be no grief to thee; for thou ſhalt firſt be taken out of this place. And when the Prophet Iſaiah brought Hezekiah a ſad meſſage, Behold the dayes come that all that is in thy houſe, and all that thy fathers have laid up in ſtore until this day, ſhall be carried to Babylon; and of thy ſons that ſhall iſſue from thee, which thou ſhalt beget, ſhall they take away, and they ſhall be Eunuchs in the palace of the King of Babylon (Iſa. 39. 6, 7.) Then ſaid Hezekiah to Iſaiah, good is the word of the Lord which thou haſt ſpoken; he ſaid moreover, for there ſhall be peace and truth in my dayes: He ſpeaks not ſlightingly of the evil to come; Hezekiah was far from the ſpirit of that Roman Emperor who ſaid, When I am once dead, let heaven and earth mingle, what care I what becomes of the world when I am once out of it: Hezekiah was not a man of this temper; yet it was ſome abatement of thoſe evils to him, that they ſhould not come till he was paſt feeling them, or being ſenſible of them. The reaſon which the Prophet gives, why God takes good men out of the world ſometimes, is, becauſe he knows a ſtorm is coming, and he would not have them overtaken with it, and therefore he houſes them before it come (Iſa. 57. 1, 2.) The righteous periſheth, and no man layeth it to heart; and merciful men are taken away, none conſidering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come. The evil to come is no hurt to them when they are gone. This is Gods deſign, though few conſider it: And as they who are taken away, have no feeling of the evils to come, ſo no fellow-feeling; there is no ſympathy in heaven: Saints are not troubled there at the troubles of any here on earth. It is a grace while we are here troubled at the troubles of others; and it is our priviledge, that in heaven we ſhall not. The Author to the Hebrews exhorts us, to remember thoſe that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them that ſuffer adverſity, as being our ſelves in the body (Heb. 13. 2.) 'Tis our being in the body which makes it either a duty or poſſibility for us to partake in the ſufferings of other men.

Me mortuo miſceatur igne terra. Calig.

We may hence confute the Popiſh Doctrine and Practice of praying to Saints departed. When they are ſent away, they know neither our ſpiritual nor our temporal eſtate, why then ſhould we pray to them about either? The Saints cannot ſee from heaven to earth, nor can they hear from heaven to earth; 'tis God, whoſe name is the God hearing prayers, and therefore to him ſhall all fleſh come; if all fleſh are obliged to come to him, where is our warrant to come to Saints departed? And if we do, where is our hope to receive their help, when they are ignorant that we want help? Though we are made low, they perceive it not.

A ſecond interpretation tells us, that Job ſpeaks not here of a man in the ſtate of death, but of a man about to die, or upon his death-bed: ſuch a mans ſons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and then we muſt expound knowing in the ſecond ſence, for regarding or being affected with what we know. Great perſonal afflictions make us forget all worldly relations, together with the comforts and ſorrows which attend them. A ſick man, eſpecially a dying man, takes no pleaſure in his life, and is uſually ſo buſied with his own pains, that he takes little or no notice of the pain or pleaſure of others. A man in ſuch a condition, can hardly be perſwaded to take in ſpiritual comforts, or to refreſh his ſoul with a taſte of that ſweet wine, with a morſel of that marrow and fatneſs which the promiſes of eternal life preſent unto him, much leſs can he delight himſelf in ſenſitive, leaſt of all, in ſenſual objects. Come, and tell him his ſons are advanced, and his eſtate thrives, he regards it not; alas (ſaith he) I am going out of the world, what's all this to me? Mr. Broughton's tranſlation anſwers this ſence with much clearneſs: Only his fleſh is grieved for it ſelf, and his ſoul will mourn for himſelf; as if he had ſaid, his own grief will ſpend out all his poſſibilities of grieving, he will have none in ſtore to beſtow elſewhere: Our ſons are our own fleſh and blood, and if any thing would affect a man, it would be to hear of his ſons; and if any thing concerning his ſons would affect him, to hear of their welfare or affliction, would. How do parents rejoyce when their ſons come to honour? how are they afflicted, when their ſons are made low? As our ſons are our own, ſo we reckon upon their good or evil, upon all the occaſions of their joy or ſorrow, as our own. Our children are our ſelves multiplied, and (in a ſence) immortaliz'd; and love to our children, is but one degree in nature removed from that of our ſelves: Yet a time is coming, when our ſons and our daughters, about whom we have had ſo many joyes and ſorrows, for whom we have laid out ſo many thoughts and cares, even theſe ſhall not have either our joy or ſorrow, our thought or care. It was an argument of the wonderful love of Chriſt, as ſome of the Ancients obſerve upon this place, that when he was nail'd to the Croſs, ready to die; he (as it were) forgot his own ſorrows and grievous ſufferings, and remembred his relations (John. 19. 25.) He ſaid to his Mother, Woman, behold thy ſon; and to the Diſciple, behold thy mother. Now was Simeon's propheſie fulfilled upon the bleſſed Virgin, Yea, a ſword ſhall pierce through thy own ſoul alſo, Luke 2. 35. And therefore Chriſt applies theſe comfortable words, as a ſalve to her wounds, even while his own were bleeding unto death: Woman, behold thy ſon; Diſciple, behold thy mother. He calls her woman, and not mother, not as unwilling to own her for his mother; but either as fearing that ſuch an owning her, might have created her further trouble; or, as ſhewing that being ready to die, and return to his father in heaven, he was above earthly relations, and knew none after the fleſh, no not his own mother. And yet though he was not only above, but leaving his mother, he leaves her to the care of his beloved Diſciple. And that remembrance which Chriſt at his death expreſſed to his mother, in committing her to a diſciple, the ſame he had expreſſed a little before to all his Diſciples; yea, and to all believers, both in committing them to his father when he was gone, and by telling them that he was but gone (as a harbinger) to take up lodgings, and prepare a place for them; aſſuring them alſo, that in his abſence he would ſend the Spirit, who ſhould (with advantage to them) make up the want of his bodily preſence. And laſtly, that himſelf intended to return to them again; he would now ſend one to them, but hereafter he would not ſend a meſſenger for them, but come himſelf, that where he ſhould be, there they might be alſo. Was not the love of Chriſt to his children, ſtronger then death, when he thus remembred and took care of them, both in the approaches and agonies of death? Earthly parents may neglect both the wo and welfare of their children, but Chriſt will not; ſurely he will not do it now, when his fleſh upon him is cloathed with glory, and his ſoul within him is filled with joy; for he did not when his fleſh upon him was full of pain, and his ſoul within him did mourn; which is the reaſon or excuſe rather which Job gives in the next verſe, why earthly fathers do not ſometimes know their own ſons either in honour or diſgrace.

Verſe 22. But his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn.

They who expound the former verſe of man in the ſtate of death, give the ſame expoſition of this, his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn, when he is dead. But hath a dead man pain? or can he mourn? Death is a total privation of all ſenſitive powers, there's no feeling in the grave. The meaning is this, he is afflicted while he lives at the thought of what he ſhall be when he is dead; he grieves that worms ſhould eat him, and that his fleſh ſhould corrupt and rot in the earth. What Job ſpeaks (chap. 21. 23.) in direct oppoſition to this point, is yet a clear proof of this interpretation: He ſhall be brought to the grave, and remain in the tomb, the clods of the valley ſhall be ſweet to him: Now in the ſame ſence that the clods of the valley are ſweet to ſome dead men, they may be ſaid to be painful unto others. Some are very deſirous to die; to ſuch the clods of the valley are ſweet, that is, it pleaſeth them as much to lie in the grave, as to go to a perfumed bed, or to reſt upon a bed of Roſes: Others are very unwilling to die, to ſuch the grave is a priſon of darkneſs and aſtoniſhment. Their living fleſh hath pain upon them, while they conſider that their dead fleſh muſt conſume. Or pain and mourning are here aſcribed to dead men, as ſpeech and joy are often in Scripture aſcribed to Trees and Stones, and Corn-fields. (liveleſs, inſenſible or irrational creatures perſonating or taking upon them thoſe actions which are proper unto man) by the Figure Proſopopeia.

Secondly, The Text may be rendred out of the Hebrew thus, While his fleſh is upon him, he ſhall have pain; and while his ſoul is within him, he ſhall mourn; that is, he ſhall be in pain and miſery as long as he lives, eſpecially while he lives (as a ſick man doth) upon the borders and confines of death. The life of man, while he lives in health, is painful; but when he is ſick and dying, he is fuller of pain. Then his fleſh upon him hath pain, and his ſoul within mourns; he hath ſorrow without, and ſorrow within; which comprehends all ſorts of ſorrow: when the fleſh is pained, and the ſoul mourns, what can be added to that pain and mourning? If the ſpirit be whole, it will ſuſtain the infirmities of the body; if the body be whole, it will ſomewhat allay the infirmities of the mind; but when the fleſh is in pain, and the ſoul mourns, natural miſery is compleat; for then all man is in miſery. Fleſh and ſpirit, body and ſoul, are all of man. And in all this Job doth not ſpeak his ſpeculation, but his experience; he felt what he ſaid, and endured himſelf what he delivered unto others.

A verme ſuper eo dolebit. Targ.

I might here draw out obſervations about the troubles of mans life, and the quickneſs of his ſorrows in the approaches of death: but theſe points have occurred before, and therefore I ſhall not renew any diſcourſe upon them in this place.

Thus I have (through the continued help of Chriſt) finiſhed the Commentary of this fourteeenth Chapter, and of Job's whole Anſwer to the Charge of Zophar, the laſt of his three Friends; and ſo of the whole firſt Charge of his three Friends, and of his Anſwers to all three. It ſeems they were all unſatiſfied in his Anſwers, as much as they were about his perſon; and therefore they begin in order as they began. Eliphaz leads the Battel a ſecond time, and that more fiercely then before; he falls upon Job, not ſo much with ſtronger arguments, as with harder words; rather reproving, then arguing with him, and reproving him with much heat, if not with ſome bitterneſs of ſpirit; as will appear (if the hand of God ſhall lead us yet further) in publiſhing the explication of that his ſecond congreſs.

TO THE

CHRISTIAN READER:

To thoſe eſpecially of this CITY, who have been the Movers, and continue the Promoters of this WORK.

SOLOMON, who made many Books, tells us (towards the end of one of them, Eccl. 12.12.) That, of making many Books there is no end; and, that much ſtudy is a wearineſs to the fleſh. But, while Solomon ſpeaks thus, doth he not at once blot thoſe many Books which himſelf had written, and diſcourage others from writing any more? Though ſtudy be a wearineſs to the fleſh, yet ('tis granted) that's no ſufficient reaſon why we ſhould deſiſt (the fleſh muſt be wearied and hard wrought, 'tis good it ſhould be ſo) but there's no colour of reaſon, why we ſhould begin that, which either cannot be finiſhed and brought to an end, or which is to no end, when 'tis brought to an end and finiſhed. How then ſaith Solomon, that of making many Books there is no end? His ſcope clears this ſcruple; for, having read his Son a Lecture upon the vanity of the Creature, and having given him many excellent advices, for the due ſteering of his courſe through this world, he applies all in the former part of this Verſe. And further, by theſe, my Son, be admoniſhed. Let what is now written take upon thy heart, and be accepted with thee. For (verſ. 10.) The Preacher ſought to find out acceptable words, and that which was written was upright, even words of truth. Again (verſ. 11.) The Words of the wiſe are as Goads and Nayles faſtned by the Maſters of Aſſemblies, which are given from one ſhepherd: Therefore, let theſe words, like goads, put thee on, and like nayles, faſten thee to the obedience of my counſels. By theſe, my ſon, be admoniſhed: As if he had ſaid, Let not this Book, which diſcovers the vanity of all worldly things, be accounted vain: If this Book prevail not with thee, if it maſter not thy judgment, and mannage not thy affections, 'tis to no end for me to make many Books; ſeeing this is cloathed with as much compleatneſs of rule to direct, as a Book of this Argument, can be; and is ſtampt with as much ſtrength of authority to command, as any Book, of any Argument, can be: And further, why ſhouldeſt thou my ſon, put me to the making of many Books? What if I could make many with as much eaſe to my own ſpirit, as I have made this one, which was given me in immediately by the Spirit; yet thou canſt not ſtudy (or, as we put in the Margin, read) many Books without wearineſs to the fleſh.

So then, though Solomon might have had juſt ground to put the affectation both of writing and reading many Books, upon the file of his obſerved vanities; yet he doth not diſoblige from the ſtudy of neceſſary and ſerious Books; nor at all condemn thoſe many Monuments of profitable Learning, which induſtrious Pens have in any Age bequeathed to Poſterity. He indeed (which is yet but a ſecond deſign, if it be at all the deſign of that place) takes us off from vain ſtudies, and cenſures thoſe Books (be they few as well as many) which have no tendency to make any man, either the wiſer, or the better by reading them. Nor can thoſe Books, how many ſoever they are, be (to their diſparagement) called Many, which center in, and promote (what is but one in every kind) any kind of truth, chiefly that which we call divine or holy Truth. Any one uſeleſs, or erroneous Book is too many: Many uſeful and Orthodox Books are but One. The five Books of Moſes are but One Law. The four Books of the Birth, Life and Death of our bleſſed Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, are but One Goſpel: All the Books of both Teſtaments are but One Book. Upon which account, we may alſo ſay, that, all thoſe many and many Books which faithfully interpret that one Book, are but one Book. And though of making many ſuch Books, there ſhould (as I conceive there will) be no end till this World ends, as End is taken for a ceaſing to make them; yet of making many ſuch Books, there is an end; yea, many noble ends, as End is taken for the good or benefit which comes by making them. The making of ſuch Books is good, and a benefit to the Reader, as communicating to him thoſe manifeſtations of the Spirit which are given to every man (to whom they are given) to profit withal: The word (τὸ συμφέρον) there uſed by the Apoſtle, ſignifies ſuch a profit as ſtreameth out to community. The making of ſuch Books is alſo good, and a benefit to the Maker, as being an improvement of his Time and Talents, to his own peace and his Maſters glory. 'Tis reward beyond all the world can give, for any Work, that God hath glory, and man peace, in doing it. As this ſmall piece of work is directed to theſe laſt mentioned ends, and (as it ought) principally to the firſt of them; ſo, that it may reach the former, by adding a Mite or two to the Treaſury of the Readers knowledge in the beſt things, and by being his encouragement to walk in the beſt wayes, is the Hope and Prayer, and the reaching of it, will be indeed a very rich reward and payment of

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE FIFTEENTH, SIXTEENTH, AND SEVENTEENTH CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. XV. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Then anſwered Eliphaz the Temanite, and ſaid,

Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? And fill his belly with the Eaſt-wind?

Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk? Or with ſpeeches wherewith he can do no good?

Yea, thou caſteſt off fear, and reſtraineſt prayer before God.

For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty.

Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: Yea, thine own lips teſtifie againſt thee.

WE are come to the ſecond Section of this great diſpute, between Job and his three Friends: they have all ſpoken one turn, and now they return to ſpeak: Eliphaz, who led the firſt charge, leads the ſecond, and that with a very violent march, againſt this ſorrowful man. Yet we are not to conceive Eliphaz upon any deſign to revile his perſon, or to vex his ſpirit: That were moſt unſuteable in any Friend, much more (ſuch we ſuppoſe Eliphaz to have been) in a godly friend: Charity ſuggeſts a fairer interpretation of this procedure, that he ſpake thus harſhly, and dealt thus roughly, being moved by ſome unwary paſſages in Job's diſcourſe, not well underſtood or miſapplyed. At which ſtone how many ſtumble at this day! Firſt, Miſconceiving, and then cenſuring their Brethren; being firſt offended without any juſt cauſe given, and then giving juſt cauſe of offence. Had we once learned to expound each others actions, ſpeeches, and opinions, by the rules of Charity, we ſhould not ſo often, no nor at all break the Laws of Love. We ſhall make a good improvement of this failing in Job's Friend, if it may be our warning (in dealing) to deal better with our Friends.

Non maledicendi ſtudio ferebatur, quod à bono viro prorſus alienum eſſit. Pined.

There are three parts in this ſpeech; In the firſt Eliphaz appears by way of reproof, and reprehenſion, which extends it ſelf from the beginning of the Chapter, to the end of the thirteenth Verſe; and he reproves Job upon five points of error, or miſbehaviour, of all which he conceived him guilty.

Firſt, He reproves him of folly, or for ſpeaking that which was unworthy a wiſe man, in the ſecond and third Verſes, Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? &c.

Secondly, He reproves him of prophaneneſs, or for doing that which was unworthy a godly man, at the fourth Verſe, Yea, thou caſteſt off fear, and reſtraineſt prayer before God. The ſum of both is, Thou ſpeakeſt unwiſely, and thou acteſt wickedly: Which he takes for ſo plain a charge, that he makes him his own Accuſer, as if there needed no evidence but his Conſcience, though he had (as Eliphaz miſjudged) daubed up the matter with fair words, and colourable pretences (ver. 5.6.) Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity: Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: yea, thine own lips teſtifie againſt thee.

Thirdly, He reproves him of pride, and arrogance, of ſelf-conceit, and overweening his own parts, and poſitions (ver. 7.8, 9, 10.) Art thou the firſt man that was born, or waſt thou made before the hills, &c. As if he had ſaid, Thou carryeſt it, as if thou hadſt engroſſed all wiſdom, as if thou hadſt more knowledge and underſtanding, more learning and experience, then any man; yea, then all men living.

Fourthly, He reproves him, for ſlighting and undervaluing the counſels and the comforts tendered to him by his Friends, at Verſ. 11. Are the conſolations of God ſmall with thee?

Fifthly, He reproves him for his confident ſticking, or adhering to his own principles, at the twelve and thirteen Verſes, Why doth thy heart carry thee away, &c. Thus he repoves his morals in the firſt part of his diſcourſe,

In the ſecond, he confutes his Doctrinals, or that which he ſuppoſed Job had aſſerted; ſc. His own purity and perfections (Verſ. 14, 15, 16.) What is man that he ſhould be clean? Behold he putteth no truſt in his Saints, &c.

Eliphaz aſſeruiſſet tantum malos hic à Domino affligi, idem ille nunc ſed apertius oſtendit. Merc.

In the third place, he labours to maintain his own Aſſertion, that God doth afflict none but wicked men, Who ever periſhed being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? Chap. 4. 7. This he doth by the authority of the Learned, and from the experiences of the Ancient, vor. 7. to the end of the Chapter: I will ſhew thee, hear me, and that which I have ſeen I will declare; which wiſe men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it, &c. Theſe are the parts, and this is the reſolution of the whole Chapter.

Then; That is, when Job had made an end of anſwering Zophar, then Eliphaz anſwered or replyed upon Job. That's properly a replication, which takes off the anſwer given to a former Argument; and in this Eliphaz alſo makes a defence for his Brethren, Zophar and Bildad. Theſe three ſtood to one another, as much as any one of them did for himſelf; as if they had all entred Bond, and given ſecurity for reciprocal aſſiſtance. Thus the diſpute grows hot, but ſtill 'tis orderly, according to that Apoſtolical Canon, (1 Cor. 14. 29.) Let the Prophets ſpeak two or three, and let the other judge. Eliphaz is now up, let us conſider what he ſaith.

Verſe 2. Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge?

The Queſtion denyes; he ſhould not: No man ſhould; leaſt of all he.

The Wiſe man is here oppoſed to the crafty man, at the fifth Verſe. There is a wide difference between wiſdom and craft, between prudence and cunning: A crafty man knoweth what is good, but he commonly doth what is evil; he is able to ſee the right, but if it be not for his turn, he turns from it, and cares not to do wrong. A wiſe man is he that knoweth how to diſtinguiſh between good and evil, and ever aims to act what is good; his underſtanding is well enlightned, and his conſcience binds him to follow the light of his underſtanding; as he can ſee what is juſt and right, ſo he cannot but embrace and do it. A wiſe man, in Scripture-language, is a holy man, and a fool is a wicked man; holineſs is the beſt wiſdom, and wickedneſs is the worſt of folly. Eliphaz ſeems to admit Job's challenge of being a wiſe man, that he might check him with more advantage for ſpeaking ſo unlike one: As if he had ſaid, Should a moral wiſe man, much more a ſpiritual wiſe man; ſhould he that is, or pretends to be thus wiſe (as thou doſt, ſhould he) utter vain knowledge?

Job at the twelfth Chapter of this Book, ver. 2, 3, 4. objected ignorance, or but popular knowledge to his Friends; I have underſtanding as well as you; I am not inferiour to you; who knoweth not ſuch things as theſe? As if he had ſaid, You think your ſelves among knowing men, the higheſt in knowledge; but who knoweth not ſuch things as theſe? Eliphaz turns it here upon Job, by the way of recrimination or counter-charge, he brings in a croſs Bill: Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? Thou doſt arrogate to thy ſelf the reputation of a wiſe man; but art thou wiſe, who ſpeakeſt at ſuch a rate of folly? The image of thy mind is ſtampt upon thy words, it may be ſeen as well as heard what thou art, by what thou ſpeakeſt.

דעת־רוח Scientiam venti vel ventoſam, i. e. vanam. Numquid ſapiens reſpondebit ſcientiam venti, vel ſcientiam ventoſam. Merc. Numquid ſapiens reſpondebit quaſi in ventum loquens. Vulg.

Vain knowledge.] The letter of the Hebrew is, Knowledge of wind, or windy knowledge: The Metaphor is elegant; vain knowledge is juſtly called windy knowledge: Vain knowledge makes a great bluſter, and noiſe, like the wind, but it paſſeth away, and though we cannot tell whither it goes, yet we may eaſily tell whence it comes, even from the fancy, and out of the mouth of a fooliſh man. It was uſual of old, to call that which is vain, windy; thoſe deſpiſers of holy Counſels, and Divine Alarms, given by the Prophets, ſaid, The Prophets ſhall become wind, and the word is not in them, Jer. 5. 13, That is, both the Doctrine and the threats which theſe Propphets utter, are vain and ineffectual; they will do us neither good nor evil; no mans finger ſhall ake, though their tongues ake with talking.

The Prophet Hoſea at once reproves and terrifies the Jews in this language, They have ſown the wind, and they ſhall reap the whirlwind (Hoſ. 8. 7.) To ſow the wind, is to do a vain thing; our actions are as ſeed; ſuch as we ſow, ſuch ſhall we reap; they ſowed ſin, and they reaped trouble. Themſelves ſowed the wind by what they did; and they thought the Prophets ſowed the wind in what they ſpake: And indeed the words of the Prophets were wind, as the peoples works were, in referenee to the iſſue; thoſe produced a whirlwind to ſcatter their contemners, as theſe did to ſcatter their actors. The old Satyriſt calls vain words, bubly toyes, becauſe ſuch words are like a bubble, full of wind (poſſibly full of wit) but empty of wiſdom and good inſtruction.

Bullatas nugas utpote ſimiles bullis vento plenis, Perſ. Sat. 5.

Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge?] The Scripture calls that vain:

Firſt, Which is unprofitable, theſe mutually expound each other, Eccleſ. 1. 2, 3.) Vanity of vanity, ſaith the Preacher, &c. What profit hath a man of all the labour which he taketh under the Sun. There's moſt vanity, where there is leaſt profit; and where there is no profit at all, there is nothing at all but vanity. Turn not aſide from following the Lord (ſaith Samuel) for then ſhould you go after vain things which cannot profit. 1 Sam. 12. 20, 21.

Secondly, The Scripture calls that and thoſe vain, which hath or have no ſolidity in them; vanity hath ſo little weight in it, that when the Spirit would expreſs men who have no weight in them, he ſaith, They are lighter then vanity, Pſal. 62. 9.

Thirdly, The Scripture calls that vain which is alwayes moving, varying, and unſetled; (Pſal. 144. 4.) Man is like to vanity, his dayes are as a ſhadow that paſſeth away: He is therefore like to vanity, becauſe he is ſo like a ſhadow, continually paſſing, but never continuing.

Fourthly, The Scripture often calls that vain which is ſinful in practice, or unſound and erroneous in opinion, I hate vain inventions (ſaith David) but thy Law do I love. Whatſoever oppoſes either truth of Doctrine, or purity of Worſhip, is a vain invention of man, and oppoſite to the Law of God; he utters vain knowledge, who utters falſe Principles which ſubvert the Faith, or ſuperſtitious forms which endanger the life and power of godlineſs. Eliphaz ſuppoſed, that ſomewhat of vanity in all theſe notions, was rallyed together into the diſcourſe of Job, that it was light and frothy, that it was erroneous and full of incongruity, eſpecially (which carries all theſe in it) that it was worthleſs and unprofitable to the receiver, as he expreſſeth in the third Verſe, Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk?

Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge?

Hence Obſerve, There is a vanity in ſome kind of knowledge, and folly in that which not a few call wiſdom.

It hath been the buſineſs of ſome mens knowledge, to find out a vanity in all ſorts of knowledge. Eliphaz ſpake well for the matter, though ill to the man. Job did not utter vain knowledge; but, we know, too many do. The old Gentiles waxed vain in their imaginations, their very reaſonings were vain; ſo the Original word tells us: It was not their fancy, but their underſtanding which was vain. The Apoſtle cautions the Coloſſians, Let no man ſpoil you through Philoſophy and vain deceit (Col. 2. 8.) Philoſophy in it ſelf is an excellent knowledge, yet it may be vainly taught, and ſo deceive us, as to ſpoil us: I may ſay alſo, let no man ſpoil you through Divinity and vain deceit. Divinity, which is in it ſelf the moſt excellent knowledge, the knowledge of God, may be vainly taught, and ſo deceive us, as to ſpoil us: That knowledge which is beſt in it ſelf, is vaineſt to us, when it is unduly or falſly uttered.

ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς αὐτῶν, vani facti ſunt in ratiocinationibus ſuis. Baz.

Secondly, Obſerve, It is moſt uncomely for thoſe, who either have, or would have the reputation of wiſdom, to ſpeak vainly.

Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? 'Tis no wonder to hear a vain man ſpeak vainly, and for a fool to utter folly. Do men gather Grapes of Thorns, or Figs of Thiſtles? The vile perſon will ſpeak villany, and his heart will work iniquity, to practice hypocriſie, and to utter error againſt the Lord (Iſa. 32. 6.) If a fool, a vain man, or a vile perſon, ſpeak thus, he ſpeaks like himſelf; but if a wiſe, or a good man ſpeak thus, he ſpeaks ſo unlike himſelf, that the Chaldee Paraphraſe puts not only an undecency, but an impoſſibility upon it, Can a wiſe man utter vain knowledge? It is impoſſible. Men act according to their principles; Every thing is in working, as it is in being: If there be wiſdom in the heart, it will be heard at the tongue: A wholſome Fountain will ſend out wholſome waters: He that is born of God (ſaith the Apoſtle John, 1 Epiſt. 3. 9.) cannot ſin; though he hath not a natural impoſſibility to ſin, yet he hath a moral impoſſibility to ſin, becauſe the ſeed of God remaineth in him, the frame and bent of his heart is ſet another way: Now, as there is a moral impoſſibility, that a godly man ſhould commit ſin, ſo that a wiſe man ſhould ſpeak ſin, or utter vain knowledge. A wiſe man ſpeaks, as well as acts, by meaſure; he weighs what he ſaith, as much as what he doth; the tongue of the wiſe is as a Tree of life: Grace in the heart bloſſoms at the lips, in ſavory words, which miniſter grace unto the hearers. Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge?

And fill his belly with the Eaſt-wind?

A belly full of windy meat is bad enough; a belly full of wind is far worſe: But what is here meant by the belly? what by the Eaſt-wind?

The belly is put for the heart and affections, together with all the intellectual powers of the mind, John 7. 38. Out of his belly (that is, out of his whole ſoul) ſhall flow Rivers of living water. This water is the holy Spirit; the holy Spirit is ſometimes compared alſo to the wind. A wiſe man ſhould deſire that his heart may be filled, with the ſweet gales and holy breathings of the Spirit of God, by heavenly inſpirations: And ſhall he fill his heart with the Eaſt-wind of earthly paſſions?

The word which we tranſlate Eaſt-wind, ſignifies only the Eaſt; Should he fill his belly with the Eaſt; we rightly add the Eaſt-wind: He compares Job's paſſions unto the wind, and unto the Eaſt-wind: To the wind, becauſe of the vanity of them; to the Eaſt-wind, becauſe of the hurtfulneſs of them. For, as by wind in the former clauſe he means worthleſs things, ſo by Eaſt-wind in this he means dangerous things. There are two Reaſons why he expreſſes ſuch inward motions by the Eaſt-wind.

Poetæ Eurum Appellant truculentum, rapidum, animoſum, tumidum & indomitum.

Firſt, The Eaſt-wind is a vehement and ſtrong wind; we read Exod. 14. 21. that when God divided the Red Sea, to make a paſſage for his people, he cauſed an Eaſt-wind to blow all night, and divided the Sea with the force of it. Poets deſcribe the Eaſt-wind to be fierce, heady, turbulent, and impetuous; that's one ground of it.

Secondly, The Eaſt-wind is obſerved by Naturaliſts to be a hot and fiery wind: Hence the Vulgar tranſlates, Thou filleſt thy belly with heat: The Eaſt-wind parcheth and blaſteth Corn and Fruits. Pharaoh beheld in his Dream ſeven Ears withered, thin, and blaſted with the Eaſt-wind (Gen. 41. 23.) So then, under this notion of the Eaſt-wind, Eliphaz cloſely cenſures Job: Firſt, That his thoughts were violent, and impetuous: Secondly, That they were angry, fiery and furious; as if coals were kindled in his boſom, and a flame ready to blaze at his lips: As if like Paul, while Saul (Acts 9. 1.) he breathed out threatnings and ſlaughter, or was inwardly heated with reſolutions of revenge. The Prophet Jeremy ſaith, The Word of God was as a fire in his boſome, and he could not refrain: Many a mans breaſt is like a heated Oven, he is ready to conſume all with the breath of it.

Ardore. Sub calidi & æſtuantis aeris ſimilitudine ſermones ejus exaſperatos & excandeſcentia plenos deſcribit.

But why doth Eliphaz charge Job with ſuch unruly perturbations? Some aſſign the reaſon from thoſe words, Chap. 14. v. 14. where he deſires that God would even hide him in the grave; he was ſo vext and troubled at the ſtate wherein he lived, that he preferred death before it, and thought a not being in the world, better then a being in his condition. But we may rather leave the reaſon more at large, to all that vehemency of ſpirit, with which Job had proſecuted and pleaded his ſorrowful caſe.

Jobo attribuit vanitatem in ſententia, tempeſtatem in affectu, imbecillitatem in argumento, ſuperfluitatem in verbis. Ccc;

From the ſcope of Eliphaz in this part of his reproof, we may obſerve:

Firſt, That violent paſſions are the diſguiſe of a wiſe man.

We cannot ſee who he is, while he acts unlike himſelf: Anger lodgeth in the boſom of fools; and when it doth but intrude into the boſom of a wiſe man, he (for the time) looks like a fool.

Secondly, Paſſions in the mind are like a tempeſt in the air they diſturb others much, but our ſelves more.

Many a man (like a Ship at Sea) hath been overſet and ſunk with the violent guſts and whirl-winds of his own ſpirit.

Obſerve thirdly, He that fills his own mind with paſſionate thoughts, will ſoon fill the ears of others with unprofitable words.

This is clear from that which goeth before, He utters vain knowledge; and it is clearer from that which follows after; when a mans thoughts are like a wind, his words (which are the firſt born of his thoughts) muſt needs be windy. A paſſionate man ſpeaks all in paſſion, and ſometimes cannot ſpeak at all for paſſion; his extream deſire to ſay much ſtops him from ſaying any thing: But whatſoever he ſaith, is the copy of his preſent ſelf, fierce and boyſterous. The image and ſuperſcription of our hearts is ſtamped upon our words. Some can ſpeak better then they are; but uſually men ſpeak according to what they are, and then eſpecially when they are (which paſſionate men for the moſt part are) not themſelves. Thus it follows in the next Verſe.

Verſe 3. Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk?

Eliphaz ſpeaks all Interrogatories; and theſe ſpeak him in anger, if not in ſome diſtemper. Should he do this? and ſhould he do that? do ſhew that either another hath very much done, what he ſhould not; or that he who reproves him hath not ſuch a ſpirit of meekneſs, as a reprover ſhould, Gal. 6. 1.

The words ſhew the effect of what he taxed him with before: As if he had ſaid, Would you know what to expect from a paſſionate man, from a man whoſe belly is filled with the Eaſt-wind? You ſhall have him ſhortly filling your eares with an Eaſt-wind, even reaſoning with unprofitable words: And (as the next clauſe gives it, which is only an expoſition of this) With ſpeeches wherewith he can do no good: Some words are great doers; they do much hurt, or they do much good; and thoſe words uſually do ſome hurt, which can do no good; yea, that which is weak and unable to do good, may be ſtrong and powerful to do evil. However, not to do good is to do evil, becauſe it is every mans duty, whatſoever he doth, to be doing good: Here Eliphaz reproves Job's words as evil, while he only ſaith, they do no good. And yet he ſaith ſomeſomewhat more then that, for he ſaith, They can do no good: It is ill not to do good actually; but not to have a poſſibility of doing good is far worſe, When the Apoſtle would ſay his worſt of the beſt of mans ſinful fleſh, he doth not only ſay, It is not ſubject to the Law of God, but adds, Neither indeed can be (Romans 8. 7.) So here, Words wherewith a man can do no good; How bad are they?

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That which can do no good ſhould not be ſpoken.

Cui bono

Before we ſpeak a word, we ſhould ask this queſtion, To what purpoſe, to what profit is it? Shall he that hears it be made more knowing, or more holy by it?

Obſerve Secondly, Unprofitable talk is ſinful, and ſpeeches which do no good, are evil.

Every idle word that men ſhall ſpeak, they ſhall give an account thereof in the day of judgment, Matth. 12. 37. And though a man be very buſie, and take much pains in ſpeaking, yet if his words be unprofitable, and his ſpeeches ſuch as can do no good, they will come under account as idle. Now, if unprofitable talk be ſinful, and ſpeeches that can do no good; then what is prophane talk, and ſpeeches which do hurt, (infection gets quickly in at the ear) defiling the mind and corrupting the manners of thoſe that hear them. The Apoſtle gives us the rule of ſpeaking, both in the negative and in the affirmative (Epheſ. 4. 29.) Let no corrupt communications proceed out of your mouths, but that which is good to the uſe of edifying, which may adminiſter grace to the hearer. Again, (Coloſ. 4. 6.) Let your ſpeeches be alwayes with grace; that is, ſuch as teſtifieth that there is grace in your heart, never ſpeak a word but ſuch as may ſtand with grace; yea, ſpeak ſuch words as may be a witneſs of grace, wrought in your ſelves, and a means of working grace in others. Let your words be ſeaſoned with ſalt; the ſalt of our words is holineſs and truth; prudence alſo is the ſalt of words; good words, and true, ſpoken unſeaſonably, may do hurt: Prudence teaches us the time when, and the manner how to anſwer every man.

Thirdly, Obſerve, It is matter of juſt reproof againſt every man, to be unprofitable, and to do no good:

Belial ex ובלי non & יעל quod in hiphil ſignificat prodeſſe; ut denotet inutilem, qui nec ſibi, nec aliis prodeſt.

Every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewen down and caſt into the fire (Matth. 3. 10.) Some conceive that the word Belial comes from Beli, which in Hebrew ſignifies Not, and the word Jagnal, which here in the Text ſignifies to do good: Becauſe a Beliaſt, or a Son of Belial is ſuch a one as neither doth good to himſelf nor to any other. The unprofitable Servant who hid, and did not improve his Talent, ſhall be condemned: And he who uſes his talent unprofitably and vainly, ſhall not eſcape: Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk?

Thus far we have ſeen Eliphaz reproving Job of folly in ſpeaking unlike, and below a wiſe man; he proceeds to reprove him for acting unlike, and below a godly man: This he ſets home with a particle of aggravation.

Verſe 4. Yea, thou caſteſt off fear, and reſtraineſt Prayer before God.

As if he had ſaid, beſides, or above all this, that thou haſt uttered vain knowledge, words that cannot profit, thou haſt alſo caſt off the fear of God, &c. The word which we tranſlate to caſt off, ſignifies to make void, to ſcatter, to diſſolve, to break in pieces; to make as nothing, or to make nothing of. It is often uſed in Scripture, for breaking the Commandments of God, implying ſuch a breach as makes the Commandments void, which is the proper character of an evil heart; A godly man may ſin againſt the Commandments, but a wicked man would ſin away the Commandments; he would repeal the Law of God, and enact his own luſts: Such is the force of the word here, Thou caſteſt off fear.

There is a natural fear, and a ſpiritual fear; we are not to underſtand this Text of a natural fear (which is a trouble of ſpirit, ariſing upon the apprehenſion of ſome approaching evil) but of a ſpiritual: Fear is here put alone, but we are to take it with its beſt adjunct, The fear of God; for as the word ſometimes is put alone, to ſignifie the word of God, as if there were no word but his; and as the word Commandments is put alone, to note the Commandments of God, as if no Commandments deſerved the name, but only the Commandments of God; ſo fear is put alone, by way of excellency, for the fear of God; as importing, that his fear is excellent, and no fear to be deſired but his. This Divine fear comes under a double notion:

Firſt, It is taken for the holy awe or reverence we bear to God in our ſpirits, which is the worſhip of the firſt Commandment, and the ſanctifying of God in our hearts.

Secondly, For the outward acts of Religion, which is the worſhip of the ſecond Commandment, Their fear is taught by the precepts of men (Iſa. 29. 13.) that is, their outward worſhip and Religion, is ſuch as men have invented, not ſuch as God hath appointed: Some take it here in the firſt ſence only, Thou caſteſt off fear; that is, thou caſteſt off that awe, reverence, and regard thou oweſt to the Name of God; others underſtand it in the ſecond, Thou caſteſt off fear; that is, the outward worſhip and ſervice of God: but I conceive we have that expreſſed in the next clauſe, And reſtraineſt prayer before God; there he taxeth him with neglect of outward worſhip, and here with neglect of inward, Thou caſteſt off fear; fear is as the bridle of the ſoul; fear holds us in compaſs, it is the bank to the Sea; fear keeps in the overflowing of ſin, Thou caſteſt off fear.

Timor hoc loco pro reverentia & tremore, potius quam pro religione & cultu, licet utrumque cohæreat. Pined.

But what cauſe had Job given Eliphaz to charge him with caſting off the fear of the Lord; we find Eliphaz touching upon this point before, and upbraiding Job, (Chap. 4. 6.) Is this thy fear? Is this thy confidence? As if he had ſaid, Is all thy profeſſion come to this? Here he chargeth him expreſly, Thou haſt caſt off fear: Job had not given him any juſt cauſe to ſpeak or think thus hardly of him; but Eliphaz might poſſibly ground this accuſation upon thoſe words (Chap. 9. v. 23.) This is one thing, therefore I ſaid it, he deſtroyeth the perfect and the wicked, &c. Which Eliphaz did interpret as a caſting off the fear of God; hath he awful and reverent thoughts of God, who affirmeth, that God laugheth at the afflictions and tryals of his people? Again, Chap. 12. 6. The Tabernacles of Robbers proſper, and they that provoke God are ſecure, into whoſe hands God bringeth abundantl[illegible] Hath not this man caſt off all fear of God, who dares ſa[illegible]e wicked proſper, and are ſecure? Is God become a friend to thoſe that profeſs themſelves enemies to him? Others refer the ground of this to Chap. 13. 21, 22. where he ſeems to ſpeak boldly, and as ſome have taxed him, impudently, Do not two things to me, withdraw thy hand from me, &c. Then call thou, and I will anſwer; or let me ſpeak, and anſwer thou me: Hence Eliphaz concludes, ſurely, the man hath caſt off the fear of God; he ſpeaks to God as if he were Gods fellow, Speak thou, and I will anſwer; or let me ſpeak, and anſwer thou me: Are theſe words becoming the great God of Heaven and Earth? Art not thou grown over bold with God? Doſt thou ſpeak as becomes the diſtance, that is between the Creator and the Creature? The Greek tranſlates to this ſence, Thou ſpeakeſt to God without any modeſty; thou haſt put on a brazen face, and hardened thy heart againſt the fear of the Almighty. Theſe ſhews of a ground Eliphaz might take, but Job had given him no real ground to pronounce this heavy cenſure, Thou caſteſt off fear: But paſſing by the rigid Hypotheſis of Eliphaz, we may from his words, as they are a Theſis, obſerve, Nullo pudore loquutus es coram Deo. Symmach.

That to caſt off the fear of God is higheſt wickedneſs.

To caſt off the fear of God is the beginning of wickedneſs; as to entertain The fear of God is the beginning of wiſdom: The word here uſed, ſignifieth not only the beginning but the top, the chief, the head and higheſt perfection of a thing: The fear of God is both firſt and laſt, the beginning and end of holineſs. To fear God, and keep his Commandments, is all man in goodneſs; to caſt of the fear of God, is all man in ſinfulneſs: The beginning and end of wickedneſs: It is ill not to have the fear of God; but it is far worſe to caſt off the fear of God: It is ill not to chuſe the fear of God (Prov. 1. 29.) but to reject the fear of the Lord, that is deſperate; if once fear be caſt off, all wickedneſs is let in; at the ſame door, at which the fear of the Lord goes out, any ſin may enter: As Abraham, ſaid, The fear of God is not in this place, and they will kill me for my wives ſake: They have no impediment of luſt to caſt off, who have once caſt off the fear of God. And as they who caſt off this fear are ready to do or ſay any thing that is good; as they have no reſtraint upon them from iniquity, ſo they can eaſily reſtrain themſelves from duty: The next words ſhew this.

Thou reſtraineſt prayer before him.] Prayer is a principal part of the outward worſhip of God, and is both here and elſewhere put for the whole outward worſhip of God.

The word ſignifies alſo, meditation, muſing, or thinking: So ſome render here, Thou takeſt off conference with God; thou waſt wont to keep continual correſpondence with Heaven, and maintain a ſweet humble familiarity with God by holy meditation, but now thou art like a ſtranger, and comeſt not at him. But whether we tranſlate the word by Prayer, or Meditation, the ſence is the ſame; for praying is ſpeaking to God; yea, an arguing and pleading with God: And ſo 'tis uſed in the titles of Pſal. 102. & 142. The word which we render to reſtrain, ſignifies two things: Firſt, To withdraw or ſtop: Secondly, To leſſen and diminiſh, Jer. 48. 37. Every beard clipt or diminiſhed: We may take it in both ſences here, as reproving Job either for a total forbearance, and throwing up the duty of Prayer, or for ſhortning and abating it: Yet there is an opinion that Job is not here charged for leſſening or abating, but for lengthening and increaſing Prayer; Thou caſteſt off fear, and multiplieſt Prayer: The Hebrew word notes the cutting or dividing of a thing into ſmall pieces or portions; which is indeed to multiply it, and to make it, though not more in bulk, yet more in number, Job 36. 27. Thou makeſt ſmall the drops of rain; that is, thou multiplieſt the drops of rain: So here, thou makeſt ſmall thy Prayers, as ſo many drops of rain, thou haſt never done dropping Prayers; thou doſt mince thy ſupplications, or cut them out into many ſmall ſhreads, as if thou didſt hope to be heard for thy much ſpeaking: Such were the ſilly devotions of the old ſuperſtitious Gentiles, which the hypocritical Phariſees imitated, and were therefore reproved by Chriſt, under the name of vain repetitions (Matth. 6. 7.) Of which fault a learned Interpreter, judges Eliphaz, reproving Job in this place. But I rather keep to our own Tranſlation, Thou reſtraineſt Prayer.

Here again it may be queſtioned, What cauſe had Eliphaz to charge Job with reſtraining prayer? The Jewiſh Writers ſay, it was becauſe he denyed Providence, and ſo by conſequence Prayer; for if God do not order the affairs of the world, the afflictions and deliverances of his people, why ſhould we pray to him about them? Others refer it not to his denial of Providence, but to that which Eliphaz ſuppoſed a fundamental error againſt the Doctrine of Providence, That God deſtroyeth the righteous and the wicked; that he laughs at the tryal of the innocent. Now will any innocent man pray to God in his affliction, when he is told that God laughs at his affliction? Will any righteous man call upon God for help, when he is taught that God deſtroyeth the righteous? Who would ſerve a Maſter who gives ſuch wages, and payes thoſe that honour him with diſgrace, yea, with deſtruction? So that Job is charged with reſtraining Prayer, according to this anſwer to the queſtion, not becauſe he totally forbore prayer himſelf, or perſwaded others to forbear it; but becauſe Job's aſſertions were ſuch as might yield thoſe conſequences, and cauſe many to ſuſpend Prayer, or give over calling upon the Name of God in the day of trouble. We may be charged to ſay or do that, which flows from what we do or ſay, though we neither ſay nor do the thing it ſelf.

Hebræi ad id referunt, quod putant Jobum Dei providentiã negaſſe, quod nos non putamus. Mea, q.d. iſta aut aſſertio & doctrina, quod mala & ſupplicia eveniant bonis & juſtis tollit religionem, & publicum divini numinis cultũ.

Many are guilty of thoſe errors conſequentially, which yet they never affirmed thetically or directly. We may be ſo far from aſſerting, that we may profeſſedly abhor an opinion which yet lyeth ſecretly under ſome of our aſſertions. We ſay juſtly, That the Pope is Antichriſt, and that pure Popery is Antichriſtianiſm; yet the Pope doth not deny Chriſt, for the Pope thinks himſelf Chriſts Vicar upon earth, and therefore muſt needs acknowledge him to be come in the fleſh; yet by conſequence, the Pope is an oppoſer both of the Perſon and Offices of Chriſt, and Popiſh doctrine fights againſt the Truth of Chriſt. As prophane men Profeſs they know God, yet in their works they deny him (Tit. 1. 16.) So many erroneous perſons profeſs they love and honour thoſe holy truths and ſpiritual duties, which by conſequences they indeed deny, as Eliphaz (though unduly) ſuppoſed Job had done the duty of Prayer. Thou reſtraineſt prayer before God.

Taking the words abſtractly, they yield us this uſeful Obſervation,

> That it is an Argument of an evil heart, to ſhorten, or reſtrain, to leſſen, or to give off Prayer in times of trouble.

Hic proponitur tanquam ingens piaculum quod homo afflictus remittat orandi ſtudium.

That King ſpake to the height of prophaneneſs, when he ſaid (2 Kings 6.) This evil is of the Lord, and why ſhould I wait on the Lord any longer? When we have done waiting, we have done praying. No man will aſk for that which he doth not expect to receive. How long ſoever affliction laſteth, ſo long prayer-ſeaſon laſteth: If the Winter day of our trouble be a Summer day in length, if it be continued many dayes, yea, many months, and years, prayer ſhould continue (Pſal. 50. 15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will hear, and thou ſhalt glorifie me: Let the day of trouble be ſhort or long, God looks to hear of us all that day. Is any afflicted, let him pray, ſaith the Apoſtle James; it is a duty to pray, when we are not afflicted, when we proſper in the world: But is any man afflicted, then is a ſpecial ſeaſon for prayer. A ſincere heart prayes alwayes, or continues in prayer; an hypocrite never loves to pray, and at two ſeaſons he will reſtrain, or lay aſide prayer: Firſt, When he is got out, or thinks he hath prayed himſelf out of affliction. Proſperity and worldly fulneſs ſtop the mouth of prayer; and he hath no more to ſay to God, when he hath received much from God. Secondly, A hypocrite reſtrains prayer, when he perceives he hath got nothing by prayer; he ſees he cannot, or fears he ſhall not get out of trouble, and therefore he will pray no more in trouble; his ſpirit fails, becauſe his afflictions hold out. Upon which ſoever of theſe two grounds the hypocrite reſtrains prayer, he ſhews the wickedneſs of his heart. If from the former, he ſhews, that he bears no true love to God; if from the latter, he ſhews, that he hath no true faith in God, or dares not truſt him. Further, to caſt off prayer, is to caſt off God; and he that lives without prayer in the world, lives without God in the world: Hence the Heathen who know not God, and the Families that call not upon his Name, are joyned together, or rather are the ſame (Jer. 10. 25.) Further, to reſtrain prayer, is worſe then not to pray: The latter notes only a neglect of the duty; the former a diſtaſt of the duty. To give over an holy exerciſe is more dangerous then not to begin or take it up. The one is the prophane mans ſin, the other is the hypocrites. Thou reſtraineſt prayer: And he that doth not utter prayer with his mouth, will ſoon utter wickedneſs with his mouth, as it follows.

Verſe 5. For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty.

Here Eliphaz explains, and proves what he ſaid before, that Job had caſt off the fear of God, and reſtrained prayer: As if he had ſaid, If thou hadſt kept in holy fear, that would have kept in thine iniquity: Hadſt thou not reſtrained prayer, that would have reſtrained and bridled down thy ſin; but thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and that ſheweth that prayer is reſtrained, and that fear is caſt off: Here is a demonſtration of it; If you ſhould come to a Princes Court, and ſee a great croud about the door, you would ſay, the Porter is there, he ſtops and examines them; if at another time you ſee all going in as faſt as they pleaſe, you will ſay, the Porter is out of the way. Thus while the fear of the Lord ſtands like a Porter at the door of the ſoul, we keep our thoughts and actions in compaſs; we examine what goes in, and what comes out: but when once that's gone, order is gone. Any thing may be ſaid, any thing may be done by him, who fears not, who prayes not. Thou haſt caſt off fear, and reſtrained prayer, for thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, out it comes as faſt as it can: I need not tell thee wherein thou haſt offended, thy mouth pours it out.

Non opus eſt ut te doceã in quo pecces, cum ipſe tuus ſermo doceat te iniquum eſſe. Reus verbis oris tui. Sept.

Hence Note, That the evil which is in the heart will out at the mouth, unleſs prayer and the fear of God reſtrain it.

As the good that is in the heart will come out of the mouth, eſpecially when prayer unlocks the mouth. David prayes, Lord open thou my lips, and then he undertakes for his mouth, that it ſhall ſhew forth the praiſe of God. (Pſal. 51. 1.) My heart is inditing a good matter (the heart doth this in prayer or meditation) What follows? My tongue is as the Pen of a ready Writer: Heavenly thoughts in the heart ſhoot out at the tongue in heavenly words. When the heart is deviſing of a good matter, the tongue will be ſwift to ſpeak, and ſet all to a good tune. Thus alſo while the heart is inditing an evil matter, the tongue runs to evil: Such a man needs not learn from others, he hath a root of bitterneſs in himſelf: Hence our Saviour concludes (Mat. 12. 37.) By thy words thou ſhalt be condemned, and by thy words thou ſhalt be juſtified: Why ſhall we be condemned by our words? The Prophet complains of thoſe who made a man an offender for a word; I anſwer, our words ſhew what we are, they declare our hearts; as a man may be diſcovered of what Country he is, when he ſpeaks, ſo of what ſpirit he is. The tongue is the ſcholar of the heart, and ſpeaks what that dictates: A man is juſtly condemned by evil words, becauſe they teſtifie that he is evil. Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity.

Qualis vir talis oratio, Mens mala linguam movet & vos fingit ad improbos ſenſus neque aliud os loquitur quā quod interior ſuggerit atque imperat ſenſus.

Obſerve Secondly, There are ſome iniquities which are more properly ours then ſome others are.

Thine iniquity: Job had (as Eliphaz ſeems to ſuggeſt) a kind of peculiarity in it. As God owns ſome people in a ſpecial manner; though all the people of the earth be his, yet they are his beloved people: So man owns ſome ſin in a ſpecial manner; though a corrupt heart hath a relation to all the ſins in the world, yet ſome one is his beloved ſin; and may be called by way of eminency, his iniquity. 'Tis his, as his Houſes and Lands, as the Money in his Purſe, and the Garments on his back are his.

Thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity. There are ſome ſins in a mans heart, which poſſibly he may never utter all his dayes; but he muſt be talking of, or acting his beloved one. Hence David ſpeaks it, as a high work of grace in him (Pſal. 18. 23.) I have kept my ſelf from mine iniquity. Even a godly man, who diſowns every ſin, hath ſome one ſin more his own then others. This finds him work (not to do it) but to keep himſelf from doing it.

And thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty.] As if he had ſaid, Thou waſt wont to ſpeak prayer, now thou ſpeakeſt pollicy, thou dealeſt cunningly and deceitfully with us, not plainly and clearly. Why, what had Job ſpoken or done, that ſhould gain him the diſreputation of a crafty man: Some conceive Eliphaz hinting at thoſe words (Chap. 6. 24.) Teach me, and I will hold my tongue, &c. Thou ſpeakeſt as if thou wert willing to be taught, ſhew me my error, and I will turn from it; yet this is from craft, not from conſcience. For though thou ſeemeſt to be willing to receive inſtruction, yet thou keepeſt cloſe to thy opinion, and wilt not part from it. We ſhall ſometimes hear a man ſpeaking very ingenuouſly, convince me that I am in an error, and I will relinquiſh it; and yet he reſolves to hold his own. To deſire inſtruction is grown into a complement, but 'tis by the tongue of the crafty: The inſtrument is here put for the effect, the tongue for ſpeech, as Iſa. 50. 4. Thou haſt given me the tongue of the learned; what to do? that I may know to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon.

Again, the word (Crafty) is taken in a good ſence by ſome Interpreters: So the tongue of the crafty is the tongue of the wiſe; as if he had ſaid, Thou ſeemeſt to ſpeak very wiſely, ſoberly and holily: Others render it thus, Thou ſhouldeſt have choſen the tongue of the wiſe; that is, thou ſhouldſt have ſpoken more reverently and diſcreetly, whereas thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity; but rather the crafty, is the ſubtil man. As if he had ſaid, Thou loveſt to play the Sophiſter, to put fair colours on a bad matter, and wilt not let things appear as indeed they are. Be wiſe as Serpents, is Chriſts advice; but he adds, Be innocent as Doves: Serpentine wiſdom muſt be mixed with Dove-like innocence; the craftineſs of the Serpent alone, belongs only to the ſeed of the Serpent.

Lingua erudita vel doctrinarū, i. e. ruditè, ſapienter, ornatè, ſuaviter loquēdi facultas.

Laſtly, Whereas he ſaith, Thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty; he heightens his accuſation, and would repreſent this good man to the eye of the world in a blacker hue. To chuſe, notes a mixt act both of the underſtanding, will, and affections; and it ſeems here to be oppoſed to that wicked act (but not in the wickedneſs of it) wherewith he beſpattered Job in the former Verſe, Thou caſteth off fear. To caſt off, or reprobate, is contrary to electing, or chuſing, and ſo is the fear of God to craft. The fear of God is the beginning of wiſdom; a good underſtanding have all they that do thereafter; but craft is only the corruption of wiſdom, and they have no good underſtanding who do thereafter. Now, when Divine fear and humane craft ſtand in competition, for a man to give his vote for craft, and to refuſe, at leaſt to let paſs the fear of the Lord, this is one of the higheſt growths of ſinful corruption. He that doth thus, needs neither Judge nor Witneſs againſt him, he is both himſelf: So Eliphaz reſolves it in the next Verſe.

Verſe 6. Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I; thine own lips teſtifie againſt thee.

This Verſe hath nothing in it that needs a Comment. The intendment of it may be thus given, It as clear as the light, that thou caſteth off fear, and reſtraineſt prayer before God; for as much as thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou haſt choſen the tongue of the crafty; theſe things are ſo plain that I need not prove them, thine own mouth ſhall condemn thee, and not I. As the Judge ſaid at Chriſts tryal, What need we any Witneſſes, ye have heard his blaſphemy, Matth. 26. 65. Witneſſes of old were wont to put their hand upon the head of the Offender, and ſay, It is thy own wickedneſs which condemns thee, and not we; much more doth their own wickedneſs condem them, who may juſtly be condemned without witneſs.

Teſtes olim manus ſuper caput rei imponentes dicere ſolebant,. Malitia tua te adduxit ad mortem non nos. Lyran.

Hence Obſerve, That ſelf condemnation is the ſtrongeſt condemnation.

Luke 19. 22. Chriſt tells the unprofitable Servant, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked Servant. The obſtinate Heretick is condemned of himſelf, Titus 3. 14. Not that the Heretick doth condemn himſelf, formally, he doth not ſay, I am in an error; you can hardly bring an Heretick to that; and when you do, he ceaſeth to be an Heretick. It is his ſtiffneſs in opinion, which faſtens the reproach of Hereſie upon him; but he is ſaid to condemn himſelf, becauſe holding ſuch an erroneous opinion, he doth virtually condemn himſelf, and plainly declares, that he is fallen from the truth, or hath alwayes oppoſed it.

The Prophet, (Iſa. 44. 9.) ſaith of Image-makers, They are all of them vanity, their delectable things ſhall not profit them, and they are all their own witneſſes; they ſee not, nor know, that they may be aſhamed: Images ſhew what both they and their worſhippers are; though no man ſhould ſpeak a word againſt them, they having tongues and cannot ſpeak, ſpeak enough againſt themſelves; their ſilence, or dumbneſs rather, proclaims aloud to all the world, that they are vain and dunghil Deities; they can do neither good nor evil, to ſhew themſelves Gods; and they who worſhip them do not ſo much as ſhew themſelves men, Iſa. 46. 8. In all this they are their own witneſſes. They cannot but ſee their own blindneſs and folly, who ſpeak to that which cannot hear, and lift up their eyes to that which cannot ſee: Every ſinner hath reaſon to condemn himſelf with his own mouth, and why an Idolater doth it not, no reaſon can be given, but that which was toucht even now from the Prophet, he wants his reaſon, and is therefore in a holy ſcorn adviſed, to ſhew himſelf a man. While we acquit our ſelves with our own mouths, and bear witneſs to our ſelves, our witneſs is of no validity, nor are we at all acquitted; but while we condemn our ſelves with our own mouths, and bear witneſs againſt our ſelves, our witneſs is ſtrong, and we are abundantly condemned.

VERS.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Art thou the firſt man that was born, or waſt thou made before the Hills?
Haſt thou heard the ſecret of God? and doeſt thou reſtrain wiſdom to thy ſelf?
What knoweſt thou that we know not? what underſtandeſt thou that is not in us?
With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father.
Are the conſolations of God ſmall with thee? is there any ſecret thing with thee?

THe firſt part of this Chapter, is reprehenſory. In the former context two points of reproof were opened: Firſt, Jobs ſuppoſed folly in the ſecond and third Verſes: Secondly, his wickedneſs, in the fourth, both which were aggravated in the fifth and ſixth.

In this Context Eliphaz gives him a third and a fourth reproof; a third, for the high conceit he had of himſelf, and a fourth, for the low conceit he had of the comforts of God, tendered to him by his Friends; he reproves him for the high conceit he had of himſelf, in two things: Firſt, as if Job had thought his experience greater then any mans, Art thou the firſt man that was born? &c. Verſ. 7. Secondly, as if he had thought himſelf immediately inſpired, Haſt thou heard the ſecret of God, &c. Verſ. 8.

This he illuſtrates by a twofold oppoſition in the ninth and tenth Verſes; Firſt, by the oppoſition of himſelf and his Friends in point of knowledge and underſtanding unto Job: As if he had ſaid, Thou lookeſt upon us as underlings, as men unworthy to carry thy Books after thee, or to be named the ſame day, but what knoweſt thou, that we know not? What underſtandeſt thou, which is not in us? Verſ. 9. Thou art not ſo weighty, but we hope we may very well ballance thee, and ſay (without pride or partiality) that our parts are as good as thine. Secondly, by the oppoſition of their party to him and his, Verſ. 10. With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father: As if he had ſaid, Our party equalls thine, as well as our parts; Haſt thou aged men on thy ſide? ſo have we; Haſt thou the authority of gray-hairs to back thy opinion? So have we. Haſt thou thy Fathers Copy to ſhew for theſe thy Tenets? So have we. We are able to make as great a boaſt of Antiquity as thou thy ſelf canſt: Do not think that we have received our Learning from ſome new fangled Sect, or from upſtart Opinioniſts of yeſterdayes edition: No, be it known unto thee, With us are both the gray-headed, and very aged men, &c.

As thus he reproves Jobs high thoughts of himſelf, ſo in the fourth place, The low thoughts which he had of them, and the pains they had taken with him, Verſ. 11. Are the conſolations of God ſmall with thee? &c.

Verſ. 7. Art thou the firſt man that was born.

Or, as ſome read it, Art thou born before the firſt man? This is a high ſtrain of Rhetorick, it is impoſſible to be before the firſt; for as there is nothing leſs then what is leaſt, ſo nothing was before the firſt; but as we ſay, Such a man will ſee the laſt man born, when we ſee him reſolved to ſtay the longeſt upon a buſineſs, or deſirous to live very long: So we may ſay, Such a man was born before the firſt, or ſurely he is the firſt man that was born, whom we ſee highly conceited of his own antiquity: And indeed when Eliphaz asks the queſtion, Art thou the firſt man that was born? His meaning is to taxe Job for a Puny, or a young man, yet arrogating to himſelf the glory of longeſt experience; as if he had ſaid, Thou haſt told us that we are but of yeſterday, and objecteſt novelty againſt us, to derogate from our authority, yet ſurely thou art none of the oldeſt, thou art not older then Adam (I believe) thou waſt not before the firſt man, that ever was, no nor the firſt man: It is uſual in many Languages, to compare thoſe who are loweſt in any degree to the higheſt, and the meaneſt to the greateſt, Ironically, or in a way of ſcorn; thus 'tis ſaid to a Coward, or a white-liver'd-fellow, Thou art no Achilles; to a Dwarf or one of a low ſtature, Thou art no Goliah; to one of weak parts, ſurely, Thou art no Solomon, no Ariſtotle; ſo of one that is but young, Surely thou art not Neſtor, thou art not Adam, the firſt man that ever was.

Nũquid ante primum hominẽ natus es, Pagn. Non natu minus minimo. Eſt uſitatum in omni, ut reor, lingua, ut qui in gradu aliquo ad quãdam mediocritatẽ non pervenere, imo qui in infimo conſtitere gradu, cũ eo qui maxime excellit comparentur; cum ironia tamẽ, ut ſi de homine timido dicas, non es cum Achille conferendus &c. neq; aliud voluiſſe Eliphazem arbitror quã ejus eſſe ætatis Jobum in qua non multũ ſoleat eſſe ſapientia. Sanct.

Job gave Eliphaz and his Friends ſome colour to twit him thus, while he ſaid (Chap. 13. 5.) O that you would altogether hold your peace, and it ſhould be your wiſdoms. This was as if he had ſaid, You are but ignorant, and the more you ſpeak the more you diſcover your ignorance; And again, Chap. 12. 12. With the ancient is wiſdom, and with length of dayes is underſtanding; where he ſecretly upbraided them as Juniors, and that therefore little or no heed was to be taken to what they ſpake; now ſaith Eliphaz, Art thou the firſt man born? that is, Art thou the wiſeſt man living? He who thinks himſelf the firſt man, takes himſelf for a very wiſe man, even as wiſe as Adam, who was not only the Father, but the Teacher, and Inſtructer, of his poſterity: In which ſenſe the Jews ſaid to Chriſt, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and haſt thou ſeen Abraham, Joh. 8. 57. Thou ſpeakeſt as if thou wert an old man: we know thy age, thou art but a young man, yet thou ſpeakeſt at the rate of thouſands, as if thou wert as old as Abraham, or the ancient of dayes among men, Art thou the firſt man? Or,

Waſt thou made before the hills?

Some conceive, that by the Hills he means the Angels, but that Expoſition ſmells too much of the Allegory: Take the Hills litterally, for the uppermoſt parts or boſſes of the earth; the Original is, Waſt thou formed or made before the face of the hills? which is an Hebraiſm. Some interpret the Hills by a Synecdoche, for the whole earth, then the ſenſe is, Waſt thou formed before the earth? The firſt man was formed out of the earth, & art thou older then the earth? So that here Eliphaz puts him off by a challenge of greater antiquity then in the former part of the Verſe, Waſt thou the firſt man that was born, or waſt thou made before the earth? the earth is elder then man, both had not the ſame birth-day.

Philippus ſequutus Auguſtinũ, contendit hoc loco angelos colliũ nomine intelligi.
Ad facies colliũ. Heb.
Num formatus es ante mundũ conditum; nam colles una cũ terra formati fuerũt aliquot diebus ante hominẽ. Druſ.

Again, as the Hills are a part of the earth, ſo they may be ſaid to be born the firſt of any part of the earth: For the earth was covered with water, it was a great deep, till a word of command came from God, that the waters ſhould retire to certain Channels, and receptacles which his wiſdom had aſſigned them; now when the waters were thus gathered and put into thoſe vaſt Veſſels, then the Hills, and Mountains, which are the higheſt parts of the earth appeared firſt, and ſo the Mountains are elder in regard of view, then the Plains and Valleys of the earth. That is ſaid to be firſt which appeareth firſt: So then, whether we take hills by a Synecdoche, for the whole earth, or plainly for a part of the earth, both reach at higheſt antiquity. There is an opinion (I confeſs) which if true, takes away the ground of this notion, That hills and mountains grew up, or were as ſo many excreſcencies of the earth, ſince it was created, and that they grow daily (as Naturaliſts expreſs it) by Juxtapoſition. But I fully adhere to their judgement (under which this notion ſtands ſafe) that the earth was diſtinguiſht into hills, plains, and valleys, by the ſame immediate power which created it, though I eaſily grant that many hills have been accidentally cauſed, and caſt up ſince, eſpecially in the deluge. And this doth more advance the wiſdom of God in the frame of this mighty maſs, which hath in it greater ornament, and yields greater delight by this variety, then if it had been ſmoothed all over into Plains and Levels.

Quod prius conſpicuum eſt antiquius eſſe videtur.

Further, to clear the Text, conſider, that it is uſual in Scripture, when a thing of great antiquity is ſpoken of, to compare it to the Hills, Prov. 8. 23, 24, 25. Wiſdom (which is Chriſt) ſpeaks thus, I was ſet up from everlaſting, from the beginning, ere the earth was, when there were no depths I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water, before the mountains were ſetled; before the Hills was I brought forth; while as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the higheſt part of the duſt of the World. Where note alſo by the way a full confirmation of the opinion even now aſſerted, that God made the Hills immediately, which are here alſo called The higheſt part of the duſt of the earth. Again (Pſal. 90. 2.) O Lord thou haſt been our dwelling-place in all generations; which he explains in the next words, Before the mountains were brought forth from everlaſting

Quod longe antiquum, montium & colliũ comparatione indicari ſoleta laſting to everlaſting, thou art God. Old Jacob ſpeaks this Divine Philoſophy upon his death-bed, while he was bleſſing his ſon Joſeph (Gen. 49. 26.) The bleſſings of thy Father have prevailed above the bleſſings of my Progenitors, above the utmoſt bounds of the everlaſting Hills: Once more, Hab. 3. 6. He ſtood and meaſured the earth, he beheld, and drove aſunder the Nations; and the everlaſting Mountains were ſcattered, the perpetual Hills did bow: Now a thing is called everlaſting, either ſtrictly, becauſe it ſhall laſt for ever, or becauſe it laſteth very long; in this latter ſenſe, the Hills are everlaſting: The Hills were from the beginning, and ſhall continue to the end. As for Job, he began to live but lately, and he muſt ſhortly die: Waſt thou made before the Hills? Eliphaz proceeds to a ſecond branch of his third reproof.

Verſ. 8. Haſt thou heard the ſecret of God, or doeſt thou reſtrain wiſdom to thy ſelf?

As if he had ſaid, Poſſibly thou wilt wave or not ſtand to this plea of thy great antiquity. What is it then that ſwells thee into ſuch proud and daring thoughts of thy infallible knowledge? Is it becauſe

Thou haſt heard the ſecret of God.] The Hebrew word ſignifies either counſel, or any thing that is ſecret and myſterious; ſome render it, Haſt thou heard things unſpeakable: when the Apoſtle was caught up to Heaven (2 Cor. 12.) He heard words unſpeakable which it is not lawful for a man to utter: Haſt thou heard unutterable ſecrets? A ſecond tranſlates, Haſt thou heard the myſteries of God? A third, Haſt thou had diſcourſe with God? or haſt thou heard God diſcourſe about the great things of wiſdom? The Septuagint, Haſt thou heard the conſtitutions of Heaven, or knoweſt thou in what manner God hath ſetled all the affairs of mankind, natural, civil, and ſpiritual? Art thou of privy counſel to the King of Heaven? or art thou a member of the Celeſtial conclave? Thus he reproves him for arrogating to himſelf ſuch knowledge, as is not attainable, but by ſpecial inſpiration, or revelation from God himſelf. The Prophet puts the queſtion (Jer. 23. 18.) Who hath ſtood in the counſel of the Lord, and hath perceived and heard his word? Who hath marked his word and heard it? So the Apoſtle (Rom. 11. 34.) Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his Counſellor? God is able to make known the whole myſtery of his will in a moment to the meaneſt ſoul, he can let in floods upon the underſtanding without our ſtudy; he can make a fool wiſe, and drawing back the curtain of ignorance, irradiate the darkeſt mind with the cleareſt light of all things knowable: But haſt thou heard ſuch ſecrets?

There are two ſorts of Divine ſecrets:

Firſt, Secrets of Providence:

Secondly, Secrets of Doctrine.

The former are of ſuch things as God will do; the latter, ſuch as Man is either to do or believe: God reveals both to his people. The ordinary way for us is by the Word written, the extraordinary by a word ſpoken: Thus God opened his ſecrets to the ancient Prophets and Apoſtles. The Prophet Amos (Chap. 3. 7.) ſpeaks of the ſecrets of providence, Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his ſecrets to his Servants the Prophets: And the Lord himſelf ſaith of Abraham, Shall I hide from Abraham the things that I am about to do: Now as there is a revealing of Providence, or of the works of God, ſo there is a revealing of Doctrines and of the holy Truths of God. This he promiſeth (Joel 2. 28.) I will pour out my ſpirit upon all fleſh, and your Sons and your Daughters ſhall propheſie, your old men ſhall dream dreams, your young men ſhall ſee viſions: Young men, cannot claim to be the firſt men, they were not before the Hills, yet to them the viſions of Heaven are promiſed: Yet we muſt not neglect that command of our attendance upon the teachings of the Word, becauſe we have received a promiſe of the teachings of the Spirit. The Spirit uſually teacheth by the Word, never againſt it; and it is a temping of God, while he gives us means, to linger after immediate Revelations: yea, when the Lord reveales himſelf immediately, he uſes to do it without mans fore-thought or expectations. The Prophets did not ſet themſelves to receive Revelations from God, but his Spirit came upon them with mighty power and irreſiſtible evidence. And though God doth reveal ſome of his ſecrets, yet he hath ſecrets which he will not reveal: The ſecret of the Lord is with them that fear him (Pſal. 24. 14.) And his ſecret is with the righteous (Prov. 3. 32.) This ſecret is either the good will and favour of God, of which the World knows nothing, or the good Word and Faith of God of which the World knows as little: Both theſe ſorts of Divine ſecrets are with the righteous, and men fearing God; but the ſecrets of his Counſel are reſerved in his own breaſt. He reveals to his people the ſecrets of his bounty, and of their duty, what he will do for them, and what they muſt do for him; but many things which himſelf will do ſhall never be revealed by the doing of them; Haſt thou heard the ſecrets of God:

And doeſt thou reſtrain wiſdom to thy ſelf?

That is, Doeſt thou think there is no wiſdom beſides thine? art thou at the very border and utmoſt limit of knowledge and underſtanding? is all beyond thee ignorance and folly? Haſt thou got and engroſſed all the learning from others, and reſerved it to thy ſelf alone as thy peculiar, with which none muſt intermeddle without a licenſe obtained from thee? haſt thou the monopoly of wiſdom? or is all but enough for thee? Shall none of thy neighbours ſhare with thee? This is either a charge of greater arrogancy then the former, Doeſt thou reſtrain wiſdom to thy ſelf? or at leaſt a charge of greateſt uncharitableneſs; goodneſs is diffuſive, and ſo is wiſdom, and it is the duty of good men to diffuſe wiſdom. When they have heard the ſecrets of God, they muſt communicate them to others, not reſtrain all to themſelves. But I conceive Eliphaz intends only the former charge.

Hence Obſerve, It is the higheſt ſtrain of pride for a man to reſtrain wiſdom to himſelf;

Or, to think himſelf ſo wiſe, that all muſt addreſs to him for wiſdom: God hath not given all wiſdom to any one man, or ſort of men, though he hath truſted ſome with more Talents of it then he hath done others. The Prieſts lips of old under the Law, and ſo the lips of Miniſters under the Goſpel, ſhould preſerve knowledge; and the people ſhould ſeek both Law and Goſpel at their mouth (Mal. 2. 7.) Yet neither might the Prieſts then, nor may Miniſters now, reſtrain wiſdom to themſelves. The rule of the Apoſtle is, Be not wiſe above what is written; that is above holy Writ, or above what is written from the immediate dictates of the Spirit of God. They are (as we ſay) fools in Print, who ſay they are wiſe above what is thus written; but we may be wiſe above what is ſpoken or written by any man, for no man ought to reſtrain all wiſdom to himſelf; to do ſo is the top-ſtair of Antichriſtian pride. The Pope reſtrains wiſdom to himſelf, he boaſts that he hath the ſecrets of God, and that all muſt come to him if they will have them unlockt and opened: His ſentences from the Chair are Oracles, and there he is infallible; all are obliged to receive what he ſaith, becauſe he ſaith it: no man muſt ſcruple, much leſs oppoſe or contradict it. Thus to impoſe upon men is to ſet our ſelves in the place of the God of Heaven; yea, to arrogate to our ſelves that we are Gods on earth. So the Apoſtle hath characteriz'd that man of ſin (2 Theſ. 2. 4.) He oppoſeth and exalteth himſelf above all that is called God, or that is worſhipped (that is, above all civil powers or Magiſtracy) So that he as God ſitteth in the Temple of God, ſhewing himſelf that he is God. And as he out of all meaſure wickedly, ſo many others in a very great meaſure have ſhewed themſelves as God, while they have taken upon them (as we ſpeak proverbially) To give the Law, yea, to give the Goſpel to other mens conſciences, or to bind up all mens tongues and judgements unto the rule of their apprehenſions. When the Apoſtle had called God to record, that he alwayes purpoſed to be bold and plain with the Corinthians, he preſently ſubjoyns this corrective (2 Cor. 1. 24.) Not that we have Dominion over your Faith, but are helpers of your joy: As if he had ſaid, Do not think that I take upon me as a Lord over your conſciences, to charge any command or obſervations of my own upon them: No, I am but as a ſervant of God to inſtruct you in his counſels, and to comfort you with his promiſes.

The Grecians, who were men of great knowledge and learning, a very witty and Philoſophical people, called all other Nations Barbarians: Such pride appears among ſome (in name) Chriſtians, they ſpeak and act as if all knowledge and truth were centred in them, or as if all were in the dark who ſee not by their light. Knowledge is apt to puff up; how are they puffed up, who think they know all? though indeed they who think they know any thing, know nothing as they ought to know, 1 Cor. 8. 2. God reveals that to Babes and Sucklings, which he hides from ſuch wiſe and prudent ones, who reſtrain all wiſdom to themſelves. God in judgement reſtrains wiſdom from them, who in pride reſtrain it to themſelves; and as God takes all wiſdom from them, who in another ſenſe reſtrain wiſdom to themſelves, that is, who will not uſe it becauſe they have but one Talent of it, or but a little; ſo he will give them no wiſdom at all, who think they are poſſeſſors, or Lord-Treaſurers of all the Talents of it, as if all wiſdom were laid up in them. The Babes and Sucklings, ſuch as are low, humble, and meek, are the objects of this bounty; as for the proud, God beholdeth them afar off: and they can never get neer wiſdom who are far from the God of wiſdom. While ſuch vainly reſtrain wiſdom to themſelves, the hand of God is juſtly reſtrained from beſtowing it upon them.

Eliphaz having thus reproved Job for entitling himſelf to ſo rich a ſtock of knowledge, either brought in by his own long experience, or from the ſpecial inſpirations and teachings of God; proceeds to challenge to himſelf and his Friends a knowledge equal at leaſt to what he really had, in the ninth and tenth Verſes.

Verſ. 9. What knoweſt thou that we know not, what underſtandeſt thou that is not in us?

He retorts what Job ſaid, Chap. 12. 3. I have underſtanding as well as you, I am not inferiour to you. Here Eliphaz tells him, we have underſtanding as well as you: Hath God revealed all knowledge to thee? ſurely we know as much as thou.

Dic age quæ ſunt tuæ partes.

What knoweſt thou which we know not?] The words are plain, and need no explication; they ſound as if he had ſaid, Come ſhew thy skill, and open thy hidden treaſures: thou haſt ſhewed nothing yet, but what is common to us and others; thou ſeemeſt to ſpeak of myſteries, of things that are unknown, and ſecret to this day, but ſurely thou haſt not traded much in theſe; For, What knoweſt thou that we know not? thou haſt not yet produced any ſuch piece of knowledge; if ſuch precious matter be in thee, wrap it not up in the napkin of ſilence any longer, bring it forth, that we alſo may know it.

Qui velit ingenio cedere rarus erit.

Hence obſerve, Firſt, Man is apt to ſtand upon terms of compariſon with man; he cannot bear it that another ſhould be thought or think himſelf wiſer or more knowing then he.

Some are not troubled becauſe they know little, but becauſe they are eſteemed leſs knowing then others, What knoweſt thou that we know not?

Secondly Obſerve, Though ſome men are of higher parts, and better natural abilities then others, yet what one man knoweth, others may.

No man can boaſt himſelf beyond the line and degree of man: For as the heart of man anſwers the heart of man in ſinfulneſs, ſo in a poſſibility of goodneſs. One man may be as holy as another, as wiſe and knowing as another; only God is more holy, wiſe, and knowing then any man can be; he knoweth many things which no man knoweth nor can know. But though it be a ſtrain of pride, for one man to ſay to another, What knoweſt thou that I know not? Yet it is a truth that one man may know as much as another: and though ſome men know that which another man (in regard of ſome perſonal impediments) neither doth nor can know, yet the humane nature in every perſon is capable of the ſame, both kind and degree of knowledge.

Thirdly, Eliphaz is about to reprove the pride of Job, as he conceives, and he doth it (as was but now toucht) in ſuch a manner as ſpeaks his own pride, What knoweſt thou that we know not, is the language of a high mind: I am as good and as wiſe as thou: though it may be ſo, yet it is uncomely to ſay ſo.

Hence Obſerve, Some in reproving other mens faults, run into the very ſame faults themſelves.

The reproof of a fault may not only be faulty, but the fault which is reproved. A man may reprove pride with much pride, and leſſer vanities, with abundance of vanity. All that good men ſpeak for good, doth not begin at a principle of goodneſs; their own corruption may riſe up againſt the corruption of others, and ſin is often heard chiding vice. How many are there who check paſſion, with paſſion, and are very angry in diſlike of anger; you ſhall have ſome men ſpeak againſt bitterneſs of ſpirit with a bitter ſpirit, and while they are taxing their Brethren with making breaches or with an unwillingneſs to peace, diſcover much unpeaceableneſs, yea an unwillingneſs to have thoſe breaches healed.

Diogenes was obſerved to trample upon the pride of Plato with greater pride; and he who to rebuke pride in Apparrel, wore himſelf an unhandſome and torn Coat, was rightly told that his pride was ſeen through the holes of his Coat. There may be as much oſtentation in wearing ſordid, as there is in wearing the gayeſt Cloathes. It was a ſhame for Heathens to declare their own folly, while they declaimed againſt the folly of their neighbours; how ſcandalous then is this in Chriſtians?

Verſ. 10. With us are the gray-headed, and very aged men, much elder then thy Father.

This Verſe is the proof of the former; ſome think the compariſon lyes between Jobs Friends and himſelf. We are thy Seniors, yet thou ſpeakeſt as if thou wert the oldeſt man amongſt us: Here are two terms in the Text, which ſeem to diſtinguiſh old age.

First, Gray-headed.

Secondly, Very aged, much elder then thy Father.

Prima ſenectus וקנה dicitur, unde וקן ſenex: media ſenectus שוב dicitur & incipit ab anno 70. & durat uſq; ad 80. annum; ad quã qui pervenit poſtea ישיש decrepitus dicitur, quod eſt ultima ſenectutis vocabulum, quæ durat uſque ad vitæ finẽ vel uſq; ad annum 100. Nam filius centũ annorũ habetur pro mortuo. Druſ. Etiã Eliphaz qui canus eſt, & Bildad qui decrepitus eſt inter nos, & Sophar qui major eſt patre tuo diebus. Targ.

Among the Jews, a man was counted old at threeſcore, which they called, The firſt old age: At ſeventy he was expreſſed by the word which we tranſlate Gray-headed, and that was his title till he arrived at Fourſcore; from that to the end of life, the whole ſtate was called, Decrepid old Age; and they who reached thoſe years, were expreſſed by the word which we render Very aged men, or as we ſay, men having one foot in the Grave; for he that was an hundred years old, was not numbred among the living, but among the dead. The Chalde Paraphraſt applys the diſtinction thus; With us is Eliphaz, who is gray-headed, and Bildad who is decrepid, and Zophar who is older then thy Father. Hierom gives Eliphaz the precedency in age, affirming that he was the eldeſt Son of Eſau, and that at the time of this diſpute, he was no leſs then a hundred and fifty years old, Jobs Father ninety, and Job himſelf ſeventy. But I ſtay not upon theſe conjectures.

The ſcope of Eliphaz in theſe words may be reduced to this account: As if he had ſaid, We need not depend on thy Authority or antiquity; For with us, that is, on our ſide, or of our party and opinion, there are men gray-headed, yea, very aged, much elder, not only then thy ſelf, but, then thy Father. Therefore do not thou charge us with novelty, know, that we have received our Doctrine from venerable Anceſtors; if thou haſt learned theſe things of thy Father, and drunk in thy opinion from the Aged, ſo have we: Nor do we eſteem the Tenets of our fore-fathers meerly by the number of days which they lived, but by the wiſdom and and piety [illegible] which they were enriched.

It is obſervable in Scripture, that Teman (from whence Eliphaz came) was a famous School of Learning (Jer. 49. 7.) Thus ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, is wiſdom no more in Teman? He ſpeaks of it, as of a known place for knowledge and wiſdom; What? Is wiſdom no more in Teman? As if we in England ſhould ſay, Is there no more learning at Oxford or Cambridge? are the lights extinguiſht, and the fountains dry? Thus Eliphaz aſſerts that his abettors and inſtructers in the opinion he maintained, were both old, and learned old men.

From this conteſt about Antiquity and ancient men ſo often renewed and ſo much urged between Job and his Friends, We may Obſerve, Firſt, That they who have moſt years upon their backs, are, or may be ſuppoſed to have moſt knowledge and wiſdom in their heads and hearts.

Secondly, They who have Antiquity on their ſide, are apt to conclude that they have Truth on their ſide.

That which is indeed moſt ancient is moſt true; yet there are very many very ancient untruths: It is no new thing to ſee a gray-headed errour, and a falſe Doctrine much older then our Fathers.

But I ſhall not proſecute either of theſe points, having met with matter of this ſtrain before, Chap. 8. verſe 8, 9, 10. Chap. 12. verſe 12. to which places I refer the Reader.

Eliphaz having finiſhed his third reproof of Job for his arrogancy, and the high conceit he had of himſelf, proceeds to a fourth, and that is (as hath been ſaid) for the low conceit which he had of the comforts tendered him in the Name of God.

Verſ. 11. Are the conſolations of God ſmall with thee, or is there any ſecret thing with thee?

Num parum à te conſolationes Dei. Heb. Supplendum eſt verbum reputantur. Numquid grande eſt ut conſoletur te Deus? Vulg. q.d. facile eſt Deo ut te ad ſtatum proſperitatis reducat. Aquin. Exiſtimáſne tuis ærumnis non poſſe Deum parē conſolationē afferre. An minores ſunt conſolationes dei, quàm ut te conſolari poſſint? Vatab. Pauca præ iis quæ peccaſti accepiſti vulnera. Sept. An conſolationes Dei tā contēptibiles judicas, ut projiciat eas ante blaſphematores.

Theſe words undergo much variety of interpretation; the Vulgar Latine, neer which ſome others tranſlate, gives a fair ſenſe, but at too great a diſtance from the letter of the Original; thus, Is it a great thing that God ſhould comfort thee? As if he had ſaid, Art thou ſo low that all the conſolations of God are not able to raiſe thee up? Is it a work too big for God himſelf to comfort thee? Cannot he change thy outward and inward ſorrows into joys? Will not the conſolations of one that is infinite ſerve thy turn? Hath not he balm enough in ſtore to heal thy wounds, nor treaſure enough in ſtock to repair thy loſſes? 'Tis no hard thing with God to comfort the moſt diſconſolate ſoul that ever was; he that made light to ſhine out of darkneſs, can give us light in our thickeſt darkneſs: This is a truth, but for the reaſon above, I ſtay not upon it.

The Septuagint tranſlation is far wider then the former, Thou haſt received but few wounds, in compariſon of the ſins that thou haſt committed; which is a Paraphraſe, not a tranſlation, and ſuch a Paraphraſe as ſeems to lie quite without the compaſs of the text: The meaning and intendment of it may be given thus; as if he had ſaid, Thou complaineſt that thou art greatly afflicted, that thy ſorrows are innumerable, but if thou conſidereſt thy great and many ſins, thy ſufferings are few, yea, thy ſufferings may rather be called conſolations, and thy loſſes gains: Are the conſolations of God ſmall to thee, ſeeing thou haſt ſinned ſo much? When God lays but a little affliction upon ſinful man, he may be ſaid, to give a great deal of mercy.

A third gives this ſenſe, Are the conſolations of God ſmall to thee? That is, Doeſt thou eſteem the conſolations of God ſo cheap, that he will give them to ſuch a one as thou? or that he will laviſh them out upon the wicked, and caſt theſe Pearls to Swine, to ſuch as are blaſphemers and contemners of God?

But why doth Eliphaz call theſe the conſolations of God? Did God adminiſter them to Job with his own hand, or did he ſpeak to Job from Heaven? Some conceive that though he and his Friends ſpake them, yet Eliphaz calls them the conſolations of God, by an Hebraiſm, becauſe he judged them great conſolations. Thus in Scripture, The Mountain of God, and the River of God, are put for a great Mountain, and a great River; ſo here. As if he had ſaid, Thou haſt received many great conſolations from us thy Friends, and do[illegible] thou account them ſmall? But I rather take the ſenſe plainly, that he calls them ſo, becauſe God is the author and giver, the fountain and original from whom all conſolations ſpring and flow.

Suas & ſociorū conſolationes, vocat Dei cōſolationes nō ſine arrogātia & faſtu. Druſ.

The Conſolations of God are two-fold:

Firſt, Ariſing from good things already exhibited to us.

Secondly, From good things promiſed to us.

The Conſolations of God in this place, are good things promiſed, or offered: Promiſes are Divine conveyances of Conſolation. The Friends of Job had made him many promiſes, that he repenting, God would make his latter end better then his beginning, &c. Hence Eliphaz tells him that he had ſlighted the conſolations of God. Any man who reads his ſtory may wonder why he ſhould: Surely Job was not in caſe to refuſe comfort, conſidering how he was ſtript of all comfort. The full ſoul indeed loatheth the honey Comb, but to the hungry ſoul, every bitter thing is ſweet; that is, thoſe things which dainty palates diſtaſt, he eats very ſavourly. Job was kept ſhort and low enough, he had nothing of conſolation left, either without or within; he was poor and ſore without, he was full of horrour, and terrour within: the arrows of the Almighty had even drunk up his ſpirit, and laid all his comforts waſt, and doth he yet neglect or undervalue comforts? 'Tis true, he had real conſolations, as appears by that profeſſion of his aſſurance of Gods favour towards him, I know that I ſhall be juſtified; yet he had no ſenſible conſolations; his frequent complaints ſhew he had not. So then, the conſolations of God (for eſteeming which little he is reproved) were the promiſes of conſolation made to him in the name of God by the Miniſtry of his Friends. Are the conſolations of God ſmall unto thee?

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That conſolation is the gift, and proper work of God.

Thou (ſaith David, Pſal, 71. 21.) Shalt encreaſe my greatneſs and comfort me on every ſide: The Lord ſhall comfort Sion, he will comfort all her waſt places (*Iſa.*51.3.) And again, As one whom his Mother comforteth, ſo will I comfort you, and you ſhall be comforted in Jeruſalem. God comforts as a Mother, tenderly, and he comforts as a Father, yea as a Maſter, effectually; I will comfort you, and ye ſhall be comforted. As the corrections of God are effectual, and proſper in the work for which they are ſent, ſo alſo are his conſolations. Ephraim ſaid (Jer. 31. 18.) Thou haſt chaſtiſed me, and I was chaſtiſed. So every ſoul, whom God comforts, ſhall ſay, Thou haſt comforted me, and I was comforted. This the Apoſtle ſpeaks out to the praiſe of God (2 Cor. 1. 3, 4.) Bleſſed be God the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt the Father of mercies, and the God of all conſolations; all conſolation belongs to God; he hath all comfort in his own power, and diſpoſe; there is not any creature in the World can give out the leaſt dram of comfort to us without the commiſſion or leave of God; it is poſſible for one man to give another man riches, but he cannot give him comfort; man may give honour to man, but he cannot give him comfort. A man may have a pleaſant dwelling, a loving Wife, ſweet Children, and yet none of theſe a comfort to him.

The conſolation of all our poſſeſſions and relations is from God: Whoſoever would have comfort, muſt trade to Heaven for it: that's a commodity can be found upon no earthly coaſt; you may fetch in wealth from many coaſts of the earth, but you cannot fetch in comfort, till you addreſs your ſelves to the God of Heaven. We can procure our own ſorrow quickly, but God only makes us to rejoyce; our relief from outward affliction or inward grief is the gift of God. He only can comfort us in outward afflictions who can command the creature, and he only can comfort us againſt our inward griefs, who can convince the conſcience. None can do either of theſe but God; therefore conſolations are from God. Luther ſpake true, It is eaſier to make a World then to comfort the conſcience; the Hebrew phraſe to comfort, uſed in divers places of the Old Teſtament, is, To ſpeak to the heart: Now God only can ſpeak to the heart; man can ſpeak to the ear, he can ſpeak words, but he can go no further, Therefore the act and art of comforting belongs properly to God; Chriſt is the true Noah: Lamech ſaith of Noah, Gen. 5. 29. This man ſhall comfort us, concerning our work and the toil of our hands; it was not in Noah to comfort, but as God made him a comfort: and he was ſaid to comfort as a type of Chriſt; Chriſt is true comfort, He is comfort cloathed in our fleſh, he is (as it were) comfort incarnate: Noah ſent a Dove out of his Ark, which returned with an Olive-branch, Jeſus Chriſt ſends the holy Ghoſt who is called the Comforter with the Olive-branch of true peace to our wearied ſouls; and to ſhew that it is now the higheſt act of Chriſts love and care as mediator, to give comfort: he promiſed to ſend the holy Ghoſt, when himſelf was taking his leave of the Church, in regard of any viſible abode or bodily preſence: being ready to aſcend and ſtep into Heaven, he ſaid, I will ſend the comforter. When God rained fire and brimſtone from Heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah, it is ſaid by ſome of the Ancients, that he ſent a Hell out of Heaven: But when he powers the holy Spirit from Heaven upon his Sion, we may ſay he ſends a heaven out of heaven. Heaven above is nothing elſe but holy comfort, and the comforts of the holy Spirit are the only Heaven below.

How highly then ought we to eſteem, how carefully to maintain communion with God, who hath all comfort, ſeeing comfort is more to us then all we have. If we have comfort, let our eſtate be what it will we are well enough; comfort is as the ſpring of our year, as the light of our day, as the Sun in our Firmament, as the life of our lives. Have we not reaſon then to draw, yea, to preſs neerer unto God, who hath all comfort in his hand, and without whom the beſt things cannot comfort us? Nor our riches, nor our relations, nor Wife, nor Children, nor health, nor beauty, nor credit nor honour, none of theſe can comfort us without God, and if God pleaſe he can make any thing comfort us; he can make a cruſt of dry bread a feaſt of fat things, a cup of cold water, a banquet of Wine to us. And as he can make our comforts croſſes, ſo our croſs a comfort, as David ſpeaks (Pſal. 23. 4.) Thy rod and thy ſtaff comfort me, not only the ſupporting ſtaff, but the correcting rod ſhall comfort, if God command it to be a comforter: Who would not maintain communion with this God who can make a comfort of any thing, who can anſwer every croſs with a comfort; If we have a thouſand croſſes, God hath ten thouſand comforts; he can multiply comforts faſter then the World can multiply croſſes.

Again, if God be the God of all conſolation, then go to God for conſolation; as the Angel ſaid to the women when they came to the Sepulcher enquiring for Chriſt, Why ſeek ye the living among the dead, he is riſen, he is not here: So I may ſay, Why ſeek ye living comforts among dead or dying creatures? Seek then there no longer. Job complains in this Book, When I ſaid my bed ſhall comfort me, then thou ſcareſt me with dreams; (Chap. 7.) Job went to a wrong place, when he went to his bed for comfort; moſt ſouls miſs of comfort, becauſe they go to a wrong place for it: one goes to his bed, another to his friend for comfort, a third to his wife and Children, theſe, ſaith he, ſhall comfort me; alaſs, why ſeek ye the living among the dead, none of theſe can comfort, though theſe may be means of comfort. Who or whatſoever is the inſtrument, God is the author of all our comfort; whatſoever hand brings it, God ſends it; God (ſaith Paul) who comforteth thoſe who are caſt down, comforted us by the coming of Titus (2 Cor. 7.6.) Titus was a good man and brought good tydings, yet Paul doth not ſay that the coming of Titus did comfort them; but, ſaith Paul, God comforted us by the coming of Titus; 'Tis not your friend who comforts you, but God who comforts you by the coming of ſuch a friend, when you are in ſorrow; by ſending in ſuch relief, when you are poor, by ſending ſuch medicines, when you ar ſick, ſuch ſalves when you are ſore, ſuch counſel when you are in doubt and know not what to do.

Once more, It is happy for Saints that conſolation is in the hand of God; if it were in the hand of the creature, ſure they ſhould have but little of it, but it is in the hand of God. There are theſe four conſiderations which may comfort Saints, that comfort is in the hand of God.

Firſt, Conſidering his nature, he is willing and ready to do good; he is full of compaſſion, and to ſhew mercy pleaſeth him more then it relieveth us.

Secondly, Conſidering his relation to his people: he is a Father. Will a Father let a Child lie comfortleſs, when he can help him? he is our Husband, he is our Friend, all relations provoke God to give out comfort to the Saints.

Thirdly, Conſidering his Omniſcience and Omnipreſence; he knows where the ſhoe wrings, he knows what comfort we want; a friend (poſſibly) hath the comfort in his hand, which we need, & he may be willing to give it out unto us, but he knows not wherein we are pinched; God tells Moſes, I have ſeen, I have ſeen the afflictions of my people in Egypt. And as he knows how it is with us, ſo we are ever within his reach, he can lay his hand upon every joynt where we are pained, and put a Plaiſter upon every wound: here is our happineſs. Chriſt would take off his people from extraordinary cares about the things of the World, by this argument, Your Father knows that ye have need of theſe things, Matth. 6. 32. Your Father who carry's the purſe knows your want.

Fourthly, Conſider his Omnipotence, he is able to comfort; he can command, yea create comforts; he can bring his comforts through an army of ſorrows to a poor ſoul: yea he can lead comfort through an Army of Devils and temptations, to a poor ſoul; he is Almighty, there is nothing too hard for him to do, nor is he hard to be entreated to do that which gives eaſe unto his people.

Secondly, Obſerve, Conſolations rightly adminiſtred by men, are the conſolations of God.

While man ſpeaks, God commands; Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, ſpeak comfortably to Jeruſalem, tell her that her warefar is accompliſhed, and her ſin pardoned (Iſa. 40.1.) As all the counſels, reproofs, and Doctrines which the Miniſters of Chriſt diſpenſe according to the form of wholeſome words delivered either in the Law or Goſpel, are the counſels, inſtructions, reproofs and Doctrines of God, ſo alſo are their conſolations. And that's the reaſon why God takes it ſo ill at the hands of men, when his Meſſengers, who bring either inſtruction, or conſolation, are refuſed: becauſe himſelf is refuſed when they are, and his conſolations are diſeſteemed when theirs are.

Thirdly, Obſerve, To account the conſolations of God ſmall, is a very great ſin.

Moſes rebukes rebellious Korah and his confederates, for undervaluing the priviledge which they (as Levites) had to be neer God in holy Services (Numb. 16. 9.) Seemeth it a ſmall thing unto you, that the God of Iſrael, hath ſeparated you from the Congregation of Iſrael, to bring you neer to himſelf to do the ſervice of the Tabernacle? &c. If it were their ſin to count it a ſmall thing to be called neer to God in holy adminiſtrations, how great a ſin is it in any man to count it a ſmall thing, that God draws neer to him with heavenly conſolations? Though the conſolations of God to us be ſmall comparatively to what ſome others have, yet we muſt not account any conſolation of God, and that upon two grounds:

Firſt, becauſe of our own unworthineſs; the leaſt conſolations are great, conſidering how little we are, as Jacob ſpeaks, (Gen. 32. 10.) I am not worthy the leaſt of all thy mercies: He thought little mercies too big for him, becauſe he was little in his own eyes. They who have great, yea any thoughts of their own merits, leſſen the mercies of God; but he who ſees he deſerves nothing but ill, ſees abundance of mercy in the ſmalleſt good.

Secondly, Smalleſt conſolations are very great, becauſe they proceed from a great God. As no ſin is ſmall, though comparatively to another ſin it may be ſmall, becauſe it is committed againſt the great God: ſo no conſolation is ſmall, becauſe it comes from the great God. God puts an impreſs of his own greatneſs upon the leaſt things that are done or given by him; though he give but a peny, yet it hath the image and ſuperſcription of him, our infinite and eternal Caſar: therefore ſee you ſlight it not. As a good heart is careful to perform the leaſt duty, and to avoid the leaſt ſin, or as a good heart calls no duty little, which God enjoyns, nor ſin little which God forbids: ſo a good heart is thankfull for the leaſt mercy, and calls no conſolation ſmall, which God, the great God ſends.

Fourthly, Obſerve, That great afflictions take away the ſenſe of tendered mercies.

Conſolations for the matter were offered unto Job, but his palate was ſo diſtempered with the gall and wormwood of his afflictions, that he could not taſte them. Phineas his Wife regarded not the joyful news, that ſhe had brought forth a Man Child, while ſhe was overwhelmed with ſorrow, that the Ark of God was taken. While the Iſraelites were under hard Task-maſters in Egypt, they could not attend to the voice of Moſes and Aaron, who told them of deliverance; their troubles and burdens wert ſo heavy, that they looked upon Moſes as a trouble, or as a burden, when he came to mediate their releaſe. And as the Idolatrous Iſraelites who ſacrificed their Children to Moloch, beat up Drums, and uſed loud-ſounding-Inſtruments, to drown the cry of the poor Children, that they might not be heard; ſo ſome afflictions cry ſo loud, and many cry ſo loud in their afflictions, that they drown the ſweet melody and muſick of thoſe conſolations that are ſounded in their ears. Great complaints render great conſolations ſmall: Job was not without ſome blame in this, for though his patience was great, yet had it been greater, he might have miſſed this reproof from his Friends; Are the conſolations of God ſmall to thee?

And is there any ſecret thing with thee?

Et verbum latens tecū. Heb.

The meaning appears thus, Are the conſolations of God, which we have offered, ſmall unto thee, becauſe thou haſt ſome ſecret hidden thing in thy breaſt? This ſecret thing is opened three wayes.

Eſtne apud te divinum aliquid reconditum in mente tua, præ quo noſtras conſolationes Divinas contemnis? Merc.

First, In reference to comfort: As if he had ſaid, Haſt thou ſome ſecret comfort beſides what we have offered? Haſt thou conſolations of thy own, which cauſe thee to neglect the conſolations of God? As in the Goſpel, when the Diſciples prayed Chriſt to eat, he told them, I have meat to eat that ye know not of (John 4. 31, 32.) Chriſt had ſecret bread, his work was his food, My meat is to do the will of him that ſent me: So here, What? haſt thou meat which we know not of? Some hidden Manna beyond what we have told thee of, that thou careſt not for our proviſions?

Iſtæ quas ab ipſo Deo acceptas affirmus conſolationes leviores ſunt quam ut eas probare poſſis: nimirum quod apud te quidpiam magis recōditū deliteſcat. Bez.

Secondly, others give the meaning thus, Haſt thou ſome ſecret conceit of thy own wiſdom, above ours? Or is there ſome unknown worth in thee, that exempts thee from this general rule, or way of comfort? Doſt thou ſo abound in thy own ſence, that thou haſt no need of our Notions? Is all we ſpeak below thee?

Thirdly, They are ſuppoſed to aim at ſome ſecret ſin or guilt, which hindred and unfitted Job to take in their Cordials and Conſolations, till it were purged out, or vomited up by ſound repentance.

Aut aliquid abſcondit eas apud te. Jun.

i. e. Ira perſtringit oculos animi tui, ut illas non percipias, quaſi res involucris tectas. Jun.

So one renders the Text, Doth any thing hide them with thee? The word ſignifies to hide and cover (2 Sam. 19. 4.) David covered his face: So here, Doth ſomewhat hide, wrap up, and cover theſe conſolations that thou canſt not receive them? Or what vails the eye of thy mind, that thou canſt not behold what we hold out to thee, or not find out the meaning of it? If our Goſpel be hid (ſaith the Apoſtle) it is hid to thoſe that are loſt, in whom the God of this world hath blinded the eyes of them, &c. (2 Cor. 4. 3, 4.) Thus Eliphaz ſeems to beſpeak Job. If the conſolations of God be ſmall to thee, doth not ſome cloud hide them from thee? Doth not prejudice againſt us, or ſome cloſe ſin in thy ſelf interrupt thy ſight?

Verba tua prava hoc prohibent. Vulg.

This is hinted by the old Latine Tranſlator, who ſaith, Thy evil words (or the evil matter that is in thee) hinder this.

Apud te potius eſt incantatio & mendacium etſi præ te veritatem feras. Rab. Abr.

One of the Rabbins gloſſeth it thus, and the Original reaches it, Some lye, ſome inchantment, or witchery hath ſeized upon thee, though thou pretendeſt truth. The Apoſtle ſpeaks to this ſence (Gal. 3. 1.) O fooliſh Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that you ſhould not receive the truth: Witchery or Inchantment gives a ſecret wound. Is there any ſecret thing with thee? Haſt thou any ſecret comfort for thy ſelf, any ſecret conceit of thy ſelf, any ſecret ſin in thy boſom hindering the effectual working, or due prizing of thoſe Cordials which we have given thee?

Malo in bonum ſumi, licet hoc in eum Eliphaz dicat, eum ridens. Merc.

The firſt of theſe ſecrets things never ſtands in the way of receiving conſolation; he that hath hidden comfort in him, will not refuſe ſpoken comforts; nor do I think that Eliphaz aimed at that, unleſs in ſcorn, as ſome reſolve it; but rather at one of, or both the latter, though miſtaken in both. Yet his ſuſpition gives us a ground for theſe two Obſervations.

Intus exiſtens prohibet alienum.

First, That a man who is full of his own wiſdom, is not fit to receive instruction, counſel, or conſolation from others; that which is within hinders that which comes from without.

When a man thinks himſelf wiſer then his teachers, he will not be taught, nor learn wiſdom by them. Some might have known much, if they had not preſumed they knew enough. There is no greater impediment of knowledge, then an opinion of it.

Secondly, Obſerve, A ſin kept cloſe, or ſecret within us, hinders the effect and working of the word.

Though comforts and counſels are given, they will not operate, where ſecret corruption lyes at heart; the filthineſs and corruption of the ſtomach hinders digeſtion, till it be purged out: Phyſitians remove ill humours before they preſcribe Cordials, elſe they do but nouriſh the diſeaſe. 'Tis ſo in Spirituals; the Apoſtle Peter gives the rule (1 Epiſt. 2. 1.) Wherefore laying aſide all guile, hypocriſie, and envy, and evil ſpeaking, as new born Babes deſire the ſincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby. As if he had ſaid, Till you caſt out theſe, you will never thrive under the Word: If a man be to ſow Seed in his Garden, he will pull up the Weeds, and throw away the Stones, elſe the Seed will not ſpring up to perfection. The Prophet tells the Jews (Jer. 5. 25.) Your ſins hinder good things from you: As ſin hinders good from coming to us, ſo it hinders the Word from working good in us. Though the proper buſineſs of the Word be to caſt out, or pull up this ſecret ſin, yet there is a great ſtop given it while any ſecret ſin is nouriſhed, or not caſt out. That's the reaſon why ſo many precious promiſes take not upon the heart, ſome ſin, ſome corruption obſtructs their operation, and (like the thief in the Candle) waſteth away their ſtrength and light.

As the Lord ſaid to Joſhua, when the people of Iſrael fled before the men of Ai, There is ſome accurſed thing among you, therefore they cannot ſtand before their enemies. So I may ſay, when any ſtand up againſt the Word of God, or reſiſt the conſolations which are offered them, ſure there is ſome accurſed thing, ſome hidden Wedge of ſtoln Gold, or ſome Babyloniſh Garment treaſured in, or wrapt about your hearts, and therefore ye can neither ſee nor ſubmit to the counſels of God for your good.

This is a uſeful truth for us, though an undue charge on Job; and yet his Friend proceeds (if a higher charge can be) to charge him higher, as will appear in the two Verſes following.

VERS. 12, 13.

Why doth thine heart carry thee away? And what doth thine eyes wink at?

That thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God, and letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth?

מה admirantis eſt

לב eſt animus θυμὸς, q.d. permittis te abripiendū & tranſverſum agēdum affectu tuo nimis animoſo.

Eliphaz inſiſts ſtill upon that unpleaſant ſubject of reproof, the fifth ground whereof here propoſed, is Job's over-confident ſticking to his own principles, or his overweening his own opinion. This reproof is couched in the twelfth and thirteenth Verſes.

Verſe 12. Why doth thy heart carry thee away?

Quis te furor cordis exagitat, quæ te extra te rapit ſapientiæ jactantia. Pined.

He ſpeaks by way of Queſtion, or as ſome expound him, by way of admiration: As if he had ſaid, It is ſtrange, even a wonder to me, that thy heart thus carryes thee away: The word which we tranſlate, to carry away, ſignifies to take up, or barely to take, and lay hold upon; Why doth thy heart? The heart is the whole inward man; here more ſpecially, the affections; Why do thy affections maſter thy judgment? Why are thy paſſions too hard for thy reaſon? Others give the ſence thus, How can thy heart hold thee? As if Job had grown too big for himſelf; as if he had been ſo proud and arrogant, ſo tranſported with ſelf-conceit, that he could not contain himſelf, and keep his bounds, or as if he had not ſtowage enough for his own thoughts. A third thus (which comes near the ſame ſence) What doth thy heart attribute or aſcribe to thee? Sure thy heart doth give thee ſome great titles, ſuch as theſe, Job the wiſe, Job the holy, the juſt, the ſincere; thy heart ſets thee out fure, and gilds thee over with attributes beyond thy deſerving.

Maſter Broughton, following one of the Rabbins, preſents us with a different tranſlation from either of theſe, What Doctrine can thy heart give thee? Or, What can thy heart teach thee? The word which we render to take, to carry, or hold up a thing, ſignifies alſo to learn or teach Doctrine; but rather to learn then to teach, as Grammarians tell us, which ſomewhat abates the clearneſs of that verſion; yet the Chalde Paraphraſe follows the ſame ſence, What hath thy own thought taught thee? What learneſt thou there? As if Eliphaz had ſaid, Thou haſt an evil heart, and ſurely an ill Maſter will teach but ill Doctrine; when the heart is inditing of a good matter (Pſal. 45.) then we may learn good good leſſons from the heart; and then we ſpeak moſt effectually to the hearts of others, when we ſpeak from our own hearts, they having firſt been ſpoken to by the Spirit of God. But a corrupt heart can teach no better then it hath, and that is corrupt Doctrines. Theſe are truths, yet too much ſtrained for upon this Text; and therefore I paſs from them, and abide by the ordinary ſignification of the word as we read it, Why doth thy heart take thee up, or carry thee away? As if he had ſaid, Thy heart hath ſeized upon thee, and arreſted thee, thou art led away priſoner, or captive by the violence and impetuouſneſs of thy own ſpirit.

The word is applyed (Ezek. 23. 14.) to the motion of the Spirit of God, ſent unto Ezekiel to inſtruct him; The Spirit lifted me up, or caught me away; that which the good Spirit did unto Ezekiel (not only upon his ſpirit, but upon his body, for he was corporally carryed away from the place where he was) that the heart of Job (as Eliphaz conceived) did unto him, it lifted him up, and carryed him away. There is a kind of violence in the allurements and inticings of the heart. As a man is ſaid to be carryed away by the ill counſels of others, ſo alſo by his own.

In the former ſence the word is uſed, Prov. 6.25. where Solomon adviſing to take heed of the Harlot, ſaith he, Keep thee from the evil woman, from the flattery of the tongue of a ſtrange woman; luſt not after her in thy heart, neither let her take thee with her eye-lids: There he makes uſe of this word, let her not take thee, or let her not carry thee away upon her eye-lids, let not her wanton eye flatter thee to the ſin of wantonneſs and uncleanneſs. As the eye of a whoriſh woman, ſo the whoriſh heart of a man, often takes and carryeth him away.

> Hence Obſerve, The heart hath power over, and is too hard for the whole man.

Paſſions hurry our hearts, and our hearts hurry us; and who can tell whither his heart will carry him, or where it will ſet him down, when once it hath taken him up. This is certain, it will carry every man beyond the bounds of his duty, both to God and man: Take it more diſtinctly in theſe three particulars.

Firſt, The heart quickly carryeth us beyond the bounds of grace.

Secondly, The heart often carryeth us beyond the bounds of reaſon; When paſſion works much, reaſon works not all.

Thirdly, It may carry us beyond the bounds of honeſty, yea, of modeſty: 'Tis very dangerous to commit our ſelves to the conduct of paſſion; that (unleſs kept under good command) will ſoon run us beyond the line both of Modeſty and of Honeſty, of Reaſon, and of Grace. He that is carryed away thus far muſt make a long journey of repentance, before he can return and come back, either to God, or to himſelf. Some have been carried viſibly away by the Devil, by an evil ſpirit without them (if God give commiſſion, or permiſſion, the Devil can eaſily do it) very many are carryed away by the evil ſpirit within them. An evil heart is as bad as the Devil; the evil ſpirit without, and the evil ſpirit within, carry us both the ſame way, and that is quite out of the way.

Conſider further how the heart carryeth us away, even from ſpiritual duties and holy ſervices; and this is not only the caſe of carnal men (who are given up to their hearts luſts) but of the Saints; their hearts are continually lifting at them, and ſometimes they are carryed quite away from Prayer, and from hearing the Word: The heart lifts the man up, and ſteals him out of the Congregation, while his body remains there; the body ſits ſtill, but the mind which is the man, is gone, either about worldly buſineſs and deſigns, or about worldly pleaſures and delights. He ſtirs not a foot, nor moves a finger, and yet he is carryed all the world over: He viſits both the Indies, yet ſteps not over his own threſhold. Thus the heart being carryed away, carryeth the man away. And that's the reaſon why God calls ſo earneſtly, My Son give me thy heart; for where our hearts go, we go, or we are carryed with them; Keep thy heart with all diligence (Prov. 4. 24.) Or, With all keeping, or above all keeping; it muſt have double keeping, double guards, keep, keep, watch, watch, thy heart will be gone elſe, and thou wilt go with it; if thou look not to thy heart, thy heart will quickly withdraw it ſelf, and draw thee along alſo: Why doth thy heart carry thee away? is a deſerved check upon every man, when his heart doth ſo; and Let not thy heart carry thee away, is a neceſſary caution for every man, leſt his heart ſhould do ſo. Job's heart was too buſie with him, though not ſo buſie as Eliphaz judged, when he thus checkt him, with, Why doth thy heart carry thee away?

And what doth thine eye wink at?

But is it a fault to wink with the eye? It is ſaid (John 13. 24.) that Peter beckened to, or winked at John (the Greek word ſignifieth an inviting geſture by the whole head, or by the eye) he winkt at him, I ſay, To ask Chriſt who it was of whom he ſpake: There was no fault in that, but Eliphaz finds fault with this: What was the ſuppoſed fault? There is a twofold faulty winking.

Νεύω, nutu utor, quia nutus fieri ſolet vel capite, vel oculis.

Firſt, When we wink at faults, our own faults, or the faults of other men, to bear with, or approve them.

Secondly, When we wink at the vertues and good deeds of others to ſlight and undervalue them; poſſibly Eliphaz taxeth Job for both theſe, as if he winked at his own faults, or would not ſee them, and that he winked at their faithful dealings, as ſlighting, or not regarding them: Yet further and more diſtinctly.

The word which we tranſlate to wink, is found only in this Text all the Bible over. It properly ſignifies to inſinuate by the eye, to ſpeak or make ſignificant tokens by the eye; there is a language of the eye, as well as of the tongue; here Job's eye gave ſome ill language to the eye or apprehenſion of Eliphaz. There are various opinions about it.

Quid annuunt quid innuunt oculi tui.

Firſt, Some interpret it as a note of oppoſition againſt, or of diſſatisfaction with the counſels which his Friends gave him, as was lately hinted. Shutting of the eye, imports ſhutting of the mind, or a refuſal of what is ſpoken. When God iudicially cloſed the eyes of the Jews, ſaying to the Prophet (Iſa, 6. 10.) Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes; this ſhewed the ſhutting of their minds againſt the truth: So alſo doth a voluntary or an affected ſhutting of the eye in ſome men, though in others it is an act of ſtronger attention, or intention of their ſpirits to what is ſpoken, which ſome take to be the Engliſh of Job's winking, as we ſhall ſee a little after.

Ægre, qui ſibi ſapientes videntur, ferunt, ſive concionentur, ſive diſceptent, non audiri cum externis modeſtiæ attentionis & æſtimationis ſignis. In auditione vitia ſunt ſupercilia, torvitas & triſtitia, vultus obtuitus vagus, nutus, &c. Plut. l. de Aud.

Secondly, This winking with the eye, is expounded by others, though not as an oppoſition againſt what he heard, yet as the geſture of a negligent and careleſs hearer. They who ſpeak, take it ill to have either ill looks, or not to be looked upon by their hearers. The attentiveneſs of the ear may be much diſcerned by the eye: One of the old moral Philoſophers, in his diſcourſe about hearing, numbers winking among the vices and offenſive behaviours of a Hearer. When the Lord Chriſt preached (Luke 4. 20.) It is ſaid, That the eyes of all that were in the Synagogue were faſtned on him. A faſtened eye is the note of a fixed heart, as a wandring eye is of a wandring heart. They faſtened their eyes upon him; as if they meant to hear with their eyes, as well as with their ears. A winking eye is a moveable and an unſettled eye, and therefore may well be the diſcoverer of an unſetled Spirit.

Nictu oculi prodis nos noſtraſque orationes à te contemni. Pined.

Thirdly, This winking with the eye is alſo a ſign of diſdain and ſcorn. As if Eliphaz had ſaid, The pride of thy heart ſparkles at thine eye; while we are counſelling and comforting thee, thou art ſcorning us. The Ancients were very critical about the eye, much of a man may be ſeen at his eye. As a man ſees, ſo he is ſeen by his own eyes. The frame of the heart appears much in the eye; a joyful or a ſorrowful frame of heart, an humble or a proud frame of heart, a contented, or diſcontented, an amicable, or a ſcornful frame of heart appears at the eye. As the ear and noſtrils of the Horſe diſcover him moſt, according to the rules of Naturaliſts, ſo the eye of man is the greateſt diſcoverer of man, whether we conſider the conſtitution or the actions of it. And that this action of winking is an argument of a ſcornful ſpirit, or the action of a ſcorner, appears from David's petition, or deprecation (Pſal. 35 19.) Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoyce over me, neither let them wink with the eye, that hate me without a cauſe: It may ſeem to be a ſtrange piece of prayer; Why would not David have his enemy wink? What was that to him? The meaning is this, Let not mine enemies have any occaſion to ſcorn and deride me, to boaſt and inſult over me.

There are two ſins which are very viſible in the eye: The firſt is wantonneſs, (Iſa. 3. 16.) Becauſe the Daughters of Sion are haughty, and walk with ſtrethed forth necks, and wanton eyes: The Hebrew is, Deceiving with their eye: And the Apoſtle Peter in his ſecond Epiſtle, Chap. 2. 14. gives this character of ſome, They have eyes full of adultery; you may perceive the filthineſs and uncleanneſs of their hearts ſtaring out of their eyes. The ſecond ſin which is ſo viſible in the eye, is Pride; Solomon ſpeaks of a proud look (Prov. 6. 17.) Six things the Lord hateth; yea, ſeven are an abomination to him: And the firſt of the ſeven is, A proud look: The Hebrew is, Haughty eyes: Pride and haughtineſs are ſeated, yea, conſpicuouſly enthroned in the eye.

Ad ſimulatam quandā innocentiæ ſignificationem & ſanctitatis ſpecimen, quod hypocriſin redolet referri poteſt.

Fourthly, Theſe words, Why winkeſt thou with thine eye? are expounded as a repoof of hypocriſie and ſeeming holineſs: As if Eliphaz had ſaid, Thou lookeſt very demurely, and innocently, as if (according to our old Proverb) Butter would not melt in thy mouth; or as if thou wert ſpeaking familiarly to God. For as lifting up the eyes, or looking to Heaven, is a geſture of holy worſhip. (John 17. 1.) Then Jeſus lift up his eyes to Heaven: So alſo is winking with the eye. It is very uſual with many to ſhut or wink with their eyes in prayer, that ſo their ſpirits may be more compoſed, and freer from diſtraction. 'Tis not unlikely that Eliphaz obſerved Job winking with his eyes, as if he had ſet himſelf to ſeek God; this provoked him, What? ſuch a one as thou, a hypocrite, a wicked man, what thou go to God? Wilt thou wink with thy eyes, as if thou wert wrapt up in ſome Divine meditation; whereas we have ground rather to conclude, that thou art deviſing miſchief: There are two Texts in the Proverbs, which give ſome light to this Interpretation, Prov. 6. 13. He winketh with his eye, he ſpeaketh with his feet, teacheth with his fingers, frowardneſs is in his heart, he deviſeth miſchief continually: Solomon puts a winking eye and a froward miſchief-deviſing heart together: As if he had ſaid, A wicked man (for of him he ſpeaks in the former Verſe) winks with the eye, as if he had ſome high rapture, whereas his mind is ſet upon miſchief, and purſuing the worſt of evils. Again, Prov. 10. 10. He that winketh with his eye cauſeth ſorrow: But how doth a man that winketh with the eye cauſe ſorrow? What dependence is there between theſe two, ſorrow, and winking, that the one ſhould cauſe the other? Theſe words, He that winketh with his eye, are the deſcription of a deceitful man; ſuch a one may cauſe ſorrow enough, both to himſelf and others. Solomon intends, not a ſimple, but a ſubtil ſly winking with the eye; and ſo the Syriack readeth it: He who winketh with his eye deceitfully, cauſeth ſorrow: Deceit makes the deceived ſorrowful, and it will make the deceiver ſorrowful; he muſt either be ſorrowful to repentance, or feel the ſorrow of puniſhment.

Qui annuit oculo ſuo cum fraude.

Quid collimant oculi tui. Jun. Metaphora à jaculatoribus ſumpta. Id.

Fifthly, This winking with the eye, is conceived to be a Metaphor taken from thoſe who ſhoot with Guns or Bows: Gunners and Archers wink when they ſhoot, that they may take aim the better: The contracting of the ſight, ſtrengthens it. So here, What doſt thou wink at? That is, What doſt thou aim at? The eye of a mans mind aims at ſome mark in meditation; and hence it is uſual for a man in vehement meditation, to wink with his eye: As if Eliphaz had ſaid, Surely thou haſt ſome great deſign, ſome grand plot in thy brain, thou pretendeſt to ſome deep wiſdom, or unheard of policies; thou haſt ſet up ſome fair mark before thy fancy, and thou wilt be ſure to hit it; What is it that thou aimeſt at? We find the phraſe uſed in this ſence, Prov. 16. 30. He ſhutteth his eye to deviſe froward things, moving his lips he bringeth evil to paſs: He ſhutteth his eyes, as if he would make his thoughts more ſteddy and fixt, to hit or reach that froward device which he is caſting about how he may effect. And as a wicked man ſhuts his eyes to deviſe froward, that is, ſinful things; ſo a good man ſhuts his eyes (leſt variety of objects ſhould divert or call off his mind) when he is deviſing and ſtudying what is beſt both for himſelf and others. The rendring of the Vulgar Latine, though it be far from the letter of the Original, and is rather a Paraphraſe than a Tranſlation, yet it reacheth this ſenſe fully; Wherefore doth thy heart carry thee away, and why lifteſt thou up thine eyes, as if thou wert thinking of ſome great matter? Or, As if the affairs of Kingdomes and States depended upon thy care, or were committed to thy truſt.

Et quaſi magna cogitans attonitos habes oculos. Vulg. Oculos in cœlo defigere ſolent cogitabundi & quibus gravis ineſt ſolicitudo. Sanct.

All theſe interpretations are ſerviceable to the Text before us; and though we cannot poſitively and particularly reſolve which of them was here intended by Eliphaz, yet conſidering that his ſcope was to reprove Job, we may take in the ſenſe of them all, and conclude, that he cenſured Job in this one word, of all thoſe miſcarriages of the heart, which may be ſignified at the eye; as appears by the inference which he makes in the next Verſe: For having ſaid, What doth thy eye wink at? He preſently ſubjoynes:

Verſe 13. That thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God, and letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth?

Explicationem continet præcedentis verſiculi. Bold.

So that this Verſe is an explication of the former, and gives us more clearly what Eliphaz meant by the carrying away of the heart, and the winking of the eye: His heart is carried out of all bounds, who turneth his ſpirit againſt God: His eye winks ſinfully, whoſe mouth preſently upon it ſpeaks unduely. Thou winkeſt with thy eye, thou art very thoughtfull, and what the fruit or birth of thy thoughts is, we may diſcern by thy ſpeech, while thou letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth.

Thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God.] As if he had ſaid, Inſtead of humbling thy ſelf under the puniſhment of thy ſin, thou with an incenſed mind conteſteſt againſt God himſelf: and though while he ſaith againſt God, he doth not mean God directly, but God in his judgments and counſells, in his Word, or in his Works; yet this is a very high charge, one of the higheſt that is in the whole Book, but very unjuſt. Indeed Job uſed ſome paſſionate ſpeeches to his Friends; and theſe Eliphaz judgeth to proceed from an oppoſition againſt God. Thou turneſt thy Spirit againſt God.

There is a twofold turning the ſpirit againſt God:

Firſt, Natural, Rom. 8. 7. Enmity is the turning of the ſpirit. The wiſdome or luſt of the fleſh is enmity againſt God.

Secondly, Improved, when we heighten this oppoſition in our practice, and are enemies to God in our minds; or Gods hearty enemies by wicked works, Col. 1. 21.

Quod rediri feceris ad Deum ſpiritum tuum. Heb. Quia reſpondit ad Deum ſpiritus tuus. Mont. Perire facit verbum qui reſpondet Druſ.

The Hebrew is, Thou makeſt thy ſpirit to return to God, which is expounded two wayes; Firſt, thou makeſt thy ſpirit to turn upon, or againſt God: Secondly, thy ſpirit anſwers or replieth upon God; both meet in one meaning; for though there may be a turning away of the ſpirit without anſwering, yet (in one ſenſe) all anſwers are the turning of our ſpirit: if any man ask a queſtion, the anſwer is the return of his mind who makes the anſwer; ſo ſome render, Why doth thy ſpirit return anſwer to God; as if he rebuked him for his boldneſs in replying. Thy ſpirit returns upon God, if he ſpeak one word, thou wilt have two; in that ſenſe the word is uſed, Titus 2. 9. where the Apoſtle giving rules (among other relations) to Servants, charges them; Servants be obedient to your own Maſters, and pleaſe them well in all things, not anſwering again. But, is it a fault for a Servant when asked a queſtion, to make an anſwer? No, it were a fault not to anſwer. The meaning is, that a Servant being reproved for a fault, muſt not anſwer; that is, his ſpirit muſt not riſe, and return againſt his Maſter; or if a Servant be directed to do any warrantable work, he muſt not anſwer again; that is, he muſt not contradict or murmur at the orders which he hath received, but addreſs himſelf to the fulfilling of them; this is the anſwering again, reproved as a fault in Servants, which is rather gainſaying than anſwering, as we put in the margent of our Bibles: in which ſenſe, anſwering is taken here, according to this interpretation. Thy ſpirit anſwers God, or turns againſt him. We may clear it alſo by that of the Apoſtle (Rom. 9. 20.) Where, having ſhewed the abſolute ſovereignty of God in his decrees and purpoſes, by the example of Jacob and Eſau, as alſo by that of Pharaoh, He concludes, Verſ. 18. Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardneth: Saint

Paul fore-ſaw that this Doctrine would raiſe a great deal of duſt, and cauſe many to turn their ſpirits againſt God, which he thus repreſents (*Verſ.*19.) Thou wilt ſay unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? for who hath reſiſted his will? Nay, but O man, who art thou that replieſt againſt God? What? wilt thou chop Logick with God himſelf? Wilt thou (as the Margent ſaith) anſwer again, or diſpute with God? Hold thy peace, quiet thy ſelf, What's the matter, that thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God?

Spirit is here put for the will, thoughts, and counſels of man, cloathed and elated with arrogancy, ſtoutneſs, and pride: In all Languages, Spirit imports that which is high. And to ſay, ſuch a one is a man of ſpirit, notes not only the activeneſs of that man, but often his pride and haughtineſs.

Beſides, Spirit is ſometimes put for indignation, for fury, and wrath; in all which acceptious, the word may be rendred here, Thou turneſt thy ſpirit; that is, thy anger and wrath, thy fury and indignation againſt God. So the word is uſed, Iſa. 25.4. When the ſpirit, or blaſt of the terrible ones, is as a ſtorm againſt the Wall; that is, while the fury of the terrible ones is in its higheſt march and motion, God promiſeth to be a ſtrength to the poor, a ſtrength and a refuge to the needy in his diſtreſs: So Prov. 29.11. A fool uttereth all his mind, or all his ſpirit; that is, all his anger, he lets it out, and diſcovers himſelf preſently; but a wiſe man (if there be cauſe of anger) keepeth it in till afterwards; that is, till a fit ſeaſon. He hath a retentive faculty which the Fool hath not. Now in which ſenſe ſoever of theſe explained, we underſtand Spirit in the preſent Text, the charge is as high as it can go upon any man, when 'tis ſaid, He turneth his Spirit againſt God. Hence Obſerve:

> To turn the ſpirit againſt God, is the very ſpirit of ungodlineſs; there is no greater wickedneſs than this.

A godly man may do an act which is againſt God, but his ſpirit cannot act againſt God; that's the character of the wicked. A godly man delights in the Law of God, according to the inward man, whilſt the outward man ſins againſt the Law of God; an ungodly man turns his inward man againſt the Law of God, while his outward man pretends obedience to it; and as it is an act of higheſt diſobedience, ſo of the proudeſt pride to turn the ſpirit againſt God. The Vulgar Latine tranſlates it well, Why doth thy ſpirit ſwell againſt God? Thou haſt an impoſthumation in thy ſpirit againſt God; yea, it is not only an act of the proudeſt pride, but of the maddeſt madneſs, to turn the ſpirit againſt God; ſo the Septuagint gives it, Thou haſt cauſed thy fury or thy madneſs to break forth before God; he that acts againſt God, is a mad-man indeed, Will ye provoke the Lord? are you ſtronger than he? Is the Apoſtles chiding queſtion to ſuch mad-men; Are you ſo mad after your luſts? hath ſin made you ſo fooliſh? Have you loſt both grace and reaſon at once? that you dare thus provoke the Lord, and challenge the Almighty? God reſiſteth the proud, and the proud aſſault him; Grace turns the ſpirit to God, repentance is the return of our ſpirits to God; then what is the turning of our ſpirits againſt God, but a clear demonſtration of a totally impenitent and graceleſs ſpirit?

Furorem erupiſti ante dominum. Sept.

Again, when Eliphaz ſaith, Job turned his Spirit againſt God, he doth not mean it of a direct or profeſſed oppoſition againſt God, as if Job had openly defied him, and blaſphemed his Name; but his meaning is, that Job ſhewing ſo much impatience and unſatisfiedneſs of ſpirit, under the dealings of God with him, did not ſubmit to God as he ought. Eliphaz (I conceive) did not ſo much as ſuſpect that Job turned his ſpirit immediately; or, as we ſay, point blank againſt God himſelf, but only againſt his diſpenſations. Hence obſerve:

> That while we ſpeak, or our hearts riſe up againſt the dealings of God with our ſelves or others, we may be ſaid to turn our ſpirits againſt God himſelf.

Many who think they have not neglected Chriſt, will be found to have neglected him, becauſe they have neglected thoſe by whom, or that wherein Chriſt is offered. The Evangeliſt brings in Chriſt ſpeaking thus (Matth. 25.) I was hungry and ye fed me not, thirſty, and ye gave me no drink; they to whom he ſpeaks, wonder at this; Lord, (ſay they) when ſaw we thee hungry, and gave thee no meat, or thirſty, and gave thee no drink? ſurely, we have not been guilty of ſuch a wickedneſs: Yea, ſaith Chriſt, In as much as ye did it not to one of theſe, ye did it not to me; when ye refuſed to feed theſe, ye refuſed to feed me; I was in theſe, and theſe were in me. Now in the ſame manner, many will ſay, when we charge them with turning their ſpirits againſt God, with fighting againſt, and oppoſing God: Who? we oppoſe God? we never oppoſed God as we know of; yea, peradventure, they will ſay, we have honoured God, and do you charge us that we have turned our ſpirit againſt God? To many ſuch God will ſay, Inaſmuch as ye oppoſed my word, and murmured againſt my works; inaſmuch as ye were angry with my diſpenſations, and diſcontented with what I have done; ye have turned your ſpirit againſt me. We may become guilty of this ſin before we think of it; for as there is a direct and literal contending with God, ſo an equivalent, or conſtructive contending with him. As ſome men commit plain, open Treaſon againſt a State, but others commit only conſtructive Treaſon: 'Tis ſo here; the God of heaven knows when ſpirits turn againſt him directly, and when by conſequence; and he will take vengeance, not only of direct and avowed, but alſo of conſequential and conſtructive Treaſon againſt his Sovereignty, unleſs the offender repent, and be humbled before him. He will judge thouſands at the laſt day, for oppoſing him, who, it may be, in ſome things have pleaded for him; yea, who have in ſome things not only acted, but ſuffered for him; though uſually, when the ſpirit of any man turneth againſt God, that mans works and words turn againſt him too: So Eliphaz further taxeth Job in the latter clauſe of the Verſe.

And letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth.] As if he had ſaid, Such ſtuff as thou haſt in thy heart, even ſuch flows out of thy mouth; the word Such is added by moſt Tranſlators; the Hebrew is, And letteſt words go out of thy mouth; It is no fault to let words go out of the mouth: 'tis no ſin to ſpeak, but to ſpeak ſuch or ſuch words, may be very ſinful; and therefore we, and others, for explication ſake, make this ſupplement, Such words; But what words were they? Eliphaz doth not quote any paſſages in his ſpeech, but leaves them, as we and others tranſlate, under a term of general diſtaſte, Such words; as if they were not worth the naming; or as if no epithite could be found worthleſs enough to name them by. For as when Ezra would deſcribe a deliverance, in the reality of it, beyond words, he doth not tell us what it was, but ſaith only, Seeing our God hath given us ſuch deliverance as this. (Ez. 9.13.) So when Eliphaz would deſcribe words in the vanity or ſinfulneſs of them, below words, he doth not tell us what they were, but ſaith onely, Such words as theſe; yet poſſibly the words he means were theſe, Why haſt thou ſet me as a mark, ſo that I am a burden to my ſelf (Chap.7.20.) or theſe (Chap. 9.30.) If I waſh me with Snow-water, and make my hands never ſo clear, yet thou wilt plunge me in the ditch; or theſe, (Chap.13.26.) Thou writeſt bitter things againſt me, and thou makeſt me to poſſeſs the iniquities of my youth: Theſe, or ſuch as theſe, were the words which Eliphaz leaves under this note of diſdain, Such words. Yet theſe Eliphaz ſhould have mollified with a charitable conſtruction, and not have ſharpned his own tongue againſt them, much leſs ſhould he have interpreted them, as the turning of Jobs ſpirit againſt God himſelf. For as ſome draw near to God with their lips, and give him ſmooth words, while their hearts are far from him, and their ſpirits turned againſt him; So others may ſeem to depart from God with their lips, and give him harſh language, while their hearts are near, and their ſpirits cleave unto him.

מלים Logos, nugas, verba? Coc.

I ſhall further give you a four-fold character of theſe words, ſutable to the miſpriſion which Eliphaz and his Friends had of him all along. Such words, or words ſo apprehended, muſt needs ſound harſhly in their ears, and in the ears of any man fearing God.

Firſt, Proud words of himſelf, inſiſting upon his own righteouſneſs, as they conceived, for in the next words Eliphaz ſaith, What is man that he ſhould be clean? they thought Job ſpake much to paint and bedeck himſelf with his own goodneſs and innocency.

Secondly, Blaſphemous words of God, though not directly, yet by conſequence, againſt his works and dealings.

Thirdly, Reproachful, ſcornful words againſt them, as if they were neither able, nor worthy to be his counſel; You are the men, and wiſdome ſhall dye with you.

Fourthly, Falſe words upon the whole matter in controverſie, maintaining (as Eliphaz judged) contrary to the truth; that he was not puniſhed for his ſin. Words under this fourfold notion are reproveable and ſinful enough; ſuch Eliphaz eſteemed the words of Job to be, proud, blaſphemous, reproachful, falſe; Why letteſt thou ſuch words as theſe go out of thy mouth? Hence Obſerve:

Firſt, Paſſion within will vent it ſelf by words without.

When the heart is carried away, and the ſpirit turned againſt God, no marvel if the tongue be carried away, and the words of ſuch a man be turned both againſt God, his truth, or people.

Secondly, Note: Our words are ſuitable to our ſpirits.

Some can diſſemble much, and ſpeak golden words, while themſelvs are droſs; but ordinarily, our words are ſuch as we are: The vile perſon will ſpeak villany, (Iſa. 32. 6.) A man that is all for the world, ſpeaks worldly (1 John 4. 5.) They are of the world, therefore ſpeak they of the world. Every man is of the world ſo, as that he is a part of the world; but ſome are ſo of the world, that the world is all them; they who are thus of the world, muſt needs ſpeak of the world, if they ſpeak any thing, for they have nothing elſe to ſpeak of. Thus a covetous man ſpeaks covetouſly, and a proud man proudly (Jerem. 43. 2.) Some told the Prophet to his face, Thou ſpeakeſt falſly, the Lord our God hath not ſent thee to ſay, Go not into Egypt to ſojourn there; Theſe were proud words indeed, but who ſpake them? The Text tells us, Then ſpake Azariah the Son of Hoſhaiah, and all the proud men: The proud men ſpake proudly; ſo on the contrary, a ſober man will ſpeak ſoberly, an humble man humbly; The poor ſpeak ſupplications, ſaith Solomon; rich men ſpeak their commands, poor men ſpeak their wiſhes and deſires.

Thirdly, Obſerve: He that dares to ſpeak evil, is arrived at a great height of evil.

Eliphaz puts this as an effect of a heart turned againſt God; Such words as theſe, ſhew that thou art not onely a ſinful man, but impudent in ſinning. For though an evil heart is worſe than an evil tongue, and an ill thought than an evil word; yet when ill words ſpring from ill thoughts, and are as branches growing from the root of an evil heart, this ſhews a man heightned in ſin; Sin hath got the maſtery of the heart, when it freely vents it ſelf at the tongue. Some keep their ſins down by hypocriſie, and ſome by common modeſty; they are either ſo cunning that they will not, or ſo baſhful that they dare not ſpeak out the filth that lies within. But they are beyond, not only modeſty, but hypocriſie, whoſe tongues can ſpeak all the evil that is in their heart; though the ſin of the heart be worſe than the ſin of the tongue; yet when tongue ſins are ſteep'd in the puddle of a corrupt heart, they are moſt unſavoury: David ſinned, when he ſaid, in his haſte, all men are lyars: How greatly then do they ſin, who tell lyes at their leiſure, and ſpeak evil with deliberation. That which is ſaid in haſte, is ſaid by the tongue alone, without the privity of the heart, but the heart is alwayes privy to that which is ſaid at leiſure. The Prophet taxeth thoſe, the ſhew of whoſe countenance did teſtifie againſt them (Iſa. 3. 9.) They fall juſtly under as ſevere a cenſure, the ſound of whoſe tongues doth teſtifie againſt them, for they alſo (as it follows in the Prophet) declare their ſin as Sodom, they hid it not. Further, this alſo argues the evil of evil ſpeaking, becauſe it wrongs others, and infects the Auditors: the vanity or errour of the mind ſpoken out, is contagious; better keep it in, than ſpeak it out, but both are naught: 'tis onely good, when we purge it out. Though it be ſome allay and leſſening, yet it is no excuſe for ſin, that we keep it in; God hates it, let it lye as cloſe as it will; and though a ſin kept cloſe doth not hurt others; yet it is not onely hurtful, but deadly to its keeper. They onely are out of danger, who, as they do not let evil go out of the door of their mouths, ſo not lodge in the chambers of their heart.

Thus I have opened the charge contained in this part of the Chapter; in all which, Eliphaz hath reproved the ſpeech of Job, as vain, empty, proud, paſſionate, and erroneous. He now proceeds to ſhew him (as he ſuppoſed) the errour of his opinion, and to confute it.

VERS. 14, 15, 16.

What is man that he ſhould be clean? and he that is born of a woman, that he ſhould be righteous?
Behold, he putteth not his truſt in Saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his ſight:
How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water?

Eliphaz hath done reproving Job for his unprofitable words, and uncomely carriage; he now proceeds to convince him of his ſuppoſed errour in judgment, and unſound opinion; namely, That he boaſted himſelf free from errour in practice, and ſound at heart: This he looked upon as the Bulwark in which Job defended himſelf, and againſt this he now raiſes his battery to beat it down. And this takes up the ſecond part of the Chapter, which I called Confutation.

Jam rem aggreditur & Jobi præcipuum firmamentum quo ille nitebatur evertit, quod ille ſe innocentem & juſtum diceret. Qua fronte inquit audes id dicere. Merc.

Verſe 14. What is man that he ſhould be clean?

As if he had ſaid, Though I ſhould grant that thou art not conſcious to thy ſelf of any crime or wickedneſs acted, for which thou art thus afflicted; yet this is enough to prove thee a ſinner, that thou art a man, and that thou art unrighteous, becauſe thou art born of a woman; What is man that he ſhould be clean, and he that is born of woman that he ſhould be righteous?

What is man?] He ſpeaks contemptuouſly, What is man? As Hiram ſaid of the Cities which Solomon aſſigned him, What Cities are theſe which thou haſt given me, my brother? And he called them the land of Cabul, that is, diſpleaſing, or dirty (1 Kings 9. 13.) Thus Eliphaz ſpeaks of man, as if he were diſpleaſed with the ſight of him, or remembred onely the duſt and clay out of which he was made, What is man (my friend Job) that he ſhould be clean?

Job had ſpoken the ſame language before (Chap. 7. 17.) What is man that thou art thus mindful of him, &c. He alſo empties man of all worth, which ſhould attract the leaſt reſpect from God upon him: What is man? puts a five fold ſlight upon man.

First, In his nature.
Secondly, In his birth.
Thirdly, In the matter out of which he was made.
Fourthly, In reference to his preſent condition.
Fifthly, and chiefly, In reference to his corruption, or ſinful depravation, What is man that he ſhould be clean?

But had Job any where aſſerted himſelf clean? Did he not aſſert his own uncleanneſs, while he proclaimed that Negative Queſtion (Chap. 14. v. 4.) Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one. Why then doth Eliphaz charge Job with this boaſt of cleanneſs, who never thought himſelf clean, as his diſcourſe every where demonſtrates, but under two notions: Firſt, as righteous by another, or through Faith in the Meſſias: Secondly, as not ſcandalous to others by any notorious crime, or conſcious to himſelf of any cloſe hypocriſie; in any other ſenſe than this Job never aſſerted himſelf clean, and in this he was, yea, every believer is clean. Yet Eliphaz faſtens it upon him, as if he had trim'd up himſelf with his own ornaments, or had advanced the Doctrine of Self-perfection.

Hence obſerve in general; That, When perſons are ingaged in a diſpute, ſpecially in a difficult controverſie, they ſeldome underſtand, but ſeldomer report the truth of each others poſition.

Some of Calvins adverſaries called his Doctrine by the odious names of Turciſm and Judaiſm: And the Papiſts call us Solifidians, as if we denied all good works, becauſe we affirm, that a man is juſtified (though not by that Faith which is alone) yet by Faith alone without works. Job indeed had ſpoken much to vindicate himſelf, but he ſpake much more to abaſe, and lay himſelf low in the ſight of God; and therefore Eliphaz might have made a fairer collection for him than this, that he affirmed himſelf clean.

Calvinoturciſmus. Hun.

What is man, &c. The Hebrew is, Miſerable man. Miſeble is his name, and miſery is with him, frail is his name, and frailty is with him. Hence Mr. Broughton tranſlates, What is woful man, to be cleared?

אנש Nomen humanæ fragilitati ſignificanda appoſitum.

What is man that he ſhould be clean?] The words contain a great and neceſſary truth, but becauſe we met with it Chap. 14.4. where the point was opened, and the impoſſibility of ſelf-cleanneſs cleared from thoſe words: Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? (which queſtion anſwers for Job, that he was poſitive for the univerſal pollution of the nature of man) I ſhall not therefore ſtay upon it; take onely this brief hint. Here is a ſtrong proof of original ſin, we are clean, but not of our ſelves; we are clean, under a four-fold notion.

Firſt, Clean, meritoriouſly, by Chriſt.

Secondly, Clean efficaciouſly, by the ſpirit uniting us to Chriſt, and ſanctifying our hearts.

Thirdly, Clean inſtrumentally, by the Word, which diſcovers Chriſt the fountain to us, and ſo purifies us (John 15.4.) You are clean through the word which I have ſpoken unto you.

Fourthly, We are clean impulſively and attractively, by faith, (Acts 15.8.) He made no difference, purifying their hearts by Faith; thus many are clean, and but thus there is no man clean; What is man that he ſhould be clean?

And he that is born of a woman that he ſhould be righteous?

יצרק & יזכה Quando conjunguntur diſtinguenda ſunt, illud latius patet; hoc dicitur cum reus à judice abſolutus dimittitur. Illo autem non tantum innocentia ſed & dignitas notatur. Coc.

Both parts of the Verſe import the ſame thing. Clean and righteous are near of one ſignification, yet in this place we may diſtinguiſh them; To be clean, refers to the purity of mans nature; to be righteous, or to be juſtified (for ſo the word may be tranſlated) refers to the integrity of his life; from both it follows, Man cannot merit, for he is not clean: he cannot anſwer God, for he is not righteous. As if Eliphaz had ſaid, What is man that he ſhould either have any cleanneſs in himſelf, or that he ſhould be reputed and looked upon as righteous by others, (Both which he intends as applicable to Job.) If God ſhould ſearch thy nature, what art thou that thou ſhouldeſt be clean? If God ſhould ſearch thy life, what art thou that thou ſhouldeſt be righteous? The point of mans utter inability to ſtand before God in himſelf for juſtification, hath been met with, more than once before, and therefore I will not ſtay upon that neither, only conſider the form of expreſſion, or the periphraſis of Man.

Emphaticè mulieris meminit. Ut Cap. 14.1. Merc.

He that is born of a woman.] In the firſt clauſe he ſaith, What is man, in this latter, What is he that is born of a woman: He ſpeaks of man in both, yet with an additional emphaſis, to mind us of our birth and original, as was ſhewed upon thoſe words (Chap. 14. 1.) Man that is born of a woman is of few dayes, and full of trouble: where the Reader may find what that teacheth, even an aggravation of mans ſinfulneſs, in that he is born of a woman, who ſinned firſt, or was, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (1 *Tim.*2.14.) Firſt in the Tranſgreſſion. How prone is man to ſin, being born of a woman, who was ſo prone to ſin, that ſhe was the firſt ſinner? What is he that is born of a woman that he ſhould be righteous? The whole race of mankind hath yielded but one exception to this general Rule, and that was in the perſon of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt: He indeed was born of a woman, and yet righteous, becauſe his Mothers conception was of the Holy Ghoſt (*Matt.*1.20.) and by the power of the moſt High over-ſhadowing her, Luke 1.35. But we may ſay of all men, except him, (who was alſo infinitely more than man, even God-man) What is he that is born of a woman, that he ſhould be righteous?

Secondly, Eliphaz proceeds (though the point be clear in it ſelf) to give a proof of it, which he urgeth from the greater to the leſs.

Verſ. 15. Behold he putteth no truſt in his Saints, and the heavens are not clean in his ſight: How much more abominable and filthy is man, &c.

The Argument riſes thus:

If they who are the pureſt, the holieſt creatures, are not able to ſtand before God in their own purity, how ſhall he who hath no purity, no holineſs at all in him?

But the Heavens, yea, the Angels in Heaven, who are the pureſt, the holieſt creatures, are yet unclean in the ſight of God;

Therefore man who is abominable and filthy, drinking iniquity like water, cannot be clean in his ſight.

Behold, he puts no truſt in his Saints] Eliphaz urged this argument, (for the ſubſtance of it Chap. 4. 18.) here he repeats and re-inforceth it.

Behold, is uſually a note of attention, here it is more, a note of admiration; as if he had ſaid, Would you think it, that God puts no truſt in his Saints? yet he doth not: or is not this a wonder, that God puts no truſt in his Saints? whom will he truſt, if not his Saints?

לא יאמין Vid. cap. 4. 18

Sic credere in Deum, in Deo, & Deo, Synonyma ſunt.* Druſ.

The word which we tranſlate, to put truſt, ſignifies properly to believe, he doth not believe in his Saints, or not give credit to them; he doth not (as our word hath been) confide in them; a perſon is confided or truſted in; either becauſe of his faithfulneſs, or becauſe of his ſtrength and ſtability; the word which we render here to truſt, ſignifies ſometimes ſtrength or firmneſs, as alſo a Pillar, which is not onely firm, but upholds and confirms the Building, or that which leans upon it. The ſame word doth elegantly ſignifie both to truſt, and to be firm, becauſe every thing (that is truſted) is truſted upon ſuppoſall, either of a natural, or moral firmneſs. Hence the Vulgar tranſlates, immutable; Behold, among the Saints there is not one immutable, or unchangeable: And another of the Ancients, There is no faithfulneſs in his Saints; that is, firmneſs, or unchangeableneſs of nature is not to be found in them.

There are three different uſes of the word.

First, To truſt.
Secondly, To truſt in.
Thirdly, To truſt upon. So the Tranſlation varies here.

For, firſt, ſome read, He doth not truſt his Saints.

Secondly, others, He doth not truſt in his Saints.

A third, He doth not truſt upon his Saints.

Thus, ſome put a difference between believing God, and believing in God, and believing upon God; though we find them uſed promiſcuouſly in Scripture. It is ſaid by Moſes (Gen. 15. 6.) Abraham believed in the Lord, and it was accounted to him for righteouſneſs; but the Apoſtle (Rom. 4. 3.) ſaith plainly, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteouſneſs: So that there is not any material difference between thoſe two expreſſions; yet ordinarily to truſt in or upon, is taken in a higher conſtruction than barely to truſt: Behold he putteth no truſt in his Saints.

Here it is queſtioned, who are meant by Saints; there are three opinions about it. The word Saint in general ſignifies a perſon ſeparated, or one ſet apart from others; Holineſs is our ſeparation from the world unto God: holy perſons are ſeparated perſons; that's their ſtate. But more diſtinctly, who are theſe holy perſons, theſe Saints? The Greek Interpreters reſtrain the Text to the old Patriarchs, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, as alſo Moſes and Aaron, with whom God at ſometimes was angry, or found fault with ſome of their actings: Secondly, others, by the Saints underſtand the confirmed Angels, who are called Saints by way of excellency; becauſe among all creatures they are (in one ſenſe) the moſt holy, as having ever been without the leaſt ſpot or taint of ſin, whether in their natures, or in their lives; and having ever continued as the Houſhold ſervants of God, obſervant of, and obedient to all his commands.

Angeli vocantur Sancti Dei, quaſi ei familiariſſimi atque illius obſequio addictiſſimi. Dan. 4. 8.

But we may rather take it in general, both for the holieſt of men, and for the holy Angels: Behold he puts no truſt in his Saints; no, not in thoſe who are moſt holy.

Hence Obſerve: There is no created holineſs ſure, ſtable, and perfect in it ſelf:

The glorious Angels which are, and ever ſhall be Saints in Heaven, and the Saints in Heaven who are like Angels, ſtand not in that holy and happy eſtate, by their own ſufficiency, but by the decree and grace of God. Thoſe Angels which fell at firſt were holy, and they who now ſtand, might have fallen notwithſtanding their created holineſs, if God had not ſuperadded confirming grace, which eſtabliſheth them for ever. Yet this is not all, that the Angels are imperfect, becauſe they might fall if not ſupported; there is ſomewhat more in it; for though the Angels are perfectly righteous in reference to the Law, (for the whole bent of their hearts is to God, and they love God with all their hearts, which is the fulfilling of the Law:) So that the obedience of the Angels in heaven is made the copy and pattern of our obedience here on earth, as Chriſt hath taught us to pray; though (I ſay) the Angels are thus perfectly righteous in reference to the Law) yet there is a higher righteouſneſs and holineſs in God. There's but the holineſs of obeying a Law, God hath the holineſs of being a Law: They have a holineſs without ſpot, yet it is but a finite, a created holineſs; now what compariſon is there between finite and infinite, created, and uncreated; therefore, though there be no blemiſh in the obedience of Angels, none in their nature, none in their lives, yet God puts no truſt in them, he cannot lay the weight of his confidence upon them, becauſe they are creatures.

The next clauſe doubles this point.

And the heavens are not clean in his ſight.] There is a difference among Interpreters, what theſe heavens are; The Chaldee Paraphraſt, and ſome of the Ancients, underſtand the Angels, as in the former part of the verſe, and they ſay, the Angels are called the Heavens under a two-fold conſideration:

Firſt, Becauſe Angels are like the Heavens, in their ſpirituality and incorruptibility, in their order and ſubordination among themſelves; as alſo in their power over ſublunary or earthly bodies.

Secondly, By a Synechdoche, becauſe the Angels have their habitation in Heaven, that's their dwelling-place; ſo Maſter Broughton tranſlates, Nor they of heaven be clean in his eyes; that is, the Inhabitants of Heaven are not clean in his eyes. The Heathen Poet calls thoſe whom he ſuppoſed dwellers in Heaven, by the Name of Heaven; deſcribing a pleaſant River, he calls it, A River pleaſant to Heaven; that is, to thoſe who are in Heaven.

Cæruleus Tibris cælo gratiſſimus amnis. i. e. diis vel cœlicolis. Virg. l. 8.

Others, by Heaven, underſtand the Saints in Heaven, not the Angels; and that alſo upon a two-fold reaſon.

First, Becauſe God is ſaid to dwell in the Saints, they are his habitation; and whereſoever God dwells, he makes a Heaven.

Secondly, Becauſe the Saints, not only thoſe in Heaven, but they on earth, have their converſation in heaven; (Phil. 3. 20.) As carnal and earthly minded men are called Earth, becauſe their hearts and converſations are fixed to the earth; ſo ſpiritual and heavenly-minded men may be called Heaven, becauſe their hearts and converſations are fixed in Heaven.

Sancti in quibus tanquam in cœlis habitare dicitur Deus, cœli dicuntur, quæ allegoria frequentiſſima eſt inter antiquos patres. Pined.

Thirdly, We may rather underſtand it in a proper ſenſe; the heavens, that is, The heavenly bodies are not clear in thy ſight; the heavens are the moſt excellent, and pureſt part of the Creation: And therefore this interpretation, or rather plain conſtruction of the words, ſuits the ſcope of Eliphaz fully, who, as he ſpake before of the Angels, who are the pureſt of all rational creatures; ſo here of the heavens, which are the pureſt of all inanimate creatures; yet theſe are not pure in the ſight of God, therefore no man is. The heavens have a kind of uncleanneſs in them: the Moon hath her ſpots, yea, the Moon is but a ſpot, if Philoſophers may be credited, who tell us that all the Stars, (in their ſenſe the Moon is a Star) are but as the ſpots of Heaven. A Star (as they define) being the thicker and groſſer part of its Orb: The Heavens themſelves are ſo fine and liquid, ſo thin and fluid, that they cannot hold the light; therefore the Lord made thoſe Celeſtial bodies, the Sun, Moon, and Stars, more compact and groſs, that ſo they might both receive, and retain the light, as alſo tranſmit and give it out to the World here below. Theſe are ſpots in the heavens; and though they appear as the glory or Beauty-ſpots of Heaven to our ſight, and are ſo indeed, yet theſe are not clean in the ſight of God.

Cœli qui maxime ſunt lucidi ſuas habent maculas, parteſque craſſiores magiſque opacas & materiales, in re igitur perfectiſſima vidit Deus maculas. Pined.

Again, the heavens are furtheſt removed from all earthly dregs and droſs, ſo that they are clean, not only in regard of their nature and conſtitution, but alſo in regard of their ſite and poſition; being placed ſo far from the ſink of the World, the earth, they never received any ſtain or defilement from it; yet theſe heavens are not clean in his ſight. God doth not make that which is clean, not clean, by his ſeeing it; but his ſight is infinitely above all the cleanneſs which he ſees. That may be clean, conſidered ſimply or in it ſelf, which before God, or to the eye of God, is as an unclean thing.

In conſpectu ejus. Aliud eſt purum eſſe ſimpliciter, & aliud purum eſſe coram Deo; ut juſtus, & juſtus coram Deo differunt. Luc. 1. 6. Druſ.

Hence Note: God is ſo clear ſighted, that the cleaneſt creatures are unclean in his ſight.

The very cleanneſs of the creature, is uncleanneſs before him, much more, compared to him. For if one creature may be ſo clean, that another creature which is clean may be ſaid to have no cleanneſs in compariſon of it; then ſurely God is ſo clean, that the cleaneſt creatures have indeed no cleanneſs in compariſon of his. The Stars are very beautiful bodies, and full of light, yet the Sun hath ſo much light, that it darkens all the Stars, and cauſeth them to diſappear, when it appeareth: Now if the Stars have no light in the ſight of the Sun, what light hath the Sun in the ſight of God? he that puts all the perfections that the creature hath into the creature, hath infinitely more perfection in himſelf. Thoſe excellencies which are divided and ſcattered all the Creation over, are not onely contracted and united in God, but unconceivably exceeded by him.

Job having thus laid down the former part of his argument, applies it,

Verſe 16. How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh iniquity like water?

Concerning the Saints, he ſaid onely, God puts no truſt in them, and concerning the Heavens, They are not clean in his ſight: But now that he ſpeaks of man, he doth not ſay, God puts no truſt in him, or he is not clean in his ſight; but he layes load upon him, He is abominable and filthy: and as if that were not enough, he aggravates it with, How much more abominable, &c. If he put no truſt in glorified Saints, in whom yet there is no iniquity, then no marvel, if man be called abominable, who drinketh iniquity like water.

The whole Verſe is a deſcription of mans ſinfulneſs: Firſt, of the ſinfulneſs of his nature, in thoſe words, He is abominable and filthy: Secondly, of the ſinfulneſs of his life, He drinketh iniquity like water.

How much more] Some read, Much leſs: So Maſter Broughton, Much leſs the unclean and loathſome. The Original may bear either (as alſo a third reading, Surely then) without any impeachment to the ſcope of the place, The heavens are not clean in his ſight: Much leſs is abominable and filthy man clean in his ſight. Again, The heavens are not clean in his ſight; how much more abominable and filthy is man in his ſight? We may take it alſo as a direct inference without any compariſon, either from the greater or the leſs. The heavens are not clean in his ſight; ſurely then, man is abominable and filthy.

The word which we tranſlate abominable, notes that which is moſt abhorring to the nature of man; that which is not onely ſo nauſeous that the ſtomach cannot digeſt it, but ſo baſe, that the mind is burdened to think of it; yea, the word imports that which is rejected by all the ſenſes, abominably rejected; that which the eye cannot endure to look upon, that which the ear cannot endure to hear of, that which is a ſtink in the noſtrils, and which the hand will not touch; ſuch an abominable thing the word bears, and ſuch is man; God loaths him, and is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, much more a lump of iniquity; he is as a ſtink in the noſtrils of God, nor will he touch him (for any thing in him) unleſs with a hand of juſtice, to deſtroy him.

Further, ſome explain abominable by that of the Apoſtle (1 Cor. 16. 26.) If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, let him be Anathema, Maranatha: that is, let all abominate, and caſt him out of their ſociety: When the Lord would ſhew the worſt thought that he had of the beſt ſervices of the Jews, he tells them, Incenſe is an abomination to me; and when the Pſalmiſt would convince us how the people of Iſrael had defiled themſelves with their own works, and polluted the Land with blood; he gives it in the word of the Text, Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled againſt his people, inſomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance (Pſal, 106. v. 40.) His Inheritance was ſo abominable to him, that he would not touch it, nor take it into his own hands; but as it follows in the Pſalm, He gave them into the hand of the heathen. Hence Obſerve;

Hoc videtur dictum per antitheſin, propter Sanctorum & cœlorum pulchritudinem, quorum ſpecies, mundicies, lux, ordo, concentus mirabilis, conſpectus multo jucundiſſimus.

Sinful man is loathſome, and abominable unto God. How much more abominable is man?

This is not to be underſtood of ſome particular man, or of ſome ſort of men, who are more vile than others; but take the beſt of men, the moſt accompliſht and compleat in the whole courſe of nature, theſe are abominable; they are deprived of the Image of God, they are ſtampt with the Image of Satan, they are not only unable to do that which is good, but they are totally averſe from it, yea, enemies to it; Is not all this enough to render man abominable in the ſight of God? And ſo abominable is man, that he doth not onely diſpleaſe the eye of God, but the very eyes of thoſe who have received the grace of God. A godly man turns away from the wicked, as the wicked man doth from the godly; (Prov. 29.27.) An unjuſt man is an abomination to the juſt; and he that is upright in his way, is an abomination to the wicked. The diſtaſte is mutual; 'tis called enmity (Gen. 3.15.) here abomination. The wicked man ſaith (as the Devil to Chriſt) What have I to do with thee, thou Son of David? The godly man ſaith, What have I to do with thee, thou ſon of Belial? 'Tis the ſin of the wicked man to abhor the righteous, for he abhors him for his righteouſneſs: 'Tis the duty of a godly man to abhor the wicked, and he abhors him only for his wickedneſs. To do ſo is a piece of his character, Who ſhall dwell in the mountain of God? He is a man, in whoſe eye a vile (that is, a wicked) perſon is abhorred, Pſal. 15.4. Much leſs can he look pleaſedly or pleaſantly upon a wicked man; his heart riſeth againſt him, not out of pride, or high thoughts of himſelf, or from the lowneſs of his condition, if he be poor, but from the odiouſneſs of his diſpoſition, and his oppoſition to goodneſs. Such a man is vile in his eſteem, how honourable ſoever he is in the eye of the world.

Again (which ſhews yet further, that a man in nature is abominable) when any man repents and turns to the Lord, he is an abomination to himſelf; he is abominable to God, and good men, before he repents; and upon the ſame account, he is abominable to himſelf when he repents. For as God and good men before, ſo he then ſees his own vileneſs and deformity, then he ſmells the filthineſs of his own corrupt heart: This the Prophet aſſures us (Ezek. 36.31.) where the Lord promiſeth to pour out the ſpirit of repentance upon his people, To take away the heart of ſtone, and give them a heart of fleſh: and then, They ſhall loath themſelves for all their abominations, as not being able to endure the ſtench of their own corruptions: When Job at the ſight of God, ſaw himſelf more clearly, then he cries out, Wherefore I abhor my ſelf, and repent in duſt and aſhes: If a good man, ſeeing himſelf, is an abomination to himſelf, how much more is ſinful man abominable in the ſight of God?

And (which aggravates the point to the higheſt) Not only is a man repenting abominable to himſelf, but even a wicked man, upon a clear diſcovery of himſelf to himſelf, becomes an abomination to himſelf, though he be far from repentance. That's the reaſon why a wicked man cannot abide to ſearch his own heart, or return into his own boſome. (Iſa. 46.8.) Remember this, ſhew your ſelves men, bring it again to mind; The Hebrew is, Bring it to your hearts: They who love their ſin, love not to look to their ſinful hearts: they dare not turn their eye inward or upward: not upward, becauſe there is ſo much holineſs in God: not inward, becauſe there is ſo much filthineſs in themſelves. Hence the Lord threatens, (Na. 3.5, 6,) becauſe they would not look on their own filthineſs, that he would ſhew their filthineſs to all the World, He would ſhew the Nations their Nakedneſs, and the Kingdomes their ſhame: And howſoever a natural man hides his abomination from his eye now, or will not ſee it, yet all ſhall be laid open to him in the day of Judgment, which will be as a day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God: So a day of the revelation of the unrighteouſneſs of man: And then he ſhall (though too late) abhor himſelf for ever. There hath been a diſpute whether the ſins of Believers ſhall be opened at that day, but there is no queſtion but the ſins of unbelievers ſhall, and that not onely to ſhame them, but to puniſh and torment them; yea, poſſibly, the ſight of ſin will be a greater torment to them then all their other torments, and to be led about (as the Prophet was in reference to others) from one unclean room of their hearts to another, there to behold all the abominations of their hearts, will be the very pit of Hell. O how abominable and, as it follows in the Text, Filthy is man.] The word is derived from a root that ſignifies corrupt, rotten, putrified, the ſcum of a Pot, the ruſt of metals, the dung, or excrement of man and beaſts; there are not words filthy enough to expreſs the filthineſs of man. The word is found but three times (as ſome obſerve) in the Scripture in this conſtruction, and in all of them it is applyed to ſhew the abominable wickedneſs of man; the firſt place is this of Job; it is found alſo, Pſal. 14.3. Pſal. 53.3. Which Pſalms are moſt pregnant deſcriptions of the corrupt ſtate of man; as if this were a word pickt out on purpoſe, as a glaſs to ſhew man his face and natural complexion in.

There is a ſecond tranſlation of the word which gives more light to this, How much more abominable and unprofitable is man? One word ſignifies filthy and unprofitable, becauſe that which is corrupt and filthy, is alſo unprofitable, and unfit for uſe. It is an extream debaſement unto man, that he is unprofitable, ſo filthy that he is good for nothing: The Apoſtle puts theſe together, (Tit. 1.16.) Abominable, diſobedient, and unto every good work reprobate; that is, unfit for every good work: We may ſay of man (in this ſence) as the Prophet (Ezek. 15.3.) doth of the Vine, Son of man, what is the Vine-tree more then another tree? Excellent to yield Wine: But in the third Verſe we have another anſwer, Shall wood be taken thereof to do any work, or will men make a pin of it to hang any veſſel thereon? Will you build a houſe of Vine Timber, or will you ſo much as make a Pin of it? The Vine is not fit to make a Pin of; thus we may ſay of a carnal man, he is unprofitable; will the Lord uſe him in any work? No, he is reprobate to every good work: Will he ſerve the Lords turn, ſo much as to make a Pin of? That is, Is he profitable for the leaſt ſervice? No, he is not. He is alſo like the Corn growing upon the houſe top, whereof The Reaper filleth not his hand, nor he that binds up the Sheaves his boſom. The reaſon why man appears thus filthy, is, becauſe he deals ſo much with filth; and he is thus unfit to do any good, becauſe he is continually doing evil, as it follows in the laſt clauſe of this Verſe.

Inutilis. Fulg. Quæ putrida ſunt inutilia ſunt.

Qui ſibi nequam eſt, cui uſui bonus eſt?

Which drinketh iniquity like water.] Will you know what declares man abominable and filthy in the ſight of God? It is not his poverty, his ſickneſs, his rags, or any external defilement, nothing but ſin makes him ſo: He drinks in iniquity like water; this makes him as filthy as the dirt and mire he treads upon, or as the vomit and dung which he caſteth out.

Hence Note in general.

Sin, and ſin only, makes man abominable and filthy in the ſight of God.

Nothing can defile the ſoul but ſin; though a man be cloathed with filthy garments, though his skin be over-run with filthy ſores, though he lye in a ſtinking Channel, yet the Lord will not ſay, he is abominable, or filthy, in theſe reſpects; for even in ſuch a ſtate, or at ſuch a time, Chriſt may have taken him in his arms, and kiſſed him with the kiſſes of his lips. But though he go cloathed in Scarlet, though he lye in a bed of Ivory, and is perfumed with all the Spices of Arabia, yet ſin makes him filthy and abominable in the eye of the Lord.

Secondly Obſerve, The multiplied acts of ſin are an evidence that man is habitually ſinful, or that he is abominable and filty.

He that doth righteouſneſs is righteous; and he that doth unrighteouſneſs is unrighteous. If man were not filthy, he could not drink iniquity; that is, feed upon, and delight in ſin, which is but filthineſs.

This expreſſion of mans ſinfulneſs is further conſiderable; he doth not only commit iniquity, but he drinks iniquity; and he doth not ſip at it, but he drinks it like water. Elihu ſpeaks thus (Job 34.7.) What man is like Job, who drinketh up ſcorning like water; And ſo doth Solomon (Prov. 26.6.) He that ſends a meſſage by the hand of a fool, cutteth off the feet, and drinketh dammage; that is, he ſhall have dammage enough, a full draught of it, his belly full of it, by ſending ſuch an empty-headed meſſenger upon his errand. So to drink iniquity, and to drink it like water, is to do abundance of iniquity. I ſhall give ſeven Obſervations, which will diſcover the intendment of this man ner of ſpeaking, and draw out the meaning of He drinks iniquity like water.

Firſt thus, Man naturally hath a ſtrong appetite or deſire to ſin.

Mans natural deſire is to nothing elſe but ſin. Drinking implyes appetite; a man doth not drink (ordinarily) till he is thirſty: And though Drunkards have ſometimes no thirſt, yet they have alwayes a ſtrong deſire to drink. Sinful man is athirſt for, and deſires the drafts of ſin (Epheſ. 4. 19.) He commits iniquity with greedineſs; which is a Metaphor taken from eating and drinking: And becauſe man hath not a greater deſire after any thing then to drink, therefore it is grown to a Proverb among us, when we would ſhew our willingneſs to do a thing, we ſay, We will do it as willingly, as to drink when we are athirſt. Such is the bent of man to ſin, that he hath no more reluctance to commit it, then the thirſty man hath to drink: He thirſteth after it as vehemently, as David did after God (Pſal. 42. 2.) My ſoul thirſteth for God, for the living God; as the Hart panteth after the water brooks, ſo panteth my ſoul after thee, O God. Or again, the heart of man thirſteth after the waters of iniquity, as David thirſted after the waters of the Well of Bethlem; Who will give me to drink of the waters of the Well of Bethlem? At which word, ſome of his mighty men brake through the whole Hoſt of the Enemy, to fetch that water. When man thirſts for this water of iniquity, his own heart, or hand, will break through all oppoſitions, through Law, through Conſcience, through Counſel, through an Hoſt of threatnings armed againſt him, through judgment inflicted on him, he will break through all theſe, that he may have a draught of his beloved inityquity-water.

Secondly, To drink, notes a ſtrong deſire, ſo pleaſure and content; and where there is a great deal of deſire, there is alſo much content, and pleaſure in drinking.

Hence Obſerve, That it is a very pleaſant thing to a carnal man to ſin, he drinks iniquity, not only like water, but in this ſence, like the ſweeteſt wine; a draught of ſin is the only merry-go-down to a carnal man.

A Drunkard likes his drink well, but he likes his drunkenneſs better: His liquor is ſweet to him, but O how ſweet is the ſatisfying of his luſt! When he hath his deſire he is pleaſed; when he is fruſtrated of his deſire he is ſullen, and like Ahab, when he could not obtain Naboth's Vineyard, he is diſpleaſed, and refuſes, (as he did) to eat bread, becauſe he cannot have this water of iniquity to drink.

Thirdly, Conſider the eaſineſs of it, to drink is no hard labour; hence we ſpeak proverbially, I can do ſuch a thing as eaſily as I can drink; there are no bones in drink: Good liquor (we ſay alſo) needs no chewing: Beſides, it is eaſie to drink, becauſe it is natural to drink; Children have no Tutors to teach them to drink. Again, to drink water is eaſie, becauſe we may get it eaſily; water is not kept under Lock and Key, but in the common Storehouſes or Cellars of Nature.

Hence Note, A natural man ſins with eaſe.

It is no pain to him to ſin: Sin is not eaſie in the effects, ſo it leaves us in Little-eaſe, pain and ſorrow enough are the fruits of it; but it is eaſie in the act of it; it is to a wicked heart, as eaſie as to drink water, which is every way eaſie.

q. d. Facillime laxatis conſcientiæ habenis in omnia omnis gineris ſcelera ſe dat præcipitem. Bold.

For firſt, Sin is a common thing, every where to be had; ſin may be found (like water) in every Ditch; ſin alſo is like thoſe waters which flow naturally, you need not pump for it, or fetch it up with Buckets.

Secondly, No man needs be taught to ſin, Children learn that leſſon (and till the Spirit of God teach them, they cannot unlearn it) without a School-maſter.

Thirdly, Moſt ſins in the act of them, have little labour or difficulty in them (Pſal. 50. 20.) Thou ſatteſt and ſpakeſt againſt thy Mothers Son. A man may both ſpeak and do evil, while he ſits ſtill and doth nothing; an idle poſture may ſerve the turn for ſuch work as that.

Quaſi per incuriam & otium, quaſi nihil agens.

Fourthly, Water is but ſmall drink; water hath little pleaſure in it, and leſs ſtrength in it. And therefore when Chriſt would ſhew that the loweſt curteſie or charity done to one of his, ſhall be highly eſteemed by him, he ſaith, Whoſoever ſhall give to drink unto one of theſe little ones, a cup of cold water only, in the name of a Diſciple, he ſhall not looſe his reward, Matth. 10. 42.

Hence Obſerve, Man will ſin upon very eaſie terms, and ſmalleſt conſiderations.

Though there be little got by it, though he get but a draught of water by it; though his ſin bring him in ſcarce any thing of advantage, yet ſin he will; the act of ſinning pleaſeth ſome, more then the conſequence or gain of ſin. The care not much whether it is water or wine which they drink, ſo it be iniquity which they drink. As the Saints, in a height of holineſs, will do good, though they do themſelves little good, or get no outward advantage by it: They reſolve to do good for good ſake; the duty abſtractly conſidered, or the act it ſelf, is the thing that pleaſeth them; ſo to a natural man, the very committing of ſin ſatisfieth him more then the outward income or revenue of his ſin: He doth evil for evil ſake, and ſerves his luſt for love, not for wages.

Eo improbitatis evadit impius, ut vel ſolo peccati & impietatis nomine, nulla præterea mercede propoſita, peccato inſerviat.

Fifthly, Drinking is a frequent act; a temperate man drinks every day, and often every day; healthy men eat often, and moſt men drink oftener then they eat: So that to drink iniquity hints alſo the frequency of committing iniquity.

Hence Obſerve, A carnal heart ſins often.

He ſins, and ſins, he cannot but ſin, it is a continual, yea, a continued act; he hath never done; he is like the Drunkard that muſt alwayes be tipling. Or like the covetous man, who is alwayes having, and the more he hath, the more he deſires to have: Covetouſneſs is a dry drunkenneſs; and drunkenneſs is a wet covetouſneſs; both return often upon the ſame acts; and ſo doth every ſinner naturally. He cannot ceaſe from ſin, as the Apoſtle Peter ſpeaks, Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil, and that continually. The cup of iniquity is never from his mouth.

Inveteratū ac inſeparabilem peccandi habitum & conſuetudinem denotat.

Sixthly, To drink iniquity like water, notes not only the frequency of ſinning, but the abundance of ſinning; they take great draughts of ſin, who drink iniquity like water: Such as are accuſtomed to drink water (in many places it is the common drink) ſuch, I ſay, drink more then men uſually do of wine, or ſtrong drink: Firſt, Becauſe wine and artificial liquors are coſtly; but you may drink water good cheap, and none will grutch you. Secondly, Water is not ſtrong nor vaporous, it doth not burden the brain like your heady liquors. Now though iniquity be ſomewhat unlike water in both theſe reſpects (for to ſome their ſins are coſtly enough at preſent, and they will coſt all very dear (except they repent of them before) at the day of reckoning; ſin alſo flyes up into the brain, and doth as much beſot, as defile the ſoul. Now, I ſay, though ſin be thus unlike water) yet the natural man drinks it like water, he takes in and ſends out abundance of it; what cares he what it coſts him, or how it beſots him, neither the preſent diſtemperings of it, nor the after reckonings for it, trouble him.

Seventhly, Eating and drinking are the ſupport of nature, by theſe the body is maintained in life: Now as the body of Nature is maintained by eating and drinking, ſo the body and life of ſin, the corrupt ſtate and ſtrength of man are maintained by the continual actings of ſin: The old Adam is nouriſhed by theſe waters of iniquity. We ſay in nature, we are nouriſhed by that of which we are made; that which is the matter of our conſtitution, is the matter of our nutrition; ſo in this caſe, a man in nature is compoſed or conſtituted of ſin; and a natural man is nouriſhed, and preſerved by ſinning. Continual acts increaſe the habit; and as a godly man is nouriſhed by holy acts, and ſtrengthened in ſpirit by ſpiritual obedience; doing the will of God is the food of the ſoul. As Chriſt ſpeaks (John 4. 21.) ſo doth every true Chriſtian in his degree, It is my meat and drink to do the will of my Father which is in Heaven; or as Job profeſſeth of himſelf (Chap. 23. 12.) I eſteem the words of thy mouth more then my neceſſary food: Thus alſo the old man ſaith, It is my meat and drink to do the will of the fleſh, and that is indeed the will of his Father which is in Hell. The words of his mouth, his his Counſels and Laws I eſteem more then my neceſſary food.

So much for the opening and illuſtration of this Scripture phraſe, Drinking iniquity like water. I ſhall propound one Querie in general, concerning the whole Verſe, and ſo conclude it. Here is a full deſcription of ſinful man: But whether Eliphaz ſpeaks this ſtrictly of a perſon unregenerate, and ſo applyeth it to Job, or whether this deſcription be not alſo applicable to a man who is regenerate and godly for the main, and was ſo intended by Eliphaz, is here a queſtion.

Some conceive that the words will ſuit none but an unregenerate man; and 'tis granted upon all hands, that they are moſt ſutable to him. An unregenerate man is abominable and filthy, he drinks iniquity like water: And yet in a qualified ſence, we may ſay all this of a man regenerate: Even He, in reference to the remains of corruption, is abominable and filthy; and He, under ſome diſtempers and temptations, drinks iniquity like water: Which words of Eliphaz, a modern Interpreter parallels with thoſe of Paul concerning himſelf (Rom. 7. 25.) With the fleſh I ſerve the Law of ſin. And delivers his opinion in this caſe, That though Eliphaz aimed at Job in all this, yet he deals with him not as with a wicked man, but as with an erring brother. For whereas he had ſaid (Chap. 13. 23.) How many are mine iniquities? Eliphaz might judge by his words, that ſurely he thought his iniquities were not very many: And whereas he had ſaid at the twenty ſixth Verſe of rhe ſame Chapter, Thou makeſt me to poſſeſs the iniquities of my youth: Eliphaz might collect, ſurely this man thinks his elder years have been ſo free from ſin, that God can find nothing in them, which might juſtifie him in theſe ſevere puniſhments. Now Eliphaz oppoſeth theſe apprehenſions, and would both teach and convince him, that as original ſin pollutes every man wholly, till he is waſhed and born again by the Spirit; ſo no man is ſo far waſhed by the Spirit, but that many ſpots and pollutions of the fleſh, do ſtill cleave to him, and often appear upon him. And Eliphaz may be conceived to handle Job in this manner,

Agit Eliphaz cum Jobo, non ut improbo, ſed ut erran-te. Coc.

Firſt, To ſhew him, that though a man be in a ſtate of regeneration, yet he can deſerve nothing at the hand of God, becauſe his holineſs is ſtill imperfect, and his corruptions are abominable.

Secondly, That the greateſt ſufferings and afflictions of good men in this life, are very conſiſtent with the Juſtice of God,

Thirdly, That he might humble Job, who (as he feared) was ſtill too high in his own opinion, and thought better of himſelf then did become him.

Fourthly, To provoke him to reſiſt his own corruptions ſtedfaſtly.

And laſtly, To bear the croſs (which the Lord had laid upon him for his good, eſpecially for the taming and ſubduing of his corruptions) patiently.

So that Eliphaz doth not diſpute with him upon this Hypotheſis, or ſuppoſition, or not upon this only, That man by Nature, and without the Grace of God, is filthy and abominable, drinking iniquity like water; but upon this, or this in conſort with the former, That man in a ſtate of Grace, or a godly man, is filthy and abominable, in reference to the fleſh that dwelleth in him, and that in reference to his frequent ſinnings, he may he ſaid to drink iniquity like water.: And therefore Job had no reaſon to be proud, how good ſoever he was, or how much good ſoever he had done; and that there was all the reaſon in the world he ſhould be patient, and take it well at the hand of God, how much evil ſoever he ſhould ſuffer.

This reſolution of the Querie, as it is profitable, ſo probable. For howſoever Job's Friends had branded him in divers paſſages of this diſpute, as a wicked man and an hypocrite, and were ſo underſtood by Job, as appears in his anſwers and replyes; yet 'tis moſt likely his Friends ſpake ſo in reference to his actions, not in reference to his ſtate. That he had done like an Hypocrite, or a wicked man, was clearly their opinion; but there is no neceſſity to conclude from what they ſaid, that they judged him abſolutely to be one.

VERS. 17, 18, 19, 20.

I will ſhew thee, hear me, and that which I have ſeen, I will declare.

Which wiſe men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it.

Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no ſtranger paſſed among them.

The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes, and the number of years is hidden to the oppreſſor.

E*Eiphaz* having argued againſt Job's ſuppoſed opinion, of ſelf-cleanneſs, and perſonal righteouſneſs, proceeds to the confirmation of his own Poſition, to which he leads us, by a new Exordium, or Preface, in the ſeventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth Verſes of this Chapter: Secondly, He largely handles and illuſtrates it from Verſe 20. to Verſe 31. Thirdly, He applyeth the whole Doctrine to Job by way of dehortation, at Verſe 31. and ſo forward to the end of the Chapter.

The general Argument which he brings to confirm his Tenet, may be thus formed up;

That is true which continued experience, and the conſent of wiſe men in all Ages have taught and delivered to us:

But the experience, and conſent of wiſe men in all Ages, have taught and delivered this, that a wicked man travels with pain all his dayes, that he is puniſhed outwardly by want and ſickneſs, and inwardly by the gripes and ſcourges of his own conſcience.

Therefore this is a truth.

The major Propoſition is the ſum of the Preface contained in the ſeventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth Verſes: The minor, or ſecond Propoſition, is held forth in the twentieth Verſe, and is proſecuted to the one and thirtieth.

I will ſhew thee, hear thou me. and that which I have ſeen I will declare.

So the Preface begins: He layes down a double proof in this Preface; a proof firſt from his own experience, ſecondly from the conſent of others. From his own experience, in this Verſe, I will ſhew thee, hear thou me, that which I have ſeen I will declare; The conſent of others is expreſſed in the eighteenth and nineteenth verſes, Which wiſe men have told me from their Fathers.

I will ſhew thee, hear thou me.] As if he had ſaid, Thou art out of the way, thou art in the dark, and therefore in charity, I will lend thee a thread of true Doctrine, to lead thee out of that labyrinth of error, wherein I ſee thou art intangled; I will ſhew thee, and all that I deſire of thee as a reward of my pains, is but this, Hear thou me, be attentive, or (as the Chalde Paraphraſt renders) receive it, take it of me; he that ſpeaks truths deſerves to be heard, and that is all I deſire.

Cæcutienti tibi & in maximis tenebris verſanti, veriſſimæ doctrinæ lumen præferam. Accipe à me. Targ.

I will ſhew thee, hear thou me.] But what will Eliphaz ſhew him? Not that which he had fancied, but that which he was aſſured of.

That which I have ſeen I will declare.] Seeing is a ſure and particular ſenſe; yet as the act of one ſenſe is often put for the act of another; ſo Seeing, which is the moſt noble of the Senſes, is often put for all. That which I have ſeen; is, that which I have learned, that which I have fetched in, or collected by the help of all my ſenſes; yea, by my reaſon and underſtanding, That do I here declare unto thee.

More ſtrictly, Seeing may be taken two wayes: Firſt, As noting experience; I have not only heard ſome reports about theſe things, but I have ſeen, and obſerved them my ſelf; there is a ſtronger conviction in this, becauſe the ſenſe of ſeeing is leſs fallible then that of hearing; and we ſay, One eye witneſs is better then ten ear witneſſes. Secondly, As I have ſeen, may be taken for common experiences among men; ſo for ſpecial revelation from God. Some Divine revelations were made in viſions; and all Divine revelations were ſo clear and evident, that they were or might be called Viſions, as if the matter of them had been repreſented to the eye; and hence ſuch as God honoured and truſted with thoſe Revelations were called Certius eſt, vidi, quam audivi, oculatus teſtis potior eſt aurito. Druſ.

Seers (1 Sam. 9.9.) He that is now called a Prophet was before time called a Seer: And he was called a Seer, becauſe the clearneſs of thoſe meſſages and manifeſtations was ſo great, that they might be judged as objects of the eye, rather then of the ear, or of the underſtanding. Thus the whole Book of the Propheſie of Iſaiah is called, A Viſion, or a thing ſeen; The Viſion of Iſaiah the Prophet, which he ſaw concerning Judah and Jeruſalem, (Chap. 1. 1.) Yet the Prophet did not receive all the Doctrines which he preached, and Propheſies which he publiſhed in that Book, by viſion; but the manifeſtation from God, was ſo full of light to his underſtanding, that it was as if he had ſeen it with his eye. Some expound ſo here, That which I have ſeen; that is, that which I have had a ſpecial revelation about. As if he referr'd to the fourth Chapter, where Eliphaz reports to Job what a dreadful Viſion he had, and what the matter of it was, even much like that which is repreſented in the following part of this Chapter. A learned Interpreter agrees, that it was a Viſion; but, ſaith he, it was either a fained artificial Viſion (ſuch are frequent in Popery) or it was a deluſion of the Devil. I do not at all admit this latter branch of his opinion; but I muſt reject the former, as altogether unworthy of Eliphaz, who was ſurely a man of integrity, and fearing God, and was therefore above ſuch affected falſhoods, and ſtudied deceits, to gain reſpect and credit among men.

Mihi non videtur improbabile aut deluſum fuiſſe à diabolo, vel ipſum ſomnium aliquod aut inſpirationē commentum eſſe, ut ſibi conciliaret authoritatē. Sanct.

I ſhall therefore inſiſt upon the former ſence, That which I have ſeen, that is, by common experience, that will I declare unto thee.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, What we declare, or communicate to others, we ſhould be well aſſured of our ſelves.

That which I have ſeen declare I unto thee: while we declare, either by way of inſtruction, to teach true Doctrine, or by way of information, to report the truth of action, 'tis our duty to declare upon knowledge. So the Apoſtle John, in his firſt Epiſtle, Chap. 1. 1. That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have ſeen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life, that which we have ſeen and heard, declare we unto you: He brings in the operations of three Senſes, Seeing, Hearing, and Feeling, as witneſſes to avouch for, and aſcertain that which he had declared; we muſt take heed of declaring upon ſurmiſes, and probabilities, upon a bare hear-ſay, or I thought ſo: That which we have clearly learned, we may teach confidently, and nothing beſides that.

Obſerve Secondly, As we muſt have a ground for what we declare to others, ſo when we have a good ground we muſt declare.

That which we know we ſhould make known; That which I have ſeen I declare unto you; holy knowledge muſt be communicated, ſuch light muſt not be put under a buſhel, nor muſt ſuch a Talent be wrapt up in a Napkin: He that is taught ſhould teach. When thou art converted (ſaith Chriſt to Peter) ſtrengthen thy Brethren: Let others partake of thy experiences. Come (ſaith David) and I will tell you what God hath done for my ſoul: Philip (John 1.43.) being found by Chriſt, finds Nathanael, and ſaith unto him, We have found him of whom Moſes, and the Prophets did write, Jeſus of Nazareth, the Son of Joſeph: He quickly declared what he had ſeen, and ſo ſhould we. This is the firſt proof, That which I have ſeen, I declare, experience is my ground.

The ſecond proof, is from the conſent of others, from the authority of the Ancients.

Which wiſe men have told from their Fathers, and have not hid it.

Eliphaz treads the ſame ſteps, as in his firſt diſcourſe with Job. For after he had there delivered the contents or ſum of his Viſion, he appeals to the judgment of the Saints, Chap. 5. So here, having told Job that he would declare what he had ſeen, he refers him alſo to the judgment of others, That which wiſe men have told their Fathers, and have not hid it. I refer you to men, and thoſe not men of a mean rank, but to godly wiſe men; in which Eliphaz ſeems again to anſwer what Job had objected, that the points he had offered were of common and vulgar obſervation (Chap. 12. 3.) Who knows not ſuch things as theſe? Eliphaz replyes, theſe things are no common diſcourſe, they are ſuch as wiſe men have told from their Fathers: As if he had ſaid, Do not deſpiſe what I ſay, as ordinary, or as a novelty, no, nor as received from corrupt antiquity, for beſides what I have ſeen, I have good authority for what I ſpeak; the ancient and the wiſe vote with me; Wiſe men have told it from their Fathers, here is the conveyance.

Wiſe men.] He doth not mean worldly wiſe men, Philoſophers and Polititians; but godly wiſe men, theſe have told it from their Fathers; their Fathers told it them, and they told it me; ſo that this poſition claims by two deſcents at leaſt. One of the Rabbins gives it three, if not more: for by the Fathers of the wiſe men he underſtands, not their immediate Fathers only, but thoſe who were more remote and further off; yea, poſſibly thoſe who were furtheſt off, even as far as Adam.

Rambam ſubtilius à patribus ſuis exponit, à patribus eorum. Vt hic tres ætates conſiderentur una ſapientum hæc indicantiū, altera patrum, tertia majorum & atavorum. Merc.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, It is an ingenuity to acknowledge by whom we profit.

Wiſe men have told me this, I received it from others, as well as collected it by my own experience.

Secondly Note, Truth ſhould be conveyed down to our Poſterity.

Truth is a more precious inheritance then Land or Money; if Parents are careful to ſecure (as much as they can) earthly things to their Children, how much more ſhould they be careful to ſecure heavenly? In the firſt Ages of the World, till the Law was given on Mount Sinai, faithful men were in ſtead of Books, and Tradition ſupplied the want of Scripture: But now, our recourſe muſt be to what God hath commanded to be written, not to what men have ſaid. No Tradition is of any force, but as conſentient with Scripture, and none of ſo much force as Scripture. The Council of Trent, in the fifth Seſſion, thunders out Anathemaes againſt thoſe who receive not Tradition with the ſame godly affection, and devotion, with which they receive the Scripture it ſelf; Bellarmine in his controverſie about Tradition, entitles his Book thus, Of the Word of God not written; as if the Word of God were to be divided into theſe two orders, The Word written, and the Word not written: Tradition with him is the Unwritten word, and muſt be held of as much authority as the Word written; This is (as Chriſt taxeth the Phariſees) To make the Word of God of none effect, through mans Tradition: It is ſtill a wiſe mans duty to tell Poſterity what the Word and Truth of God is; but we muſt not receive any thing, as a truth of God, upon the bare Word of the wiſeſt men. Wiſe men have told their Fathers,

And have not hid it.] There is a twofold hiding: Firſt, a hiding to keep a thing ſafe, that we looſe it not: Secondly, A hiding, that we keep it cloſe, and not communicate it: In the former ſence, we muſt hide the truth of God, but we may not in the latter. When David ſaith, I have hid thy Commandments in my heart; when Mary hid the ſayings of Chriſt in her heart; and when the man that found the treaſure (Matth. 13.44.) Went away and hid it, and for joy thereof ſold all he had, and bought the field: All theſe hid it, that it might be forth coming for their own uſe, they did not hide it, as unwilling to bring it forth, for the uſe of others; ſo the idle Servant hid his Talent, and was juſtly condemned for hiding it, Matth. 25.

Truth is a common good, no man hath the ſole property of it; every one may challenge his part of this poſſeſſion; and the more we part with it to others, the more we increaſe our own poſſeſſion. Truth multiplyes in its degree to us, while we make diviſion of it to thouſands. A Candle gives not the leſs light to the owner, becauſe many ſtanders by ſee by it; and this Candle gives a clearer light to us when we let many ſee by it: Our knowledge is perfected while it is communicated. This Candle therefore is not to be put under a buſhel, but muſt be ſet upon a Candleſtick, that all may ſee by the light of it. Shall I (ſaith the Lord, Gen. 18.) hide from Abraham the thing that I am about to do? No, I will not, For I know Abraham will not hide it: He will command his Children and his Houſhold after him, and they ſhall keep the way of the Lord. The Iſraelites were charged to communicate the wonders which God wrought for them, and the Ordinances which he appointed them, when they were delivered out of Egypt, Exod. 12.

I will open my mouth in a Parable (ſaith the Pſalmiſt) I will utter dark ſayings of old, which we have heard and known: And our Fathers have told us, we will not hide them from their Children, ſhewing to the Generations to come, the praiſes of the Lord, and his ſtrength, and the wonderful works which he hath done (Pſal. 78. 2, 3, 4.) 'Tis our duty to preſerve memorials of the works of God, and to declare his word to all that are about us. What wiſe men know from their Fathers, they will not hide.

Eliphaz yet goes on to deſcribe the men whoſe conſent in opinion he had received about the controverſie in hand.

Verſ. 19. To whom alone the earth was given, and no ſtranger paſſed among them.

If any man ask who were theſe wiſe men? He anſwers, They were wiſe men,

To whom alone the earth was given.] In theſe words Eliphaz ſeems to remove a prejudice that might lie in Job's Spirit againſt the teſtimony of thoſe Ancients: For ſuppoſe they were wiſe men, yet he might ſay, 'tis like they were but mean men, men of no rank or quality, men of ſmall credit or authority, and (we know what Solomon ſaith, Eccleſ. 9. 16.) A poor mans wiſdom is deſpiſed, and his words not heard: Therefore ſaith Eliphaz, you ſhall not put me off thus, nor diſable my witneſſes upon a ſuppoſition, that theſe wiſe men were mean men, for theſe were Chiefs and Princes in their Generation; And he advanceth their honour two wayes; Firſt, in regard of their riches and power, To whom alone the earth was given: Secondly, in regard of their righteous and juſt adminiſtrations, No ſtranger, or ſtrange thing paſſed among them; as if he had ſaid, Job, I ſpeak of men that were fit to ſit at the helm of a Kingdom, and govern Nations, yea, to have the reins of the World put into their hands; I ſpeak of wiſe men who by their wiſdom, and the bleſſing of God, have kept the earth quiet, and ſo have poſſeſſed it alone.

Aſſertur hoc ad amplificandum authoritatem horũ ſapientum, q. d. hi tales & tãti fuerunt ut, &c. Merc.

But it may yet be ſaid, who were theſe Monarchs of the world, and ſole poſſeſſors of the Earth? To whom alone the earth was given: Some conceive that Eliphaz means it of Noah and his Sons, who indeed had the World to themſelves; for the Flood having ſwept away all mankind, except that Family, to him and his Sons the earth was given alone; theſe were the wiſe men (ſaith this opinion) from whom Eliphaz received the Doctrine which he communicated to, and preſſed upon Job; there was never ſuch a Monarch (except Adam the firſt man) as Noah was, he had the whole World given him: Hence the Ancients ſtile Noahs three Sons, The Commanders and Colonels of the whole World: But I conceive, we need not determine it upon thoſe, though poſſibly Eliphaz might have an aim at them. Moſt interpreters take it in general, of the old good Princes, of whom it may be ſaid, The earth was given to them alone; Abraham was a great Prince, and to him, The earth (in one ſenſe) was given alone. But who made this great deed of gift, even the moſt high God, whom Abraham calls (Gen. 14.) The poſſeſſor of Heaven, and Earth: He it is that then gave, and ſtill gives the earth, and he gives it two wayes; firſt, by an act of common providence, thus (as Job expreſſeth it, Chap. 9. 24.) The earth is given into the hand of the wicked: Secondly, he gives the earth by an act of ſpecial providence, or by vertue of a promiſe, ſo Canaan was given to Abraham and his ſeed, the people of Iſrael; and thus the Kingdom of Iſrael and Judah, was given to David and his ſeed.

Iſta phraſi circumloquitur mihi patiarcham Noe cũ tribus ejus filiis. Bold. Methodius aliiq; patres antiqui vocant Noe tres filios Mundi chiliarchos.

When it is ſaid here, that the earth was given to ſuch alone, the meaning is not that none had any of the earth given them but they, but none had the earth given them as they, by peculiar promiſe, and ſpecial providence. Further, the giving of the earth may be conſidered, either as the giving that which is good, or as the giving it for good; as a gift of bounty, or as a gift of mercy; in the latter conſiderations, the earth is given to good men alone: None have it for good but they who are good, and they only make a good uſe of it. Hence Obſerve,

Sapientibus ſolis terra data eſſe dicitur, quia bonorũ terrenorum ipſi ſunt domini, utentes iis ad ſuum bonũ. Aquin. in loc.

> That the earth, or earthly things, are diſpoſed to the Sons of men, by a deed of gift from God:
> Secondly, Wiſe, holy men, receive the earth and the things of the earth, by ſpecial gift.

Theſe alone receive the earth from a Fathers hand and good will; it comes to them in the Covenant of grace, to which the promiſe of the earth belongs, as well as of Heaven, Godlineſs hath the promiſe of this life, and of that which is to come; Saints have the earth and all earthly things given to them, in reference to their being in Covenant with God; and thus the earth is given to them alone.

Again, we may expound that term Alone, by the next clauſe, To whom alone the earth was given; that is, as they had great poſſeſſions in the earth, ſo they had thoſe poſſeſſions to themſelves without any to trouble, vex, or moleſt them, which Eliphaz thus expreſſeth:

And no ſtranger paſſed among them.] Some read, No ſtrange thing paſſed among them; Both readings are a deſcription of wiſe and godly Princes, who having the earth given them, No ſtranger, or no ſtrange thing paſſeth among them.

Optimorum principum circumloqutio eſt, quorũ adminiſtratio reſpublicas ſuas tuebatur, omnemque hoſtiũ injuriã propulſabat. Offic.

Strangers are here taken under a double notion: Firſt, no ſtranger, that is no enemy: To clear which notion of the word Stranger, we muſt remember that as the Grecians (conceiting themſelves the beſt bred people in the World) called all other Nations Barbarians; ſo the people of Iſrael, the ſtock of Abraham (being Gods peculiar Covenant-people) called all other Nations aliens, or ſtrangers: and becauſe they were hated and maligned by all other Nations, therefore they called all profeſſed ſtrangers enemies; ſo the word is uſed (Iſa. 1. 7.) Your land ſtrangers ſhall devoure; that is, enemies ſhall invade and prevail over you (Pſal. 144. 7.) Deliver me out of the hand of ſtrange Children, or out of the hand of ſtrangers; that is, out of the hand of mine enemies: The Latine word Alienus, is often put for Hoſtis, & the Roman Orator telleth us, That he who is now called a ſtranger was called an enemy by our Anceſtors. The reaſon was, becauſe ſtrangers proved unkind to, yea turned enemies againſt thoſe that entertained them: As formerly Kings were called Tyrants, but becauſe many Kings oppreſſed their people, therefore now oppreſſing Princes only are called Tyrants. So then, to ſay no ſtranger paſſed among them, is as much as to ſay, no enemy, none to moleſt or afflict, paſſed among them.

Again, the word Stranger is taken for one that is erroneous, or idolatrous; for a man unſound in Doctrine, or ſuperſtitious in Worſhip: Wiſe men to whom alone the earth was given, had no ſuch ſtranger paſſing among them; they were not mixed with idolatrous and uncircumciſed Nations, they did not communicate with them in worſhip, as in after-times the people of Iſrael did.

Satis apparet non de hoſte temporali; ſed de eo qui alterĩ quam veræ religioni addictus eſt, vel qui numina extranea colit. Bold.

This notion of the ſtranger, is an advantage to Eliphaz; as if he had ſaid, The wiſe men whoſe authority I produce in this cauſe, were ſound in judgement, and pure in worſhip, they did not mingle themſelves with Idolaters and Hereticks, they neither learned their works, nor received their Doctrines, and are therefore witneſſes worthy of credit, and againſt whom there lies no juſt exception. No ſtranger paſſed among them.

If we take ſtranger in the firſt ſenſe for an enemy, then the word Paſſed ſignifies as much as invaded, and may well be tranſlated to a military motion: No ſtranger or enemy paſſed; that is, none marched among them, or through their Land, to diſturb, or plunder them; when God is ſaid to give Laws to the Sea, or ſet it bounds which it ſhould not paſs; this imports that the Sea like an enemy would march through the earth, and overwhelm all, unleſs bridled by a Divine decree.

But if we take Stranger in the ſecond ſenſe, for an Idolater, or a man of unſound Principles, then, No ſtranger paſſed among them, is, ſuch were not received, and embraced by them, nor admitted among them.

> From the firſt Obſerve, That it is (as the honour of a people to relieve oppreſſed ſtrangers, ſo) the happyneſs of a people to be freed from the oppreſſion of ſtrangers.
> From the ſecond Obſerve, That it is the happineſs of a people to be free from the mixture of evil men, whether ſuch whoſe worſhip is impure or, Doctrine untrue.

The Lord made frequent promiſes of this happineſs to his people (Iſa. 52. 1.) From henceforth there ſhall no more come into them, the uncircumciſed, and the unclean; which is as much as to ſay, The ſtranger (for all uncircumciſed perſons were ſtrangers) ſhall not come into thee. We have the like promiſe (Joel 3. 17.) So ſhall ye know that I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Sion, my holy Mountain, then ſhall Jeruſalem be holy, and there ſhall no ſtranger paſs through her; Why not any ſtranger? Forget not to entertain ſtrangers, ſaith the Apoſtle (Heb. 13.2.) Jeruſalem in her beſt dayes ſhall have ſtrangers, to be viſited and relieved by her, but Jeruſalem ſhould have no ſtrangers in thoſe dayes to defile and pollute her (Nah. 1. 15.) Behold upon the Mountain the feet of him that bringeth good tydings; for the wicked ſhall no more paſs through thee, for he is cut off: The Hebrew is, Belial ſhall no more paſs through thee. Belial is he that cannot endure to ſerve; he will not yield obedience to the holy commands of God, he caſts off the yoak of Chriſt, and pulls the ſhoulder from his burden. This Belial ſhall no more paſs through thee. The pureſt times of the Goſpel are preſented under a like promiſe (Zach. 14.21.) In that day there ſhall be no more the Cananite in the houſe of the Lord of Hoaſts; That is, the ſtranger and uncircumciſed, the wicked and ungodly, ſhall no more be mixed with his people.

Thirdly, in that he puts ſuch under the notion of ſtrangers, we learn, That wicked and Idolatrous perſons ſhould be as ſtrangers to us; we muſt not lay ſuch in our boſom, to maintain any ſpiritual ſociety with them, though in ſome caſes, we may have civil ſociety with them. (2 Cor. 6. 13, 14.) Be not unequally yoaked together with unbelievers, for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs, and what communion hath light with darkneſs, and what concord hath Chriſt with Belial, &c. Theſe can never agree together: Let no ſuch ſtranger paſs, or be approved among us in the fellowſhip of the Goſpel; there is not only ſin in letting ſuch paſs with our approbation, but danger; and that a double danger. Both which are aſſigned as reaſons why we ſhould come out of Babylon (Revel. 18. 4.)

Firſt, we are in danger of partaking of their ſins, and that both by contracting the ſpot of their ſins, as alſo the guilt of their ſins.

Secondly, we are in danger of partaking of their puniſhments, as it there follows, That ye receive not her plagues. There is no ſafety in being neer thoſe, who are under the curſe of God: The companion of fools ſhall be deſtroyed (Prov. 13. 20.) Though poſſibly he be not a fool in any other reſpect, but becauſe he is in ſuch company.

Fourthly, Taking it for a ſtrange or wicked thing.

Note, That, It is the honour of Magiſtrates, when no evil paſſeth quietly in their Territories.

When neither Idolatry in the things of God, nor injuſtice, nor oppreſſion in the things of men, find any favour with them, this is at once their duty, and their glory.

Eliphaz having by way of preface, given proof of what he was about to preſs upon Job, both from his own experience and the conſent of Antiquity: He now propoſes the point it ſelf.

Verſ. 20. The wicked man travels with pain all his dayes, and the number of years is hidden to the Oppreſſour.

In this general Poſition, Eliphaz intends Jobs perſonal conviction, that he was wicked, whom he had heard appealing to God (Chap. 2. 10.) Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked. As if he had ſaid, Thou wouldeſt make us believe that God will be thy compurgator, and give witneſs for thee upon his own knowledge thou art not wicked: But we who are but men may know the contrary, for we ſee all the marks and brands of a wicked man upon thee: The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes, and ſo doſt thou: Theſe ſnares and ſorrows ſpeak who thou art, though we ſay nothing.

Mr. Broughton reads, The wicked killeth himſelf all his days, he is a ſelf murtherer; that was the report which Eliphaz made of him at the fifth Chapter, Verſ. 2. Envy ſlayeth the ſilly one. Both Job and his Friends repeat the ſame thing often, yet with ſuch variety of illuſtrations, that though for the matter it be the ſame, yet it is new for the manner. Such repetitions do not only delight, but profit.

The wicked man travelleth with pain all his dayes:] Who is a wicked man, hath been opened at large, Chap. 10. 7. where Job affirms, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked; There ſee the temper of a wicked man, I will not ſtay upon it here. Only conſider how his appellation and condition ſuit one with the other, The wicked man travels: the Original word for a wicked man ſignifies an unquiet motion, and ſo one whoſe life is a continual, not only motion, but unquietneſs. Unquiet is the name, and unquietneſs is the ſtate of a wicked man; he is always raiſing ſtirs, and acting Tragedies, His life is always in a hurry, he travels with pain all his dayes.

He travelleth with pain.] This ſentence is but one word in the Hebrew; the word ſignifies any grief, or ſorrow, any torture or torment: The tranſlations are various, but all meet in this one ſenſe, that a wicked mans life is a miſerable life; All the life of a wicked man is ſpent in carking care: So the Septuagint. Another renders, It is ſpent in ſorrow. But all may be reduced to that which is moſt proper to the word: He is in pain as a woman in travail; and whereas we have heard of ſome Women in travail many dayes; here is a man in travel all his dayes.

The wicked man travelleth in pain all his dayes; his whole life is nothing elſe but continual pain, or painful throes towards the birth of ſome filthy Monſter-ſin, which ſin when it is finiſhed, brings forth death: Somewhat he hath conceived, the Pſalmiſt tells us what; He hath conceived miſchief, and he would bring forth iniquity.

The Vulgar Latine tranſlates, The wicked man is lifted up with pride all his dayes; which is as much as to ſay, He travelleth in pain all his dayes; for though as ſome ſay, Pride feels no cold, yet there is nothing feels ſo much pain as pride doth: And becauſe a wicked man is proud all his dayes, therefore he travelleth with pain all his dayes.

Hence Obſerve, The life of a wicked man is a very painful life: or thus, The pain of a wicked mans life is the greateſt pain.

It is like the pain of a Woman in travel; when the holy Ghoſt would ſet forth great pain, he expreſſeth it by the pain of a woman in travel. But what kind of pain is it, with which a wicked man travels? He hath two ſorts of pain.

First, external:
Secondly, internal.

His external pain is of two ſorts:

Firſt, Such as God layes upon him, or caſts him into; for though many are the afflictions of the righteous, from the hand of God, yet the righteous have not all the afflictions, wicked men have ſome: They are not only beaten with ſcourges, but ſmitten with Scorpions; God rains down upon them ſnares, fire and brimſtone, and an horrible tempeſt; this is the portion of many of their cups, even in this life.

Secondly, Such as a wicked man brings upon himſelf; Mr. Broughtons reading aims at theſe pains, The wicked kills himſelf all his dayes. A wicked man is often very active, ſometimes extreamly malitious againſt others, ſo malitious that he murders them; and yet it may truly be ſaid he only kills himſelf all his dayes. The ſelf-love of a wicked man deſtroys him, and his very earneſtneſs to avoid trouble, tumbles him into it: And this is clear, if we conſider either the way which a wicked man takes, or the end which uſually he comes unto; his way is a very ſad way: A godly man is deſcribed (Pſal. 118. 2.) Eating the labour of his hands; that is, the very work which he doth, feeds him; and before he hath any reward for his work, he finds a reward in his work, in which ſenſe, he may well be ſaid, to Eat the labour of his hand: On the other ſide, the labour of a wicked man eats him, the labour of his hand, and the labour of his head, eat him out. The way of ſin is a wearyſome way (Jer. 9. 5.) They weary themſelves to commit iniquity (Ezek. 24. 12.) She hath wearied her ſelf with lies: A Lie is not taken ſtrictly there for an untruth told to deceive others : A lie is any ſin, for every ſin is a Lie. Sin tells us a fair tale, but it will deceive us at laſt.

Again, (Iſa. 47. 13.) Thou haſt wearied thy ſelf, in the multitude of thy counſels. (Iſa. 57. 10.) Thou art wearyed in the greatneſs of thy way. Thoſe counſels were ſinful counſels, and theſe wayes were ſinful wayes, both were a wearineſs, and tired their undertakers. The Lord challenges the Jews (Mic. 6. 3.) To ſhew wherein he had wearied them; O my people what have I done unto thee, and wherein have I wearied thee, teſtifie againſt me. God is very tender in laying burdens upon us, but we are very cruel in overburdening our ſelves.

And whereas the pain of a wicked man is compared to the pain of a Woman in travail; it is not only like it, but exceeds it: For though when her pain comes upon her, ſhe hath ſorrow becauſe her hour is come, yet when ſhe is delivered, ſhe remembreth her anguiſh no more, for joy that a Man is born into the World (John 16. 21.) The Womans pains end in joy, but the pain of a wicked man is ſo far from ending in joy, that it hath no end at all, and therefore he is ſaid to travel in pain all his dayes. A wicked man hath the pain, but not the deliverance of a travailing Woman, a Son ſhall not be born to him. And though he ſometimes ſeems to proſper, and attain his end, yet there is ſomewhat or other, that ſticks ſtill in the birth, and paineth him in the midſt of all his proſperity. The Author of that uſeful Hiſtory, The Travels of the old Patriarcks, Kings, and Prophets, when he comes to write the motions of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was a great King, but of a moſt malitious ſpirit, againſt the people of God, he obſerves that this Antiochus in purſuance of his bloody deſigns, had run more hazards, and taken more tedious journeys to ſatisfie his malice, and reach his ambitious ends, then any of the Saints had done, upon any command or ſervice of God; upon which conſideration, he makes this excellent concluſion, That wicked men take more pains to go to Hell and eternal deſtruction, then godly men do in the way to eternal life, and ſalvation. A wicked man cannot go to Hell with eaſe; he goes with pain to eternal pains. Thoſe wayes of ſin which have moſt pleaſure in them, have much vexation in them. (Prov. 23. 29.) Who hath wo, who hath ſorrow, who hath wounds without cauſe? The anſwer is at hand in the next words, They that tarry long at the Wine, they that go to ſeek the mixt Wine: The Wine is ſweet but it bites like a Serpent, and ſtings like an Adder, Verſ. 32. The voluptuous man drinks larger draughts of ſorrow then he doth of Wine; and while the Adulterer goes to the Harlots houſe, he goes as a fool to the ſtocks, or as an Ox to the ſlaughter (Prov. 7.) As pleaſure is the Epicures God, ſo gain is the covetous mans God, yet to get it, he pierceth himſelf through with many ſorrows, and falls into a ſnare; (1 Tim. 6.) Further, as a ſinful converſation among men, ſo a ſuperſtitious ſervice of the true God, and the ſerving of falſe Gods is full of trouble.

The falſe worſhipper travelleth in pain all his dayes: All falſe worſhip hath a tang of baſeneſs and ſlavery in it; they that worſhip the Devil, in what a wretched ſervitude do they live? In Popery, what vexatious penances do they put upon their blinded Votaries? The Goſpel is noble, and the ſervice of it ingenuous, as well as pure or ſpiritual: Chriſt hath not called us to drudgery, but to liberty. They are moſt free, who ſerve him moſt.

What pain the Jews travelled in when they Apoſtatiz'd from God to Idols, Tophet, and the Valley of Hinnon, where they offered their Children in the fire to Moloch, are abundant witneſſes. Did God put them to ſuch pain in his ſervice? God called them to offer their Beaſts in Sacrifice to him: But they offer their Children in Sacrifice to that abominable Idol. Wicked men live under a hard task-maſter.

Now beſides all theſe outward pains which either are concomitants, or conſequents of wickedneſs: There is an inward pain far worſe then theſe. Inward pain ariſeth ſometimes upon the diſappointment of his hopes. A wicked man is exceedingly pained with labour in the attaining of his end, but he is much more pained with grief, when he cannot attain his end; he hangs between hope and fear, while he is at work (for he that cannot walk by faith to his end, ſhall meet with fears enough before he comes at it) but when his ſenſe tells him that he cannot come at it, he falls into the gulf of deſpair. Beſides this pain of fear that he ſhall not, and that of deſpair, when he cannot compaſs his deſigns or ends, he is often afflicted with a fiercer pain then either of theſe, even with the gripes and gnawings of his own evil conſcience for the evil he hath done. This pain follows ſome wicked men all the dayes of their life; and it ſhall be the portion of all wicked men after death. Eliphaz aims at this in the next Verſe, while he ſaith, A dreadful ſound is in his ears; there I ſhall further inſiſt upon it. We have yet another very conſiderable part of the wicked mans miſery held forth in the cloſe of this Verſe.

And the number of years is hidden to the oppreſſor.

The word which we render, Oppreſſor, ſignifies a man exceeding powerful and terrible, or by his power terrifying others; He that oppreſſeth muſt have power, and ſome deſire power for no other end, but to enable them to oppreſs. Solomon ſpeaks of a poor man that oppreſſeth (Prov. 28. 3.) but he oppreſſeth only thoſe who are leſs powerful then himſelf. A poor man that oppreſſeth the poor, is, &c. One poor man may be as much above another poor man in power, as ſome rich men are above the poor. Equals in power cannot oppreſs.

But who is this Oppreſſor to whom the number of years are hid? The Oppreſſor in this part of the Verſe, is the wicked man in the former part; Eliphaz ſpeaks ſtill of the ſame perſon, though under another name, whom he there called wicked, he calls here an Oppreſſor.

Hence Note, That to oppreſs is a very great wickedneſs;

For an oppreſſor and a wicked man are the ſame man.

Again, in that the word which ſignifies an oppreſſor, ſignifies alſo a mighty man, or a man of great ſtrength.

We may further Note, That men who have much power are apt to abuſe it for the oppreſſion of others.

It is in the power of my hand ſaid Laban to Jacob, to do thee hurt; And Laban had hurt Jacob, if God had not ſtopt him; They that have much power in their hands, need much holineſs in their hearts, that they may uſe it well; much power is a temptation to do much hurt.

Pauci anni reconditi ſunt violento. Jun.

The number of years is hidden to the Oppreſſors.

The number of years,] Say ſome, is an Hebraiſm, for few years, or years that are eaſily numerable; a Child may tell the years of an Oppreſſor, they are ſo few: Hence the words are alſo rendered thus, Few years are laid up for the Oppreſſor. Mr. Broughton tranſlates plainly to the ſenſe, Soon numbred years are ſtored to the Tyrant.

Numerus annorũ, i.e. facile numerabiles.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That wicked Oppreſſors are often ſpeedily cut off by the hand of God.

(Pſal. 55. 23.) Blood-thirſty and deceitful men, ſhall not live out half their dayes; If God ſhould lengthen out the lives of men ſet upon miſchief, who could live? 'Tis a comfort for us, as well as a curſe on them, that Soon numbred years are ſtored to the Tyrant, his treaſure is not great in dayes; who daily treaſures up wrath againſt himſelf.

Another reſuming theſe words, He travelleth with pain; out of the former part of the Verſe, reads it thus, And in the whole number of years which are laid up for him, he travelleth in pain: That is, his whole life is miſerable: As if that which is a truth of all wicked men, were more ſpecially applicable to oppreſſors; That they travel in pain.

Hence we may Note, They who love to trouble others, ſhall be ſure to meet with trouble themſelves.

He that deſires to be feared, ſhall be often afraid. Oppreſſors and Tyrants in all ages have experimented this truth; which flows both from the nature of their unjuſt actions towards men, as alſo from the juſt retaliation of God.

Qui vult à multis metui, multos timeat oportet.

Our reading leads us to a further conſideration; The number of years is hidden to the Oppreſſor: That is (as ſome expound) they are determined, or defined in the ſecret counſel of God. It is under a hidden decree how long his oppreſſing power ſhall continue, and when he ſhall receive the reward of his oppreſſions: Or rather thus, The number of years of his own life is hidden to the oppreſſor; that is, he knows not how long he ſhall live.

But is that any ſpecial judgement upon the Oppreſſor, that the number of his years, or how long he ſhall live is hidden to him? Is not the number of a good mans years hidden to him? Are not the number of every mans years hidden to him? Doth any man know how long he ſhall live? David indeed prays, Teach me to number my dayes (Pſal. 90.) and Make me to know mine end, and the meaſure of my dayes, what it is, Pſal. 39.4. Yet he doth not deſire to know preciſely the number of his dayes, or time of his end, he only deſires to know their general number, or utmoſt extent ſpiritually; namely, that at the moſt they were not many, that ſo he might make a wiſe improvement of his life, and a holy preparation for his death.

Seeing then the number of every mans years is hidden to him, how is this reckoned as the peculiar puniſhment of a wicked man, that the number of his years are hidden to him? I anſwer, It is true, the number of years is hidden from all men, both from good and bad, the Lord hath made that a ſecret. Two numbers are ſecret.

Firſt, The number of the years of the World, when that ſhall end; Of that day and hour knows no man, no not the Son of man, but the Father only.

Secondly, The number of the years of a mans own life, or the day of his death is a ſecret which no man knows, though many have been buſie to pry and inquire into it. But though godly men know not the number of the years of their own lives, yet this is no affliction to them, under which notion it is here ſaid of the Oppreſſor; The number of years is hidden to him.

A wicked man is thoughful about this, how he may live long, not how he may live or do well; he would fulfil many dayes and years in the World, that ſo he might have his fill of worldly profits and pleaſures. He is therefore troubled to think his life hangs upon uncertain tearms, becauſe he is uncertain of any good beyond this life. A godly man knows not the number of his years, but he knows by whom they are numbered; that ſatisfies him, be they longer or ſhorter, more or leſs. But a wicked man would have the account in his own hand, he would be Lord of all, even of time too, but he cannot, The number of years are hidden to the Oppreſſor.

> Obſerve Hence, That the number of the years of mans life is a ſecret which none knows but God himſelf:

And as it is ſo, ſo it is beſt for man, that it ſhould be ſo, The certain knowledge when our lives ſhould end, would hinder us in many duties and ſervices of our lives. Men would be at a ſtand in their worldly callings, if they were acquainted with the preciſe date of their ſtanding in the World. Our not knowing this, is not ignorance, but neſcience; and were it not for this neſcience, we ſhould be taken off from the ſtudy of much profitable knowledge. Beſides, our not knowing the number of our dayes, ſtirs up in us a care of improving every day, and to pray with David, Lord teach us to number our dayes. Our not knowing which day ſhall be our laſt, ſhould provoke us to ſpend every day ſo, that we may have comfort if it prove our laſt. It is beſt for us not to know that, the not knowing whereof is a motive to be alwayes doing good.

> Secondly, Obſerve, That it is a great vexation to the oppreſſor, or wicked man to think of the uncertainty of his own life.

Numerus annorũ incertus eſt tyrãnidis ejus. Vulg. Ex iſta incertitudine, ſequitur ſuſpicio & timor. Aquin. in loc.

The Vulgar makes this Obſervation from the Text, his tranſlation of the Text is, The years of his Tyrannical power are uncertain. If ſuch could but live long enough, what work would they make? Yea what a world would they make? The Jeſuits ſay, Take time and you may do any thing. So alſo ſaith the oppreſſor, If I had but time enough, I could do any thing; though I am diſappointed now, yet I ſhall have a day to act what I project, and to pour out my revenges; But this cuts the oppreſſors heart, he doubts his life may end before he can accompliſh his ends. A wicked heart is not more pleaſed in doing evil, then troubled when he is but under a ſuſpition that he ſhall want either opportunity, or time to do it. This is added to the painful travel of a wicked man, that he knowes not how long he ſhall travel in this pain; for though all his be painful dayes, yet he had rather continue in pain, then not continue his dayes. But the number of years is hidden, or a hidden thing to him.

Cum ait numerũ annorũ abſconditum eſſe, intelligit annos quibus victurus, aut regnaturus ſit improbus tyrannus. Druſ.

VERS. 21, 22.

A dreadful ſound is in his ears, in proſperity the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him.

He believeth not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs, and he is waited for of the Sword.

Eliphaz having laid down this poſition, That pain is the portion of a wicked man, goes on to the proof, and illuſtration of it; firſt, in reference to the terrours of his conſcience; and ſecondly, in reference to the troubleſomeneſs of his outward ſtate, and the ſad changes that are incident to him. That a wicked man travels with inward pain, or terrour of conſcience; the firſt words of this context tell us,

Verſ. 21. A dreadful ſound is in his ear.

קול פחרים Sonitus terrorũ, numerus multitudinis ſignificationem auget, i. e. ſonitus maximè terrificus, vel non unius ſed multiplicis terroris. Merc,

The Hebrew is, A voice of dreads; the word is Plural, becauſe, not one ſingle terror, but a multitude of terrors, an Army of terrors incamp about the ſpirit of a wicked man: and theſe charge him without intermiſſion; as ſoon as one hath done, another draws up againſt him.

And he ſaith, A ſound of terrour, becauſe a ſound carries fear with it; Fear is a perturbation of the mind, ariſing from an apprehenſion of ſome approaching evil: Now, by how much the nearer evil draweth to us, by ſo much doth fear increaſe upon us; and then an evil may be ſaid to be very near us, when we hear the ſound of it. We quickly ſee and feel an Enemy, when once he is come within our hearing. When the King of Iſrael ſent a meſſenger to take off the head of Eliſha, Shut the door (ſaith Eliſha) and hold him faſt at the door, is not the ſound of his Maſters feet behind him? (2 King. 6.33.) That is, is not his Maſter near. And when Eliah ſaw the rain at hand, he thus beſpeaks King Ahab, Get thee up, eat, and drink, for there is a ſound of abundance of rain (1 King. 18.41.) So here, The ſound of terror, notes the ſpeedy approach of it; the Prophet (Jer. 4.19.) complains lamentably, My belly, my belly, I am pained at my very heart, my heart makes a noiſe within me (and why all this?) becauſe thou haſt heard O my ſoul, the ſound of the Trumpet, and the alarm of War; that is, becauſe now it appears that the enemy is at hand. When once we hear the ſound of the Trumpet, War is not far off, yea it is even at the door, and death is ready to climb up at our windows. Uſually the ear receives the firſt blow; we firſt hear, and then feel the Sword.

When Eliphaz ſaith, A dreadful ſound is in his ear, we may underſtand it two wayes; either firſt, that a wicked man hearing the ſad reports of approaching evil, is greatly troubled; or ſecondly, that a wicked man frames to himſelf an imaginary ſound of evil. His fanſie makes a noiſe, he thinks he hears the ſound of Drums and Trumpets, the clattering of Armour, and the claſhing of drawn Swords, he hears (as the Prophet Nahum elegantly deſcribes it) The noiſe of the whip, and the noiſe of the ratling of the Wheels, and of the pranſing Horſes, and of the jumping Chariots. Now, whether we underſtand it of the approach of real dangers, the ſound of which, are a terror to him, or whether we take it for thoſe fantaſtick, panick fears and Satanical deluſions, both or either of them render his life uncomfortable, and are the effects of an unquiet, or of a guilty conſcience.

> Hence Obſerve, A wicked man is alwayes ſubject to fear; he that is a ſervant to ſin cannot but be a ſlave to fear. And he that hath done much evil, ſuſpects much.

While we have Peace within, War without doth not much trouble, though it much afflict us. And while our hearts, toucht by the Spirit of God, make us muſick, a ſound of terrour to the ear is not terrible.

Impius tātū metuit, quātum nocuit.

It is ſaid of a godly man (Pſal. 112.7.) No evil tydings ſhall make him fear (though there be a dreadful ſound in his ear, a ſound of danger, yet) his heart is fixed, truſting in the Lord. A wicked man is terrified with conceited danger; a godly man is not afraid when there is real danger. A godly man hath a witneſs for him in himſelf; a wicked man carries a witneſs againſt him in himſelf; and this witneſs is alſo his judge to condemn him, yea his executioner to torment, and vex him; as ſoon as our firſt Parents had ſinned (Gen. 3.8.) They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the Garden, in the cool of the day, and Adam and his Wife hid themſelves from the preſence of the Lord: Here was no appearance of terrour, it was the voice of God walking as a friend, not marching as an enemy, and it was in in the cool, not heat of the day; theſe circumſtances argue the guiltineſs of Adam and his Wife, who fled and hid themſelves at this appearance of the Lord. The voice of God walking, was a dreadful ſound in their ears, becauſe they had not hearkned to the voice of God commanding. Wicked Paſhur, who oppoſed the good Prophet, is branded with a new name (Jer. 20.3. 4.) The Lord ſaid, his name ſhall no more be called Paſhur, but Magor-Miſabib; that is, Fear round about, and in the next Verſe, the reaſon is given why this name was given him, For I will make thee a terrour to thy ſelf: He that is a terrour to himſelf, can no more be without terrour, then he can be without himſelf. Nor can any thing be a comfort to him, who is his own terrour. And therefore a guilty conſcience hears a dreadful ſound, what ſound ſoever he hears: he ever expects to hear bad news, and he puts fearful gloſſes and comments upon that which is good.

Nemo ſe judice nocens abſolvitur.

Peſſimus in dubiis Augur timor. Stat.

A wicked man interprets all reports in one of theſe two miſchievous ſenſes, either To the diſcredit of others, or to the diſquiet of himſelf: Bring what text of providence you can to him, he corrupts it with one of theſe gloſſes. Yea, the faithful counſels of his own Friends, are dreadful ſounds unto him, for he hath a ſuſpicion that while they are counſelling him for good, it is but a contriving of evil againſt him, or a ſetting of ſnares to catch him.

Again, ſometimes God creates a ſound, or cauſeth the wicked to hear a dreadful ſound (2 King. 7. 6.) The Lord made the Hoaſt of the Syrians to hear a noiſe of Chariots, and a noiſe of Horſes, even the noiſe of a great Hoaſt, &c. Upon this dreadful ſound, they aroſe and fled. Sometimes a wicked heart creats a ſound, and what the Prophet threatens, he hears, the ſtone out of the Wall, the beam out of the Timber crying againſt him. The Story tells us of one who thought that the Swallows in the Chimney ſpake, and told tales of him. We ſay in our Proverb, As the Fool thinketh, ſo the Bell clinketh; much more may we ſay, As an evil conſcience thinketh, ſo every thing clinketh. As he that hath a prejudice againſt another, takes all he hears ſpoken of him, and all that he hears him ſpeak in the worſt ſenſe, and moſt diſadvantageous conſtruction to his reputation; ſo he that hath a prejudice againſt himſelf, conſtrues all that he either hears or ſees againſt his own Peace: Hence it is that he doth not only flee when he is purſued, but when none purſue (Prov. 28. 1.) The wicked flies when none purſueth (except his own fears) but the righteous is as bold as a Lyon: This terrour was threatned in the old Law (Levit. 26. 36.) They that are left alive of you in the time of your Captivity, I will ſend fainting in their hearts, in the Land of their Enemy, and the ſound of a ſhaking leaf ſhall chaſe them; What poor ſpirits have they who are chaſed by the motion of a leaf? The ſound of a leaf is a pleaſant ſound, it is a kind of natural muſick. Fear doth not only make the heart move, As the Trees of the Forreſt are moved with the wind (Iſa. 7.) but it makes the heart move, if the wind do but move the Trees of the Forreſt. The Prophet Iſaiah tells Jeruſalem, Thy ſlain men are not ſlain with the Sword, not dead in Battel (Iſai. 22. 2.) With what then were they ſlain? And how died they; a learned Interpreter tells us how: They were ſlain with fear, and died with a ſound of Battel before ever they joyned Battel. This anſwereth the judgment denounced by Moſes in another place (Deut. 28.65.) The Lord ſhall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and ſorrow of mind, and thy life ſhall hange in doubt before thee, and thou ſhalt fear day and night, and ſhalt have no aſſurance of thy life.

Homines tui, nō expectato adventu hoſtis, velut transfoſſi exanimātur metu. Jun.

But here ſome may object, Is this the portion of wicked men? Doth a dreadful ſound in their ears afflict their hearts? Have not many ſuch, much peace? and do they not either ſmile or wonder to hear others complaining of an afflicted ſpirit, and beg prayers for the appeaſing of their troubled conſcience? which are matters they have no acquaintance with, nor knowledge of.

I anſwer, Firſt, We are not to underſtand the propoſition, as if all wicked men have, or that any wicked man at all times, hath this dreadful ſound in his ear; but thus it is very often, and thus it may be always: thus it is with many, and thus it may be with all wicked men. A wicked man hath (as we ſay) no fence for it, no priviledge nor promiſe to ſecure him from it.

Again, though ſome wicked men have not this dreadful ſound in their ears; yea though they have pleaſant ſounds in their ears, like them who ſang to the Vial, &c. (Amos 6.) Yet firſt, their peace is not a true peace; Secondly, it is not a laſting peace; Thirdly, that which they have, ariſeth from one of theſe two grounds; either from neglect of their conſciences, or from ſome defect in their conſciences. The neglect of conſcience from whence this ariſeth is twofold, either firſt, when they neglect to ſpeak to conſcience, conſcience and they never have a word, much leſs any ſerious conference, or diſcourſe; either concerning the ſtate of their hearts, or the courſe of their lives, and then all's peace with them. Secondly, when the ſpeakings of conſcience are neglected, conſcience hath a double voice of direction, and correction; conſcience tells a man what he ought, and what he ought not to do: conſcience checks a man for not doing what he ought, or for doing what he ought not. Yet many over-power and reſtrain conſcience from this office, and never leave oppoſing, till they have ſilenced, yea conquered it: Such as theſe have peace, ſuch a one as it is, and hear nothing but a ſound of delight in their ears, while this ſilence laſteth.

Again, this may ariſe from ſome defect diſabling conſcience, to do its ordinary, or natural duty. (the conſcience of an evil man may have ſome goodneſs in it) Conſcience may be conſidered two wayes, either morally, or naturally; that only is a morally good conſcience, which is pure and holy, a conſcience cleanſed from the guilt of ſin by the blood of Chriſt; thus no wicked man can be ſaid to have a good conſcience. That is a naturally good conſcience which performs the office or duty to which conſcience is appointed; conſcience is ſet up in man to perform certain offices: If the conſcience of a bad man perform them, his conſcience (in that ſenſe) is good.

The firſt office or work of conſcience is to obſerve, and take notice of what we do, conſcience ſhould, as it were, keep a Day-book, and follow us up and down with Pen and Ink, to write all our motions.

A ſecond work of conſcience is to teſtifie what we have done, and which way we have moved.

A third, is, to accuſe us when we do evil, and to acquit us when we do well: Now as a wicked mans conſcience is alwayes morally evil, becauſe ſtained, and polluted with ſin: So many times his conſcience is naturally evil too; that is, it will neither take notice of, nor check him for his ſin. When the wicked mans conſcience is in this evil ſtate, he thinks his ſtate good enough, and ſo he is at quiet.

Caſuiſts tell us of four ſorts of evil conſciences, all which may live out of the hearing of theſe dreadful ſounds.

Firſt, A blind ignorant conſcience that cannot diſcern between moral good and evil.

Secondly, A ſecure conſcience, which thinks not of any penal evil.

Thirdly, A dull, lazy, ſleepy conſcience, which hath little or no ſenſe, either of what is done or ſuffered.

Fourthly, A ſeared conſcience, which is altogether ſenſleſs.

A conſcience thus diſabled to perform its work, being either blind, ſecure, ſleepy, or ſeared, is tame and quiet with the worſt of men. But all this while, though this wicked man hath ſome eaſe, yet he hath no peace; his conſcience while ſeared, is far enough from being ſetled; his conſcience while aſleep, is far enough from reſt. It is with ſuch, as with ſome ſick men, ask them how they do, they will ſay, Very well, when as indeed they are ſo ſick, that they know not how ill they are; they take death it ſelf for health, and their not feeling of pain, for the curing of their diſeaſe.

But when the conſcience of a wicked man is once enlightned, ſoftned, and awakened, he cannot but have theſe dreadful ſounds, which will neither give, nor let him receive any reſt. Conſcience will awake at laſt, and ſpeak terrible things; conſcience will be a Boanerges, a terrible Preacher, thundring out, not onely a chiding reproof, but a ſentence of condemnation, and then the wicked will even gnaſh their teeth, becauſe conſcience did no ſooner uſe its teeth, they will gnaw their tongues for ſorrow, becauſe conſcience had no tongue to ſpeak, or they no ears to hear what it ſpake, till it was too late. A dreadful ſound in his ear.

In proſperity the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him.

The Hebrew is, In peace the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him. Peace is ſo near allied, and ſo great a friend to proſperity, that one word may well ſerve both. The wicked mans deſtroyer ſhall be to him like Joab to Abner, and Amaſa, ſhedding the blood of War in Peace, and putting that blood upon the Girdle about his loynes, &c. (1 Kings 2. 5.)

But ſome may demand, How doth this ſuit with the former Verſe? Where Eliphaz told us, that A wicked man travels in pain all his dayes: How is he in proſperity, if he travels all his dayes in pain? I anſwer, The denomination is given from the greateſt part of a wicked mans life, and that is trouble and pain. Or, ſecondly, if an inſtance can be given of any wicked man that hath had more good dayes than evil, or that hath had no ill dayes at all, in regard of any outward trouble and pain, then we may reconcile the Text thus; his proſperity is beſide his ſtate, yea, in his very proſperity he is in pain: In the midſt of laughter his heart is ſorrowful, and the end of his mirth is heavineſs. (Prov. 14. 13.) His is but a ſeeming, not a real proſperity.

Eſt amplificatio malæ cujuſdam impiorum ſecuritatis q.d. ſi contingat impium nihil timere ſed ſecure agere tunc & inopinato opprimetur. Pined. Et cum pax ſit ille inſidias ſuſpicatur. Vulg. Omnia etiam tuta tyranni & impii timent. Merc.

Further, theſe words are an aggravation of his miſery, becauſe if at any time he appears proſperous, and free from fear, then ſudden deſtruction overtakes him.

Or, laſtly, The deſtroyer may be ſaid to come upon him in proſperity, becauſe in his beſt dayes he fears the deſtroyer: he ſuſpects danger, when he ſees none; and is therefore never out of danger. Who this deſtroyer is, is left here at large; no particular one is ſpecified, but any terrible one is intended; Eliphaz doth not ſay, A Deſtroyer, but The Deſtroyer. One both powerful, and skilful to deſtroy, ſhall come upon him. He ſhall not onely come to him, but come upon him; to come upon, is to invade, or to aſſault: A friend comes to a man with kindneſs and embraces, to viſit or ſalute him, an enemy comes upon a man with blows and violence, to wound and deſtroy him. In proſperity the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him.

Hence obſerve; When wicked men think themſelves moſt ſafe, they are neareſt to deſtruction.

'Tis ſeldome that they think themſelves ſafe, and when they do, they are furtheſt from ſafety. When the wicked ſpring as the graſs, and when all the workers of iniquity do flouriſh, it is that they ſhall be deſtroyed for ever (Pſal. 92. 7.) Their temporal, ſhort ſpring, is not onely an antecedent, but an Argument of their eternal Winter. And their Winter is not the going down of the ſap to the root, but the pulling of them up by the roots; they ſhall be deſtroyed.

(Job 20. 22.) In the fulneſs of his ſufficiency he ſhall be in ſtraits: When it is full Sea with him, his Channel ſhall be dried up. It was ſaid to that Fool (Luke 12. 20.) This night thy ſoul ſhall be taken from thee: The deſtroyer came upon him indeed in his proſperity, when he ſang himſelf aſleep, with Soul, thou haſt goods laid up for many years, he could not keep his ſoul one night. (1 Theſ. 5. 3.) When they ſhall ſay peace and ſafety, then ſudden deſtruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child, and they ſhall not eſcape: The general deſtruction of wicked men in the day of Judgment, ſhall come as a thief in the night. We have a repreſentation of this, in that woſul tragedy which the Lord acted upon the Egyptians (Exod. 12. 13.) At midnight there was a grievous cry, (he came upon them as a thief in the night) for the Lord ſmote all the firſt-born of the land of Egypt; they dyed in their warm beds, in proſperity the deſtroyer came upon them. This is bad enough, yet not the worſt of the condition of wicked men: For,

Verſ. 22. He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs, he is waited for of the Sword.

This is a further account of the inward miſery or pain which afflicts the ſpirit of a wicked man.

He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs] He looketh not that he ſhall eſcape from darkneſs. So Maſter Broughton. There are five interpretations given about this darkneſs, out of which the wicked man believes he ſhall not return.

Pii ſpe ſe armant & in ſpem contra ſpem ſperant. Merc.

Firſt, Some underſtand it of the darkneſs of ſin; but a wicked man cannot be ſaid to deſpair of that about which he never had any hope or deſire.

Secondly, Some underſtand darkneſs literally and plainly, of the darkneſs of the night, and interpret thus, He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs; that is, he is ſo haunted with fears every night when he lies down, that he thinks he ſhall never live till the morning: This is a good ſenſe.

Thirdly, Others underſtand this darkneſs to be death, he hath a perfect ſound of dread when death comes, becauſe he believes not that he ſhall return out of that darkneſs. The Reſurrection is the conſolation of the Saints, in the midſt of greateſt dangers and thickeſt darkneſs; becauſe, though they dye, yet they believe they ſhall return out of darkneſs. But a wicked man, who believes or hopes for nothing beyond the time of this life, if he be once caſt into the Grave, either thinks he ſhall lye there for ever, or if he believes he ſhall riſe, yet he doth not believe that he ſhall riſe out of darkneſs, for he ſhall riſe in darkneſs, and go down to everlaſting darkneſs.

Fourthly, A fourth expounds it of internal darkneſs, the darkneſs of his ſpirit, or of thoſe miſts and clouds which hang about his mind. A godly man falling into this darkneſs, doth not actually believe he ſhall return out of it (for ſuch a faith were his return out of it) but a wicked man, as he hath no ground, ſo no poſſibility (continuing in the ſtate he is) to believe it. Saul had a woful dark ſpirit, and believed not that he ſhould return out of it, by the help of God; therefore he went to a Witch (a Counſellour of the Prince of of darkneſs) for help.

But fifthly, I rather conceive, as often elſewhere, ſo here, by darkneſs is meant outward affliction. When the deſtroyer comes upon him, and he is caſt into a ſad dark condition, he hath no faith for himſelf, that he ſhall return out of it, or be delivered from it. This is an extream aggravation of the miſerable ſtate of a wicked man, who either hath no outward proſperity, or his proſperity is nothing to him, he enjoyes it not; but if ever he fall into outward miſery, how great is his miſery? ſo great that he gives himſelf for gone, a loſt man for ever: He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs.

Obſerve hence, That a wicked man neither doth, nor can believe deliverance from evil.

Firſt, He hath no ground to believe promiſes are the foundation of Faith. A wicked man may be under promiſes of converſion from his ſin, but he is not under any promiſe of mercy while he continues in his ſin; the whole Book of God yields him not (in that ſtate) any ſpecial promiſe, for ſo much as a bit of bread; when he hath bread, he hath it from providence, not from a promiſe, or but from a general promiſe. He is fed as a Beaſt is fed, the Lord being the preſerver of Man and Beaſt: He cannot have a ſpecial promiſe himſelf, not being an heir of promiſe: Therefore when he falls into darkneſs, he hath no ground to believe. Whereas a godly man never hath ſo much ground to believe, as when he falls into darkneſs, becauſe then he hath more promiſes than before; his outward loſſes gain him the advantage of many ſweet promiſes, which till then he could not plead, for the ſuccour and nouriſhment of his faith. As a wicked man hath no promiſe of God (in the ſenſe explained) at any time; ſo a godly man hath moſt promiſes of God in evil, yea, in the worſt of times.

And as a wicked man hath no ground to believe, ſo he uſually hath no heart to believe: and as he hath no reaſon to hope for better things, ſo he hath no courage, his ſpirit ſinks and fails when his ſtate doth. Abigail had no ſooner told Nabal that the deſtroyer was comming upon him in his proſperity, but his heart ſunk within him like a ſtone, and he dyed away preſently.

Secondly, The beſt of a wicked mans faith (that he ſhall return out of darkneſs) is but a preſumptuous fancy, or meer Fool-hardineſs. A good man is like a Child in his Fathers houſe, who takes no care, but caſts all upon his Parents; in the greateſt ſtorm he commits the helm to Chriſt, as Pilot; he can ſay as David (Pſal. 42.) when he is in trouble; Why art thou diſquieted, O my ſoul? He calls his ſoul to queſtion, and would have his ſoul give him a reaſon, Why art thou troubled, my ſoul? hope in God, for I ſhall yet praiſe him: But a wicked man hath no God to hope in, therefore he cannot ſay, I ſhall yet praiſe him: That man cannot caſt his burden of cares upon the Lord (Pſal. 55. 22.) who cares not how he burdens God with his ſins; therefore he muſt bear and ſink under both burdens himſelf: He cannot believe that he ſhall return out of the darkneſs of trouble, who delights and ſports in the darkneſs of iniquity.

Again, Conſider, this is brought as a proof of the woſull condition of a wicked man. It is miſery enough, that the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him; but this is more miſerable, he cannot believe deliverance from deſtruction.

Hence Obſerve; That want of faith in time of affliction, is more grievous than affliction.

It is worſe not to believe deliverance, than to fall into trouble; as the life of Faith is the beſt life, ſo the life of Unbelief is the worſt life. Deſpair of good is the greateſt evil: Faith is not onely the ſupport and relief of the ſoul in trouble, but it is the victory and triumph of the ſoul over trouble. Faith doth not onely keep the ſoul alive, but lively; Faith keeps the ſoul fat, and in good plight; Faith is a ſhield, both againſt temptation and affliction. But every blow falls upon the bare skin of an unbeliever; Faith is a ſhield both againſt the fiery darts of the Devil, and (with a difference) againſt the fiery darts of God alſo. Let God himſelf caſt his darts at a Believer, Faith ſecures him from hurt, though not from wounds, yea, his very wounds, through a work of Faith, ſhall work his good.

It is the comfort of a man that feareth God, and obeyeth the voice of his Servants, that while he walketh in darkneſs and hath no light, he is bid to truſt in the name of the Lord, and to ſtay upon his God (Iſa. 50. 10.) But while a man that doth not fear God, walks in darkneſs and hath no light, his miſery is, that he can neither truſt in God till light comes, nor that light will ever come. How happy are the righteous, to whom light ariſeth in darkneſs? How unhappy are the wicked, who being in darkneſs, conclude that the light will never ariſe.

Faith makes all evil good to us, and all good better; unbelief makes all good evil to us, and all evil worſe. Faith (like the Horſe, Job 39. 19.) laughs at the ſhaking of the ſpear; unbelief trembles at the ſhaking of a leaf. Faith finds good in Famine, and a Table in the Wilderneſs. In greateſt dangers, Faith anſwers, I have a great God; when outward ſtrength is broken, and all lyes a bleeding, Faith anſwers, The promiſes are ſtrong ſtill, they have not loſt a drop of blood, nor have they a ſcar upon them. When God himſelf appears angry, Faith anſwers, I know how to pleaſe him, and I can go to one in whom he is, and will be well-pleaſed for ever. Thus Faith pulls out the ſting of trouble, draws out the gall and wormwood of every affliction. But where Faith is wanting, every affliction is full of gall and wormwood, and every trouble vexeth with a double ſting. It ſtings ſuch, as it is a trouble, and it ſtings them more, as they ſee no comfort in, nor way out of trouble. The darkneſs of darkneſs is this, Not to believe, that we ſhall return out of darkneſs.

And he is waited for of the ſword] This clauſe is near in ſenſe to the latter part of the former Verſe, and yet in this variety of expreſſion, there is ſome variety of intention. For the clearing of it, two things are to be enquired:

First, What is meant by the Sword.

Secondly, What is meant by, waited for of the Sword.

The Sword is taken two wayes in Scripture.

Firſt, literally, for, That weapon of War, and by a Synechdoche the Sword is put for all weapons of War; as alſo by a Metonymie, for War it ſelf: When the Sword is threatned in Scripture, War is threatned.

Secondly, The Sword is taken for the power of the Magiſtrate, who bears not the Sword in vain: Chriſt is deſcribed as a King armed with his Sword. (Iſa. 11. 4.) By the Sword (that is, with the Word) of his mouth, he will ſlay the wicked: Chriſt will pronounce a ſentence of condemnation, and deliver them up to execution: Thus the Judge ſlayes the malefactor with the ſword of his mouth.

Nempe ſua ſententia tradens eum juſtitiæ miniſtro.

Further, By a Synechdoche, the Sword is taken for all manner of evil and trouble; whatſoever hurts or afflicts is comprehended under the notion of a Sword (Luke 1. 35.) Old Simeon tells the holy Virgin in his ſong, Alſo a Sword ſhall paſs through thy Soul; his meaning is not, that ſhe ſhould be cut off in War by the hand of a Souldier, or in peace, by the ſentence of the Judge; but that ſore troubles and afflictions, like a ſharp ſword, ſhould pierce her ſoul.

Quicquid pungit & percutit, & torquet, & cruciat in ſcripturis ſanctis gladius appellatur. Hieron. in cap. ult. Iſa.

Here the Sword may be taken either for the Sword of War, or of Peace, or for any evil that befalls the wicked Man.

But how is he waited for of the Sword? The Original word is rendred two wayes;

Firſt, Actively.

Secondly, Paſſively.

Some render actively, He is waiting for of the Sword: He ſtands expecting the Sword, and that in a double ſenſe; he waits for the Sword which he fears will deſtroy him, or he waits for a Sword, which he deſires to defend him. Mr. Broughton gives this ſenſe, Having watch, he thinketh upon the Sword.

Circumſpectans undique gladium. Vulg.

Sc. vel quo pereat, vel quo ſe defendat.

Tanquam ex ſpecula expectat. Tigur.

Again, Others render it paſſively, He is waited for of the Sword, when he thinks not of it; The Sword lies in ambuſh to ſurprize him. A man is ſaid to be waited for by an Enemy, when he intends to aſſault him unawares; To be thus waited for by the Sword, is to be waited for by Sword-men. And it is as great a diſadvantage to be ſeen of the Sword, before we ſee the Sword; as it is (according to the old Proverb) to be ſeen of the Wolf, or of the Crocodile, before we ſee either.

Hebraizantes tenent eſſe participium paſſivum: hinc Rab. Levi exponit, Conſpicitur à gladio. Aſpectus gladio. Vatabl.

The wicked is waited for of the Sword, not for any ſervice, but for the revenge it owes him, the Sword lyes behind the door, or under a buſh, to ſnap him as he paſſeth.

Eſt Hebraiſmus, ut viderri à gladio ſit ab hoſtibus obſervari per inſidias.

The Septuagint, inſtead of, he is waited, or watched, or looked for by the Sword, render thus, He is decreed into the hand of the Sword; leading us to the appointment and deſtination of God, who hath ſet him out, and marked him for judgment. He is appointed to the Sword: Such a decree the Prophet ſeems to point at (Jer. 15. 2.) where he brings in the Lord, as reſolved to proceed in judgement againſt all prayers and intreaties, though made by his greateſt Favorites; Though Moſes and Samuel ſtood before me, yet my mind could not be unto this people, but ſuch as are for death, to death, and ſuch as are for the ſword, to the ſword: That is, ſuch as are decreed into the hand of the Sword, let the Sword take them; the decree ſhall ſtand, the ſentence is irrevocable.

Conſpectus ipſe ad gladium. Mont.

Nempe à Deo conſpectus & deſtinatus ad gladium. Præviſus enim eſt ad gladium. Sym.

Taking the Text actively, Obſerve; That a wicked man thinks every one his enemy.

He dreams of danger when he ſleeps, and where-ever he comes, he waits for the Sword; He that hath a mind to hurt others, fears it is in the mind of every one to hurt him: He that is harmleſs is fearleſs; and while we go about doing good, we are free from the ſuſpition of evil. Cain having murthered his Brother, complains of the Lords ſentence againſt him, Thou haſt driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face ſhall I be hid, and I ſhall be a fugitive and a Vagabond on the earth, and it ſhall come to paſs, that every man that finds me ſhall ſlay me, (Gen. 4.14.) Cains complaint is the Comment of this Text, Every one that finds me ſhall ſlay me, is, I wait for, or I expect the Sword: Cain ſpeaks as if an Army were continually purſuing him, or, as if the avenger of blood were alwayes ready at his heels. And that which aggravates the wonder of this jealouſie, is, that we can give account but of one man alive in the world beſides himſelf at that time, and that was his own Father Adam; We read not of any Son that Abel left behind him, nor had Cain any Son (upon record) at that time; and yet he cries out as if the World had been full of Inhabitants, and every one of them his Enemy; Every one that meets me will ſlay me. What is ſaid of Iſhmael, is true of Oppreſſors, Their hand is againſt every man; and therefore they have cauſe enough to ſuſpect that every mans hand is againſt them, they are ever waiting for the Sword.

Nunquam non divinã ultionem expectat vel metuit. Merc.

Ex omni parte inimicos ſibi imminere videns. Aquin. Qui de nullo confidit de omnibus timet. id.

Secondly, from the paſſive ſenſe, He is waited for of the Sword, Obſerve,

That a wicked man is in danger whereſoever he is.

He cannot ſet his foot over the threſhold but miſchief may arreſt him; the Lord ſaid to Cain, If thou doeſt ill, ſin lyes at the door; that is, (according to the ordinary interpretation) puniſhment lyes at the door; it lyes at the door, yea, it will draw the latch, or turn the key, and come in at the door; There is no evil but a wicked man is ſubject to it; as there is no good but is the inheritance of a godly man, who is therefore called an heir of the promiſe. He that is an heir of the promiſe, hath all the good things of this life, and of the next for his inheritance. When he goeth forth, mercy hath him by the hand, yea, mercy lyes under his feet, and holds a canopy of protection over his head. A wicked man is an heir of the curſe, and therefore he alwayes ſtands under the droppings of Divine anger; his breaſt is the Butt or mark at which God levels the deadly Arrows of his indignation; and he is waited for of the Sword.

Thirdly, Obſerve, That the expectation of evil is more afflictive than the feeling of evil.

He doth not ſay, he is ſlain with the ſword, or cut off with the ſword; but he is waited for, or he waits for the ſword: All evil attends him who is thus attended, or who gives ſuch attendance. He that is alwayes looking for evil, cannot enjoy the good which he ſees. For as the aſſured hope of approaching comfort ſwallows up our preſent ſorrows, ſo the continual expectation of approaching ſorrow ſwallows up our preſent comforts.

Fourthly, It is not ſaid either by what ſword, or whoſe ſword, he is waited for, but he is waited for of the ſword; here is the ſword, but here is no hand named, neither the hand of God, nor the hand of man, drawing and weilding this Sword.

Hence Note; That the deſtruction of a wicked man is inevitable.

When we neither know whoſe the Sword is, nor whence the Sword is, how ſhall we prevent it, or provide againſt it. When the Lord would aſſure us that an unavoidable overthrow ſhall come upon the Kingdomes of the earth, which oppoſe the Kingdome of Chriſt, he ſaith, A Stone cut out without hand ſhall do this; it ſhall be done no man knows how or which way; and therefore no man can know how or which way to hinder the doing of it. As there is a Stone cut out without hands, ſo here is a ſword to cut without hands. The judgment of Babylon is thus expreſſed by the Prophet (Iſa. 47.11.) Therefore ſhall evil come upon thee, thou ſhalt not know from whence it ariſeth, and miſchief ſhall fall upon thee, that thou ſhalt not be able to put it off. The former words expound the latter: Why ſhould not Babylon be able to put off the miſchief? Becauſe it comes upon her, ſhe knows not from whence. We ſay in our Proverb, when we threaten a miſchief, from which there is no eſcaping, You ſhall never know who hurt you: He that knows not who hurts him, ſhall never know how to help himſelf; and while the hand that ſtrikes us is not ſeen, how ſhall we ſee to defend our ſelves againſt the ſtroke. He that waits for the ſword is alwayes in fear, and he that is waited for by the Sword, is alwayes in danger. Either of theſe is bad enough; and he that is under both, cannot be worſe.

Cum Supplicium dicitur, & non dicitur à quo inferendum ſit, inevitabile ſupplicium ſignificatur. Sanct.

VERS. 23, 24.

He wandreth abroad for bread, ſaying, Where is it? He knoweth that the day of darkneſs is ready at hand.

Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, they ſhall prevail againſt him, as a King ready to battel.

THeſe two Verſes are a further deſcription of the perplexed condition of a wicked man, A dreadful ſound is in his ears, &c. He is waited for of the Sword. And what more?

Verſ. 23. He wandereth abroad for bread, ſaying, Where is it?

We put in thoſe words, Saying, and Is it? the Hebrew being onely this, He wandreth abroad for bread, where; as if he had ſaid, No man knows where, and he knows not whither himſelf.

In Hebræo tantum eſt movetur pro pane.

There is a two-fold interpretation of this Wandring; ſome underſtand it of a powerful roving abroad for bread; he takes what he can from thoſe who are next, or he takes what comes next to hand: He muſt have it, it matters not much with him, how or from whom. Such are called Rovers, they rove abroad for bread, they ſpoil and plunder others, for the ſupply of their wants, ſhall I ſay, or of their luſts. But I conceive this Expoſition unſuitable; and the reaſon is, becauſe Eliphaz is not here deſcribing the ſin of a wicked man, but his puniſhment; to ſpoyl and plunder for bread is his ſin; to wander for bread is his puniſhment, and implies the evil and miſery that comes upon the wicked, not the evil and miſchief that is done by the wicked.

Tyrannorum furta & rapinas hic deſcribi putat Cajetanus.

Secondly, To wander, is the condition of a man who hath no ſetled dwelling. Paul was once in ſuch a ſtate, Even to this preſent hour we both hunger, &c. and have no certain dwelling-place (1 Cor. 4.11.) This was alſo the lot of the Jewiſh Martyrs, They wandered about in Sheepsſkins, &c. (Heb. 11.37.) Theſe were holy wanderers: They wandered in the world, that they might not wander from God. Here we have an unholy wanderer, who having gone aſtray from God, found no reſt among men, a downright Vagabond; for ſo the word is applied to Cain (*Gen.*4.) A fugitive and a vagabond ſhalt thou be; and we in our Law, call a ſort of idle Beggars, Vagabonds, ſuch as go from Countrey to Countrey, from houſe to houſe, to ſeek their bread. Such alſo were among the Jews, who are therefore called Vagabond Jews, (Acts 19.13.) To be a wanderer was one of the ſharpeſt threats that God ever denounced againſt his people, My God will caſt them away, becauſe they did not hearken to him, and they ſhall be wanderers among the Nations,

He wanders about for bread] In Scripture ſenſe, bread takes in all good things, even the beſt which concern this life: So Chriſt teacheth us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. But here by bread, we are to underſtand the meaneſt proviſion, diſtinct from fleſh, and other Food; a man that lives meerly upon bread, hath but poor fare; though bread be the ſtaff of life, yet he that hath nothing but bread to eat, lives meanly, and hath onely enough to keep life and ſoul together.

Yet further, They that wander for bread, muſt be content with the courſeſt bread, and with a little of that; they are often glad if they get but a dry or mouldy cruſt of bread to ſatisfie the cry of hunger. So then, To wander about for bread, is to live a a beggars life, or to be driven to the utmoſt ſhifts to ſuſtain life, and keep from ſtarving.

Panis hoc loco non ſignificat, ut aliâs ſæpe, quodcunque eſculentum; ſed viliſſimum quemque cibum quo poſſit ſuſtentari. Pined. His verbis notatur aliud Dei flagellum nempe extrema inopia. Bold.

To be brought to a piece of bread (of our own) is to be brought to the loweſt ebb in worldly things, (*Prov.*6.26.) By means of a whoriſh woman, a man is brought to a piece of bread; That is, he is made very poor. And if he be at a low ebb, who hath but a piece of bread of his own: what are they who are forced to ask ſo low as a piece of bread of others? To want bread is ill, but wander about for bread is far worſe. He that wants bread is pincht, but he rhat wanders for it is diſgraced.

Exul, inops erres, alienaque limina luſtres. Ovid. in Ibin.

Obſerve hence, Firſt, To wander about for bread, is a ſore affliction.

Such an affliction, as David profeſſeth he never obſerved the righteous mans ſeed fallen into (Pſal. 37. 25.) I have been young, and now am old, yet never ſaw I the righteous forſaken, nor their ſeed begging their bread: The righteous are often troubled, yet never forſaken, or if forſaken of men, yet not of God; when all men, even godly men, forſook Paul, yet God did not: The Lord (ſaith he) ſtood by me, (2 Tim. 4. 16, 17.) And though a righteous man may be brought to begg, yet his ſeed (that is, his whole poſterity) is not; or if we take ſeed for a ſingle perſon, to ſee him beg for bread is very rare; ſo rare it was in thoſe times, that David had not obſerved it; for he ſpeaks not of that which cannot be, but of that which is ſeldome or never ſeen to be. 'Tis a mercy to be denied ſuperfluities, but it is an extream miſery to be denied neceſſaries. The Jews had poor amongſt them, but the Law made ſuch proviſion, that they had no Beggars, or wanderers for bread (Deut. 15.) He is not a Beggar that asks Bread upon a pinch, (for ſo did David himſelf, more than once) but he that makes a trade of it.

Caſus tranſitorii non reddunt mendicum. Muſc. in Pſal. 37.

Poverty or want is not a mark of Gods diſfavour, no more than riches are a mark of his love: Yet ſome want and poverty, that eſpecially, which is accompanied with a continual wandering for bread, is a mark of Gods diſfavour. It was a Prophetical curſe upon the Traytor Judas and his Poſterity, (Pſal. 109. 10.) Let his Children be continually Vagabonds, and beg, let them ſeek their bread out of deſolate places. And experience tells us, that though ſometimes a Lazarus, a good man beg, yet the race and generality of profeſſed Beggars are the worſt of mankind.

Secondly, Whereas Eliphaz ſpeaks ſpecially of the Oppreſſor, and tells us, that he wanders about for bread; we may obſerve, > Oppreſſion is the neareſt way to poverty: They who make Beggars to ſatisfie their luſts, ſhall be forced to beg for the ſatisfying of their hunger.

It is very dangerous to make proviſion for the fleſh by lawful means, to fulfill the luſts of it; but it is moſt dangerous to make proviſion for the fleſh by unlawful means (by wrong and oppreſſion) to fulfil the luſts of it. They who ſo fulfil their luſts, ſhall ſoon be brought to want. Hannah ſung out this ſudden change (1 Sam. 2. 5.) They that were full have hired themſelves out for bread, and they that were hungry ceaſed. Not that they ceaſed to be, but they ceaſed to be hungry, or their hunger ceaſed. Godly empty ones were filled, and wicked full ones were emptied; and that which makes the want and emptineſs of a wicked man ſo great a miſery, is his want of faith and patience when he is empty; he hath done ſo much evil, that he hath no faith to believe that any man will do him good; therefore his poverty fills him with impatience, and his mind is more unſetled than his eſtate.

Thus ſuch as are here deſcribed (Pſal. 59. 14, 15.) At evening let them return, and let them make a noiſe like a Dog, and go round about the City: Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not ſatisfied: A good man may want meat, but he doth not grudge. He that waits upon God, and believes, ſhall be ſatisfied, though not filled.

Again, 'tis propheſied of wicked men (Iſa. 8. 21.) They ſhall paſs through it hardly beſtead and hungry, and it ſhall come to paſs, when they ſhall be hungry, that they ſhall fret themſelves, and curſe their King and their God, and look upward: When an unbeliever hath nothing to eat, he eats himſelf. His own fretting waſtes him more than his hunger. He then looks upward, not as ſubmitting himſelf to God in his hunger, not as depending upon God, for the ſatisfying of his hunger: In which ſenſe it is ſaid (Pſal. 145. 15, 16.) The eyes of all wait upon thee, or (as we put in the Margin) look unto thee, and thou giveſt them their meat in due ſeaſon, thou openeſt thine hand and ſatisfieſt the deſire of every living thing. A wicked man cannot look upward, thus, when he is hungry, he cannot look up and pray, he cannot look up and truſt in God; but he looks upward to curſe the God of Heaven in his heart, if not with his tongue; he looks upward, becauſe he is vext with all that is done below; he looks upward, not becauſe he hath any pleaſant ſights in Heaven, but becauſe he is diſpleaſed with all he ſees on Earth.

He wanders abroad for bread.] Where? or whither doth he wander? That which Eliphaz is conceived to aim chiefly at in this paſſage, is not ſo much the real, as the imaginary and conceited want of a wicked man. He wanders while he ſtayes at home, and ſeeks for bread, while his Barns and Tables are filled with it. He is terrified with forethoughts of poverty, in the midſt of his riches, and when he hath bread, ſaith, Where is it? He is ſo troubled with ſuſpected evils, that he cannot take comfort in his poſſeſſed goods. Hence obſerve;

Terroribus conſcientiæ ita divexatur ut in maxima abundantia ſummè egeat, laboret de victu ſupra modum. Jun. Vagatur, vel in mediis opibus, egeſtatis metu, nec partis ſecurè fruitur. Merl.

Firſt, That abundance cannot ſatisfie.

God only is fulneſs to us. A man may wander about in his thoughts for bread, when he hath bread enough about him, and ſay he ſhall be undone, and die a beggar, when he hath abundance. A covetous man is an unſatiable gulf; He only is well who hath enough, and he is beſt who hath (in temporals) the leaſt enough: But a covetous man hath not enough though he hath more than enough, and much more than needs; he alwayes dreams of dearths, and ſuſpects the Earth will be barren: with theſe fears he pines, yea martyrs himſelf, and is not at all enriched with all his riches; he hath ſufficient to maintain twenty, yet is told by his unbelief, that he hath not ſufficient for one. This is vanity and vexation of ſpirit; The life of man doth not conſiſt in what he hath, but in what he is, and hopes to be: his life doth not conſiſt in abundance, either for the continuance of it, or for the comfort of it. A man doth not live more dayes, nor more chearfully any day, becauſe he lives plentifully. The creature were a God to us, if it could do this to us; but this, God hath reſerved in his own hands (how much ſoever of the creature he gives out) that we may know our dependance on him.

Secondly, obſerve. That imaginary wants, or to have an unquiet ſpirit in the midſt of our enjoyments, is more afflictive than to be in real want.

The worſt worldly poverty is to be poor when we are rich; as it is the excellency of our ſpiritual eſtate to be poor in ſpirit, in our greateſt ſpiritual plenty to be little or nothing in our own eyes, when we have a great ſtock of grace: So it is the miſery of our temporal eſtate, to be thus poor in ſpirit, when we have plenty in the purſe; to ſay we have little or nothing, when we have a great ſtock of worldly goods.

Zophar concludes of the Hypocrite (Chap. 20. 21.) In the fulneſs of his ſufficiency he ſhall be in ſtreights; which may be underſtood, either firſt, That when he is full, troubles ſhall empty him; or ſecondly, That while his fulneſs continues, even in his fulleſt fulneſs, he ſhall live, as if he were indeed as empty of wealth, as he is of goodneſs, alwayes ſpending himſelf with fears that all will be ſuddenly ſpent, and ſaying in his heart, This will not hold out, I ſhall never be able to bring the year about, or bring (as we ſay) both ends together. Hence his cares are endleſs, and he grudges himſelf ordinary comforts, his worldly ſorrow conſumes him, and he is willing to dye, onely to ſave charges: That man is in an ill caſe, who is grudged what he eats or ſpends by others, but it is far worſe for a man to grudge himſelf his neceſſary expences.

Some worldly men, whoſe Barns are full, are ready to ſay every one to his ſoul, as he (Luke 12. 19.) Soul take thine eaſe, thou haſt goods laid up for many years: Another hath his Barn full, and yet ſaith, This will not hold one year, and ſo gives his ſoul no eaſe at all. What the Apoſtle ſaith of himſelf, is true of all thoſe who have an intereſt in Chriſt, (2 Cor. 6. 10.) As poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, yet poſſeſſing all things: But there are ſome rich, who make many poor, and themſelves pooreſt of all; for though they have all thoſe things, yet they are as if they poſſeſſed nothing. It is an affliction to be poor for want of riches, but it is a curſe to be poor in the poſſeſſion of riches. He that loves Silver ſhall not be ſatisfied with Silver (Ecclef. 5. 10.) To be ſatisfied, is more than to be rich, and he is alwayes poor who is unſatisfied; he that expects ſatisfaction from the creature, ſhall never find contentation in the creature; and he that expects no ſatisfaction from the creature, hath contentation in any portion of the creature. A godly man learns in every eſtate to be content; A carnal man is content in no eſtate; when he is poor, he ſees he hath nothing; and when he is rich, he ſaith, he hath not enough. Thus he wanders as well when he is rich, as when he is poor, and is therefore never ſatisfied.

Again, He wanders about for bread, Where? Or ſaying, Where is it?

Hence Obſerve, A man that is not good, is uncertain where to receive any good.

Where is it? Though a Believer want bread, yet he knows whither to go for it, and where it is to be had. The earth is the Lords, and the fulneſs thereof; he goes to Heaven for bread as well as for grace; he knows there is bread in the promiſe, and to the promiſe he goes. The promiſe hath all things both concerning life and godlineſs. Chriſt, who is the bread of life, gives us bread for this life; and having Chriſt with him, we have all things elſe; bread and cloathing, gold and Silver, are laid up in Chriſt.

An Unbeliever (as hath been ſhewed) hath nothing to do with promiſes, nor with Chriſt the fulfiller of promiſes, and therefore he is ever in doubt, when he is in want; and ſaith, Where is it? He knows not whither to go, nor to whom for the ſupply of his wants. A wicked man is never in his way, and, in one ſence, he is never out of his way. They may go any where, who know not whither to go. They are never out of their way, who have no home. Eaſt, Weſt, North, or South, it is all one to them; which way the ſtaff falls, they go, they have no rule nor line to go by; but though a wicked man know not his particular way, yet he often knows his general end, and that is miſery, as the next words tell us.

He knows the day of darkneſs is ready at hand

At Verſ. 22. He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs; that is (as was opened) in caſe he falls into evil, he thinks he ſhall never get out of it; he hath no faith that he ſhall recover out of trouble, but he hath a ſtrong faith, that he ſhall fall into trouble: He knows that the day of darkneſs is ready at hand.

Here are three things to be cleared.
Firſt, What is meant by knowing.
Secondly, What by the day of darkneſs.
Thirdly, What by being ready at hand.

To know, it is here oppoſed to an uncertain gueſs, or to conjecture; to know is as much as to be fully perſwaded; to know, is to be aſſured; the higheſt act of faith is often expreſſed by knowledge: Hereby we know that we know him (1 John 2. 4.) That is, hereby we are aſſured that we know him: ſo here, He knows; that is, he is aſſured; it is ſetled upon his ſpirit, that the day of darkneſs is ready at hand. This knowledge riſeth not from reports abroad, but from his own breaſt; ſo the Septuagint tranſlates, He knows in himſelf that evil ſhall be upon him: As a godly man hath a witneſs for him in himſelf; ſo a wicked man hath a witneſs againſt him in himſelf.

Novit in ſeipſo quod maneat in ruinam. Certo ſibi perſuadet atque hujus rei præſagium ex ſui cordis ſenſu facit.

What the day of darkneſs is, learn upon the former Verſe, He believeth not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs; There I ſhewed a fivefold darkneſs; here I ſhall reduce it to one of theſe two.

The day of darkneſs is either the day of death, or the day of affliction; ſo 'tis taken (Eccleſ. 5. 17.) All his dayes he eateth in darkneſs; that is, he is in ſorrow all his dayes: Though he hath Sun-light, or Candle-light enough at his Table, yet he hath no light in his heart. So the Prophet (Amos 5. 20.) Shall not the day of the Lord be darkneſs, and not light? Even very dark) and no brightneſs in it? There is a day of the Lord which is nothing but light; and there is a day of the Lord which is nothing but darkneſs; that is, of tribulation and anguiſh upon the ſoul that ſins. The Prophet Joel calls it, A day of darkneſs, and of gloomineſs, a day of clouds and of thick darkneſs. He knows that the day of darkneſs is Ready at hand.] The word which we tranſlate ready, ſignifies two things.

Firſt, That which is prepared.
Secondly, That which is eſtabliſhed, or confirmed.

נכן Paratū, firmū, ſtabilē, certū eſſe denotat. Druſ.

We tranſlate to the former, the day is ready or prepared; others render to the latter ſence, the day is eſtabliſhed, and ſetled; his day of darkneſs ſhall certainly come upon him. And whereas we tranſlate Ready at hand, noting the nearneſs of the danger. Others, to note the cauſe of the danger, render, He knows that his own hand hath made a day of darkneſs; that is, The villanies and wickedneſſes which he hath committed, cauſe the clouds of judgment to gather, and look black upon him; his unrighteouſneſs hath haſtened on his ruine, and wrapt him up in darkneſs, He hath brought an evil day upon himſelf, by his evil deeds; or as the Prophet ſpeaks, His deſtruction is from himſelf: He hath pulled down his Houſe with his own hands, and is the ſole author or contriver of his own ſorrows.

Tygurina per manum intelligere videtur ipſa impiorum ſcelera, & per paraphraſim ſic ſententiam elucidat. Scit quod ſuis factis periculoſa tempora accerſierit.

This is an experienced truth; but I rather take the words as we render, The day of darkneſs is ready at hand; that is, it is near, and will ſhortly ſeize upon him.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Many a wicked man grows into an aſſurance of his approaching miſery.

It is as hard to perſwade ſome wicked men that their ſtate is naught, as it is to perſwade ſome good men that their ſtate is good; yet as many of the Saints conquer unbelief, and come not only to have ſome hopes, but high aſſurances, that there is a day of mercy at hand for them, that they are in a preſent happy ſtate, and eternal happineſs waits for them; ſo a wicked man (after long debate) may have his unbelief conquered, and though he hath been ſowing pillows under his own elbows, though he hath ſlighted all the counſels, admonitions, and threatnings of faithful Friends, though, notwithſtanding all this, he continue long, ſpeaking peace to his own ſoul, and ſaying, all is well, yet (I ſay) this man may have his unbelief conquered, and know at laſt that there is a day of darkneſs ready at hand; when his eyes are opened to ſee what he hath done, and what he hath been, he ſees that God hath rejected all his confidences, and that he ſhall never proſper in them.

Secondly, Obſerve, That for a man to be aſſured of his own miſery is the height of miſery.

Eliphaz puts it here among the puniſhments of wicked men. This aſſurance makes his heart ſhake; this knowledge is full of fear, and therefore full of torment. As to know that a day of light and deliverance is ready at hand, is light while we are in darkneſs, and deliverance while we are in trouble: So to know that a day of darkneſs and miſery is ready at hand, is darkneſs to wicked men while they are in external light, and miſery in the midſt of all their mirth. And as it is the higheſt comfort of the Saints to know that they have eternal life, to know that they are in the favour, and live in the love of God; (a man may be in it, and not know it, and then though he ſhall do well at laſt, yet his ſtate is but uncomfortable, and he that is an heir of Heaven, may walk as an heir of Hell, with a troubled ſpirit) but to know that it is ſo, this is Heaven before we come at Heaven; ſo it is the deepeſt ſorrow of any man in this life, to know that he hath eternal death; an aſſurance of this, ſetled upon the ſpirit (though I conceive a man cannot have an abſolute aſſurance of it, yet to have ſtrong impreſſions upon the ſpirit, that he ſhall never be ſaved, or that Hell is prepared for him) this is Hell before he is caſt into Hell.

A ſoul that doubts of mercy and of the favour of God, is in a very ſad condition, but the condition of that ſoul is unexpreſſibly ſad, which is aſſured of judgment, and of the wrath of God.

Thirdly, Obſerve, That as a wicked man may knows that he ſhall be miſerable in the end, ſo he may know that his miſery is near at hand.

An evil conſcience awakened is the worſt Prophet, it is full of ſad preſages; like Micah to Ahab, it never propheſied good, but evil; and it doth not only propheſie of evil afar off, but near, or ready at hand: 'Tis true, an evil conſcience uſually puts the evil day far off (2 Pet. 3. 4.) There ſhall be ſcoffers, ſaying, Where is the day of his coming, &c. The day of darkneſs is far enough off, it hath been long talked of, but we do not ſee it, ſay theſe deſpiſers: But when an evil conſcience is awakened, then he ſees evil near, and himſelf dogg'd at the heels, or (as the former Verſe ſpeaks) Waited for of the Sword.

Hæc eſt pœna impii pars non modica quod cogatur ipſe ſibi ominari malum. Pined.

As a Believer, when the eye of faith is clear, ſees mercy near at hand (Faith makes God near, and then all good is near.) So an Unbeliever, when the eye of his conſcience is cleared, ſees miſery near.

Obſerve Fourthly, The miſery of a wicked man is unmoveable.

His day of darkneſs is eſtabliſhed by an irrevocable decree, there is no getting it off; he is under a Divine Fate. A day of darkneſs may come over the Saints, but that day blows over: David ſaid once of his day of light, It ſhall never be dark; and of his Mountain, it ſhall never be removed; yet he was deceived: But a wicked mans day of darkneſs ſhall never be light, nor can he uſe any proper means to turn his day of darkneſs into light. He cannot pray, and it is prayer that turns darkneſs into light; he cannot believe, and it is Faith that turns a day of darkneſs into light; he hath not a Chriſt to go unto, and it is Chriſt only who can turn darkneſs into light, death to life, and the waters of ſorrow into the wine of joy; his darkneſs ſhall never be removed, who hath not Chriſt (who is light) to remove it.

Verſe 24. Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, they ſhall prevail upon him, as a King ready to battel.

In this Verſe we have a double effect of thoſe troubles, which are the portion of a wicked man; the firſt effect is, They ſhall make him afraid: the ſecond effect is, They ſhall prevail upon him; both which are illuſtrated by an elegant ſimilitude, They ſhall make him afraid, and they ſhall prevail upon him, as a King ready to Battel.

Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid.] Trouble without, and anguiſh within (ſo ſome expound) He ſhall have ſtraits in his ſtate, and a ſtrait upon his ſpirit; both meeting, ſhall not only afflict him, but make him afraid. The word may be tranſlated to fright, rather then to make afraid: They ſhall ſcare him, not only out of his comforts, but out of his wits and ſenſes. There is a threefold fear.

Firſt, Natural.

Secondly, Spiritual.

To be ſpiritually afraid is good; and to be naturally afraid is not evil: So Chriſt was not only afraid, but amazed (Mark 14. 33.)

Thirdly, There is a diſtracting, vexing fear, which is both a paſſion and a perturbation: This is at once the ſin and puniſhment of wicked men.

Conſider with what weapons and inſtruments God fights againſt a wicked man: he doth not ſay, Sword and fire ſhall make him afraid, Armies of enemies ſhall make him afraid, but trouble and anguiſh ſhall do it; God can create and form weapons in our own hearts, to fight againſt us: Inward anguiſh is far more grievous then any outward ſtroke. (Rom. 2. 9.) Tribulation and anguiſh ſhall be upon every ſoul that ſins, whether of Jew or Gentile: Anguiſh is the edge of tribulation, both joyned, wound ſoul and body; yea, ſtrike through both at every blow.

Hence Note, It is worſe to be afraid of evil, then to feel it.

Every thing is to us as we apprehend it, good is not pleaſing to us, nor evil afflictive to us, unleſs we think it ſo: They who are not afraid of death, welcome it when it comes; others, through fear of death, are held in bondage all the dayes of their life.

Secondly, Obſerve, Diſtracting fear is the portion of a wicked man.

The troubles of the righteous are many, but their fears are few (Pſal. 112.) His heart is fixed, he ſhall not be afraid: 'Tis not ſaid, he ſhall not hear evil tidings (I know no man whoſe ears are priviledg'd from ſuch reports) but he ſhall not be afraid; I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of people, that have ſet themſelves againſt me round about, (Pſal. 3. 6.) Though I walk in the valley of the ſhadow of death, I will fear no evil, Pſal. 23. 4. are the reſolves of Faith: Whoſoever hath much fear, hath but little Faith, Wherefore are ye afraid, O ye of little faith? Mat. 8. 26. And how can they but be afraid (when ſtorms ariſe) who are of no faith? When Faith increaſeth, fear decreaſeth; and when Faith is come to the height, fear is gone; where there is no Faith, there can be nothing but fear; Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, that's the firſt effect.

But that's not all, anguiſh doth not only fear the wicked man, but prevails againſt him: Some render, Trouble and anguiſh intrench about him: The ſence is the ſame, it is ſuch an intrenchment as concludes in a conqueſt; the beſieger prevails. A ſecond reads it thus, Trouble ſhall make him afraid, and anguiſh ſhall intrench about him. The Original joyns the two Subſtantives together, and the Verb is plural, Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, they ſhall prevail againſt him.

From this ſecond effect obſerve.

Evil ſholl get the upper hand of evil men.

A good man, poſſibly, may be afraid, and afraid ſinfully: exceſs of fear may take hold of him, but he ſhall not be prevailed againſt (Prov. 24. 16.) The juſt man falls ſeven times a day (into affliction and trouble) and riſeth up again; trouble may throw him down, but it cannot keep him down (Mic. 7. 8.) Rejoyce not againſt me, O mine enemy, when I fall, I ſhall riſe: The Church riſes in her falls, and ſhe ſometimes foreſees her riſing, when ſhe is fallen: The wicked fall, and riſe no more. And whereas the Saints are more then conquerors through him that loveth them; wicked men are more then conquered, they are utterly ruined, loſt, and vanquiſhed, becauſe not beloved. There are two battels wherein we cannot ſtand without the ſtrength of Chriſt.

Firſt, The battel of inward temptation.

Secondly, The battel of outward affliction.

We are no match for either, unleſs Chriſt be our Second. Satan hath deſired thee (ſaith Chriſt to Peter) to winnow thee as Wheat (hoping to find, or make thee Chaff) But I have prayed that thy Faith fail not: Peter fell into temptation, yea, he fell in the temptation, yet becauſe Chriſt undertook for him, the temptation could not prevail againſt him. And as there is no conqueſt over Satans temptation, but by the ſtrength of Chriſt; ſo none over affliction (which is Gods temptation) but by the ſtrength of Chriſt (1 Cor. 10. 13.) There hath no temptation (that is, no affliction) taken you, but what is common to man; yet no man can ſtand under that alone, which may befal any man, therefore it follows) But God is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above that you are able, &c. Man alone is not ſufficient, ſo much as to think one good thought, how then ſhall he think good thoughts enough alone, either to ſcatter a temptation, or to bear an affliction? To carry the ſoul out in ſuch a conflict requires more then one good thought, yea, more then many good thoughts; it requires good actings; yea, and ſufferings too; How ſhall he do this without the ſtrength of Chriſt? No wonder then if the leſſer of theſe, yea, the leaſt of the leſſer, the leaſt affliction prevail againſt a wicked man; and if while he runs with Foot-men they weary him, how ſhall he contend with Horſes, with trouble and anguiſh, ſhall not theſe prevail againſt him, as a King ready to battel? Which is the illuſtration of the wicked mans downfal: Trouble and anguiſh prevail againſt him: But how? Not a little, not with ſtrength only enough to turn the ſcale of the conflict, but mightily, even with much ſtrength to ſpare.

As a King ready to battel.] There are four interpretations for the making out of this ſimilitude; ſome place it between a wicked mans trouble and anguiſh, and the trouble and anguiſh of a King ready to joyn battel with a potent Adverſary: For, then his ſpirit is much troubled, knowing how great an adventure he makes, in reference to his ſtate, and how great a hazard he runs, in reference to his life, and perſon. The charge being ſometimes given, to fight neither againſt ſmall nor great, but only againſt the King. So wicked man when trouble comes, is like a King going to battel, full of fears and anxious thoughts what the iſſue and event may be: He looks upon himſelf as the mark, both of the wrath of God and man, and that every blow ſhall be directed againſt his breaſt.

Trouble and anguiſh ſingle out wicked men; when God ſends out his Armies of judgments, he charges them not to fight againſt the ſmall or great of his own people, but againſt the wicked of the world: Wrath aims at them, and therefore they are terrified at the approaches of wrath.

Secondly, Others give out the ſimilitude thus, Trouble and anguiſh ſhall come upon him, as a King ready to battel:

As when a King goes to Battel he is compaſſed with a ſtrong guard. (Every General hath his Life-guard, much more Kings) So, trouble and anguiſh ſhall compaſs a wicked man, as yet with wideſt difference; for the Guard compaſſeth the King for the ſafety and preſervation of his perſon; whereas trouble and anguiſh gather about wicked men for their deſtruction: But the Text will hardly admit this explication, and therefore I paſs it.

Prœliaturū regē circundare ſolebat globus militū, ut lectio Jygurinæ indicat. Anguſtia & circūvallatio eū circūſtāt ut regē confertis globis prœliaturum.

Thirdly, The Hebrew word which ſignifies a day of Battel, ſignifies alſo a Sphear, or round Globe, we tranſlate it, a Ball (Iſa. 22. 18.) where it is propheſied againſt Shebna, that the Lord would make him an example, and that (as the Hebrew is) Toſſing, he would toſs him with a toſſing, that is, he would ſurely toſs, and turn him like a Ball, into a far Countrey; as a Ball is toſſed or thrown, ſo the Lord would throw him into Captivity. Now becauſe it is a uſual way of embattailing; to draw an Army into the form of a Globe, or Ball; therefore the ſame word which ſignifies a Sphear, or Globe, ſignifies alſo a Battel, from the form of it. Taking it in this ſenſe, for any thing that is round, or circular as a Ball, or Sphear. This third interpretation of the ſimilitude riſeth thus, Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, they ſhall prevail upon him, as a King put in Chains, or into a hoop of Iron; ſome labour much for the maintaining of this interpretation, That Eliphaz intends to ſhew how wicked oppreſſors ſhall be ſurrounded & held faſt with trouble, like ſome great Kings, who falling into the hands of their Enemies, have been ſhut up in round Iron Cages, as Tamerlane carried Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperor; or bound in Chains, as it is Propheſied in the 149. Pſalm. It was the uſe of thoſe times, to make hoops of Iron, for the ſecuring of Kings and Princes taken in Battel; the forms of which, and how thoſe captivated Kings were lockt up in them, with the poſture of their bodies in that baſe impriſonment, may be ſeen in Boldoc upon this Verſe; and he annexeth divers texts of Scripture, in which he conceives there is an alluſion to this courſe way of handling Kings.

Fourthly, Our reading compares trouble and anguiſh to a King, ready to Battel; as if he had ſaid, Trouble and anguiſh ſhall prevail upon him irreſiſtably: This is but a high expreſſion of greateſt preparation for a Battel; for when a King goeth forth to Battel in perſon, he will have all the ſtrength of his Kingdom with him, which Job himſelf clears in the 29. Chapter, Verſ. 25. where deſcribing his own former felicity, he concludes, I choſe out their way, and ſat chief, and dwelt as a King in the Army: That is, in great ſtrength and power. So the Apoſtle ſpeaks (1 Cor. 4. 8.) You have reigned as Kings without us, and I would to God ye did reign; that is, you conceive you have had the confluence of all comforts, and ſtrengths, You have reigned as Kings, I would you had, that we alſo might reign with you, or ſhare in your felicity. So that when Eliphaz ſaith, Trouble and anguiſh ſhall prevail, as a King armed, and ready to ſet forth to Battel; his meaning is, They ſhall prevail ſtrongly, yea irreſiſtably. The wicked man ſhall not be able to ſtand their charge, much leſs repulſe it. Theſe ſeveral explications of the ſimilitude meet in one common truth: That as the wicked ſhall not ſtand in judgment, when God comes to judg all the World; ſo when the Lord ſends forth his judgments upon any part of the World, they are the men that ſhall ſurely fall; trouble and anguiſh ſhall terrifie them, as a King going to joyn Battel, or as a King taken and captivated in Battel, or as a King conquering and prevailing over his Foes in Battel. Sin prevails always upon wicked men, as a King commanding and ruling over them; at laſt, trouble (which is the fruit of ſin) ſhall prevail upon them as a King oppreſſing and deſtroying them. They who will not ſubmit to the rule of the Law as a King to guide them: ſhall be forced to ſubmit to the curſe of the Law, as a King to puniſh them.

VERS. 25, 26.

For he ſtretched out his hand againſt God, and ſtrengthened himſelf againſt the Almighty.

He runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick boſſes of his Bucklers.

Eliphaz having explained much of the inward puniſhment of wicked men, the torture which they indure upon the rack of conſcience, as alſo ſome of their outward puniſhments, he ſubjoyns the reaſon of both, their ſin, in theſe two Verſes, and that not an ordinary ſin, but a ſin committed with a high hand.

Verſ. 25. He ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God.

And is it any wonder then that God ſhould ſtretch out his hand againſt him? Every ſin deſerves puniſhment, and ſhall be puniſhed either upon the ſinner, or upon his Surety; but extraordinary ſins call for extraordinary puniſhments: they who have done much evil, ſhall endure much. Juſtice hath an eye to the quantity, as well as to the quality of our works; and that's a work of wickedneſs in Folio, or of the largeſt ſize, which is done with a hand ſtretched-out: What revenge is big enough for a ſin thus big?

He ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God.] Here are three things to be opened:

Firſt, What is meant by the hand.

Secondly, What is meant by ſtretching out the hand.

Thirdly, How the hand may be ſtretched out againſt God.

Tanto ſupplicio nunc ſcelus digniſſimū explicat. Pined.

The hand may be taken properly, or improperly; properly for that member of the body, which is ſo uſeful and inſtrumental in all the ſervices of this life; and then to ſtretch out the hand, muſt be taken in a proper ſenſe, for ſo wicked men ſometimes do; they ſtretch out the hand of the body againſt God, by acting ſins of violence, and by acting violently in many ſins.

The outward members, eſpecially the hand and tongue, are made the weapons of unrighteouſneſs, both againſt God and Man.

The Church-Hiſtorian reports of Julian the Apoſtate, that when he was wounded in the Battel againſt the Parthians, he took of his blood, and threw it up to Heaven, he ſtretched out his hand againſt God, ſaying, in deriſion of Chriſt, O Galilæan thou haſt overcome: This outward geſture of his body, expreſſed the ſecret indignation of his mind. And it is obſerved by Jerom, who ſaith, he received it from the Tradition of the Jews, that the Amalakites, who were profeſſed Enemies to the Jews, did lye upon the watch, to take all advantages againſt them, in their march from Egypt to Canaan, and when at any time they turned aſide out of the way, either becauſe of legal uncleanneſs, or upon any natural neceſſity, they would fall upon them and ſlay them; which being done, they cut off that member which had the Seal of the Covenant (Circumciſion) upon it, and with their hands ſtretched out, threw it up towards Heaven, as if they would challenge God himſelf to revenge their blaſphemy of him, and the contempt of that Sacred Inſtitution.

Theod. l. 3. cap. 20. Niceph. l. 10. cap. 35.

Amalachitæ Iſraelitas in Exitu de Egypto vel ob laſſitudinem vel ob legalem immunditiē extra caſtra degentes occiderunt, & eorū circūciſionē amputatam in ſubſannationē Dei projecerunt in cœlum. Hieron.

Secondly, The hand is taken improperly, or metaphorically; ſo, the power of a man is his hand, the ſtrength of his whole body, ſtate, and mind, may be called his hand; his riches are his hand, his credit is his hand, his wit, and parts, Learning, and Eloquence, are his hand, as there is a power in all theſe. And when it is ſaid here, He ſtretcheth forth his hand againſt God; we may underſtand it in that latitude; for a wicked man improves the ſtrength of his body, the power of his Eſtate, his Credit, his Wit, all his accommodations in the way of Rebellion againſt God. A man is ſaid to ſtretch out himſelf, when he doth his utmoſt to attain his end, and makes the moſt of himſelf to any purpoſe: In ſuch caſes he ſtretcheth all that he is (as we ſay) upon the Tenters; and this all of his put together, is his hand ſtretched out againſt God.

Further, To ſtretch out the hand, imports four things.

Firſt, To do a thing with the utmoſt intention of mind and body, to do it with all our might and fulleſt reſolution. Joſhua being reſolved to bring total deſtruction upon the men of Ai, Drew not his hand back wherewith he ſtretched out his Spear, till he utterly deſtroyed all the Inhabitants of Ai (Joſh. 8. 26.) The ſtretching forth of his hand was emblematical, ſpeaking, or implying that his ſpirit kept up to the height of reſolution, for the ruine of that City and people.

Extendere manum eſt omnē adhibere conatū ad percutiēdū hoſtē aut aliquid aliud aggrediendum.

When the Scripture ſpeaks of God, acting towards Man, either in a way of judgment or mercy, this phraſe is often uſed, (Exod. 6. 6.) Wherefore ſay to the Children of Iſrael, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with an out-ſtretched arm. (Exod. 14. 8.) The Children of Iſrael went out with an high hand; and at the ſixth Verſe of the ſame Chapter, the Lord bid Moſes, Stretch his hand over the Sea; to ſhew that he was purpoſed to work a Miracle, for the deliverance of his people. The Prophets are frequent in this language (Iſa. 5. 25.) Therefore is the anger of the Lord kindled againſt his people, and he hath ſtretched forth his hand againſt them: Read Chap. 9. Verſ. 12, 17, 21. Chap. 10. 4. Jer. 51. 25. Ezek. 14. 13. Chap. 15. 7. In all theſe places when the Lord went with full purpoſe to puniſh, he is ſaid, To ſtretch out his hand. Now as when God ſtretcheth out his hand againſt Man, it ſhews his reſolvedneſs to ſmite, ſo when man ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God, it ſhews his reſolvedneſs to ſin, or his actual ſinning with full intention and ſtrength of ſpirit.

Secondly, Mans ſtretching out his hand, ſpeaks the confidence of a man, that he ſhall carry all before him, and win the day; it is uſual with contenders, eſpecially with Souldiers, before they joyn Battel, to ſtretch their hands out, to draw and brandiſh their Swords, in token both of their courage to fight, and of their confidence to prevail. Obſtinate ſinners are full of falſe hopes that they ſhall obtain what they deſign, and proſper in their projects of wickedneſs, and therefore they are ſaid to ſtretch out the hand againſt God.

Thirdly, Stretching out the hand, is a poſture of pride and impudence; pride is written upon a ſtretched-out-hand. To ſin preſumptuouſly, is in the Original to ſin with a high hand (Numb. 15. 30.) The Septuagint render that place, The ſoul that in the hand of pride thinks ſo, ſhall be cut off: The Caldee Paraphraſe gives it thus; He that ſins with an uncovered head; An uncovered head is an argument of boldneſs, and that he who acts, cares not who ſees him. Modeſty cauſeth us to hang down, or cover the head, when we have done ill, and ſhame makes us cover the head when we receive evil, or are puniſhed (Jer. 14. 4.) The Plowmen were aſhamed, they covered their heads becauſe the ground was chapt: for there was no rain in the Earth: So that to do, or ſuffer with an uncovered head, is like doing or ſuffering with a high, or ſtretched-out-hand, boldly, preſumptuouſly, and as it were, hanging out a Flag of defiance again the God of Heaven.

Anima quæ in manu ſuperbiæ. Sep.

Fourthly, Stretching out the hand, is the poſture of a furious mad man; he that wants the uſe of his reaſon, makes this uſe of his hand, laying about him, as if he would do wonders; ſuch madneſs lodgeth in the hearts of debauched ſinners, they do they know not what; they rage and are furious, as if they would pull God out of Heaven, and throw the Houſe, yea the World, out at the Windows: Theſe ſtretch their hands againſt God, and they do it three wayes.

Firſt, Againſt the very being of God; ſuch a wicked man oppoſeth God as God, he wiſheth there were no God, or that himſelf were God; he would have all power in his own hand: Francis Spira in his deſpairing diſtraction ſaid, I would I were above God: In him nature ſpake her mind plainly, and not in Parables: Nature heightned in wickedneſs would be above God; therefore a carnal man is called, A hater of God: Now that which we hate we would deſtroy, and take out of the way.

Secondly, There is a ſtretching out the hand againſt God, not only in this open bold challenge, or profeſſed oppoſition; this very few will own. Few Atheiſts will ſpeak out their blaſphemy, or ſend their Trumpet to defie God; and moſt wicked men take a ſuſpicion of this, as the higheſt diſhonour and affront that can be put upon them. What? They oppoſe God? They ſtretch out their hand againſt God? They will tell you, they love God, and it may be they will tell you that God is their God, and yet will be found ſtretching out their hand againſt God: therefore not only do his profeſſed Enemies ſtretch out their hand againſt God, but even thoſe his profeſſed Friends, who live in the open violation of his righteous Laws; they who oppoſe the will and Word of God, the Statutes and Ordinances of God, theſe will be found to ſtretch forth their hand againſt God himſelf.

The Lord complains (Mal. 3. 13.) Your words have been ſtout againſt me: Who? we ſtout againſt God? when did we ſpeak againſt God? we never had ſuch a thought in our hearts, much leſs, ſuch words in our mouthes: So it followes, Yet ye ſay, What have we ſpoken ſo much againſt thee? The Lord tells them (becauſe it ſeems they could not) Verſ. 14. Ye have ſaid it is a vain thing to ſerve the Lord, and what profit have we, that we have kept his Ordinances, and ye call the proud happy, &c. To ſpeak, or think thus (though ſuch a word be not ſpoken formally, as it is probable they did not) is to be ſtout againſt God. To ſay, It is a vain thing to ſerve the Lord, is not only a diſſervice, but a Rebellion againſt the Lord: To ſay, There is no profit in keeping his Ordinances, is the higheſt prophanation of his Ordinances; to call, The proud happy, is to ſtretch out the hand againſt God, for he ſtretcheth out his hand againſt, and reſiſteth the proud.

Thirdly, The hand is ſtretched out againſt God, when it is ſtretched out againſt his people, his Servants, or any that are under his tuition, and ſpecial protection; to oppoſe, or ſtretch out the hand againſt theſe, is to ſtretch out the hand againſt God. The Prophet Zachary ſets forth both the care of God to keep his people from trouble, and his Sympathy with them in trouble, by an elegant Similitude: He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye (Zach. 2. 8.) What part is more ſenſible of the leaſt hurt, then the eye, or being hurt, cauſeth a greater ſmart? God is as tender of his people as any man is of his own eyes. He that toucheth them, ſc. to wrong or vex them, toucheth the apple of Gods eye, he lifts up his hand againſt Gods face, and againſt the moſt excellent part of his face, his eye, and againſt the moſt excellent part of his eye, the apple of it or ball of the eye which is the proper inſtrument of ſeeing. We uſe to ſay, There is no ſporting with the eyes; men do not like it, to have their eyes played with: Surely then God will not bear it, that any ſhould ſmite or wound his eyes. And he interprets any hurt done to his people, as done to his own eye, yea to the apple of his eye. When it was under debate in the Councel what ſhould be done with the Apoſtles, Gamaliel adviſes, Refrain from theſe men, and let them alone, &c. Leſt haply ye be found to fight againſt God (Acts 5. 38, 39.) Some poſſibly would reply, We fighters againſt God? We love God; here is a company of turblent Fellows called Apoſtles, who diſquiet the City, may we not puniſh them, but we muſt preſently be judged fighters againſt God? No, ſaith Gamaliel, you fight againſt God, if they and their Apoſtleſhip be of God.

Dicimus vulgò cum oculis non ludendum eſt.

Saul was zealous of the Law, and (as he thought) for God; yet Chriſt rebukes him from Heaven, with Saul, Saul, Why perſecuteſt thou me? Thou ſtretcheſt forth thy hand againſt me, when thou doſt it againſt the Saints; then, there is a ſtretching out the hand againſt God, not only by a boiſterous oppoſition of God, As Pharaoh, Senacharib, and Julian did, but by oppoſing the wayes or word, the Meſſengers or Servants of God.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Though every ſin be againſt God, yet ſome ſins are more againſt God.

We cannot ſay that every one who ſins, ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God; there is a difference of ſins in degree, though they are all in their nature deadly; there is a preſumptuous ſin, a ſin committed with a high hand, which hath theſe two things chiefly in it.

First, A ſinning againſt clear light.
Secondly, A ſinning with full conſent and ſwindge of will.

In that place of Numbers, where this ſin is deſcribed (Chap. 15. 30.) There are two other Characters put upon it: Firſt, it is called, A reproaching the Lord: And ſecondly, a deſpiſing of the Word of the Lord; Every ſin is a tranſgreſſion of the Word of the Lord, but every ſin is not a deſpiſing of the Word of the Lord; every ſin is diſpleaſing to God, but every ſin is not reproaching of God: Every ſin, even the leaſt, is a departure from God, but ſome ſins are full of activity againſt God.

It is conceived, that the preſumptuous ſin in the old Teſtament, is the ſame with, or anſwers to, the ſin againſt the holy Ghoſt in the New; and that which leads to this apprehenſion is, becauſe no ſacrifice was appointed for that under the Law, as this is ſaid to be unpardonable under the Goſpel. And the Author to the Hebrews is expreſs (Chap. 10.26.) If we ſin wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more ſacrifice for ſins. The Goſpel knowes but of one Sacrifice for ſin, and that but once offered; they who deſpiſe that, have deſpiſed all, for there remains no more Sacrifice for ſin. God will not ſend his Son to die a ſecond time for thoſe who have trodden the Son of God in his death under foot, and have counted the blood of the Covenant an unholy thing. God indeed ſtretcheth out his hand all the day long, to a gain-ſaying and rebellious people, that is, to thoſe who ſtretch out their hands againſt him in his Law: But he will not ſtretch out his hand (unleſs to ſmite) to a gain-ſaying and rebellious people, who (in this ſenſe) ſtretch out their hands againſt him in the Goſpel.

Secondly, From the connexion of this Verſe with the former,

Obſerve, That God proportions the puniſhment of man unto his ſin.

There is a twofold proportionating of puniſhment to ſin.

Firſt, In the quality, or manner of it.

Secondly, In the quantity, or degree of it.

The Juſtice of God is viſible in both, according to the exact rules of retaliation: As I have done, ſo the Lord hath requited me, ſaid Adonibezek (Judg. 1.) He was puniſhed in the ſame manner that he had ſinned, and ſo have many others. But all ſhall be puniſhed in the ſame degree that they have ſinned. If ſin be great, ſo ſhall the puniſhment of it be. When the iniquity of Amorite was full, he had his fill of wrath. When God himſelf was preſſed with the ſin of Iſrael, as a Cart with Sheaves: then he laid on load in judgment. If any wonder why the wicked man ſhould be hurried, troubled, vexed, why he travelleth in pain all his dayes, he may ceaſe to wonder, when he reads, that the wicked man ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God. Is it any wonder God ſhould ſhew himſelf an Enemy to them, who practice the Enemy againſt him? Or that they ſhould be higheſt in ſuffering, who have been higheſt in ſin? The Prophet Amos reproves and complains of thoſe, who made the Ephah ſmall, and the Shekel great (Chap. 8. 5.) That is, who abated the meaſure, and enhanſed, or raiſed the price of their commodities: But if man makes the Ephah, or meaſure of his ſin ſmall, God will not make the Shekel of his puniſhment great. The wages which the Juſtice of God payes the ſinner, ſhall not be a peny more then his ſinning-work hath deſerved.

Thirdly, In that the ſtretching out the hand againſt God, is a ſin againſt light, Obſerve, That ſins committed againſt light, leave the ſoul in the greateſt darkneſs.

A ſin committed in the darkneſs of ignorance, deſerves yet to be puniſhed with darkneſs, even with everlaſting darkneſs; much more thoſe ſins which are committed, not only in, but againſt the light of knowledge. Some ſhall periſh for want of light; they cannot but periſh who live and die in the abuſe of light. Many ſhall periſh becauſe they have not ſtretched forth their hands according to the light received, to work for God; how deeply then ſhall they periſh, who in the midſt of received light, ſtretch out their hands to work wickedneſs againſt God?

Fourthly, Eliphaz deſcribes the wicked man ſtretching out his hand; that is, all the power which God hath truſted him with, to provoke God with.

Hence Obſerve, That wicked men abuſe the good gifts of God, and turn them againſt God himſelf.

They uſe their hand, properly taken, againſt God; as alſo their metaphorical hand, their whole ſtrength againſt God; they ſtretch their authority, their high places, their parts, and wits againſt God; they form weapons out of all the good gifts of God, to fight againſt God; ſuch ſinning is out of meaſure ſinful. The idle Servant was condemned, who did not employ and improve the one Talent which he had received, to his Maſters advantage; of how much ſorer condemnation ſhall they be thought worthy who employ their many Talents to their Maſters loſs, and diſadvantage?

Laſtly Obſerve, Sin is the greateſt evil.

That muſt needs be the greateſt evil which oppoſeth the greateſt good: God is the greateſt good, every ſin is againſt God, and ſome ſins directly oppoſe God. The Apoſtle argues the evil of ſin, from the oppoſition it makes againſt us (1 Pet. 2.11.) Dearly beloved, I beſeech you as ſtrangers, and pilgrims, abſtain from fleſhly luſts (he doth not ſay, which fight againſt, or diſhonour God, but) which war againſt the ſoul: We have no reaſon to be dallying with luſts, or to be friends with them, when we hear that our luſts war againſt us; but when we remember that our luſts war againſt God, we ſhould not only abſtain from them, but abhor them. Every thing is by ſo much the worſe, by how much that is better which it is contrary unto: There are four conſiderations which heighten the evil of ſin upon this account, that it is a ſtretching out of the hand againſt God.

Firſt, Stretch out a hand againſt God! No man ſhould dare ſo much as to lift up a word againſt God.

Secondly, Stretch out a hand againſt God! No man ſhould dare ſo much as to lift up a thought againſt God.

Thirdly, Stretch out a hand againſt God! Every man ought to fall down before God, and be well-pleaſed with whatſoever God ſaith or doth.

Fourthly, Every man is bound to ſtretch out heart and tongue, and hand, to think and ſpeak and do for God, and when all this is done, we have done but our duty, and the utmoſt that any man doth or can do in theſe, is not half his duty. How wide then is he from, how oppoſite to his duty, who ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God? And (as it follows in the next words.)

Strengthens himſelf againſt the Almighty.] That is, As the Original imports, who makes himſelf a ſtrong Warrier, and will ſhew his valour againſt the Almighty: So Mr. Brougton, He would be valiant againſt the Almighty: Or as another tranſlates to the letter of the Text, He ſhews himſelf a man againſt the Almighty; as if he had ſaid, This wicked man ſtrains all the ſtrength he hath, to ſhew himſelf a man of his hands, or to play the man againſt God. The Apoſtle uſeth that word, in reference to temptation, Play the men, or quit your ſelves like men: Saints play the man againſt Satan; wicked ones play the man againſt God: he ſtrengthens himſelf againſt God. But how? What doth the wicked man to ſtrengthen himſelf? Doth he gather Armies, lay in Ammunition, fortifie Cities, and Caſtles? Doth he thus ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Almighty? All theſe are no ſtrength againſt God, and this is not the way the wicked man takes to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt God; how then? He ſtrengthens himſelf againſt God, by hardening his heart, by ſtopping his ears, by ſetting his face, by debauching his conſcience againſt the call and command of God. Thus,

ἀνδρίζεσθε. 1 Cor. 16.13

He ſtrengthens himſelf againſt the Almighty.

Before we had the word God, the ſtrong God, here the Almighty, which word in the Hebrew, ſignifies not only one that hath great power: But,

Firſt, All power; Shaddai is he that hath power to do all things: Omnipotency is one of the incommunicable Attributes of God: All the power of man is of his giving, but he hath not given all power to any man, no nor to all men. Only Chriſt as Mediator, or God-man hath all power given to him. It is not the will of God to do all that is in his power, but it is in his power to do whatſoever he will. If the wicked mans power were ſuch, what work would he make? If he could do as much as himſelf pleaſeth, he would do nothing, which ſhould pleaſe either God or good men.

Secondly, The word ſignifieth, ſuch a one as hath a ſufficiency in himſelf to do what he will; God needeth not to go out for any aid, or call in the aſſiſtance of any creature: Shaddai is the Original of power, he hath all his power laid up in his own compaſs, and his compaſs is infiniteneſs; he is ſelf-ſufficient. Some Princes think they have power enough to do what they will, but they muſt do it with other mens hands. Though they have a civil power or authority to command all, yet they have not a natural power, ſtrength, ſtrength, or ability to execute all. God hath both theſe powers, he hath abſolute authority to command all to ſerve and help him; and he hath ſuch an abſolute ability, that he needs none to ſerve or help him: He that made the World alone, what cannot he do alone? God calls for our help that we may have the honour of it, not that he hath any want of it.

Qui ſufficit omnibus aliis.

Thirdly, Shaddai is he who hath not only enough for himſelf, but for all others; the five wiſe Virgins had Oyl in their Lamps, and they had enough for themſelves, but they had none to ſpare, they could not furniſh the five fooliſh Virgins. But the Lord God Almighty hath ſtrength and wiſdom for all that come to him, and call upon him: As he is ſelf-ſufficient, ſo he is all-ſufficient; his Ocean can quickly fill all our empty Veſſels, and his treaſury ſupply and bear all our charges. This Almighty God, who hath power to do what he pleaſeth, who hath all this power in himſelf, and who hath power enough to give out to all that need, and ask it of him, this is the Almighty, againſt whom the wicked man ſtrengthens himſelf.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That the heart of man is very buſie to arm againſt God.

As when a people are threatned with an invaſion, they then ſtrengthen themſelves, they lay in their Proviſions of War, and get Forces in a readineſs: even thus doth the heart of man: Man hath three uſual wayes of ſtrengthening himſelf againſt the Almighty. Firſt, By carnal pleas and reaſonings. He pretends reaſon for what he doth; and he ſtrengthens himſelf againſt all that God ſaith, by reaſon: he ſets up reaſon againſt that Law which is the quinteſſence of reaſon, and will not be mad but by reaſon, ſuch as it is, and that is, ſuch as he is, a mad one. Theſe reaſonings are the ſtrong holds ſpoken of by the Apoſtle (2 Cor. 4. 5.) The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of ſtrong holds, caſting down imaginations, and every high thing, that exalteth it ſelf againſt the knowledge of God: As the weapons of this warfare are not carnal but ſpiritual, ſo the ſtrong holds which theſe caſt down, are not corporeal, but carnal; they are not made of Stones, and Timber, of Earth, or Iron, but of the ſubtilties, ſlights, excuſes, ſubterfuges, and arguings of fleſhly minded men. All which the Apoſtle wraps up in the latter words calling them imaginations, or ratiocinations, and high things; that is, ſuch things as are formed in the high and proud conceits of the creature exalting it ſelf againſt the ſound and ſaving knowledge of God: Such as theſe:

First, Others do ſo.

Thirdly, This is the cuſtom of the World.

Fourthly, If I ſhould not do ſo, I ſhould diſhonor, yea and undo my ſelf: And why ſhould I refrain what others do, or what would be my own undoing? No reaſon for any of theſe. Thus he ſtrengthens himſelf againſt the Almighty: his reaſon (ſuch as it is) will bear him out.

Secondly, He ſtrengthens himſelf againſt God upon preſumption of mercy from God; why may not I do thus? God hath mercy for ſinners, why not for me though I ſin? The Apoſtle cautions the Epheſians (Chap. 5. 6.) againſt ſuch preſumptions. Let no man deceive you with vain words, for becauſe of theſe things, the wrath of God comes upon the Children of diſobedience: It is good to plead mercy to ſtrengthen Faith, that ſin committed ſhall be pardoned; but wo be to thoſe, who plead mercy to ſtrengthen themſelves in the committing of ſin.

Thirdly, Others ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the Almighty with hopes of worldly gain, and they incourage themſelves in an evil matter, with promiſes of good; We ſhall find all precious ſubſtance, we ſhall fill our houſes with ſpoil, caſt in thy Lot among us, let us all have one Purſe: Thus Solomon perſonates the inticements of ſinners (Prov. 1. 13, 14.)

As a gracious heart ſtrengthens it ſelf for God:

Firſt, By the promiſes of God.

Secondly, By the experiences which himſelf, or others have had of Gods diſpenſations.

Thirdly, By conſidering the nature of God, how gracious, how good, how powerful, how faithful he is.

Fourthly, By remembring his relations to God; he is my Father, my King, &c. Shall I not venture to do or ſuffer for him?

Now (I ſay) as a gracious heart ſtrengthens it ſelf for the Lord, or (as the Apoſtle adviſeth, Epheſ. 6. 10.) Grows ſtrong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, putting on the whole Armour of God: So a wicked heart ſtrengthens it ſelf againſt the Lord, or grows ſtrong againſt the Lord, and the power of his might, yea of his Almightineſs, putting on the whole Armour of the Devil, that he may be able to ſtand againſt all the encounters of the Word, and of his own conſcience. For as the Word of God, and the graces of the ſpirit are the Armour and weapons by which the Saints ſtrengthen themſelves againſt Satan; ſo carnal reaſonings and the luſts of the fleſh, are the Armour and weapons by which wicked men ſtrengthen themſelves againſt God.

A wicked mans chief care is to fortifie and incourage his luſts; to put warm cloaths to his ſinful heart, and make it ſtout againſt God: Sin begins with turning the heart from God, and ſin ends in turning the heart againſt God: The firſt ſtep in ſin is a neglect of God, the ſecond ſtep is contempt of God, the third and laſt is a War with God: He ſtrengthens himſelf (for the Battel) againſt the Almighty.

Secondly Obſerve, Sin runs us againſt reaſon, and cauſeth us to act not only wickedly, but fooliſhly.

Is it not folly and madneſs for weakneſs to contend with Omnipotency? When a ſinner hath ſtrengthned himſelf the beſt he can, the very weakneſs of God (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks) is ſtronger then he. What King (ſaith Chriſt, Luk. 14. 31.) going to make War againſt another King, doth not firſt ſit down, &c. As if he had ſaid, The Kings of the Earth are not ſo fooliſh, ſo brainleſs, and counſelleſs to contend with thoſe, whom they cannot match; they will hardly venture a Battel with ten thouſand againſt twenty thouſand, they will rather make a diſadvantageous Peace, then proceed in a War upon ſuch diſadvantages. The King of Iſrael reproved the challenge which the King of Judah ſent him, by the Parable of the Thiſtle in Lebanon, aſpiring to match with the Cedar in Lebanon (2 King. 14. 9.) What's a Thiſtle to a Cedar? Then what is man to God? See then what a reaſonleſs, yea ſenſleſs creature man is, who will needs go out againſt God to Battel, though all the number he can muſter, is not only as diſproportionable as ten thouſand to twenty thouſand, as a Thiſtle to a Cedar, but more then one ſingle man is to a Million of men, or then a bruiſed Reed to the ſtrongeſt Oak. God with eaſe made all the power of man alone, and he, though alone, can more eaſily deſtroy it: it coſt him but the ſpeaking of a word to ſet it up, and he can pull it down with, yea without a word ſpeaking. Many men have been ſtyled, The great, The ſtrong, The mighty: But no man ever durſt own this ſtyle, The Almighty: This title of God in the Text, The Almighty, ſhould make the mightieſt of men, the Nimrods of the World afraid to meddle, yea to think a thought of medling with God. The abſurdity of men in ſtrengthening themſelves againſt the Almighty, may appear yet more diſtinctly in three particulars.

Firſt, He that is Almighty is ſtronger then All; there cannot be two Almighties. Hence the Apoſtle argues (1 Cor. 10.) Will you provoke the Lord to anger, are you ſtronger then he? It is baſe and cowardly to provoke thoſe that are weaker then our ſelves; it may give us trouble enough to provoke thoſe who are as ſtrong as our ſelves, but it is either madneſs or deſperateneſs to provoke thoſe who are ſtronger then our ſelves. And when the Apoſtle demands, or rather expoſtulates, Are ye ſtronger then he? His queſtion calls for this poſitive aſſertory anſwer, we are infinitely weaker then he; and therefore there is no prevailing againſt him, not only not in all things, but not in any thing. It is poſſible for a weak Enemy to prevail ſometimes upon a mighty Enemy. The Romans who commanded the world for many ages, and were too ſtrong for any Nation, did yet receive ſome foils; though they were never conquered, yet they were ſometimes worſted, not only by ſurpriſals and Ambuſcadoes, but in the open field; and even petty Princes gave checks for a while, to ſome of their deſigns. But El-ſhaddai, the Almighty God, never received any defeat, nor is he within the poſſibility of a ſurpize.

Secondly, Not only cannot the Lord be defeated, but he cannot be endammaged; he never loſt (as we ſay) ſo much as a hair of his head, nor did he ever ſuffer ſo much as the ſcratch of a Pin. The Romans obtained ſome Victories with ſuch extream loſs and hazzard, that it hath been ſaid, Two or three more ſuch Victories, would utterly undo them; they who were never defeated or foiled, have yet been greatly endammaged in Battel; and their cleareſt gains have not been without ſome loſs: but the Almighty never loſt the worth of a thread, or drop of blood, in all thoſe innumerable Victories which he hath gained.

Thirdly, Man cannot ſo much as hinder or retard the deſigns of God. He tranſcends all the impediments, and throws open all the Barracadoes that are ſet in his way. He will work, and who ſhall let him? (Iſa. 43. 13.) There is no putting of a bar in his way; and therefore if any ſhould anſwer the queſtion, Who ſhall let it? Yes, there are ſome will let it, the great men, the Nobles of the Earth, ſay no; they will let it. But they ſhall not, ſaith God, in the next Verſe (Verſ. 14.) For your ſake (ſpeaking to his people in Captivity) I have ſent to Babylon, and have brought down all their Nobles. The Original word for Nobles, ſignifies alſo Bars, the Bars of a door, or Caſtle-gate, as we put in the Margin of our Bibles; to note, that Nobles and great men ſhould be the ſtrength of a People, and a ſtop to the entrance of any evil among them: but if in ſtead of that, they prove like Bars, only to hinder the good of a People, and to lie croſs in all publike proceedings; then the Lord, the Lord of Lords, and King of Kings, brings them down, and breaks them all to pieces. I will work, and who ſhall let it? The Nobles, the Bars ſhall not, though Bars of Iron to Gates of Braſs.

It was ſaid in opening the words, that ſtretching out the hand is the poſture of a mad man: Conſider this, and then ſay, Is it not the maddeſt madneſs to ſtretch out the hand againſt God, or to ſtrengthen our ſelves againſt the Almighty, to oppoſe him, againſt whom it is impoſſible not only to prevail, but to do him the leaſt hurt, or give him the leaſt check or ſtop in his way? If we ſhould ſee a man ſet his ſhoulder againſt a Wall of Braſs, or blow a Feather againſt it, hoping to overturn and batter it down, would not we ſay, this man is either a Fool, who never had the uſe of reaſon, or a Mad-man, who hath loſt his reaſon? He that oppoſeth the counſels and ways of God, can no more overthrow them, then a Feather can a Wall of Braſs, or the touch of a little finger, the ſtrongeſt Tower. The Pſalmiſt repreſents us with theſe ſimple attempts (Pſal. 2. 1, 2, &c.) Why do the Gentiles rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The Kings of the earth take counſel, &c. Come let us break their bands and caſt their cords away from us: What follows? He that ſits in Heaven ſhall laugh, the Lord ſhall have them in deriſion: He ſees how poor, how inconſiderable, theſe motions and commotions, both of the Many and of the Mighty are, to give check to that Decree of his Almightineſs, to ſet his Son upon the holy Hill of Sion.

Eliphaz hath not yet done with his deſcription of the impotent rage of man againſt the Almighty God. O ſinful vain man, whither wilt thou go? What wilt thou do next? The next Verſe tells us, Verſ. 26. He runs upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick Boſſes of his Bucklers.

This 26. Verſe is an amplification, or aggravation of the madneſs of a wicked man, who, when he hath ſtrengthened himſelf againſt God (as he thinks and hopes) ſufficiently, then he runs upon him, &c.

Eliphaz carrieth on the metaphor of a Battel, which before it is fought, Armies are muſtered, and drawn up in view of each other; and then to ſhew their courage, they ſtretch out their hands, draw their Swords, and as ſoon as the Signal of the Battel is given, by ſound of Trumpet, beat of Drum, or diſcharge of Cannon, they run on upon one another; and when the Battel comes to the heat and hight, they charge home, even upon the necks of one another, and upon the Boſſes of their Bucklers: Here's the deſcription of a fierce charge. This wicked one is a Champion for Hell, he challenges the God of Heaven, and runs upon him, &c. with utmoſt violence: That's the ſum of the words, I ſhall now open them a little further.

He runs upon him, even upon his neck.

There is a difference among Interpreters about that Antecedent, ſome underſtand God: As if the meaning were, God runneth upon a wicked man, like a ſtrong Warrier, with incredible ſwiftneſs and irreſiſtible force, to caſt him down. The wicked man having ſtretched out his hand, and ſtrengthned himſelf againſt the Almighty, now the Almighty runs upon his neck, even upon the thick boſſes of his Buckler; Come ſaith God, I will have a bout with thee, if thou dareſt, I will try it out with thee, I am not afraid of thy ſtiff neck, though it hath Iron ſinews, nor of the thick boſſes of thy Buckler, though they be of Steel.

Quia impius manū in Deū extēdit ideo currit in eū Deus ad collum & in dēſitate dorſorū clypeorū ejus, q. d. in ea quibus iſte maxime roboratur. Rab. Lev. Vatabl. Beza.

Thus ſome, both later Writers, and ancient Rabbins, give the ſenſe, but I rather conceive (with others) that Eliphaz ſtill proſecutes the ſtrange progreſs, and hightned wickedneſs of man, who having ſtrengthned himſelf, by hardning his heart againſt God, runs upon him, even upon his neck, &c. Taking this ſenſe, there is a different reading; thus, He runs upon him with his neck; we ſay, the wicked man runs upon the neck of God; they ſay, A wicked man runs upon God with his neck; their meaning is, He runs upon him audaciouſly and proudly. The neck lifted up, is a token of pride, and preſumptuous boldneſs: And to run with the neck, is to run with the neck lifted up, or ſtretched out; which is indeed the periphraſis of pride. (Pſal. 75. 5.) Speak not with a ſtiff neck; that is, with a ſpirit unwilling to ſubmit to my diſpenſations. The Prophet Iſaiah complains, and threatens (Iſa. 3. 16.) Becauſe the Daughters of Sion are haughty, and walk with ſtretched out necks: That is, becauſe they teſtifie the pride of their hearts, by the gate and poſtures of the body, as much as by the vain attire, and apparel of the body: Therefore the Lord will ſmite, &c. The Lord tells Moſes (Exod. 32. 9.) I have ſeen this people, and behold it is a ſtiff-necked people: He complains by the Prophet (Iſa. 48. 4.) I knew that thou art obſtinate, and thy neck is an Iron ſinew: Stephen the Proto-Martyr gives a breviate of all their rebellions, Act. 7. and concludes (Verſ. 51.) Ye ſtiff-necked, &c. The ſtiff-neck and the proud hard heart are the ſame, all the Bible over.

Thus the wicked man runneth upon God with his ſtiff, that is, his proud daring ſpirit. As before, He ſtretched out his hand, ſo now (which is more) his neck againſt God. The metaphor is taken either from Souldiers in battel, who to ſhew their valour, hold up their heads, and ſtretch out their necks, running head to head, and ſhoulder to ſhoulder, when they come to cloſe fight.

Or, It is a metaphor taken from a Bullock unaccuſtomed to the yoak; who therefore will not ſubmit his neck to bear it. Wicked men are called Children of Belial, becauſe they endure not the yoak of obedience; when God would put his yoak upon their necks, they lift up their necks, or run upon him with their ſtiff-necks.

Hence Note, It is pride of ſpirit which cauſeth man to oppoſe God.

The Apoſtle James ſaith, God reſiſteth the proud (Jam. 4.) which intimates, yea and ſpeaks out, that the proud aſſault God. As the wicked in his pride perſecutes the poor (Pſal. 10. 11.) So in his pride he oppoſeth God. And as he that loveth God, follows, yea runs after God to obey him; ſo he that hates God runs upon him by diſobedience. An act of ignorant diſobedience is a going from God; an act of known diſobedience, is a running upon God: Running upon God, is not only ſinning, but impudent ſinning. The Angels in Heaven cover their faces before God, daring not to behold him: Humble ſinners on earth, ſuch as the poor Publican (Luke 18.) venture not to lift up their eyes to Heaven, but proud ſinners, lift up their necks againſt God. They who care not what God ſaith to them, care as little what they do to God: And they who have no faith in God, ſeldom have any fear of him; theſe run upon him with their necks.

Per ſuperbiā homo maximè deo reſiſtit & ſuperbus propter præſumptionē ſpiritus contra Deum currere dicitur. Aquin.

But I return to our Tranſlation, He runs upon him, even on his neck: That is, on the neck of God: that is, he ſins fiercely, and fearleſly; he doth not dare God at a diſtance, or like a Coward, ſpeak great words, and vaunt of what he will do when his Adverſary is out of ſight and hearing; but he charges on boldly in his very face.

It is ſaid of the Ram (by whom the Prophet means Alexander the Grtat, King of Greece, That when he ſaw the He-goat (that is, Darius King of Perſia) he ran upon him: That is, he aſſaulted him ſpeedily and boldly, overthrowing his whole eſtate, and ſo making himſelf ſole Lord of Aſia. The whole courſe of his Victories are deſcribed by this word, He ran upon him (Dan. 8. 6.) And when Job would ſhew how fiercely the Lord handled him, he gives it in this language, I was at eaſe, but he hath broken me aſunder, he hath alſo taken me by the neck and ſhaken me to pieces (Job 16. 12.) As God in a way of higheſt puniſhment, or chaſtiſement, is ſaid to take a man by the neck; ſo man in a way of higheſt ſinning and rebelling, is ſaid to take God by the neck, or to run upon his neck: He that ventures upon the neck, cares not where he ventures; and he that runs upon the neck of God, cares not on whom he ventures. And as in height of love, a friend runs and falls upon the neck of his friend; thus Joſeph did on his Brethrens necks (Gen. 45. 14.) and the Father of the Prodigal (Luke 15. 20.) Ran and fell upon his Sons neck, and kiſſed him: So in heat of wrath, an Enemy runs upon the neck of his Enemy; and wicked men (who are enmity againſt God) run upon the neck of God.

Cum eo concurrens collū invadet. Tigur.

Some conceive that this running upon the neck of God imports two things.

Firſt, That the wicked man imagines himſelf, as having an equality of ſtrength with God.

And ſecondly, That he hath authority above God, or that he is Gods better, and ſuperior.

This latter they ground upon an old cuſtom among Magiſtrates, who finding an offender contumacious, were wont to command the Officer to take him by the neck, and drag him out of the Court, to receive his puniſhment. But I ſhall not inſiſt upon that Criticiſm; eſpecially conſidering the incongruity of it with the next words;

Erat pœnæ genus ut Magiſtratus ſi quem ſuo imperio parum obedientem viderit, in collum invaderent & intorquerent. Liv. l. 4.

Even upon the thick boſſes of his buckler.

Malefactors are never permitted to come armed before the Judge to their arraignments.

The word which we tranſlate Thick, ſignifies alſo Fat, becauſe fat is thick: Hence the Vulgar Latine tranſlates, He is armed with his fat neck: But I paſs that. According to our reading (which keeps cloſer to the Original) Eliphaz deſcribes the ancient and preſent form of Bucklers, which as they are defenſive weapons, ſo alſo offenſive, and therefore have not only boſſes for ornament, but (one eſpecially in the center or middle with a ſharp pike in it) for uſe: For as the whole Buckler ſecured the body againſt the Arrow or Sword of the Adverſary, ſo if he preſſed near, this high Boſs, or Pike of the Buckler ſerved to pierce and wound the Adverſary. So that while the wicked man is ſaid to run upon God, even upon the thick boſſes of his Buckler; it ſhews the higheſt valiancy of a wicked man in oppoſing God; he fights not only afar off, but near at hand, and preſſes upon him, though within the reach and danger of his Weapon.

Hence Obſerve, There is no danger can keep a wicked man off from ſin.

Like the Horſe in this Book (Chap. 39. 22.) He mocketh at fear, and is not afrighted, neither turneth away from the Sword; he ſwalloweth the ground with fierceneſs and rage, he ſaith among the Trumpets, Aha, aha: Though God have a Buckler, man will come upon him; yea, though God have a Boſs upon his Buckler to ſtrike and wound him, yet on he comes. The Buckler of God is the Law or Word of God, and the Boſſes of this Buckler are the threatnings and curſes of the Law. Now, when man ſins, notwithſtanding the Law, which is the Buckler by which God ſaves and protects his Honour and his Holineſs, his Name and Glory from the wounds which ſinful man is ready to give him, then man may be ſaid to run upon his Buckler. And when notwithſtanding the ſharp threats and terrible curſes of the Law, which are the thick Boſſes with which he wounds thoſe who tranſgreſs his Law, when, I ſay, notwithſtanding theſe, man adventures to ſin and tranſgreſs the Law, he may rightly be ſaid, To run upon the thick Boſſes of his Buckler. God gave Adam a Law, Of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, thou mayſt not eat: Here was the Buckler; and when he added this threat, In the day thou eateſt thereof, thou ſhalt ſurely dye: Here was the Boſs. God ſent a word to Pharaoh, Let my people go; this was a Buckler: If thou refuſe to let them go, I will ſlay thy firſt-born; this was the Boſs. Adam run upon the Boſs of the Buckler, ſo did Pharaoh, and ſo do all wilful ſinners.

A wilful heart will go on in ſinning, whatſoever God is ſpeaking, or doing (Iſa. 57. 17.) I was wrath, and ſmote him, yet he went on frowardly in the way of his heart: Neither the wrath of God, nor their own ſmart, ſtop their progreſs, though ſmitten, yet they went on, Saints ſometimes go on in ſinning, though God be ſmiting; they have run upon the Boſſes of the Buckler, to the wounding both of their ſouls and of their outward comforts; wicked men will run upon them to the damning of their ſouls and bodies. Though they ſee, yea, feel the Boſſes, judgments not only threatned, but executed, yet [illegible] they will, and (like wicked Ahaz) In the time of their affliction ſin more againſt the Lord. This is the height of ſinfulneſs. As it ſhews the truth and height of holineſs in the Saints, when they will not only run to God in fair times, when men approve, but in the worſt times, when men oppoſe; when they venture to do their duty upon the Bucklers of men, yea, upon the Boſſes of the Buckler, extreameſt danger: So it ſhews a like ſtrength and height of wickedneſs, when men venture upon the Boſſes of the Buckler, upon the point of the naked Sword of Gods diſpleaſure; they will venture, let it coſt what it will; though the Lord ſet a flaming Sword in the way of luſt, as he did in the way of the Tree of Life (Gen. 3.) though the Lord ſet an Angel with a drawn Sword in the way of luſt, as he did in Balaam's way, when he was going to curſe Iſrael, yet on they will: Till the heart be changed, neither Swords, nor Bucklers, nor Boſſes, neither wrath threatened, nor executed, can cauſe a ſinner to change his courſe.

This the Prophet complains of (Iſa. 9. 13.) The people turneth not to him that ſmiteth them, neither do they ſeek the Lord of Hoſts: Their incorrigibleneſs under ſevereſt corrections is elegantly deſcribed by another Prophet, enumerating five ſpecial ſtrokes or ſmitings, to every one of which he ſubjoyns, Yet have ye not returned unto me, ſaith the Lord, Amos 4. 6, 7, 8, &c. When the bellows were burnt, and the lead conſumed of the fire (that is, when all inſtruments and means of refining them were ſpent and worn out, yet their droſs remained in them) The Founder melted in vain, for the wicked (that is, their wickedneſſes, or evil things) were not plucked away (Jer. 6. 29, 30.) They went into the Furnace full of droſs, and they came out as full of droſs as they went in. The Founder blowed his fire till he burnt his bellows, but their luſts had no ſcent of fire upon them; his lead (by which he ſeperates the droſs from the metal) was all conſumed and evaporated, but the droſs of their corruptions waſted no more then the pureſt gold doth in the fire. Hence the Lord reſolved to waſte no more of his judgments upon them: Why ſhould you be ſmitten any more, ye will revolt more and more (Iſa. 1. 5.) To revolt from God, and to run upon him, are ſins of the ſame ſtrain; and they who revolt from him, will not fear to run upon his neck, even upon the thick Boſſes of his Buckler.

Thus Eliphaz hath given us an account, why the Lord afflicts a wicked man all his dayes; he fights againſt God all his dayes. We have a reaſon of this reaſon in the next words; why it is that this wicked man is ſuch a valiant Champion againſt God, why he commits wickedneſs with ſo much greedineſs; It is, Becauſe he covers his face with his fatneſs, &c. The fatter and fuller he grows in fulfilling the luſts of the fleſh, the more hungry and ſharp ſet he is to fulfil them. Full-feeding in ſin, doth not ſatiſfie, but increaſe a ſinful appetite.

VERS. 27, 28, 29, 30.

Becauſe he covereth his face with his fatneſs, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks.

And he dwelleth in deſolate Cities, and in Houſes which no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps.

He ſhall not be rich, neither ſhall his ſubſtance continue, neither ſhall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs, the flame ſhall dry up his branches, and by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away.

As the two former Verſes ſhewed ſin the cauſe of thoſe evils which befal a wicked man; ſo here Eliphaz ſhews us two cauſes of their ſin.

First, Their riches.

Secondly, Their power.

The firſt is here deſcribed tropically by Fatneſs.

Verſe 27. He covereth his face with fatneſs, and maketh collops of fleſh on his flanks.

Both parts of the Verſe mean the ſame thing; ſhewing the wicked mans worldly proſperity by the uſual viſible effects of it; a f[illegible]face, and fleſhy flanks.

He covereth his face with fatneſs,

That is, he is exceeding fat; a phraſe like that (Pſal. 73. 7.) Their eyes ſtand out with fatneſs: The Hebrew is, Their eyes are gone out of their heads through fatneſs: That is, They ſeem as gone or going out of their heads. 'Tis uſual in the language of the Holy Ghoſt, to deſcribe wicked men by fatneſs, (Pſal. 78. 31.) He ſlew the fatteſt of them; that is, the worſt of them, thoſe who were moſt rebellious, longing after dainties, when God had given them bread from Heaven. David ſets forth his Enemies (and ſo the Enemies of Chriſt, of whom that Pſalm is a Propheſie) under this notion (Pſal. 22. 12.) Strong Bulls, or fat Bulls, came about me: By the fat Bulls he means the Scribes and Phariſees, the high Prieſt and Rulers, who (as it were) beſet Chriſt with continual conſpiracies. More plainly (Pſal. 17. 9, 10.) Keep me from mine Enemies that oppreſs me: They are incloſed in their own fat, with their mouth they ſpeak proudly. Again, (Pſal. 119. 70.) Their heart is as fat as greaſe, but I delight in thy Law.

Exiit præ adipe oculus eorum. i.e. exiſſe videntur præ genarum tumore & pinguedine. Bold.

Singulari quodam infamiæ titulo impii & iniqui in ſcriptura vocantur pingues.

The Scripture ſpeaks thus, not as if fatneſs had any moral evil in it, or as if leanneſs had any moral good in it. Fatneſs doth not diſcommend us, nor doth leanneſs commend us to God; yea, a man lean in body may have the worſt fatneſs, he may be proud, ſwoln and puft up in ſpirit; and a man fat in body may have the beſt leanneſs, much ſelf-emptineſs, and poverty of ſpirit. But becauſe they who have abundance, and grow fat with the Creature, are tempted to forgetfulneſs of, and rebellion againſt God; and becauſe a body overburdened with fleſh and fat, renders the mind more indiſpoſed to holy and ſpiritual activity; and uſually they who beſtow moſt care and coſt in pampering their bodies, go with pined, ſtarved, and lean ſouls; therefore fatneſs hears ill in Scripture.

It is obſerved by Plutarch, that the Egyptian Prieſts gave their Apis (a Deity which they worſhipped in the form of an Oxe) the water of a Pit, or Well, not the water of Nilus, to drink; the reaſon was (not as ſome aſſign it, becauſe they thought thoſe waters were prophaned by the Crocodile, for the Egyptians had that River in high veneration, but) becauſe the waters of Nilus were fatning, nouriſhing waters; therefore their Apis, whom they adored as a God, and from whom they expected continual help, muſt not drink of it, leſt the groſneſs of his fleſh ſhould diſable him for their aſſiſtance. Fat corpulent men are, in common experience, unweildy, ſleepy, and (comparatively) unfit for action. It was a cuſtom, as my Author reports, among the ancient Spaniards and Gaules, to keep a conſtant meaſure, which if a Woman (ſhe not being with Child) did exceed in the compaſs of her waſte, ſhe fell under diſgrace, and loſt much of her reputation, by having got ſo much of fat and fleſh about her: And doubtleſs it had ſomewhat of diſrepute in it, in Job's time, elſe Eliphaz (a man of experience) had not given this as a piece of a wicked mans deſcription. He covereth his face with fatneſs.

Eſt deſcriptio ſummæ abundantiæ. Jun.

This latter clauſe of the Verſe is of the ſame intendment with the former: And that which both reprove as ſinful, is the intentneſs of mans ſpirit about the pampering of his fleſh.

He covereth his face with fatneſs, he makes collops, &c.

He doth not ſay, Becauſe he is fat, but becauſe he covers his face with fatneſs, &c. That is, he ſets his heart upon his belly, and makes it his buſineſs to pamper his body. He is active, yea, full of activity in getting this cover, or mask of fatneſs upon his face; and this mask diſcovers the naughtineſs of his heart.

Hence Obſerve, That it is a ſign of an evil heart, or a lean ſoul, to intend the fleſh, or to ſtudy the ſatisfying of the bodily appetite.

A carnal man gives himſelf to deliciouſneſs; his greateſt labour is about that, for which Chriſt forbids our labour, The meat that periſheth (John 6. 27.) This covering of our ſelves with fatneſs, and making collops of fat, the Apoſtle reproves in thoſe, Whoſe God was their belly (Phil. 3. 19.) and in thoſe who ſerved not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but their own belly (Rom. 16. 18.) They who ſerve their belly, as they ſhould ſerve God, make a god of it; and they who ſerve their belly at all, do not ſerve Chriſt at all. We may provide for the belly, but we muſt not ſerve it; and they who do ſo, deſerve rather to be called Epicures then Chriſtians. That's ſinful fatneſs which is got upon terms of ſlavery, or ſervice to the belly; yea, a man that is intentive upon that queſtion, What ſhall I eat? and careful how to feed his fleſh, though he do not grow fat by it; yet he ſhews himſelf full of ſin by it. The deſign of such is for the fleſh, though their fleſh do not thrive under that deſign. As a man may be very covetous though he continue poor and lean in purſe; ſo a man may be very luxurious, and a great ſervant to Bacchus, and Belly-chear, though he continue lean and poor in body.

The bleſſing of God fattens ſome, and ſuch fat ones leſs God. David propheſies, that when The Kingdom ſhall be the Lords, and he the Governor among the Nations (which is very parallel with what thoſe great voices ſaid after the ſeventh Angel had ſounded, Revel. 11. 15.) The Kingdoms of this World are become the Kingdoms of the Lord and of his Chriſt, and he ſhall reign for ever and ever; and when this ſhall be, ſaith David (Pſal. 22. 30.) Then all they that be fat upon the earth, ſhall eat, and worſhip; that is, the great ones ſhall ſubmit to Chriſt; his Kingdom ſhall be inlarged, and not only the poor, who are deſcribed in the latter part of that Verſe in the Pſalm, under the name and notion of ſuch, as go down to the duſt, but the rich ſhall receive the Goſpel. Kings and Queens, perſons of authority and wealth, ſhall come to the participation of the grace of Chriſt (Iſa. 60. 3, 10.) They who have their bellies full of the meat that periſheth, ſhall have their ſouls full of that meat which endures to everlaſting life. (Pſal. 45. 12.) The rich among the people: What people? The firſt words of the Verſe tells us, he means the Tyrians who were a wonderful rich people (Iſa. 23. 8. Ezek. 27.) and the Tyrians are here put, by a Synechdoche, for all other Heathens; for though Tyre were a City in the Tribe of Aſer (Joſh. 19. 29.) yet it was at that time poſſeſſed by Heathens. Now, ſaith the Pſalmiſt, The rich among theſe people ſhall intreat thy favour: That is, the Churches favour. God will work their hearts to an earneſt deſire of admiſſion into the ſociety of the Saints, and to live under a profeſſed ſubjection to the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, who have abounded in worldly poſſeſſions, and hold the World in ſubjection to their power: Theſe rich and fat ones among the people ſhall intreat thy favour. This propheſie was in part fulfilled (Mark 3. 8.) where we read of great multitudes from Tyre and Sidon flocking after Chriſt: So that it is not riches and fatneſs preciſely conſidered, but the intending of our skin, or our ſtudiouſneſs to fill our ſelves with earthly delicates, which ſhews we have weak appetites to, or rather a loathing of the things of Heaven.

Secondly, This covering the face with fat, is here preſented by Eliphaz as a cauſe or occaſion at leaſt of the wicked mans arming himſelf againſt God.

Hence Obſerve, That an evil heart turns the bleſſings of God into rebellion againſt him

Bonorum abundantia vitiorum omnium materiam ſubminiſtrat.

The Jews were thus charged (Deut. 32. 15.) Jeſurun waxed waxed fat, and kicked. The Lord complains of this, as of a ſin, which he ſcarce knew how to pardon (Jer. 5.7.) How ſhall I pardon thee for this? Thy Children have forſaken me, &c. When I had fed them to the full, they then committed adultery, and aſſembled themſelves by troops in the harlots houſes. Thoſe are great ſins indeed, which put the Lord (whoſe title is, The God pardoning ſin, and ready to forgive) into a query about their pardon and forgiveneſs. Such kind of ſinning made Jeruſalem a Siſter to Sodom; that is, as like Sodom, yea, and Samaria too, as if they had been one Mothers Daughters, or as if they had been of one and the ſelf-ſame blood and ſtock (Ezek. 16.49.) Behold this was the iniquity of thy ſiſter Sodom, pride, fulneſs of bread, and abundance of idleneſs was in her, and in her Daughters: Plenty of the Creature, and plenty of ſin, went together; and whereas Jeruſalem ſhould have ſerved God, ſhe ſerved her luſts in the abundance of all things. We have a ſaying, when men are lifted up upon the enjoyment of outward good things (in alluſion to Beaſts) Provender pricks them. They act more like beaſts then men, who kick againſt God, who feeds them, and turn his bread of bleſſings into the ſtones of diſobedience. What outward good thing will not an evil heart abuſe, and wax wanton with, when it is ſo apt to abuſe ſpiritual things, and to turn the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs; that is, to grow wanton and laſcivious, becauſe God is gracious?

Thirdly Obſerve, They take little care for their ſouls, who take overmuch for their bodies.

They who deſire to pleaſe appetite, cannot endeavour to pleaſe God. When the Apoſtle exhorts to put on the Lord Jeſus, he dehorts from providing for the fleſh (Rom. 13.14.) Put ye on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and make not proviſion for the fleſh to fulfil the luſts thereof: As if he had ſaid, Unleſs you forbear providing for luſts, you will have little leaſure, and leſs deſire to put on Chriſt. (Epheſ. 5.18.) Be not drunk with wine wherein is exceſs (that is, be not inordinate in the uſe of the creature) but be filled with the ſpirit: As if he had ſaid, You will never be filled with the Spirit, if overfilled with wine; if you give up your ſelves to ſatisfie carnal appetite, you will not have any appetite at all to ſpirituals. There is an inward gluttony and drunkenneſs, when the thoughts run upon dainty diſhes, and full Cups, or when men chew their meat and wine in their thoughts, before they eat or drink. Now as well they (or rather they more) who are inwardly drunken with exceſſive deſires of wine, as they who are viſibly drunken with the exceſſive taking down of wine, are far enough either from the deſire or attainment of a filling with the Spirit. The ſpirit of the Buttery, and the Spirit of God, have no more agreement then the fleſh and the Spirit; yea, that ſpirit is the groſſeſt part of ſinful fleſh, and therefore can neither take care for, nor bear with, the things of the ſpirit. So far of the firſt cauſe of the wicked mans exceſſive ſinning; his exceſs in the uſe of the Creature, ſet forth by the ordinary effect of it, Fatneſs, He covereth his face with fatneſs: The ſecond follows.

Verſe 28. He dwelleth in deſolate Cities, and in houſes wherein no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps.

This Verſe ſhews a ſecond cauſe of the wicked mans fierceneſs againſt God, His power over men; which is deſcribed (as the former) by the effect of it, He hath made Cities deſolate. It requires much power to overthrow whole Cities; that which is ſtrong cannot be deſtroyed without ſtrength; ſuch was the power of the man whom Eliphaz deſcribes, ſuch his ſtrength: He ſubdued ſtrong Cities, he conquered men, and he thought he could conquer God too. But though to deſtroy and pull down intimate ſtrength, yet to build and ſet up Cities requires greater ſtrength.

This ſtrength alſo is here aſcribed to the wicked man, who,

Firſt, Either comes to Cities already overthrown, or overthrows Cities.

And then ſecondly, builds the Cities which are overthrown, that himſelf may dwell in them. He will not dwell in Cities built to his hand, or in Palaces ready made, but he will make goodly Palaces out of the deſolate places; a City waſted by War, by Fire, and Sword, ſhall revive out of the rubbiſh, and recover to its ancient ſplendor, if he undertake it.

Maſter Broughton renders clearly to this ſence, Though he makes dwellings of Cities ruinated, of houſes undwelt, which were coming to heaps of ſtone: Here's the compleatneſs of his worldly power. He makes flouriſhing Cities deſolate, and deſolate Cities flouriſh; he dwells in deſolate Cities, in Houſes where no man inhabiteth; that is, in Cities which he himſelf once made deſolate (having caſt out their proper Inhabitants) but hath now re-edified and enlarged for his own uſe and honour.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That a wicked man cares not whom he ruines, ſo he may raiſe himſelf.

Down with Kingdoms, down with Cities, down with all, ſo he may ſtand, or have his own ends.

Secondly Obſerve, (which is the ſcope of Eliphaz) A man that hath great power among men, begins to think himſelf ſtrong enough for God alſo.

He made earthly Cities deſolate, and none was able to reſiſt him, therefore he hopes to make Heaven deſolate, and diſturb the Throne of God; He runs upon his neck, &c.

Again, Some expound this Verſe not of the cauſe of this mans ſin, but of the puniſhment of his ſin; He dwells in deſolate Cities, in places where no man dwelt: That is, He ſhall dwell alone, he ſhall either refuſe, or be refuſed by all good company, For this miſerable ſolitude may ariſe two wayes.

Firſt, From trouble of mind; he having oppreſſed others, ſhall find himſelf at laſt ſo oppreſſed with the witneſs of his own conſcience, that to avoid it, he retires into deſolate places, into waſte Wilderneſſes, into old ruinous buildings, where none dwell but the Owl, and the Screech-owl, (Iſa. 34.) He that finds not his own conſcience good company, never finds any.

Terrores de quibus nuper dictum eſt, non patiuntur impium in familiari hominum conſortio vivere, ideo deſolatorium urbium ruinas & latibula quærit.
Pined.

Secondly, This wicked man is caſt out from the company of men, he hath bern a ſcourge to many, and now all are a ſcourge to him. Tyranny grows intolerable to mankind (Dan. 4.33.) Nebuchadnezzar was the greateſt Monarch in the world, and a proud Tyrant; at laſt he was turned out to graſs: his Nobles, Lords, and Subjects forſook him, and he who ruled men, lived among beaſts; or as the ſame Propheſie of Daniel reports it (Chap. 5.20.) When his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was depoſed, or (as the Chalde) made to come down frrom his Kingly Throne, and they took his glory from him, and he was driven frrom the ſons of men, &c. Which we may anſwer with Job's Text, He was forced to dwell in deſolate places.

Hujuſmodi tyranni ejiciuntur in exilium.

The Roman Story tells us of Nero, that perceiving himſelf a loſt man, by the revolt of ſome Provinces, and the general complaint of the people againſt his inſolent Government, he wandered up and down, and crept firſt into a Thicket, by and by into a Cave with Sporus his filthy Favorite, and at laſt when he heard of the ſentence of death given againſt him by the Senate, and that their Officers were haſting to attach him, he, with a little help of one of his Servants, cut his own Throat.

Thirdly, Others interpret theſe words, as noting the wicked mans worldly decay; he ſhall not have a houſe to put his head in: His ſtrong Cities and goodly Palaces, ſhall go to ruine; or he ſhall be forced to dwell in a ruinous houſe, a houſe ready to fall about his ears, who before lived in ceiled houſes; he hath pulled down other mens houſes, and now he dwells in houſes ready to fall down; he impoveriſht others, and now himſelf is turned out among the poor.

Hence Obſerve, That God often makes the puniſhment of man ſuitable to his ſin.

The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, the wicked is ſnared in the work of his own hands (Pſal. 9.16.)

The judgments of God are alwayes juſt, and ſometimes their juſtice is viſible. As the wicked feel them, ſo all may ſee them, and ſay, Righteous art thou, O Lord. The Prophet deſcribes this retaliation of Divine judgment (Iſa. 5.8,9.) Woe to them that add houſe to houſe, and lay field to field, till there be no place (that is, no place for others to dwell in) that they may be placed in the midſt of the earth:

What is the danger of this? In mine ear ſaith the Lord of Hoſts; of a truth, many houſes ſhall be deſolate, many and fair without Inhabitants: Here is deſolation, the reward of deſolation; and as they took bread from others, and pull'd the cup from their mouthes, ſo their bread ſhall be taken away, and their cup left empty. Thus it follows in the Prophet (Verſ. 10.) Yea, ten Akers of Vineyard ſhall yield one Bath: A Bath was a meaſure among the Jews of Liquids, containing, as is conceived, about eight Gallons: So that when he ſaith, Ten Akers of Vineyard ſhall yield one Bath; the meaning is, there ſhall be a great ſcarcity of Wine: An Aker of Vineyard ſhould not yield a Gallon of Wine; that's a miſerable Vintage. And the ſeed of an Homer, ſhall yield an Ephah: An Homer was a meaſure for dry things, containing ten Ephahs: So that when it is ſaid, The ſeed of a Homer ſhall yield an Ephah, the meaning is, they ſhall reap but the tenth part of the ſeed ſown, which is a miſerable Harveſt, and the higheſt threat of enſuing Famine. Thus the Lord puniſhed them as they had ſinned; they ſtarved the poor, and God threatens to ſtarve them. Hunger never pinches ſo terribly, as when it is a puniſhment ſent at the cry of the hungry.

Again (Iſa. 33. 1.) When thou ſhalt ceaſe to deal treacherouſly, then they ſhall deal treacherouſly with thee: When the deceiver is deceived, and the treacherous dealer ruined by treacherous dealing men, then the truth and faithfulneſs of God are eminently exalted. And as it is in puniſhments, ſo often in rewards, God doth us good in the ſame way wherein we have done good. The Midwives ſaved the Males of the Iſraelites in Egypt, and by this act of pitty built the houſe of Iſrael, which the Lord took ſo well at their hands, That he built their houſes, or made their houſes flouriſh (Exod. 1. 21.) As the deſtroyer ſhall be deſtroyed, ſo the builder ſhall be built; mercy loves to be exact as well as judgment.

Again, Eliphaz tells us of Cities and Houſes ready to become heaps.

Hence Note, The moſt flouriſhing Cities, the ſtrongeſt Structures in the World, are ſubject to ruine.

Art cannot prevent the decayes of Nature, much leſs the Decrees of Divine Juſtice. Material Jeruſalem was threatened, that one ſtone ſhould not be left upon another which ſhould not be caſt down; the event anſwered that prediction. Myſtical Babylon is under a more dreadful doom, and the event will in due time anſwer that prediction. Babylon is ready to become heaps, and one ſtone ſhall not be left upon another: There is no cement can hold that together, to which God ſaith, Fall.

Eliphaz having ſhewed the cauſes of the wicked mans impudent oppoſition againſt God, and (according to the two latter Expoſitions of this Verſe) ſome part of his puniſhment, proceeds further to ſhew his puniſhment.

Verſe 29. He ſhall not be rich, neither ſhall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

Verſe 30. He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs, the flame ſhall dry up his branch, and by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away.

Here is compleat miſery in externals. The judgment is laid down two wayes.

Firſt, Negatively.

And ſecondly, Affirmatively.

Negatively, what the wicked man ſhall not be, what he ſhall not attain to; and then affirmatively, what the wicked man ſhall be, or what ſhall come upon him; the Negative part hath a gradation of four ſteps.

The firſt is this, He ſhall not be rich.

The ſecond is, His ſubſtance ſhall not continue.

The third is, He ſhall not prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

The fourth is this, He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs.

Thoſe are the Negative parts of his puniſhments, the Affirmative are two.

Firſt, The flame ſhall dry up his branch.

Secondly, By the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

He ſhall not be rich.

The words ſeem to carry an oppoſition all along to the wicked mans purpoſes and projects. The wicked man ſaith in his heart, if not with his mouth, He will be rich; to which God anſwers, He ſhall not be rich. The Apoſtle (1 Tim. 6. 9.) ſpeaks of ſuch a ſort of Rich Will-bees, They that will be rich fall into temptation, &c. When a man comes to this height of reſolvedneſs, He will be rich whatever comes of it, or whoever ſtands in his way; he will be rich and ask no mans leave, no nor Gods leave, then God riſes to his high reſolves, He ſhall not be rich: Let it come to tryal whoſe word ſhall ſtand, his, or mine: And when once this word is gone out of Gods mouth, then he, and all his trees which ſhould bear him that golden fruit, are blaſted and mildew'd. Then, though he lay the ſtrongeſt projects for riches, yet he ſhall not be rich, though he ſweat and toil to be rich, though he dig deep into the ground, and turn every ſtone above ground, to find riches, yet he ſhall not be rich; though he cares not whom he makes poor, yea, though himſelf live poorly all his dayes, that he may dye rich, yet he ſhall not be rich.

Hence Obſerve, It is not in the power of man to get riches.

A man may make it his deſign to be rich, but he cannot make himſelf rich. Moſes (Deut. 8. 18.) gives it in charge to the people of Iſrael, Thou ſhalt remember the Lord thy God; for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, &c. Man is very apt to forget the Author, not only of his ſpiritual, but of his temporal good things, and is readier to aſcribe his riches to his own getting, then to Gods giving. Temporal good things lye more level to the power of Nature, and humane Induſtry, then ſpirituals; yet we can no more attain temporals then ſpirituals without the power of God. Chriſt teacheth us, that our care can no more add a penny to our eſtate, then a cubit to our ſtature (Matth. 6. 27.) How often have we ſeen experience ſealing to this truth? Many have endeavoured after, and reacht at riches, in good and hopeful, in fair and probable wayes, yet they have not reacht to riches. Others have ſtriven for riches in baſe and unwarrantable, in unjuſt and ſinful wayes, yet they could never get a ſtep beyond beggery.

Ex quocunque piſcatu non evadet ditior.

The Lord gives them a ſtop, and ſaith, Ye ſhall not be rich; evil men do not alwayes thrive; Peter, a good man, fiſhed all night, but got nothing, till Chriſt bid him put down the Net. Some have caſt their Net in all ſorts of waters, yet could never catch the great fiſh of worldly wealth. It is the bleſſing of God that makes good men rich; and it is a permiſſion from God that makes evil men rich. Godlineſs is profitable for all things, having the promiſe of this life, and of that which is to come, yet every godly man meets not with the profit of this life; ungodlineſs is profitable for nothing, having neither the promiſe of this life, nor of that which is to come, yet ſome ungodly men meet with the profit of this life. Though ſinners are never on the thriving hand, yet they often thrive in their way; and though Saints are ever on the thriving ſide, yet they do not alwayes thrive in their way: Neither the one ſort nor the other thrives, if the Lord ſaith, They ſhall not be rich: When he ſaith ſo to the Saints, it is to humble them; but when he ſaith ſo to a wicked man, it is to puniſh him; He ſhall not be rich, that's the firſt ſtep of his miſery.

But ſuppoſe he get riches, yet he cannot keep them; The wages which he earns is put into a bag with holes, or pierced through, all's gone (Hag. 1. 6.) Carnal men are like leaking Veſſels to the Word of God, they (as the Apoſtle cautions Believers, leſt at any time they ſhould, Heb. 2. 1.) alwayes let it run out. Now as they let out what they have heard of the Word of God; ſo God lets out what they have got of the World: He makes all the Veſſels which hold their earthly ſubſtance leaky: So it follows,

Neither ſhall his ſubſtance continue.

חיל robur, pro opibus ſæpe ſumitur. Latine copias poſſis vertere. Merc.

This is his ſecond woe: The word which we render Subſtance, ſignifies alſo Power, and Strength; becauſe riches impower and ſtrengthen men to do great things; but how ſtrong and ſubſtantial ſoever they are in the opinion of men, their time is but ſhort, They ſhall not continue; and this ariſeth two wayes.

First,

Summis negitum eſt ſtare diu.

First, From the nature of the things of the World, which are all frail and momentary; and though we call them Subſtance, yet indeed they are but a Shadow, there is no continuance in them.

Secondly, This ariſeth from the judgment and curſe of God, both upon ſuch rich men, and upon their riches; if the Lord doth not ſtop them from getting riches, yet he can ſpeak a word, and blaſt all that they have gotten.

Hence Note, That the moſt ſubſtantial of earthly things are of ſmall or no continuance.

More. particularly.

That ill gotten goods are not laſting, or long-lived.

Sometimes they melt away, and dye in the ſame hands that got them; they alwayes dye and melt away in ſome of their hands, for whom they were gotten. There is no tack in their eſtate, in whom there is no Juſtice. That which is gathered by the unrighteouſneſs of man, ſhall be ſcattered by the wrath of God. As the little which a righteous man hath is better, ſo it is ſurer then the great riches of many wicked. Sin makes no proviſion at all for the ſoul; and it makes very ill proviſion for the body. The title by which we hold worldly things, is more conſiderable then worldly things themſelves. To hold in Capite from Chriſt is as the pureſt ſo the ſtrongeſt Tenure: Only he who continues the ſame for ever, and changes not, can give continuance to that which is changeable.

But ſuppoſe the wicked mans ſubſtance doth continue long for bulk and matter, yet the beauty and comfort of it ſhall not continue for a moment; which is the third ſtep of this Gradation.

Neither ſhall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

מנלם perfectio eorum a נלה perfecit, alii Minlam unicam, dictionem perinde ac ſi duæ eſſent exponunt, quaſi מנ להם ex eo quod eſt illorum, i. e. res illorum non extendentur per terram. Merc.

Riches are one thing, the perfection of riches is another; as in ſpiritual things there is the ſubſtance of them, and the perfection of them; ſo in temporals: The word ſignifies, the conſummation of any thing, or the bringing it to its perfective end (Iſa. 33. 1.) When thou ſhalt make an end to deal treacherouſly, they ſhall deal treacherouſly with thee: The Prophet doth not mean it of making an end by way of ceſſation, as if hand, heart, or tongue, did ceaſe dealing treacherouſly (for ſo wicked men will never make an end of wickedneſs, if they might have an eternity to act evil in, they would act it eternally) but he means it of making an end by way of conſummation; as if he had ſaid, When they are come to a full ſtature in treachery, and have compleated their conſpiracies againſt goodneſs, and good men, then they ſhall be dealt with in their kind, and as they beſt deſerve. Now as a wicked man would compleat his ſin, and often reaches the very perfection of it, ſo he would compleat his eſtate, and doth ſometimes reach to the perfection of it. The wicked man would be perfectly rich, he is not ſatisfied to have a compleat eſtate, or enough for meat, drink, and cloathing, he muſt have a great eſtate, enough for pride, pomp, and glory; Manna pleaſes him not, he muſt have Quails, ſuperfluities as well as neceſſaries: He thinks a little too much in ſpirituals, but a great deal is not enough for him in temporals: His internal imperfections trouble him not, his aim is at perfection in externals. That is perfect only in a ſtrict ſence, to which nothing can be added, and from which nothing can be taken away: The wicked man would attain to ſuch perfection, but he cannot; his own heart forbids the firſt, for how much ſoever he hath, he would have more added to it; he ſaith not, it is enough, though it be too much; God forbids the latter, his portion ſhall be abated, or (in the words of the Text) He ſhall not prolong the perfection thereof.

Nec mittes in terra radicem ejus. Vulg.

The utmoſt perfection he can attain unto, is but the ſhadow of perfection; and though ſhadows towards the ſetting of the Sun grow longer and longer, yet no ſhadow can be prolonged, they quickly paſs and fly away. Solomon tells us (Prov. 12. 3.) A man ſhall not be eſtabliſhed in wickedneſs, but the root of the righteous ſholl continue: A wicked man may be ſet in the ground, but he hath no root in the ground: Their ſtock ſhall not take root in the earth, and he (that is, God) ſhall blow upon them, and they ſhall wither (Iſa. 40. 24.) A tree not rooted falls by a puff of wind, or withers while it ſtands. The tree of a wicked man may have a great body, but he hath no good root, he is not rooted in Chriſt, he hath no hold of the Covenant, therefore his perfection cannot continue.

Hence Obſerve, That as there is no worldly perfection of any long continuance, ſo the perfection of wicked men is of ſhorteſt continuance.

Nubecula eſt, cito tranſibit.

Athanaſius ſaid of Julian the Apoſtate, when he was in the height, in the very Zenith and perfection of earthly felicity, having aſcended the Impereal Throne, and given the Law to a great part of the then known World, He is but a little Cloud, he will ſoon vaniſh. And indeed his glory and the perfection of it did not continue, for when he was but thirty years old, in that prime of his natural courſe. and conſtitution, he was cut off; his power could not protect his perſon, nor prolong his perfection on the earth.

David profeſſeth, as from his own experience (Pſal. 119. 96.) I have ſeen an end of all perfection: The term of univerſality, All, doth not compaſs in every kind of perfection, but all the perfections of one kind. The end of Divine perfections cannot be ſeen; when we have ſeen the moſt of them, there is more of them unſeen; but the end of all humane perfections may be ſeen. There is a twofold ſight.

First, Of the eye.
Secondly of the underſtanding.

David's eye had ſeen the end of many humane perfections, and his underſtanding ſaw the end of them all; he had ſeen ſome ending, and he ſaw all muſt end. Never dream of prolonging your perfection here. No wordly thing can continue long, for the World it ſelf ſhall not continue long: If the Scaffold or Stage upon which theſe perfections are ſhewed, or acted, muſt fall, the perfections themſelves cannot ſtand. There have been but few that ever advanced ſo far as to an earthly perfection; but there was never any one that prolonged his perfection on the Earth. Adam did not continue in that created perfection, which had no imperfection in it; How then ſhall any of his Children continue in an imperfect (ſuch is their beſt) perfection.

As Eliphaz hath ſhewed us the wicked mans miſery in the not prolonging of his perfection; ſo now he ſhews us a further degree of it, by the prolonging of his affliction.

Verſe 30. He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs.

Here is the fourth ſtep of this Gradation. The wicked mans miſery in miſery: He cannot ſtay in a good, nor get out of an ill eſtate. Eliphaz ſeems to take off an Objection, for ſome might ſay, What if the wicked man do not grow rich for the preſent? What if his ſubſtance doth not continue? What if he prolong not his perfections, or fall from the top-ſtair of his high condition? Yet we hope at laſt he may out-grow all this, and get riches which he had not, or regain thoſe which he had? No ſaith Eliphaz, Either the wicked man ſhall not riſe to riches, or if he riſe he ſhall fall, and when once he is fallen, he ſhall riſe no more; either he ſhall not get into the light, or if he do, he ſhall be ſoon overtaken with darkneſs; and when once he is in the dark, he ſhall come out no more, He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs.

When the wicked man is in the light, he ſings, Loth to depart, but he muſt; and when he is caſt into darkneſs, neſs, he cryes, Haſte to depart, but he cannot: The wicked man, like the evil Angels, is held in chains of darkneſs, which he is neither able to break off, nor to file off: He hath ſaid to God, who is light (yea, becauſe he is light) Depart from me; and God ſaith to him, Thou ſhalt not depart out of darkneſs.

There is a twofold darkneſs.

First, Inward.
Secondly, Outward.

Both metaphorical. By darkneſs ſome underſtand inward trouble, or grief of ſpirit; others expound it of outward troubles and calamities upon his eſtate: 'Tis true of both, for he ſhall depart neither out of the one nor the other; but rather take it here for outward trouble; and then, Not to depart out of darkneſs, imports abiding miſery, irrecoverable ſickneſs, decayes and loſſes, which ſhall never be repaired.

Hence Note, Wicked men falling into trouble, ſhall not know the mercy of a reſurrection out of trouble.

The juſt man falleth ſeven times, and riſeth again (Prov. 24. 16.) The juſt man is ſubject to take falls of two ſorts, and both of them Seven times; that is, often.

Firſt, He falls into ſin.

Secondly, He falls into trouble.

He riſeth from both theſe falls: He riſeth from the firſt by repentance; he riſeth from the ſecond by deliverance. Solomon's Text is to be underſtood of this ſecond ſort of falls, and may therefore be expounded by the direct words of David, (Pſal. 34. 19.) Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all: The righteous have as many reſurrections as falls, But (as Solomon makes the Antitheſis in the place fore-cited) the wicked ſhall fall into miſchief. Solomon doth not tell us expreſly, what the juſt man falls into, but he tells us he ſhall riſe again: He tells us expreſly what the wicked man ſhall fall into, but he doth not tell us, that he ſhall riſe again; nay, he tells us implicitely, that he ſhall never riſe again. He that riſeth again did not fall into miſchief, how great ſoever the evil was which he fell into; and he that doth not riſe again fell into miſchief, how little ſoever the evil was which he fell into. Nothing makes our falling either into ſin, or trouble, a miſchief to us, but our continuing in it. He goes far (we ſay in our Proverb) who never returns; he falls low, who never riſeth; and he ſtayes long in darkneſs, who never departs out of it. Darkneſs is the portion of a wicked man, and he ſhall never depart out of darkneſs; neither out of that darkneſs of ſin, nor miſery; he hath no deſire to depart out of the former, and he hath no promiſe to depart out of the latter. Thus we have ſeen the negative puniſhment of a wicked man, what he ſhall not be, what he ſhall not receive; this is enough to make him miſerable, but poſitive evil will make him outright miſerable. This Eliphaz proſecutes in the next words.

The flame ſhall dry up his branches.

The flame is taken two wayes: Either,

Firſt, For the wrath of God which goeth forth, cauſing judgment to take hold of ſinners: Or,

Secondly, For the judgment it ſelf, which is an effect of his wrath.

The wrath of God burneth againſt the wicked as a flame, and then judgments burn up the wicked; there is no heat to the heat of Divine wrath; neither is there any thing punitively hot, till Divine wrath heats it.

The flame ſhall dry up his branches: Some by his branches underſtand his Children, they ſhall dye; Children are branches, they ſtand, ſaith the Pſalmiſt, like Olive plants, or branches, round about the Table of a man fearing God: Such branches Job had, but they were dryed up, and probably Eliphaz might give him a rub upon that ſoar in this expreſſion.

Sunt qui ejus liberos intelligunt; ſed nos allegoricè intelligimus omnem ejus ſplendorem, opes, &c. Merc.

Secondly, Others by branches underſtand His followers and flatterers, who live upon him as branches upon a Tree; but to paſs theſe reſtrained Interpretations: I conceive we may take the Branch in general, for all that belongs to a wicked man, his Children, his Friends, his Followers, his Flatterers, his Honour, his Riches, his Power; all theſe look green, and are his beautiful branches; and all theſe the flame dryeth up. The Prophet complains (Joel 1. 19.) O Lord to thee will I cry, for the fire hath devoured the paſtures of the wilderneſs, and the flame hath burnt all the trees of the field: The flame, of which he cryes out, and which did not only dry the branches, but devour the Trees of the Field, was the extream heat of the Sun; which as it uſually ſends out refreſhing beams, ſo when God is angry, it can ſend out ſcorching flames, and thoſe beams, which tempered with ſhowers of rain, nouriſh the Earth, in the long withholding of rain ſcorch the Earth. And what then befel the Trees properly taken, and their branches, doth often befal both Trees and branches taken in the metaphorical ſence, as here in the Text, a flame dryes them up. A godly man is compared to a Tree flouriſhing and growing by the water ſide; wicked men are compared ſometimes to flouriſhing Trees, but they grow by the fire ſide: The flame dryes up their branches.

Flamma exurens, in Heb eſt vehementiſſimi ſupplicii atque adeo æterni ſymbolum. Duci videtur tranſlatio à more hoſtium vaſtantium regionem aliquam qui ſegetes & arbores ſuccendunt.

Hence Note, Firſt, The wrath of God is a drying, yea, a devouring flame; the flame of Gods diſpleaſure puts all into a flame.

That flame will burn up branches, how goodly, how ſtrong, how high ſoever they are grown; though as ſtrong as the Oaks of Baſhan, though as high as the Cedars in Lebanon, yet this flame will dry them up. The Prophet Zechariah ſpeaks this point, while he thus beſpeaks Lebanon (Zech. 11. 1.) Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy Cedars: 'Tis interpreted as a Propheſie of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and Judea, by the Roman power; as Chriſt after threatened them for rejecting him and his Counſel: The words of the Prophet may be underſtood two wayes, either literally, for the deſtruction of that Forreſt of Lebanon, which the Romans cut down for the ſervice of their Siege againſt Jeruſalem; or figuratively, for the flouriſhing eſtate of Jeruſalem, whoſe branches, though like the branches of the Cedars in Lebanon, were dryed up by the flame of that dreadful War. In which ſtile and figure the Prophet Iſaiah denounceth the judgments of God (Chap. 2. 12, 13.) The day of the Lord ſhall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, &c. And upon all the Cedars of Lebanon. And the Prophet Ezekiel puts forth this Riddle and Parable (Chap. 17. 3.) Thus ſaith the Lord, A great Eagle (that is, Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon) with great wings, long winged, full of feathers, which had divers colours, came into Lebanon (that is, unto Judea and Jeruſalem) and took the higheſt branch of the Cedar; namely, Jehojakim the King of Judah, and carried him captive to Babylon.

The Lord can make any affliction a conſumption to the moſt beautiful branches of a ſinful people, or perſon.

Whatſoever he uſeth as an inſtrument of his indignation, is his flame: In this ſence, the very waters which drowned the old World, were the fire and flame of God: He can by poverty, as by a flame, conſume and dry up riches; by diſgrace, as by a flame, conſume and dry up honour; by ſickneſs, as by a flame, conſume and dry up health; God hath ſpecial flames for every ſpecial branch, nothing can continue to do us good, when God gives Warrant or Commiſſion to any of his flames to ſcorch and conſume it. The flame ſhall burn up his branch,

And by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away.

We have the flame of God in the former clauſe, and the breath of his mouth in this: Some Interpreters conceive that Eliphaz mentions theſe two, The flame and the breath, purpoſely to put Job in mind what God had done to him; for we read in the firſt Chapter of this Book, of the flame of God, a fire from Heaven conſuming that branch, his flocks of Sheep, and a breath from God, namely, a mighty ſtrong wind, deſtroying a more precious branch, his flock of Children: Eliphaz cloaths this diſcourſe in ſuch terms as might eaſily remind and repreſent to Job, what God had done to him, in the day of his calamity.

And by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away.] There is yet a difference among Expoſitors about the Antecedent to his: His mouth; Whoſe mouth? Moſt underſtand it, of the breath of Gods mouth, as hath been hinted already: Some expound it of the breath of the wicked mans own mouth: I ſhall touch upon both.

Firſt, By the breath of Gods mouth he ſhall go away: The breath of God may be taken two wayes.

Either firſt (as the flame before) for his anger, which is often expreſſed by puffing the breath.

Secondly, It may be taken for the decree, or determination of God.

Both theſe wayes a wicked man goes away by the breath of God; firſt, by the anger of God; if God do but breath angerly upon him, he is blaſted and gone, His glory and greatneſs languiſh before the leaſt puff of Divine diſpleaſure: God needs not make great preparations of Armies, or Forces, to contend with wicked men; he needs not raiſe Mounts and Batteries, to overthrow their beſt Fortifications of Riches and Honour: The Channels of waters were ſeen (ſaith David, Pſal. 18. 15.) and the foundations of the World were diſcovered, at thy rebuke O Lord, at the blaſt of the breath of thy noſtrils. The Prophet tells thoſe, who neglected to build the Houſe of the Lord (Hag. 1.9.) Ye looked for much, but lo it came to little, and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it: God did but blow upon it, and by the breath of his mouth all their expected encreaſe went away. When Pharaoh purſued the Iſraelites in the height of pride and preſumption, the Text ſaith, It came to paſs in the morning watch, the Lord looked upon the Hoaſt of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire, and of the cloud, and troubled the Egyptians, and took off their Chariot wheels, that they drave them heavily (Exod. 14.24, 25.) God confounded them by a look; how eaſily can the Lord riſe up and deſtroy all the power that riſeth up againſt his people? He can do it with a breath from his mouth, With a caſt of his eye. When Chriſt was apprehended by the Officers armed with Staves and Swords; he ſaid, Whom ſeek you? They anſwered, Jeſus of Nazareth: He ſaith, I am he. (Chriſt was not afraid to confeſs himſelf) As ſoon then as he had ſaid unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground (John 18.6.) What a ſtrange power was here, that Chriſt could caſt them down with a word, and that not an angry word, not a word of conviction but confeſſion; he did not chide them, and ſay, Ye wretches, how dare you lay your hands upon me, who am an innocent perſon; how dare you carry me to judgment, who ſhall one day be your Judge; Chriſt ſpake no ſuch terrible language, but only ſaid, I am he, and down they fell. If theſe words of ſubmiſſion had ſuch a force in them, as overthrew thoſe Officers to the ground, how ſhall his Enemies ſtand before the thunder of his ſevereſt increpations, and final ſentence? As the Lord needs not make great proviſions for comforting of his people, if he ſpeaks a word, it is done; if he give but a good look, their hearts revive; Lord lift up the light of thy countenance upon me; thou haſt put gladneſs in my heart (*Pſal.*4.6,7.) So if God do but darken his countenance againſt wicked men, and frown upon them, if he do but breath at them, he puts ſorrow enough into their hearts, even conſuming killing ſorrow; By the breath of his mouth they go away.

Verba vel mandato ex ore Dei procedēte. Jun.

Again, take the breath of God, For the decree of God: for the word or command which goeth out of his mouth, by this breath of God, they go away. The deſtruction of the wicked is under a Decree; God hath ſpoken in his holyneſs (Pſal. 108. 7, 8, 9.) That is, he hath given out his word from Heaven, the habitation of his holineſs, and of his glory; or, He hath ſpoken it certainly, there is nothing but holineſs in his word (and that's the ſtrength of words) David having received this word, ſtands aſſured, That as Shechem, and Succoth, Gilead, and Manaſſeh, Ephraim, and Judah, would willingly ſubmit to him, and yield obedience; So alſo, that Moab, Edom, and Philiſtia, who were his profeſſed Enemies, ſhould be ſubdued to him. He expected to conquer and triumph over them, to put them to the baſeſt offices, as his Vaſſals, becauſe God had decreed and ſpoken it in his holineſs. God hath ſpoken the word (ſaith he) therefore it ſhall be done, yea 'tis done; and therefore David cryed, All's mine, Gilead is mine, Manaſſeh is mine, Moab and Edom are mine, as ſoon as God had ſpoken the word. All that ever was done in the World, hath been done by the breath of Gods mouth; that is, by the word or decree of God: So ſome underſtand that of the Apoſtle (2 *Theſ.*2.8.) And then ſhall that wicked one be revealed, whom the Lord ſhall conſume with the ſpirit, or breath of his mouth, and deſtroy with the brightneſs of his coming: Antichriſt hath ſtood long, and he hath been for ſome time declining; his downfal haſtens; the breath of God will leave him breathleſs: As he hath ſtood by the flattering breath of men; ſo he ſhall fall by the conſuming breath of God.

This conſuming with breath, notes either (as before) the eaſineſs of that conſumption, 'tis done with a breath, or the way and manner of doing it; 'tis done by the command and decree of God, or by the Preaching of the Goſpel, which indeed gives Antichriſt his fatal blow, and ſhakes all the Towers of myſtical Babylon, and is called by the Prophet, The rod of his mouth, and the breath of his lips (Iſa. 11.4.) He ſhall ſmite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips ſhall he ſlay the wicked. Life and death ſit upon the lips of Chriſt, he hath a reviving breath, and a killing breath; he quickens the deadeſt heart, and deads the quickeſt, the proudeſt heart with a word ſpeaking. By the breath of his mouth the wicked go away.

Spiritu oris, ſc. ipſius impii, credo potius referendum eſſe ad impium quaſi ille ſibi ipſi fuerit mortis cauſa dum contra Deum loquitur confidēter & libere. Sanct. Spiritu oris ſui, i.e. ſuis verbis quæ ſpiritu & halitu in ore formantur.

Further, The breath of his mouth, ſay ſome, is the breath of the wicked mans own mouth; By the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away: That is, by the words which breath out of his mouth. His paſſionate diſtempered ſpeeches ſhall undo him, while he ſpeaks, either outragiouſly, and blaſphemouſly againſt God, or falſly and ſeditiouſly towards man, his ruine enters at the opening of his lips.

The motion of the breath is the preſerver of life, and while breath laſts, life laſts; yet many a mans life had laſted longer had it not been for his breath. The wicked mans breath proves his death, and his tongue which hath been a ſcourge to others, becomes a Sword to himſelf. His words poſſibly have wounded, and his breath hath been the death of many: But now he is wounded by his own words, and cruſht to death by the weight of his own breath, or by the fall of his own tongue upon him: So the Pſalmiſt gives it (Pſal. 64.8.) They ſhall make their own tongues to fall upon themſelves; that is, Their own words ſhall be brought as a Teſtimony againſt them, and condemn them. The tongue is a little member (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 3.5.) And therefore a light member; yet it falls heavy, as heavy as lead. A man were better have his Houſe fall upon him, then that (in this ſenſe) his tongue ſhould fall upon him. Some have been preſſed to death, becauſe they would not ſpeak, but ſtood mute before the Judge; but more have been preſſed to death by their ſinful freedom, or rather licentiouſneſs in ſpeaking; this hath brought them to judgement, and caſt them in judgement: Their tongue hath fallen upon them, and by the breath of their mouth, they have gone away.

Laſtly (but I will not ſtay upon it, becauſe the Original doth not well bear it) theſe words are caſt into the form of a ſimilitude, deſcribing the manner how the wicked man, and all his glory ſhall go away; even as a breath, or as his breath; As the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away; that is, he ſhall go ſpeedily, he ſhall go ſuddenly: A breath is ſoon fetcht, it is both come and gone in a moment; A breathing time, is a Proverbial, for a little time (much like that, In the twinckling of an eye). Thus man comes and goes, is come and gone (eſpecially a wicked man who is driven by the wrath of God) as ſoon as ſeen by others, as ſoon as he hath breathed himſelf: It will not be long ere he goes, and he will not be long a going. For as the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

The breath of man goes continually, and ſo doth the life of man; while man ſleeps, his breath goes, and ſo doth his life; while man ſtands ſtill, his breath goes, and ſo doth his life: The breath, indeed, is ſometimes in a hurry, and goes faſter then it doth at other times; but though the life of man doth not go faſter at one time then at another, yet it always goes.

Or if at any time our life may be ſaid to go faſter then at another, it is when our breath is (by ſome ſtop in its paſſage) at a ſtand; and when ever our breath comes to a full ſtop, our life is not only going, but quite gone.

The life of man hath ſo much dependance upon his breath, that it is called Breath, and the breath of life: When God formed man out of the duſt of the ground, he breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life, and man became a living ſoul (Gen. 2.7.) And as ſoon as God calls back this breath of life, man becomes a dead body, or a carkaſs: The life of man muſt needs go as his breath, for it goes with his breath; and when the life of a wicked man is gone, all (that he called his) his worldly glory, goes with him: In that day all his thoughts periſh: For, As the breath of his mouth he ſhall go away.

Eliphaz having laid down the wicked mans ſad condition, and the cauſes of it, concludes with a uſe or application of the whole Doctrine, at the 31. Verſe, Let not him, that is deceived truſt in vanity, &c.

VERS. 31, 32, 33, 34, 35.

Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity; for vanity ſhall be his recompence.
It ſhall be accompliſhed before his time, and his branch ſhall not be green.
He ſhall ſhake off his unripe Grape as the Vine, and ſhall caſt off his flower as the Olive.
For the Congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate, and fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery.
They conceive miſchief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

ELiphaz laid down his Doctrine, at the 20. Verſe of this Chapter, That a wicked mans life is a miſerable life, he travels in pain all his days; and having inſiſted long upon the proof, he now gives us the application of it, in a uſe of dehortation,

Verſ. 31. Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity.

He inforceth this dehortation by a ſummary repetition of the Doctrine before delivered; which he doth, Firſt, Plainly in the cloſe of the 31. and in the beginning of the 32. Verſes, For vanity ſhall be his recompence; it ſhall be accompliſhed before its time.

Secondly, He doth it allegorically, in the cloſe of the 32. Verſe, and in the 33. His branch ſhall not be green: He ſhall ſhake off his unripe Grapes as the Vine, and ſhall caſt off his flower as the Olive.

Having thus preſſed his Doctrine by this powerful motive, he concludes his whole Sermon, with a freſh aſſertion of his Doctrine, againſt two ſorts of wicked men in particular, which yet may comprehend all wicked men;

Firſt, Of Hypocrites, who corrupt the worſhip of God, or are corrupt while they pretend to worſhip God. Ver.34. For the congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate;

Secondly, Of oppreſſors, who pervert Juſtice, or deal falſly among men; The fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Under theſe two heads, we may reduce all ſorts of ſinners; ſinners againſt God, under the notion of Hypocrites: And ſinners againſt men, under the notion of Oppreſſors, who pervert Judgment by giving or taking Bribes: All which Eliphaz concludes, by a deſcription of their evil actings (the cauſe of all their ſufferings) under that elegant metaphor of Child-bearing; They conceive miſchief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit: Thus you have the reſolution and ſcope of the latter part of this Chapter.

Verſ. 31. Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity.

Theſe words contain the dehortation; here are three terms to be explained.

First, What is meant by being deceived.
Secondly, What by truſting.
Thirdly, What we are to underſtand by Vanity.

Let not him that is deceived.] The Original word ſignifies, either the turning of the foot, or the turning of the heart, or both out of the way (Pſal. 119.176.) I have gone aſtray, like a loſt Sheep: That is, I have been deceived, and ſo have gone out of the way of thy holy Commandments. Satan is an ill guide, and our hearts are no better: He that follows either, quickly looſeth himſelf: And until God ſeeketh us up (as David prays in the next words) we cannot find our way when we are once out of it (*Ezek.*44.15.) The Prieſts, the Levites, the Sons of Zadock that kept the charge of my Sanctuary, when the people of Iſrael went aſtray from me, they ſhall come near to me: When the people walked in by places, and were intangled in the briars of their own corruptions; then the Prieſts kept the charge of the Lord: It was a great mercy, that when the people were deceived, the Prieſts were not; that when the Sheep went aſtray, the Shepherds did not: If Prieſts and people go aſtray together, who ſhall reduce them? But to the point, Iſrael went aſtray. They who led them did not cauſe them to erre (once they did as the Prophet complains) Who then did? Many go aſtray, when none lead them aſtray: Man can deceive himſelf faſt enough, if none elſe do; yet the word implys alſo the cunning activity of an external agent, to lead poor ſouls out of the way. We may take in both here; Let not him that is deceived, whether by the fallacious arguings of his own heart, or by the ſubtlety of any other, whether Men or Devils, יאמן Credet, ne credat in vanitatem.

Truſt in vanity.] Or, Let him not believe in vanity: Truſting is an act of faith, and though a man may believe, and not truſt; yet no man can truſt, who doth not believe. We tranſlate the word not as ſignifying only bare believing, but as it reaches that higher act of truſting: He that is moſt deceived, is moſt apt to truſt that which will deceive him more; and gives not only his conſent, but confidence to that which either is not at all, or is that leaſt which it pretends to be, fit to be truſted, Vanity.

Let him not truſt in vanity.] The word which we render Vanity, is not Habel uſed by Solomon (Eccleſ. 1.2.) Vanity of vanities, which ſignifies only a light thing, ſuch as is a vapour riſing from the earth, a bubble ſwelling out of, and floating a little upon the water, or more ſtrictly, a puff or breath of the mouth; but it ſignifies raſhneſs, falſeneſs, a lie, a deceit; vain things are falſe, lying, and deceiveable; therefore, one word ſerves for both.

Again, Vanity may be here taken two ways, either for the ſin, or deceit, with which a man is miſlead; and then the meaning is, Let not him that is deceived by ſin, truſt in ſin: Or ſecondly, Vanity may be taken for any creature comfort, and contentment, eſpecially thoſe which are the revenue, or income of ſinful practices. Sin leads to profit, to pleaſure, to honour, to theſe frail and tranſitory things ſin leads us, in hope of ſatisfaction by them, and then the meaning is, Let not him that is deceived, truſt in that which ſin promiſeth, and profeſſeth it will do for him, or advance him to: Sin in its nature is vanity, and all the fruits or iſſues of it are vain too. Therefore, as nothing, and nothing, added together, make nothing, ſo vanity and vanity put together, make but vanity: The total ſumm cannot exceed the Items or particulars; Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity, for vanity ſhall be his recompence.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Man is very apt to be deceived; ſo apt to be deceived, that he is ſcarce ever undeceived.

Eliphaz ſpeaks here, not only of a poſſibility to be deceived, but of being actually deceived; and this ariſeth two ways, firſt from the impotence and weakneſs, from the blindneſs and ignorance that is in man; he that is blind and weak, is eaſily miſlead; every man naturally, how ſtrong, how wiſe, how knowing ſoever he ſeems to be, is yet weak, blind, and ignorant in a very great meaſure; and therefore very deceivable: Man is full of craft, this makes him deceitful; he is empty of true wiſdom, this renders him deceiveable.

Secondly, As man may quickly be deceived, by reaſon of the ignorance which is in him, ſo alſo by reaſon of thoſe ſubtle enemies, who are alwayes about him, yea and within him. We live (as I may ſo ſpeak) among Cheaters, and Cozenners, and there is a great Cheater lives in us; how hard is it then not to be deceived? If a man be in a Croud among many Cut-purſes, and Cheaters, he is in danger to loſe his Money every moment; it is ſo with us: though carnal men are not at all aware of it, nor they who are moſt ſpiritual, ſo much aware of it as they ſhould. It is dangerous to live among deceivers, though we know them, and are aware of them; it is moſt dangerous to live among deceivers, and not to know them, for then we cannot be aware of them; but it is madneſs to know we live among deceivers, and yet not to be aware of them.

There are three notorious Deceivers, who labour to enſnare us; we need not wonder though ſome who are watchful againſt them, are deceived by them: but it would be a wonder, and ſuch a wonder as yet was never ſeen, if they ſhould not be deceived, who never watch againſt them.

Firſt, Our own hearts which have not only an impotence or weakneſs (as I noted before) whereby they are apt to be deceived, but there is in our hearts an activeneſs, yea an efficacy to deceive; we are not only paſſive, but active; we are ſeldom, if at all, deceived, till we deceive our ſelves: And ſome men are very active in deceiving others, ſo all men are active in a degree to deceive themſelves. (Jer. 17.9.) The heart of man is deceitful and deſperately wicked: The heart is deceitful in reference to a threefold object.

Firſt, The heart would deceive God himſelf, and impoſe upon the All-wiſe: That's the deſign of a Hypocrite, his buſineſs is to deceive God, though the iſſue be the deceiveing of himſelf.

Secondly, The heart of man is deceitful in contriving wayes to deceive and ſupplant other men. The complaint of the Prophet goes very high upon this (*Mich.*7.2.) The good man is periſhed out of the Earth, and there is none upright among men; they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net. To lie in wait, Is the act, and a Net is the inſtrument of a Deceiver, the Propheſie of Chriſt goes yet higher (*Matth.*24.24.) For there ſhall ariſe falſe Chriſts, and falſe Prophets, and ſhall ſhew great ſigns and wonders; inſomuch that (if it were poſſible) they ſhall deceive the very Elect. Deceit works to its utmoſt poſſibility, when it puts hard to deceive thoſe, whom to deceive is impoſſible. If Elect men could be deceived, God ſhould be deceived in his Election; But this is impoſſible, and therefore that is; the man who is elect is deceiveable, but becauſe he is an elect man, he cannot be deceived: And though an elect man may be deceived in ſome things (for even he is ſubject to errour, becauſe he is ſtill (while in this World) the ſubject of ſin) yet he cannot be ſo far deceived in any thing, as to null or fruſtrate his election. How reſtleſs is man to deceive man, ſeeing he ceaſeth not his endeavour to deceive, where he cannot prevailingly deceive.

Thirdly, (Which I conceive the Text in Jeremiah ſpecially aims at) the heart of man is very buſie to deceive himſelf. 'Tis bad enough to deceive others, but to deceive our ſelves is worſe, and that not only becauſe it makes us more miſerable, but more ſinful: Self-deceit is the moſt ſinful deceit. The heart of man is deſperately wicked, there is no hope that it will leave off to do wickedly, ſeeing it is of counſel againſt its own peace. And ſurely, man is not only under a poſſibility to be deceived, in regard of the impotence and blindneſs of his heart, but alſo under an impoſſibility not to be deceived, in regard of the skill and unwearied activity of his heart to deceive himſelf.

Secondly, Man hath another deceiver continually about him, The World, and all that is in the World, The luſt of the fleſh, the luſt of the eye, and the pride of life; all theſe are but as ſo many ſnares and juggels to cozen, and deceive poor man.

Thirdly, The Devil, who is The Deceiver; of whoſe devices we are not ignorant (ſaith the Apoſtle) he is full of tricks and plots; he hath his methods, his arts to deceive. Ever ſince the Devil deceived himſelf, he hath been ſtudying how to deceive man; he doth not only go about like a roaring Lyon, but like a ſubtle Serpent, and a cunning Fox, ſeeking whom he may devour; or he is a Lyon to devour thoſe whom he hath firſt deceived as a Fox, or as a Serpent: Man is a perſwadable creature (Gen. 9.27.) God ſhall perſwade Japhet to dwell in the Tents of Shem: The Original word there uſed to perſwade, ſignifies alſo to deceive, becauſe perſwaſions are often made as Engins, or baits to deceive.

There is alſo a kind of holy fraud in the Goſpel, and man is as it were deceived into the obedirnce of it, Being crafty I caught you with guile (I fetcht you over, did I not?) ſaith Paul (2 Cor. 12.16.) Now as man is ſometimes deceived for his good, ſo he is often and eaſily deceived for his hurt, by theſe three deceivers. Satan, the World, and his own Heart, perſwade him by an unholy deceit to dwell in the Tents of ſin.

בשו Eis poteſt ſumi & cũ יאמנ credet, ne credat in vanitatem, & cum נתעה deceptus, deceptus inquã per vanitatem, ne in eam fidat.

Again, Some who by vanity underſtand ſin, read the word Vanity twice, Let not him that is deceived by vanity, truſt in vanity; that is, Let not him that is deceived by ſin, truſt in ſin; which interpretation yields us this truth, Sin is deceitful, or thus, Sin doth nothing but deceive.

The Apoſtle, (*Heb.*3.13.) chargeth ſin with deceit to its very face, Exhort one the other, while it is called to day, leaſt any of your hearts be hardned through the deceitfulneſs of ſin; there are three eminent evils in ſin, Firſt, There is a pollution in ſin, it defiles.

Secondly, There is baſeneſs in ſin, it diſhonours.

Thirdly, There is a deceitfulneſs in ſin, it would make us believe we ſhall be, and receive, that which it is not able to perform.

Hence the Apoſtle (Rom. 6.21.) puts the queſtion to thoſe who were once the ſervants of ſin, What fruit had ye then in thoſe things whereof you are now aſhamed? He asketh them, and bids them ask their own hearts, what fruit had you? as if he had ſaid, I know when you were ſervants of ſin, your ſins promiſed you great matters great rewards: the Tree of ſin ſeems to be loaded with fruits, the bows of it look as if ready to break with goodly fruits; fruit pleaſant to the eye, ſweet to the taſte, and deſireable to make one wiſe; but I beſeech you tell me what fruit had you in thoſe things whereof you are now aſhamed? If you be aſhamed to tell me; I will tell you, The end of thoſe things is death; that's all the fruit which the Tree of ſin bears. Sin deals with us, as Jael with Siſera (*Judg.*4.18.) She ſtood at the Tent door, when he came panting from the Battel, and ſaid to him, Turn in my Lord, turn in; ſhe took him into her Tent, and laid him down, covered him warm, and when he asked her for Milk, ſhe gave him Butter, Butter in a Lordly diſh; here were fine words, and ſeeming promiſes: yet ſhe honeſtly deceived him, She put her hand to the Nail, and her hand to the workmans Hammer, and nailed his temples to the ground. Thus ſin bids us turn in, promiſes to cover us warm, gives us Butter in a Lordly diſh, but never tells us of that woful end, and wretched cataſtrophe which it intends unto us: Sin deals with us as Dallilah with Samſon, takes us into its boſome and embraces; but then it hath a plot to cut the lock of our ſtrength, to deliver us over to the Philiſtims, to call in Legions of Devils to ſieze upon us, and make us grind at the Mill of their baſeſt drudgery.

More diſtinctly, ſin deceives by a threefold promiſe.

Firſt, By a promiſe of profit (Prov. 1.13.) Come caſt in thy lot with us, let us lie in wait for blood, &c. We ſhall find all precious ſubſtance, we ſhall fill our houſes with ſpoil: but this precious ſubſtance, proves only a pernicious ſhadow, and theſe ſpoils taken, ſpoil thoſe who take them.

Secondly, Sin deceives by promiſing content, and ſweet delight; what thoughts had Ahab concerning Naboths Vineyard? If he could but get it, he were a made man; what pleaſure ſhould he have in thoſe ſhady walks? what Grapes and Wine from thoſe fruitful Vines? Sin promiſeth as largly as God doth, to give us not only delight but ſatisfaction; that we ſhall not have ſo much as an empty corner in our ſouls; all ſhall be filled: whereas in truth there is nothing but emptineſs, and diſſatisfaction in any creature, eſpecially when ſin leads or helps us to the enjoyment of it.

Thirdly, At leaſt, ſin promiſeth and gives its word for it, that we ſhall be free from trouble, and feel no evil; That we ſhall have peace, though we walk in the imagination of our heart (*Deut.*29.19.) That as they flattered themſelves in the Prophet, we ſhall not ſee Sword, nor Famine: Theſe vaniſhing dreams of plenty, of good things, and immunity from evil, carry thouſands of ſouls captive to the baſeſt bondage of ſin.

Further, This vanity, from truſting which the deceived ſoul is called off by Eliphaz, is conceived to be worldly riches, and the fulleſt poſſeſſion of the creature; theſe are vanity: That they are, is a common theam, and yet though it be much ſpoken of, it is very little belived; we are apt to over-rate the things of the World, and under-rate the things of Heaven. The creature is vanity, not only in regard of the nothingneſs of it, but vanity in regard of that which we call the ſomethingneſs of it, or the beſt of it.

The Prophet Jonah makes the word which we here tranſlate vanity, the Epethite of that which is commonly tranſlated vanity (Jon. 2.8.) They that obſerve lying vanities: Idols are vanity, and a lie, becauſe though they can do no good at all, yet they promiſe much: Riches are vanity, and a lie, becauſe they cannot do ſo much good as they promiſe. Solomon ſaith in his Eccleſiaſtes, That Money anſwereth all things (Chap. 8.10.) And ſo it doth as the value of all earthly things is made by Money, and and as Money is the price of all earthly things. But though Money anſwereth all things, by ſatisfying our engagements, yet it anſwereth nothing to the ſatisfying of its own engagements. Money and riches have paid many a mans debts, and enough of them will pay any mans debts, but they have never paid their own debts, no more then Idols have, and therefore they juſtly bear the brand of this reproach, Lying vanities: That they are ſo, appears clearly in two particulars.

Firſt, In the report which they make of themſelves.

Secondly, In the promiſes which they make to us.

Firſt, In the report which they make of their own worth; if you look upon the bill of the creature, it puts down, not only a hundred for fifty, but a million for a mite: For, how much ſoever it is worth, yet it bears no proportion to that which it would be eſteemed worth: As ſome rich men are not half ſo rich as they deſire to be reckoned; ſo riches themſelves are not ſo rich by thouſands of thouſands as they would be reckoned.

There is indeed a created worth in the creature, for it is the work of God; but ſince the ſin of man hath (as to us) both imbaſed, and imbittered the creature, it is worth nothing comparatively to that at which it is rated, both in its own, and our Books.

Secondly, The creature (in this notion) is a lying vanity, while it perſwades us; that in the enjoyment thereof we ſhall be happy; whereas our happineſs doth not conſiſt in any creature-enjoyment; unleſs God himſelf be our portion, we are both poor and miſerable in the fulleſt poſſeſſion of the creature. God is the living ſtream, the creature at the beſt was but a Ciſtern, and now it is but a broken Ciſtern which leaks out all the waters that paſs into it, unleſs God ſtop the chinks, and mend the cracks of it, by Jeſus Chriſt.

Again, The creature promiſeth to eaſe us of our cares, yet it doth but multiply them: The creature promiſeth to ſatisfie our deſires, yet it doth only encreaſe and enlarge them. Riches are not food, but fewel to our deſires; they do not allay our appetite, as bread doth, when received into the ſtomack, but enflame our appetite, as wood doth, when it is caſt into the fire.

Further, The creature promiſeth to protect us; hence that of Solomon (Prov. 10.15.) The rich mans wealth is his ſtrong City: That is, it promiſeth to be ſo, and tells him, it will do that for him, which a ſtrong City doth for its Inhabitants, defend him againſt all Commers and Invaders; yet the ſame Solomon aſſures us in the next Chapter (Verſ. 4.) That riches profit not in the day of wrath. And Ezekiel threatens the Jews, That their Silver and their Gold ſhall not deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord.

Laſtly, the Creature promiſeth to continue with us. Riches tell us, that though Father and Mother forſake us, yet they will not, though Wife and Children forſake us, yet they will not; they make us believe that they will ſtick cloſer to us, then Chriſt himſelf, and yet they are upon the wing preſently, they flie away as the Eagle, and are gone out of ſight, they do not only periſh in the uſing, but periſh from our uſe.

Is not all this and a thouſand times more, which might be ſaid of their lying, and vanity, enough, and more then enough to juſtifie thoſe titles which the Spirit of God hath beſtowed upon them, that they are vanity and a lie, or as Jonah calls them, Lying vanities.

And yet (to cloſe the point) we muſt remember that creature-riches are not a lie, nor deceitful in themſelves. There's no more deceit in the greateſt abundance of Gold and Silver, then there is in a wholſome ſavory piece of bread. Riches are not vain and deceitful, as our hearts are ſaid to be deceitful (Jer. 17.9.) nor as luſt is ſaid to be deceitful (Epheſ. 4.22.) For theſe things are deceitful only through the deceitfulneſs of our hearts, and luſts: Or they are deceitful Objectively, not Actively; we are deceived about them, not by them. They do not deceive us till we are decived; nor do they deceive us either as poſſeſſed or uſed, but as adored and truſted. Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity.

Thirdly Obſerve, Man muſt and will have ſomewhat to truſt to, or lean upon.

And therefore rather then fail, he will truſt that which cannot but fail, Vanity. Like one that's ready to drown, he catcheth at any thing, a rotten ſtick, or a ſtraw, and would ſupport his whole body, by that which is not able to bear the weight of his little finger. Man is a weak creature, ſenſe and nature are enough to make him ſenſible of his natural weakneſs; and theſe alſo are enough to prompt and provoke him to ſeek help without himſelf, though they are utterly inſufficient to direct him whither to go for the ſureſt help; It is the priviledge of God alone to have nothing to truſt to, or to be above truſt: He who is all ſtrength needs not truſt. As he doth not put truſt in his (Verſ. 15.) Becauſe he knows they are frail and mutable: ſo he hath no need to truſt them, becauſe he knows himſelf not only ſtrong, but immutable. God is all that he is from himſelf, and therefore he ever continues to be what he is, by himſelf. But man who is not a ſpring to himſelf of Being, cannot be a ſupport to himſelf for the continuance of his Being; much leſs for the continuace of his well-being. And as man's neceſſity calls him to truſt, ſo his duty calls him to truſt God: Man fell at firſt by his deſire to ſtand alone, he would be independent; and men fall every day, becauſe they deſire to ſtand by that which cannot ſtand alone. It is a ſpecial part of that worſhip which we owe to God, to truſt him; and whatſoever we truſt beſides God, we make a God of it. He that truſts not in the God that made him, makes many Gods (ſuch as they are) by truſting them. While Job puts that negative ſuppoſition (as to his own caſe, Chap. 31.24.) If I have made Gold my hope, or have ſaid to the fine Gold, thou art my confidence: He more then implyeth that many had: Man ought to truſt God, but few will; many will truſt in Creatures, but none ought: Man will be truſting in ſomewhat, and he is ſo forward to truſt in vanity (which indeed is nothing) that it is the hardeſt thing in the World to take him off. We cannot preſs either our ſelves or others too much, to truſt God, and we cannot repreſs them enough from truſting vanity: Man is very ready to exerciſe and put forth an act of truſt, and he is as ready to miſtake the object of truſt.

Laſtly Obſerve, Man is apt to truſt that which hath deceived him; or man being once deceived, truſts that which will deceive him again.

Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity: We ſay, Such a man hath deceived me once, but he ſhall not deceive me the ſecond time: But carnal hearts being deceived once by ſin and vanity, are willing to be deceived a thouſand times; being once deceived, they care not how often they are deceived: That of the Prophet is an eminent Teſtimony to this too much experimented truth (Iſaiah 44.20.) He feedeth on aſhes; that is, he is as much deluded as a man is, who eats aſhes, thinking it to be bread or other good chear; or his Idol which promiſed him great matters and much joy, hath given nothing but aſhes, ſorrow, and miſery; of which, aſhes, and eſpecially feeding upon aſhes, was an emblem: Now though it were thus with him, yet (ſaith the Prophet) A deceived heart hath turned him aſide that he cannot deliver his ſoul, nor ſay, is there not a lie in my right hand? that is, Though he ſees himſelf deceived, yet he hath no power to withdraw from the deceiver, nor to queſtion the deceit; he is ſo bewitched with the ſorcery of ſin, that he cannot deliver his ſoul from the ſnares of it; but being deceived, he is willingly deceived, and looks upon his deceiver as his truſty Friend.

God never deceived, no nor failed any man that truſted in him (Pſal. 9.10.) Yet the hearts of the moſt will not be perſwaded to truſt God; ſin and the creature deceive all that truſt in them, yet we can hardly call or beat the heart off from truſting them. Sin ſeldom looſes its credit; ſin hath broken and undone thouſands, yea all who have truſted it; yet ſtill it hath credit among thouſands, and can be truſted with more then this World is worth, the precious ſoul of man, for the asking. But let not him that is deceived, truſt (any longer) in vanity, if he do, he ſhall never be a gainer, no nor a ſaver by it;

For vanity ſhall be his recompence.

Vanity fills both parts of the Verſe, and meets us at every turn, yet with a difference: In the former part by vanity was ſignified either ſin, or the creature; in this latter part, vanity notes miſery, or the effect and fruit of ſin.

Hence

Vanitatis nomē variè hic ſumitur, quā ob rem forſan & variè ſcribitur, priore loco ſig. vanas res quibus fidebāt, ſc. opes: gloriā, poſteriori loco vanitatem in quā hæc omnia redigēda ſint dum ex his decidens miſer fiet. Merc.

Hence Obſerve, The vanity of miſery overtakes all thoſe who are deceived by the vanity of ſin.

Vanity is their recompence.] There are two ſorts of recompence.

Firſt, Of wrath.
Secondly, Of favour.

Evil deeds have their recompence, as well as good. To me (ſaith the Lord, *Deut.*32.35.) belongeth vengeance and recompence; that is, the recompence of vengeance; as the Apoſtle expounds it (*Heb.*10.30.) For we know him that ſaid, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompence ſaith the Lord: God will not live long in any mans debt: As holy Goſpel-confidence hath a great recompence of reward (*Heb.*10. 35.) So every diſobedience of the Law received a juſt recompence of reward (*Heb.*2.2.) And God is ſo exact in giving the recompences of puniſhment, that he will not ſpare his own, when they are ſo fooliſh as to truſt in vanity (*Prov.*11.31.) Behold the righteous ſhall be recompenced in the earth, much more the wicked and the ſinner: that is, A righteous man ſhall be corrected, though he ſin of infirmity; how then ſhall the wicked be puniſhed who ſin with preſumption and delight. As a wicked man hath all his recompences of good on the earth (*Mat.*6.2.) They have their reward; ſo a righteous man hath all his recompences of evil of affliction in the earth; he hath none beyond. But, we may ſtrongly argue, that the wicked, who truſt in vanity ſhall be recompenced with ſorrow for ever; ſeeing the righteous, if they do but a little turn aſide to vanity, ſhall be recompenced with ſorrow here: That's the Apoſtle Peter's way of reaſoning (1 *Epiſt.*4.18.) If the righteous ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and ſinner appear? Surely, as the Prophet concludes (*Iſa.*59.18.) According to their deeds accordingly he will repay fury to his adverſaries, recompence to his enemies, to the Iſlands he will repay recompence.

Secondly, as vanity in the former clauſe is taken for the Creature,

Obſerve, The Creature is moſt vain to thoſe who truſt it.

The Creature is a vain thing in his hand, who believes and truſts in God, but it is exceeding vain in his hand, who truſts on it; and the more it is truſted, the more vain it is. If we make it our ſtaff, it will be our ſcourge: if we lean upon it as our rock, it will run into our hands like a broken Reed: The beſt way to keep up our comfort in the Creature, is to keep our diſtance from the Creature. And they ſhall find moſt content in the World, who live furtheſt off it, and expect leaſt from it. God is good, and the more we truſt him, the better he is to us, yea he is not good at all to us, unleſs we truſt him: But the beſt of creatures truſted to become evil, yea an Idol to us. Truſt not in vanity (ſuch are all creatures, in their beſt eſtate) for vanity ſhall be your recompence.

Again, The word which we tranſlate, recompence, ſignifies a change, or the exchange which is made of one thing for another: While Job exalts the value and excellency of wiſdom above all created excellencies, he ſaith (*Chap.*28. 17.) The Gold and the Chryſtal cannot equal it, and the exchange of it ſhall not be for jewels of fine Gold.

A radice מור mutavit תמורה commutatio, vanitas erit commutatio ejus, i.e. in nihilum redigetur.

So ſome render it here, Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity, for vanity ſhall be his change: Whenſoever he changeth, he ſhall change into vanity, or when he hath driven a trade in ſinful vanity, to the higheſt; the beſt exchange which the Merchandize thereof yields him, is miſerable vanity: Vanity can produce nothing to us but vanity: The effect is not better then the cauſe, nor the fruit then the Tree; and that which we receive in exchange, though it may be of another kind, yet it is of no better value then that we give in exchange. Hence Obſerve,

That a wicked mans ſtate never changeth for better, but from good to bad, or from bad to worſe.

Till the man himſelf be changed from bad to good, his ſtate can never change from bad to good: And ſuppoſe his outward ſtate be good, then the worſt thing that can befal him, is this, that his ſtate ſhould not change. His ſettledneſs in that which is civilly good, doth but more ſettle him in that which is morally evil. They have no changes, therefore they fear not God (*Pſal.*55.19.) What can be worſe for man then this, not to fear God, who is the chiefeſt good? Who would not fear to be without changes, when he hears that being without them, keeps out this fear?

Suppoſe further. That the wicked mans outward eſtate be evil, then it is worſe to him, when he changes to outward good: if he change from ſorrow to joy, from poverty to riches, from ſickneſs to health, from a priſon to liberty, in all theſe, or in any other of like nature with theſe, he changes to his loſs: That man can never change for good, who continues evil. Such a mans outward eſtate often changes from bad to worſe; if it change from bad to good, that is bad for him; and if being good, it change not at all, that is worſt of all.

It is a part of the miſery of man, that his ſtate is changable, but that is incident to the beſt of men: We ſhall be unchangable in our ſtate, till we come into the preſence of God, who is unchangable in his nature. We may ſay alſo (conſidering the many troubles which we are ſubject to in this life) that it is a part of our happineſs, that our ſtate is changable. Thoſe changes which are from evil to good, or from good to better, are to be numbred among our bleſſings; ſuch are the changes of the Saints, all their changes are for the better: yea thoſe changes of the Saints which are from joy to ſorrow, from riches to poverty, from health to ſickneſs, from liberty to a priſon, from life to death, in a word, their changes from any kind of outward temporary good, to outward temporary evil, are yet for their good. He cannot change but for his good, who is good, and who abides always under this promiſe, that all ſhall work together for his good.

An evil and a good man differ in nothing more then in their changes; nor ſhould any ſelf-conſideration provoke an evil man more to deſire that he may be changed to good, then this, that his changes may be for good. Who would continue or truſt in vanity, were he perſwaded that vanity ſhall be his change?

Secondly, Obſerve, That ſuch as our way is, ſuch will our end be.

If we walk and truſt in vanity, we ſhall have vanity for our recompence, or our change. Every mans end is virtually in his way: So the Apoſtle argues elegantly (*Gal.*6.7.) Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatſoever a man ſowes that ſhall he reap, he that ſowes to the fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption; he that ſowes to the ſpirit, ſhall of the ſpirit reap life everlaſting: If the Husband-man ſow tares he muſt look to reap tares: A ſeed time of tares, and a Harveſt of Wheat, were never heard of in the ſame ground: As the ſeed is, ſuch is the crop (*Iſa.*3.11.) Wo to the wicked, it ſhall be ill with him, for the reward of his hand ſhall be given him. There is nothing worſe for ſome, then to have their reward brought in, and all that is owing to them paid: The very receiving of their debts and rewards, is their undoing for ever.

All the miſery of a wicked man is ſummed up in this, He ſhall have the reward of his hands. Wrath, and death, and Hell, are his rewards, and all the wages which the work both of his hands and heart can earn, and theſe he ſhall have fully paid to him: Vain he hath been, and vanity ſhall be his recompence.

אַל Malo ſimpliciter negare quam prohibere Merc. Non credit qui vanitate errat quod vanitas erit permutatio ejus Merc. Non credet fore ut ejus fœlicitas permutetur & ad meram vanitatem deveniat. Vatabl.

Some read this Verſe, not as a dehortation, Let not him that is deceived truſt, or believe in vanity; but as a negative propoſition (for that particle in the Hebrew, which ſometimes carrieth a prohibition, notes alſo a bare negation; ſo here) He that is deceived with vanity will not believe (the ſame word ſignifies both to believe and truſt) that vanity ſhall be his recompence: He will not believe a change, much leſs ſuch a change; This is a clear ſenſe, and it hints us this Obſervation.

That a wicked man is full of infidelity or unbelief, that his eſtate is evil, or ſhall ever be worſe then it is.

The unbelief of man is as ſtrong againſt the threatnings, as againſt the promiſes: The Saints are hardly brought to believe, that glory ſhall be their recompence, that the purchaſe which Chriſt hath made of Heaven, and eternal happineſs belongs to them. A wicked man will not believe that tribulation and anguiſh ſhall be upon him, or that the wrath of God is revealed from Heaven againſt his unrighteouſneſs, he will not believe that he ſhall go to Hell and be damned, or that everlaſting fire ſhall burn him, or the worm that dies not, feed upon him; he that is deceived will not believe theſe things, and the Devil hath as great an advantage upon men, by making them ſtrong in unbelief: As God hath, by making his people ſtrong in Faith.

The firſt aſſault that ever the Devil made againſt man, was to weaken Faith, or ſtrengthen unbelief about the threatnings: While he laboured to deceive the Woman, he laboured as much to perſwade her, That vanity ſhould not be her recompence: God had ſaid peremptorily, In the day that ye eat thereof, ye ſhall ſurely die: The Devil denied as peremptorily, Ye ſhall not ſurely die (*Gen.*3.4.) The people were commanded to ſay Amen to every branch of the Curſe (*Deut.27.16,17,&c.*) Though it be the loweſt way of obedience to obey, becauſe we believe the truth, and certainty of the Curſe; yet it is a high act of obedience to believe it: And Satan is as buſie againſt our faith, in the threatnings, as he is againſt our faith in promiſes. This unbelief opens the way to the committing of ſin, and ſweetens ſin while we are committing it: Were it not for this unbelief ſin could not be bread, much leſs (as it is to many) pleaſant bread. Sin would be Gall and Wormwood in the acting of it, did we believe, that it will be bitterneſs in the end. Who would do the work of ſin, did he believe that vanity ſhould be his recompence? Becauſe this threat is not believed, therefore the Law which forbids ſin, is not obeyed. As Faith is a ſhield to the new Man, ſo unbelief is a ſhield to the old Man; as Faith quenches the fiery darts of the Devil, or his allurements to ſin; ſo unbelief quenches all the fiery darts of God, or his threatnings of puniſhment. Tuſh ſay they, We ſhall never ſee Sword nor Famine, we need not fear (which is ſo much talked of) death or Hell: Vanity ſhall not be our recompence.

Rab. Kimchi exponit Sheve, pro æquali ſeu æqualitate. q. d. Ne credat qui deceptus eſt æqualem ſẽper & ſui ſimilẽ fore ſibi ſtatum, vel eodẽ ſẽper modo res ſibi ceſſuras. Merc.

There is a third reading of the Text: The former word which we render Vanity, is tranſlated by ſome of the Rabbins, Equality, or a thing that is equal, the latter, as we, a lie, or Vanity. This varies the whole ſtrain of the Verſe, and yet the Expoſition given upon it is clear, both to the general ſcope, and to the ſenſe given immediately before. Let not him that is deceived, believe that he ſhall be always equal, or of the ſame eſtate, for vanity ſhall be his recompence. He thinks to carry it ſmoothly, and with an even thred, but he is deceived. Things will not alwayes ſtand at the ſame point and poyze with him, and therefore let him not feed himſelf with groundleſs ayery hopes, that they will: His affairs will not always have the ſame face, nor bear the ſame aſpect toward him; now they ſmile and look pleaſantly, but anon they will frown and look ſowre.

Non credet verbo æquo qui errat ſed mẽdaciũ erit loco ejus. Pagn. q. d. qui errat nõ credit verbo recto; ſed ponet mẽdaciũ loco illius & hoc pacto credet.

Laſtly, Keeping near the ſame ſenſe ſtill; the words are thus tranſlated: He that is deceived, will not believe the right word, or the word of truth, but he will believe a lie in ſtead of it: As if Eliphaz had thus ſchool'd and caution'd Job, I have told you this as from God; but I know he that is (as you are) miſled, and deceived, will not believe the word of God, who cannot lie; he will believe a lie rather. As the carnal heart changes the glory of God into a lie, ſo the truth of God into a lie, or embraceth a lie for truth; he that believed not the right word, will ſoon believe that which is wrong. As they who receive not the love of the truth, are (by the juſt judgment of God) given up to ſtrong deluſions, to believe a lie: So alſo are they, who receive not the truth. As the not doing of good, is not only it ſelf an evil, but leads us alſo, or lays us open to the doing of many evils, yea of any evil: So the not receiving of truth is not only an errour, but it leads us alſo, or lays us open to the receiving of many, yea of any errour.

Eliphaz having thus preſſed his dehortation upon Job, not to truſt in vanity, leſt he find vanity the reward and recompence of that unholy faith and truſt; proceeds yet further to preſs his dehortation by the ſame argument for the matter, though varied in the manner of expreſſion, in the beginning of the next Verſe.

Verſ. 32. It ſhall be accompliſhed before his time, &c.

Theſe words are a ſtrong enforcement of the motive laid down in the former Verſe, Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity: Why, what if he do? Vanity ſhall be his recompence: That's the firſt part of the motive. The ſecond is,

It ſhall be accompliſhed before his time.] What ſhall be accompliſhed? There is no expreſs Antecedent in the Hebrew; we may underſtand, either firſt, the life of the wicked man himſelf, of whom Eliphaz had before diſcourſed. Or ſecondly, the eſtate of the wicked man. Or thirdly, the deſigns and plots of the wicked man. Taking in all three, the meaning is, That himſelf and all that he hath gotten, and all that he hath projected, Shall be accompliſhed before his time; and what's this but vanity for his recompence?

In non die ſuo cõplebitur. Mont. Cõpleri ante diẽ, &c. eſt potius perire quã ullũ cõplementũ & perfectionẽ accipere. Pined. Antequã dies ejus impleantur, peribit ut ſit תמלא à מלל ſuccido. Morte immatura prævenitur vel gladio, vel morbo, vel aliqua alia violẽta cauſa in die non ſuo implebitur ſepulchrum ejus. Targ.

To be accompliſhed before the time, is not to be accompliſhed at all, it notes rather perdition then perfection. The word which we tranſlate to accompliſh, ſignifies alſo to cut off, as we put in the Margin of our Bibles, It ſhall be accompliſhed, or cut off before his time: The Vulgar tranſlation fills up the ſenſe thus, Before his dayes can be filled, he ſhall periſh.

As the Relative looks to the wicked man himſelf, Obſerve,

An untimely death is the portion of a wicked man.

He ſhall be accompliſhed in a day that is not his, or before his proper day. In oppoſition to which, Eliphaz had promiſed, *Chap.*5. That a godly man ſhall come like a ſheaf of Corn into the Barn, fully ripe: Now ſaith he, This wicked man ſhall be like untimely fruit, accompliſhed, cut off, and periſhing before his time. We have ſuch an Expreſſion (*Eccl.*7.17.) Be not righteous over-much, neither make thy ſelf over-wiſe; why ſhouldeſt thou deſtroy thy ſelf? Be not over-much wicked (not that there is any mediocrity in wickedneſs, or that a man can be wicked in due proportion, but ſaith he, take heed of high actings in wickedneſs) why ſhouldeſt thou die before thy time? Some wickedneſſes lie cloſe, men live and continue in them long unſeen; others are ſo open and abominable, that their actors are abnoxious to the hand of Juſtice: He that is wicked over-much, that is, extreamly wicked, ſhall be cut off ſome way or other before his time.

Quarrellers die by the Sword, Drunkards die by ſurfet, Adulterers decay into filthy diſeaſes, Sorcerers are killed by the Devil, Malefactors of all ſorts are cut off by the ſentence of the Magiſtrate. Moſt deſire to live long, and yet they take a courſe to make their lives ſhort; they forget that ſhort way to long life (Pſal. 34. 12.)

That promiſe (*Iſa.*65.20.) ſtands oppoſite to this threatning, There ſhall be no more there an infant of dayes, nor an old man that hath not filled his dayes: A good man fills his dayes, a wicked man ſhall be accompliſhed, or there ſhall be an end of him before his day; both, before that day which he would live to, according to the courſe of his deſire, and before that day which he might live unto, according to the courſe of nature.

Implere dies ad lõgã fælicẽq; ſenectã pertinet, vel denotat illã ætatis maturitatẽ, quæ nõ annorũ numero; ſed pietatis perfectione definitur.

Beſides, a wicked man never fills his dayes, though he be full of dayes; he that is not prepared for death (how old ſoever he is) dies before he is ripe: he is ripe for deſtruction, but he is neither ripe nor fit for death: The youngeſt Saint that dies, dies ripe, though he die before he come to that eſtate, wherein nature uſeth to crop men off; yet, he (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, *Epheſ.*4.13.) is come to the fulneſs of the ſtature of Chriſt.

Pii licet ætate juvenes, ſenes ſunt moribus.

Secondly, Referring theſe words unto the eſtate of a wicked man, it ſhall be accompliſhed, or cut off before the time; that is, his pomp, and greatneſs, all that he hath gotten together (of which he ſpake in the precedent part of the Chapter) ſhall be ſcattered ſuddenly.

Hence Note, Wicked men often outlive all their worldly enjoyments.

Some live to be their own Executors; they diſpoſe, or rather diſſipate all; they leave nothing when they die, for others. The pride of wicked men ſhall have a fall, their preſent poſſeſſions and future hopes ſhall come to nought (*Prov.*3.16.) Solomon tells us, that Wiſdom hath length of dayes in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor: We may ſay of ſin, Shortneſs of dayes is in its right hand, and in its left hand, poverty and diſgrace. The former point ſaith, that a wicked mans dayes are ſhort, he ſhall be cut off before his time, death cuts him off. The latter ſaith, his pomp, his riches and honour, all theſe ſhall be cut off before the time. We have ſeen ſome who have raiſed great eſtates by ſin, and they have ſeen an end of all in miſery.

Thirdly, Taking the Antecedent to be the deſigns and contrivements of the wicked man,

Hence note, The counſels, deſigns, and contrivements of wicked men, do often prove abortive.

They are accompliſhed before their time. Their plots break out before they are ripe, and then all's ſpoyled. So it was with the Powder-plot, it was accompliſhed before the time; it was diſcovered before it could be acted; we have often ſeen grand deſigns laid in the duſt, cruſht in the ſhell, and nipt in the very bud. As the Prophet reproves ſome for ſtaying too long, in the place of breaking forth of children (Hoſ. 13. 13.) That is, they have let their purpoſes dye under tedious conſultations, or irreſolutions for acting: So we may deride others for ſtaying too little in the place of breaking forth of Children. God in judgment haſtens them to action before their deſigns are fully matured by conſultation, It is accompliſhed before his time.

And his branch ſhall not be green.

In the cloſe of this Verſe, and in the next, Eliphaz in ſeveral metaphors, proſecutes the declining condition of wicked men; His branch ſhall not be green.

His branch] Or his hand ſhall not be green; ſo the word ſignifies properly: And, that ſome underſtand in a figure, his hand ſhall not be green; that is, himſelf ſhall be unapt, and unfit for work. When an arm is dryed up, or a hand palſied, it is unſerviceable: The hand of a godly man is green, he is laborious, and fit for labour; the hand of the wicked man, as it is alwayes ſinfully dried up, in reference to the doing of any good, ſo it is often judicially dried up, leſt it ſhould do hurt; his hand ſhall not be green, that is, he ſhall not have power ro do that evil which he would: When Jeroboam put forth his hand from the Alrar, &c. his arm dryed up, ſo that he could not pull it in again to him (1 Kings 13.4.) His hand, his arm was not green, he could not uſe it to hurt the Prophet. (Zech. 11. 17.) The wicked Idol Shepherd is threatned, His arm ſhall clean be dryed up, and his right eye ſhall be utterly darkned: that is, He ſhall neither have counſel nor ſtrength, he ſhall neither be able to adviſe nor act; his eye ſhall be darkned, ſo that he ſhall not be able to ſee his way; his arm ſhall be dryed up, he ſhall not be able to attain his end (Pſal. 75.5.) None of the men of might have found their hands; as we ſay of a man that goes lamely or lazily, He cannot find his feet; ſo of a man that acts lamely and lazily, or of a ſouldier that fights faintly and cowardly, He cannot find his hands; or, in the language of the Text, His arm or hand is not green.

We tranſlate metaphorically, ſo the word ſignifies not a hand, but a branch; becauſe a branch or bough of a tree puts forth from the body of it, as the hand or arm is ſtretcht from the body of a man; by this branch we may underſtand either of thoſe two things noted before.

Firſt, The eſtate of the wicked man; for that is as a branch ſhooting and growing out from him;

Or ſecondly, The deſigns and counſels of the wicked man; they alſo are branches ſprouting from the corrupt ſtock of his heart: and ſo this clauſe is of the ſame ſenſe with the former; It ſhall be accompliſhed before his time, his branch ſhall not be green: that is, he ſhall not proſper in any thing he poſſeſſeth, or undertaketh.

But, thirdly, There is a diſtinct ſenſe, and ſo the branch is the Poſterity, the Children of this wicked man. As he, and his plots ſhall fail, ſo his Children likewiſe. Children are compared to branches (Pſal. 128.) His Children ſhall ſtand like Olive-plants (or branches) round about his Table.

Priuſquam impius ſeneſcat, interibit; & liberi ejus ſub ætatis flore morientur. Paraphr.

His branch ſhall not be green] Greenneſs notes flouriſhing (Cant. 1.17.) where the Spouſe and Chriſt ſpeak one to another of their ſeveral excellencies, ſhe ſaith, Verſ. 16. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea pleaſant, alſo our bed is green. By bed ſome underſtand holy Ordinances, wherein the Lord communicates himſelf to his people. Our bed is green; that is, Ordinances are pure, flouriſhing, and fruit-bearing. In the ſame ſenſe the word is uſed (Luke 23.31.) If they do theſe things in a green Tree, what ſhall be done in the dry? that is, If they do theſe things in a vigorous, ſtrong, and flouriſhing tree, meaning Chriſt himſelf, who was like a tree full of ſap and life; what ſhall be done in thoſe that are dry? The beſt of men compared to Chriſt, are but dry trees, how ſear and rotten then are the worſt? And if Chriſt ſuffered theſe things for ſinners, himſelf being without ſin, what ſhall thoſe ſinners ſuffer, who are without Chriſt? They, like dry trees, will ſoon be conſumed by the fire of Gods wrath. So that, when he ſaith, They ſhall not be green, it is as much as to ſay, They ſhall have no ſtrength, vigour, life, nor beauty. Taking the branch in this ſenſe for Children, Obſerve,

A wicked Father brings a curſe, and withering upon his whole Family.

His branch ſhall not be green. Though they walk not in the ways of their Fathers, nor inherit their ſins, yet they may receive temporal fadings, and outward decays upon their Fathers account. It is a miſery to be the branch of a wicked ſtock (for though an evil ſtock may have good branches, they who are evil, not onely (as all are) deſcending from a common evil ſtock, but alſo from a particular evil ſtock (as moſt are) even ſome of theſe are made good by tranſplantation into Jeſus Chriſt, yet (I ſay) it is a miſery to be a branch of an evil ſtock) many Children have fared the worſe for the wickedneſs of their Parents, even good Children may fare ſomewhat the worſe for their Parents wickedneſs. Though God will not lay eternal judgment upon them for the wickedneſs of their immediate or remoter Parents, yet they may feel declinings, and loſe much of their greenneſs and beauty. It is a diſadvantage to be in any relation to a wicked man, Servant, Wiſe, Children, his whole Family may groan and ſmart for his ſake, His branch ſhall not be green. That's not all yet;

Verſ. 33. And he ſhall ſhake off his unripe Grape as the Vine, and ſhall caſt off his flower as the Olive.

That is, His unripe Grapes and Flowers ſhall be ſhaken and caſt off. By whom? Some ſay by God. He (that is, God) will ſnap off his ſour Grape as the Vines, ſaith Maſter Broughton; and indeed whatſoever is the wind that ſhakes them, it is God who blows and ſends the wind.

Theſe words are a gradation to what went before, here are two ſimilitudes to ſet forth one thing, the certain and ſudden deſtruction of all the hopes of a wicked man, His branch ſhall not be green; his Children and Poſterity, eſpecially they that follow his ſteps ſhall wither; and, which is yet a greater judgment, He ſhall ſhake off his unripe Grapes as the Vine, &c. Though his branch be green a while, though he hath leaves and buds, yet before 'tis perfect fruit, and gives a pleaſant taſte, it ſhall be deſtroyed: This he ſhadows under theſe metaphors, of the Vine, and the Olive, ſhaking off his unripe Grapes, and caſting off his Flowers.

Eodem fere tempore vites & oleæ floreſcunt, Plin. l.17. c.25.

The Naturaliſt obſerves, that theſe trees flouriſh near about the ſame time, and that the Vine and the Olive joyn, and are (as it were) ſpouſed together; and if ſtorms, or blaſts of wind ſmite the Olive and the Vine, while they put forth their flowers, the hope of the Husbandman is utterly diſappointed. We may ſum up the meaning of theſe two ſimilitudes into this brief concluſion.

Aliquando vites maritantur oleis. id.ib. c.4. Peſſimus eſt inter omnia, quum deflorentem vitem & oleā imber percuſſit; quoniam ſimul deflat fructus. Plin. l.17. c.25.

That God will utterly deſtroy the very appearing hopes of wicked men. Their boughs and branches may be green, ſome flowers, ſome unripe Grapes may appear; here is hope; but, He ſhall ſhake off; that is, God ſhall ſhake off by ſome terrible ſtorm which he will raiſe, by ſome ſudden judgment which he will ſend) their unripe Grapes, and their faireſt Flowers.

Hence obſerve, Violent judgments ſtorm wicked men out of all their comforts.

Thus the Egyptians are threatned (Iſa. 18. 5, 6.) Before the Harveſt, when the bud is perfect, and the ſour Grape is ripening in the Flower, he ſhall both cut off the ſprigs with pruning-hooks, and take away, and cut down the branches: They ſhall be left together, unto the Fowls of the Mountains, and to the Beaſts of the Earth, and the Fowls ſhall Summer upon them, &c. The Bud is perfect, while the fruit is imperfect, while God takes away their Buds, he deſtroyes their hopes. And as God hath his winds at hand, to ſhake the fruit from off the branches; ſo he hath his Pruning-hooks to cut off the branches alſo.

Some interpret theſe unripe Grapes of the Vine, and Flowers of the Olive, as the branch before, for Children, as if Eliphaz would here re-mind Job, how his Poſterity, the Grapes of his Vine, were ſhaken off, before they were ripe, and the Flowers of his Olive blaſted in the Bud; or, as if he would upbraid him with the ſour manners, and ill-taſted converſation of his Children, under this Alluſion of unripe Grapes, which, inſtead of pleaſing the palate by a ſavoury reliſh, do only by their ſharpneſs ſet the teeth on edge.

De immatura morte filiorum duas ſimilitudines affert.

Odioſe Eliphaz ut acerbos filiorum Jobi mores notaret, ipſos omphaci contulit.

Hence Note, It is an affliction upon the beſt, and a judgment upon many, to have their Children, their Grapes and Flowers rent from them, and taken away unripe: And then eſpecially it is ſo, when God leaves no Grapes on the Vine, no Flowers on the Olive.

To loſe a hopeful Child is an affliction, what is it then to loſe them all?

Eliphaz having dehorted the wicked man from truſting in vanity, upon theſe conſiderations; gives in the ſtrength of his whole diſcourſe in the two laſt Verſes of the Chapter.

Verſ. 34. The Congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate, and fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Verſ. 35. They conceive miſchief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

Epilogus eſt totius loci. Merc. Apodoſis ſuperioris allegoriæ Jobum perſtringens cui iſta obvenerant. Jun.

As if he had ſaid, Here is the ſum of all, of all the ſins, and of all the puniſhments of a wicked man. Here are two ſorts of wicked men deſcribed, and theſe two (as was toucht before) by a Synechdoche, include all.

The firſt are ſuch as worſhip God falſly, or with falſe hearts: they draw near to God with their lips, but their hearts are far from him, theſe are Hypocrites, The congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſtroyed.

As theſe are falſe with God in his worſhip, ſo others are falſe with men in their commerce and dealings: Theſe are compriſed in the ſecond branch, Fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery: Bribery is put for all ſins againſt our Neighbours, and hypocriſie for all ſins againſt God. So that here we have ſinners againſt the firſt Table, and ſinners againſt the ſecond; ſinners againſt God, and ſinners againſt men; in the compaſs of this diviſion all ſins and ſinners are contained.

The Congregation of Hypocrites.] That is, Hypocrites, how many ſoever there be of them, though they be a full Congregation: Hypocrites, how ſtrongly ſoever they are conjoyned and cemented, yet they ſhall be deſolate.

The Hebrew word ſignifies, not only to Congregate, and gather together ſeveral perſons into one place, but to aſſociate them into a Covenant, League, or Confederacy one with another: as if he had ſaid, Though hypocrites combine, and covenant together, yet this covenanting Congregation, or theſe unholy Leaguers, ſhall be made deſolate.

יעד Significat non ſolum congregari; ſed in fœdus & pactum aut amicitiam convenire.

A ſecond interpretation gives it thus, The Congregation of hypocrites; that is, all that Hypocrites do congregate; whatſoever they gather together, whether things or perſons, their Riches, their Honours, their Relations, all ſhall be deſolate.

Illa quæ congregantur ab hypocrita. Aquin.

Shall be deſolate:] Or barren; the word ſignifies both; that which is deſolate brings forth no fruit, and that which brings forth no fruit will quickly be deſolate.

What an Hypocrite is, hath been ſhewed before, Chapter 8. therefore I will not ſtay upon it, but refer you thither, where Bildad told Job, The hope of the Hypocrite ſhall periſh: Only note two things from the whole, The congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate.

Firſt, An Hypocrite is under a curſe. Of all men in the World, Hypocrites are deepeſt under a curſe: They are moſt curſed, who are moſt wicked; Hypocrites are therefore more wicked than others, becauſe they would ſeem not onely ſomewhat, but much more holy than others. It is bad enough to be bad; but it is worſe to appear good when we are bad. They who delight in the ſhews of moral goodneſs, when they hate, or care not for the reality of it, ſhall ſurely meet with, not ſhews, but realities of penal evil. Their painted ſeigned fire of zeal ſhall be puniſhed with the true fire of Divine wrath.

Secondly, Obſerve, Hypocrites, how many ſoever they are, how ſtrongly ſoever they are confederate, how much ſoever they have gotten together, ſhall be made deſolate.

It is not poſſible to make any power to withſtand the power of God. Though like thoſe uncircumciſed Nations, Gebal, and Amnon, and Amalek, the Philiſtims, and thoſe of Tyre, they all conſult, and lay their heads together, to make a Congregation, yet God will break them all. How long ſoever their train be, how many ſoever their attendants be, and how ſtrong ſoever their correſpondency be, yet the Congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate.

And fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Fire may be taken two wayes.

Either literally, and ſtrictly, for the element of fire, or for ordinary fire.

Or it may be taken figuratively, and metaphorically, and ſo it ſignifies:

Either firſt, The wrath of God.

Or, ſecondly, Any effect of the wrath of God, any revenge, or judgment which God pours forth on wicked men. And ſo, what judgement ſoever God ſends, we may call it a Fire, even that deluge of Water (as hath been noted) which drowned the old World, was (in this ſenſe) a fire.

Divine judgments are repreſented by fire, upon theſe three grounds.

Firſt, Becauſe, as fire, they break forth ſuddenly, and unexpectedly; they are not like the fire that is for uſe, which we are long preparing and blowing before it will burn; but the Judgments of God are like an accidental fire, which breaks out, when no man looks for it, in a moment.

Secondly, They are fire, becauſe of their deſtroying nature, ſo the Text ſpeaks, it eats up, or devours. Fire is a great eater, fire hath a ſtrong ſtomach; what will not fire digeſt? Fire will digeſt the whole ſublunary World at laſt. The Element ſhall melt with fervent heat: Fire will digeſt Stones, Adamant, and Iron. Such is the wrath of God, nothing can ſtand before it, it will ſubdue the hardeſt materials, and tougheſt pieces. The hot ſtomach of the Oſtrich (as ſome affirm) concocts Iron; what will not the heat of Gods anger concoct, and conſume to aſhes?

Os & lingua tribui ſolet igni nam dicitur lambere & depaſcere.

Thirdly, There is a mercileſneſs in the judgments of God, as in fire: We ſay, Fire and Water have no mercy; there is no intreating them, they are not onely hard, but impoſſible to be intreated. Such (in reference to wicked men) is the wrath of God; as good ſpeak to fire not to burn, or to water not to drown, as to the wrath of God not to conſume wicked men; it muſt and will do it (Jer. 15. 1.) Though Moſes and Samuel ſtood before me, &c. to intreat, yet the ſentence ſhall not be taken off, wrath muſt burn. Though prayer hath in many caſes quenched wrath, yet ſometimes the wrath of God cannot be quenched by prayer, nor intreated down, there is no ſpeaking to it; and ſometimes that it might burn quietly, the Lord hath ſaid, Pray not for this people. Fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery.

Tabernacles of bribery, may be taken two wayes: Either for the Tabernacles of thoſe who have taken bribes: Or the Tabernacles of thoſe who have given bribes; for there goes (as we ſay) but a pair of Shears between him that gives, and him that takes bribes; both are of a piece, and both are alike miſchievous and wicked. Some take bribes to pervert Juſtice, and others give bribes to pervert Juſtice: Fire is prepared for both their Tabernacles; that is, for their whole eſtates, or for all that belongs unto them. Yet Eliphaz may ſeem rather to aim at bribe-takers, or unjuſt Judges (among whom, he ſecretly numbers Job) who ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted with gifts, and to have their eyes put out by rewards: The Septuagint is expreſs in that ſenſe, Fire ſhall conſume (ſay they) the Tabernacles of Bribe-takers. And indeed, if there were no bribe-takers, there would be no bribe-givers: as we ſay, There would be no Thieves, if there were no Receivers. The Receiver makes the Thief; and corrupt Judges, who take bribes, make ſo many bribe-givers.

δωροδέκτων munera accipientium. 70.

Further, The word which we tranſlate Bribery, ſignifies properly a gift; and the Text may be rendred thus, Fire ſhall con- conſume the Tabernacle of Gifts. There are many gifts which are far from bribes. There are five ſorts of gifts.

First, Gifts of Charity to the poor.

Secondly, Gifts of friendſhip between equals.

Thirdly, Gifts of duty from inferiours to thoſe above them, to teſtifie either thankfulneſs or obedience.

Fourthly, Gifts of bounty and grace, from Superious to thoſe who are below them, to teſtifie their favour to them, and that they are well-pleaſed in them, or in their ſervices; There is no hurt either in giving or receiving theſe gifts. Theſe are onely teſtimonies of reſpect from man to man, and tend onely to maintain humane ſociety.

But there is a fifth ſort of Gifts, which we may call gifts of injury, or in the language of the Text, Gifts of Bribery: Theſe are given, either to pervert, or delay Juſtice, and to overthrow a man and his cauſe.

Quid eſt שוחר quod facit, הוד unum, dantem ſcilicet & accipientem; quam primum accipit munus ab ipſo, tunc accedit anima ejus ad ipſum, & fit ſicut ille ipſe. Rab. Becei, &c. Buxtorf. Lex.

The Hebrew expreſſeth a gift in general, and a bribe, by the ſame word; becauſe, as all bribes are gifts, ſo very many gifts are bribes. Gifts of charity, of friendſhip, of duty, of favour, are but few in compariſon of bribing gifts. And 'tis exceeding hard for any man that is intereſſed in affairs of Judgement between man and man, to receive a gift from either of them, and not be brib'd by it, to tranſgreſs the rules of equity and righteouſneſs. A gift transforms the Judge into a party, or makes (as the Hebrew Criticks tell us upon that word) the Judge and party to be but one perſon.

Laſtly, The Tabernacles of bribery, may be taken, not only in general for the eſtates of thoſe who have given or taken Bribes; but particularly for the very Houſes which have been built by giving or taking bribes. Some have built houſes, with what they have gotten by giving Bribes, and many by taking Bribes, have got enough to build houſes: While ſuch look on their houſes and dwellings, they may ſay, if they will ſay the truth, Injuſtice hath built us theſe houſes; theſe are the tabernacles of bribery.

Hæc ſunt peccata Germanorum.

A Traveller coming to Rome, and viewing many famous ſtructures, and goodly houſes there, asked who built them? It was anſwered, Theſe are the ſins of Germany; the meaning was, that the Money brought for Pardons out of Germany, built thoſe Houſes. So we may ſay of many fair places, and goodly dwellings, Theſe are Bribes and Oppreſſions, ſuch a man built theſe by iniquity. Bribes may build houſes, but bribe-takers cannot protect them: The Tabernacles of bribery ſhall be conſumed.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Bribery is an odious ſin.

That ſin which is put to expreſs all ſins againſt our neighbours, muſt needs be a very odious, as well as a very comprehenſive ſin. God loves judgment, bribery oppoſeth what God loves. God commands charity, as well as judgment; and delights to ſee men bountiful as well as righteous: Yet charity without judgement, and bounty without righteouſneſs, are an abomination to God. God is a God of judgment, they that are againſt judgment, act not only againſt the rule which God makes, but againſt the example which God gives. It is as much the honour of God, that he is a God of judgment, giving all their due; as that he is a God of mercy, giving to all his what they have not at all deſerved.

Secondly, Obſerve, That which is ſinfully gotten, ſhall be miſerably loſt. Fire ſhall conſume the tabernacles of bribery.

There is nothing gained, though much be gotten by injuſtice. Many give bribes to undo others, and all who receive bribes, undo themſelves. What is the advantage of any ſinful gain, when the fire of Gods wrath conſumes the gainer? What ſhall a man give in exchange for his ſoul? And as the loſs is infinite, that comes by ſin, in reference to the next life; ſo at beſt, the gain is little, in reference to this preſent life: Either the actor of injuſtice, or his heir, ſhall find a fire in the foundation, a fire in the Stones and Timber of his Houſe, and down 'twill come; Bribery never bought any laſting materials to build with. Woe be to him (ſaith the Prophet, Hab. 2. 9, 10, 11, 12.) that coveteth an evil covetouſneſs; or (according to the Hebrew) that gaineth an evil gain to his houſe, that he may ſet his neſt on high, that he may be delivered from the power of evil! Thou haſt conſulted ſhame to thy houſe, &c. For the Stone ſhall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the Timber ſhall anſwer it. What ſhall the ſtones cry? Or, what ſhall the beam anſwer? The ſtones ſhall cry, that the mortar in which they were laid, was tempered with the bloud of innocents; and the beam ſhall anſwer, that it was ſet up by pulling down the poor.

Thoſe are crying ſins indeed, which cauſe ſtones that cannot ſpeak) to cry: And what anſwer can be given for thoſe iniquities which provoke Timber beams to anſwer? Such is the iniquity of oppreſſion and injuſtice, which are the fruits of bribery. See a parallel place (Jer. 22. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17.) the ſum of which may be drawn up into this concluſion, given by Eliphaz, Fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of Bribery.

Eliphaz having thus deſcribed the periſhing eſtate of wicked men, as an argument to deterr and ſtave them off from wickedneſs, concludes his whole diſcourſe with an Allegorical recapitulation both of their ſin and miſery, in the laſt words of this Chapter.

Verſ. 35. They conceive miſchief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

The Scripture is frequent in this metaphor; we have it (Pſal. 7. 14.) almoſt word for word, Behold he travelleth with iniquity, and hath conceived miſchief, and hath brought forth falſhood. (Iſa. 59. 4.) They conceive miſchief, and bring forth iniquity. The Apoſtle James (Chap. 1. 15.) ſpeaks the ſame language, When luſt hath conceived, it bringeth forth ſin, and ſin when it is finiſhed, bringeth forth death. All alluding to the natural conception, formation, and production of Children. We have theſe three in the Text before us, the order of the words being a little altered.

Here is firſt, Conception; They conceive miſchief.

Thirdly, the Birth; Bring forth vanity.

More ſtrictly to the method of Eliphaz; we have firſt, the Conception; ſecondly, the birth of ſin: And as if one birth were not enough, they return to their work, providing for a new birth of the old man; Their belly prepareth deceit.

עמל Labor, moleſtia, perverſitas.

They conceive miſchief.] The word which we tranſlate miſchief, ſignifies properly, labour, hard labour, or labour accompanied with a great deal of pains and ſorrow; it ſignifies alſo wickedneſs, perverſneſs, We tranſlate miſchief, They conceive miſchief, or ſome miſchievous device to the diſhonour of God, and the wrong of man.

They conceive] Conception is here the work of the mind; we ordinarily ſay, We conceive ſuch a thing; that is, We take it in, or apprehend it by an act of the underſtanding.

Here's the trueſt character of a wicked man, he is one that conceives miſchief. The alluſion teacheth us:

Firſt, That a wicked man ſins with much freedom of ſpirit, or he ſins freely.

He conceives miſchief. The conceptions of the mind cannot be forced, nor can the conceptions of the body; and therefore the Law reſolves it, That there is no rape, where conception follows. Theſe conceptions are the joynt actings of the will and underſtanding, both concur in them. An unregenerate perſon is free to do evil, he needs not be forced to it, he cannot be forced from it; and every evil is the more evil, by how much the more freely it is done. The more voluntarily we ſin, the more wickedly we ſin.

Again, The conceptions of the mind are deliberate, there is a collecting of one thing from another, a debating in conceiving. Hence Note, Secondly, Wicked men ſin with deliberation.

They ſit down and meditate, they lay the frame of wickedneſs in their hearts, and then ſet it up, or act it with their hands.

Note thirdly, All the conceptions of wicked men are wickedneſs.

They are very fruitful in wickedneſs, and they bear no other fruit. Miſchief is not onely that which he conceives, but all that he conceives; he conceives nothing elſe. A wicked man cannot think or conceive one good thought; he may think of that which is materially good, but he conceives no good (*Gen.*6.5.) All the thoughts of the imaginations of his heart are onely evil and that continually. All the Creatures which he forms in his mind, all the children of his underſtanding are deformed and monſtrous; He conceives miſchief, which, as it notes a continued act, ſo an act continued about, or upon the ſame object.

Fourthly, Obſerve, To be a contriver, a plotter, a conceiver of miſchief, is worſe than to be an actor, or a doer of miſchief.

It is ill to have a hand in any ſinful evil, it is worſe to have a head in it, but worſt of all to have a heart in it. Conceivers of miſchief alwayes have their hearts and heads in miſchief; and if they are not ſtopt, will have their hands in it too: they who are plotters, and deſigners, would be actors. Hence they are called Workers of iniquity. They have an inward ſhop, and an outward ſhop: firſt they work it in their thoughts, and mould it there, and then it comes out. To conceive miſchief, is properly the Devils trade, he rather deviſeth than acts wickedneſs. There are many wickedneſſes in the World which he cannot act; but he is or would be the plotter, ſetter, and contriver of them all: This is the wickedneſs of the Devil: and every conceiver and deviſer of miſchief is of the Devils trade. A good man may (poſſibly) do evil, but a wicked man deviſeth evil. As it notes the ſpiritualneſs of a man in holineſs, when he doth not onely act that which is good, but his heart is upon it, he conceives and frames it in his mind. So it notes a man ſpiritually wicked, when his mind frames wickedneſs. The Apoſtle concludes of himſelf, (Rom. 7. 25.) So then with my mind I ſerve the Law of God, but with the fleſh the Law of ſin. Not that he willingly gave up his fleſh to ſin, but that he was carried through the infirmity of the fleſh to ſome ſinful actings, while his mind, his deviſings, and contrivings, were according to the Law of God, and he delighted in the Law of God concerning the inward man. This is the ſpiritualneſs of holineſs, and without this, there is no outward act of any account with God. It is what the mind moves to, not what the mouth ſpeaks, or the hand doth, which commends us to God. What is it to God, that we ſerve his Law with our fleſh, if with our minds, we either ſerve the Law of ſin, or do not ſerve the Law of God? Man is not what he acts, but what he conceives, unleſs he act what he hath conceived. They conceive miſchief,

And bring forth vanity.] Now they come to the birth; they are in travel after conception; they bring forth, and the Childs name is Vanity.

The Original word is rendred three wayes.
First, We ſay Vanity.
Secondly, Another ſaith Lyes.
A third ſaith Iniquity.

און Vanitas, mendacium, perverſitas.

The word will bear any of, or all the three tranſlations. They bring forth vanity, a lye, iniquity. They who conceive miſchief, may bring forth any thing but what is good. Thoſe three words may ſerve the ſame thing; every vanity is a lye, and any lye is vanity, and iniquity is both lye and vanity. The perſons of whom Eliphaz diſcourſeth, are ſaid to bring forth vanity, on theſe three grounds.

Firſt, Becauſe they ſometimes bring forth no fruit at all; they are conceiving miſchief, but they can make nothing of it, their conceptions end in abortions; they deviſe and plot, but all is hatching of wind: The Church is ſo expreſſed, though in a different caſe (Iſa. 26. 17, 18.) Like as a Woman with Child, near the time of her delivery, is in pain, and cries out in her pangs; ſo have we been in thy ſight, O Lord; We have been with child, we have been in pain: The Church had conceptions for good, ſhe hoped that the Lord would have done ſome great thing for her; yet after her conception, and travel, ſee what ſhe brings forth, We have been in pain, and brought forth wind; that is, nothing at all, it proved a meer timpany; for ſo he explains it, We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth, neither have the Inhabitants of the World fallen; that is, we have not obtained that deliverance that we hoped for in the earth, neither have our enemies (who are called by the Prophet, The Inhabitants of the World) been ſubdued under our power; they have not fallen. Now as the Church and people of God ſometimes are diſappointed in their expectations; they conceive, yet bring forth wind, not that Man-child of mercy which was expected: So, much more do wicked men, after all their pleaſing conceptions, and pangs of travell, they bring forth vanity; and their veſſel is marr'd upon the wheel.

Secondly, They are ſaid to bring forth vanity, or a vain thing; becauſe what they bring forth is not proportionable to their expectation. Their Mountain proves a Mole-hill or (as it was ſaid of old) a Mouſe.

Parturiunt montes,&c.

Thirdly, Becauſe the birth is not onely alwayes below, but often quite croſs to their expectation; they conceive miſchief againſt others, and bring forth miſchief upon themſelves: this is vanity, yea, and vexation of ſpirit, They bring forth vanity.

Obſerve from this alluſion; Wicked men cannot but act evil.

They who conceive, muſt do their utmoſt to bring forth conceptions. As a Woman with Child cannot but bring forth when her time is come, and her pains are on her; if you would give her all the World it is impoſſible to divert or delay the birth. So is it with a wicked man, when he hath miſchievous conceptions in his heart; He ſleepeth not unleſs he do miſchief (Prov. 4. 16.) Whatever comes of it, fall back, or fall edge, he muſt do it. He cannot forbear an attempt to do it, though it coſt him his life; many have been at that coſt, in attempting to do it, but could not.

Obſerve, ſecondly, Wicked men are oft put to much pain in fulfilling their luſts, or in acting their conceived miſchiefs.

It is with ſuch men as with the Women in Child-bearing, on whom the Lord hath laid that heavy burthen, In ſorrow ſhalt thou bring forth children (*Gen.*3.16.) wicked men feel this to the full, In ſorrow they bring forth: The wicked man travelleth in pain all his dayes, verſ. 20. It is their delight to ſin, but for the moſt part they ſmarr in ſinning, and run through many ſorrows to accompliſh their ſin. They are ſo mad upon ſinning, that the ſweetneſs of doing miſchief pleaſeth them more, than all the troubles they go through in doing it diſcourageth them. Many evils cannot be done with eaſe, it coſts ſinners dear to effect what they deſign; they often have, as we ſay of women, after long and ſore travel in child-bearing, A very hard bargain of it, and pay very dear for that which is worth, or worthy of nothing but repentance or greater pain.

Thirdly, Taking vanity for iniquity; which ſenſe was given in opening the terms.

Obſerve, Such as our thoughts and conceptions are, ſuch are our productions.

They conceive miſchief, and bring forth iniquity; ſuch as we plow and ſow in the mind, ſuch is the Harveſt of our actions: The very form, the lineaments and portraiture of a mans ſpirit, is drawn upon the things he doth; his works are the image of his heart. As it is ſaid of Adam in nature, He begat a Son in his own likeneſs; ſo doth every man in morals. Our actions are as our ſelves are, they are begotten and brought forth in our own likeneſs, whether good or evil, onely with this difference; Good actions are born in our ſupernatural likeneſs, evil actions in our natural likeneſs.

Fourthly, As to bring forth vanity imports, as was interpreted, either no fruit, or that which is not ſutable to the deſigns and deſires of wicked men,

Obſerve, Sinful conceptions often prove abortive, and miſcarry; they bring forth nothing, or nothing as they would have it, who have conceived them.

The birth is ſometimes ſhort in degree, and not ſeldome contrary in kind; they have not what they expect, yea, they have what they leaſt expect (Pſal. 2. 1.) Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? Why a vain thing? Becauſe they cannot obtain their deſire: it is vain to imagine the pulling down of Chriſts Kingdome, which muſt ſtand for ever. Pharaoh deſigned miſchief, Let us work wiſely; (here is the language of conceivers) but he brought forth vanity, in all the notions ſpoken of: vanity, as it was a ſinful and wicked act; vanity, as he failed in the thing he did expect; he thought to bring deſtruction upon Iſrael, but he could not; he thought to ſubdue the people of Iſrael, and make them ſlaves for ever, but he could not: He brought forth vanity alſo in the worſt ſenſe, the iſſue was contrary to his expectation, himſelf and his Army were ſwallowed in the Red Sea, and Iſrael was ſaved. Haman deviſed miſchief againſt the Jews, but he brought forth vanity; he did not effect what he intended againſt them, this was vanity; nay, it wrought the contrary way, himſelf was hanged on the gibbet he had prepared for Mordecai, this was vanity and vexation too; every wicked man brings forth vanity in ſome one, if not in all theſe notions of it, after all his conceptions of miſchief.

Perſeverante allegoria venter ſumitur ex conſueto loquendi modo ſacri ſermonis pro intelligendi facultate. נכן

And their belly prepareth deceit.] The belly is taken here metaphorically, for the underſtanding, or mind; becauſe natural conception is in the belly wrought; therefore Eliphaz proſecutes the Allegory in ſuitable expreſſions, Their belly prepareth deceit.

The word ſignifies,

To prepare { Accurately, Strongly.

Their belly prepareth deceit: They expreſs a kind of curioſity in working, they are very exact in every point; they prepare with art, they will not have their work like a Cobweb, curious, yet weak; but they muſt have it ſtrong too; they prepare for eſtabliſhment, and plot as if it were for everlaſting. So the word is uſed (Pſal. 37. 3. Pſal. 89. 14.) Righteouſneſs and judgment are the habitation of Gods throne. It is this word, The eſtabliſhment or ſtrength of Gods throne is righteouſneſs and judgment: Righteouſneſs and judgment are the baſis and eſtabliſhment of all Thrones; That which hath made Thrones to totter in all ages, hath been the want of righteouſneſs and judgment.

The wicked man in the Text prepares not only curiouſly, but ſtrongly; as he likes no bungling, ſo he is not pleaſed with toyes and bables; he would lay his deſignes ſo cunningly, and ſo firmly, that as they ſaid of the Powder-plot, All the Devils in Hell ſhall not diſappoint it: He hopes to catch and hold, not the weak Flyes only, but the ſtrongeſt Eagles, in his deceits and ſnares.

Their belly prepareth deceit.] That is, they prepare to deceive and enſnare: The Prophet denounceth judgment againſt the Prieſts, againſt the houſe of Iſrael, and againſt the houſe of the King, becauſe they had been a ſnare upon Mizpeh, and a net ſpread upon Tabor (Hoſ. 5. 1.) that is, becauſe they had prepared nets and ſnares to entangle and deceive the people. Their bellies prepared deceit; and ſo did theirs, who ſaid (Jer. 18. 18.) Come, let us deviſe devices; let us contrive ſomewhat to enſnare the Prophet (Jer. 18. 18.) Their belly prepareth deceit: He ſpeaks in the preſent tenſe, as if they were alwayes doing it; they know neither vacation nor ceſſation from this wicked work. It is a continued act, Their belly prepareth.

Hence obſerve, A wicked man is conſtant in conceiving and contriving wickedneſs.

He doth it not by ſtarts and fits, his belly is ever preparing; when one deceit is wrought off, he goes to work upon a ſecond, and then he projects for a third. Some ſpeak of a perpetual motion, we find it here; what a man doth naturally, he doth conſtantly. Though there be much art in preparing deceit, yet it is the work of ſinful nature; the frame, the engine of a wicked mans heart moves perpetually, He prepareth deceit, he is alwayes at it. As David profeſſeth (Pſal. 45. 1.) My heart is inditing a good matter, I will ſpeak of the things which I have made touching the King. David had ſome holy work ready made, but he had more a making; he ſaith not, I have endited, but my heart is enditing; I am upon it, it is my continual ſtudy. So alſo the wicked mans heart is alwayes preparing and deviſing unholy work, or that which is evil.

Again, Their belly; that is, their mind prepareth.

Hence Note, The mind of man is the Shop wherein deceit is framed:

Yea, the mind is not onely the Shop, but the Artificer; and it is not onely the Shop and the Artificer, but the very Tool that frames it: The underſtanding and wit of a wicked man, hammer out, and ſhape all his deceitful wares.

The hand and tongue begin where the mind ends; the tongue publiſheth, and the hand executes what the mind prepares, and the heart ſuggeſts. That which one of the old Poets ſaid of the Belly, under the notion of Appetite and Hunger, the ſame we may ſay of the belly, in the notion of this preparing; This belly is the Maſter of all ſinful arts, and that which gives out, and furniſheth man with all the cunning deceits of wickedneſs. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, theft, falſe witneſs, blaſphemies (Matth. 15. 19.) theſe are the wares which are not onely laid up in the heart, as in a Store-houſe, but made in the heart, as in a Work-houſe; and from thence they proceed ready made. The belly prepareth deceit.

Artis magiſter ingeniique largitor venter. Perſ.

Laſtly, Mark how Eliphaz deſcribes the wicked man in his actions, He conceiveth miſchief, and brings forth vanity. And yet again, he is preparing deceit.

Note from it, An evil heart is never diſcouraged by any diſappointments from going on in evil.

One would have thought, after he had conceived miſchief, and brought forth nothing but vanity, that we ſhould have heard no more of him; that he would now ſit down and be quiet, but his belly prepareth deceit preſently, he will to it again, he will try once more; if he fail in one plot, he hopes to thrive in another; he will ſow his ſeed of ſin in the morning, and in the evening he will not withhold his hand; and though he ſee neither of them proſper, yea, though he ſee both of them blaſted, yet he will to his ſowing again. As a gracious heart receives many diſappointments and diſcouragements, but, ſaith he, I will not give over, My belly ſhall prepare ſtill, holy, and juſt, and righteous things; and the more he is diſappointed, the more holily he acts: So doth a wicked man more ſinfully; for he acts as ſtrongly and naturally in his ſtate, as a godly man doth in his; and therefore he will not be put off by diſappointments. He ſaith in the words of Solomon (Prov. 23. 35.) They have ſtricken me, and I was not ſick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not, when I awake, I will ſeek it yet again. Wicked men in general, as well as Drunkards in particular, of whom Solomon there ſpeaks, meet with many blows, and are often ſick with following their ſin; yet (becauſe they are never ſick of ſin) as ſoon as ever they awake, and recover a little, they forget all their wounds and ſickneſſes, and reſolve to ſeek it again. They pleaſe themſelves ſo much with what is to come, that they ſlight all that hath been done, and reſolve with thoſe (Iſa. 56. 12.) To morrow ſhall be as this day, and much more abundant: They are preparing for ſin, even while they are ſinning: It is ſaid (Revel. 6.) that he on the Red Horſe went forth conquering and to conquer: he had not onely a preſent conqueſt, but a project to conquer; he was actually a Conqueror, and having conquered, he had freſh deſigns in his eye. As Chriſt goes out thus conquering, and to conquer, ſo wicked men go out doing evil, and to do it; deceiving, and to deceive. Their belly prepareth deceit: though they have brought forth vanity once and again, yet they prepare, as aſſured of victory.

This ariſeth three wayes.

Firſt, From the extream love and good affection which a carnal heart bears to ſin: as the love which believers bear to Chriſt, is not onely a motive provoking them to do for Chriſt, but alſo to perſevere in doing for Chriſt, though they ſuffer much in doing for him; he that loves Chriſt, will not onely ſweat at his work, but bleed at his work, if his work cannot be carried on without bleeding. Thus alſo the love of wicked men to their luſts, is not onely a motive provoking them to fulfill their luſts, but to endure any thing for the fulfilling of them; Love is the ſpring of labour, actions are affections put forth, and made viſible: Love is alſo the ſpring of valour, as well in a bad cauſe, as in a good cauſe: What is it that love dares not attempt, towards the attainment of what we love? Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. Love is ſuch a vehement flame, that though you caſt the waters of ſorrow, yea, flouds of trouble upon it, yet theſe cannot extinguiſh it; much more then will it keep alive after many deferrs and diſappointments. It is the obſervation of one of the Ancients, that Love built the two Cities; Holy Love built the City of God, and unholy Love built, or is daily building the City of Satan: And though it be much hindred and oppoſed in building this City; yea, though the materials with which it would raiſe and fortifie this City, be often ſcattered and broken, yet theſe Builders will provide more materials, Their belly prepareth deceit.

Secondly, This their unwearied projecting and acting after diſcouragements and diſappointments, ariſeth from the extream deſire they have to attain their end. It is a true Axiom, that, The appetite of the end is infinite. Whatſoever a man propoſeth to himſelf as his end in any undertaking, will carry him on without end till he do attain it: As reſt is the natural end of motion, ſo till man hath reached his civil (though ſinful) ends, he cannot reſt. A wicked man propoſeth an end to himſelf in evil actions, as well as an honeſt man doth in good: and therefore till that profit, or pleaſure, or honour, or revenge, which he propoſeth to himſelf be enjoyed, he is unſatisfied; let God or Man put as many ſtops as they will in his way, let his firſt, and ſecond, and third conceptions of miſchief conclude in the bringing forth of vanity, yet he is not concluded by it, he will try a fourth, and a fifth time too, His belly again prepareth deceit.

Thirdly, His hope to ſpeed at laſt, puts him forward to new experiments, when former ones have failed; he perſwades himſelf he ſhall obtain, if he continue. As the Saints having prayed, and waited long without an anſwer from God, yet go on praying, their belly prepareth new prayers, becauſe they have a good ground to hope that God will hear at laſt: So ungodly men perſevere in plotting miſchief, becauſe they have ſtrong hopes (though but the ſhadow of a ground to hope) that they ſhall one day accompliſh their deſires. As the heart would break for ſorrow, ſo both heart and hand would break off from labour, were it not for hope. But where hope of attaining lives, eſpecially where it is lively, there ſuch will labour as long as they live: Though they have hitherto been deceived in their expectation, yet their belly prepareth deceit.

Thus Eliphaz proſecutes his dehortation; and though he ſaith not to Job, as Nathan did to David, Thou art the man; yet Job was the man he meant, the man, who (in his opinion) had conceived miſchief, and brought forth vanity; yea, the man whoſe belly was even then preparing deceit. How much Eliphaz was deceived, appears upon the whole matter; what Jobs belly, his mind, his inward man was preparing, will appear by his own anſwer in the two Chapters following.

CHAP. XVI. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

Then Job anſwered and ſaid,

I have heard many ſuch things: Miſerable comforters are ye all.

Shall vain words have an end? Or what emboldeneth thee that thou anſwereſt?

I alſo could ſpeak as ye do: if your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead, I could heap up words againſt you, and ſhake mine head at you.

But I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

THIS Chapter, and that which follows, contain Jobs ſecond anſwer to the ſecond charge of Eliphaz. He calls it an anſwer, but in ſtrictneſs of ſpeech it is a rejoynder; and he rejoynes with ſome acrimony and ſharpneſs of ſpeech. The longer contention is maintained, the hotter are the ſpirits of the contenders; and the more we are put to anſwer, the more angry are our anſwers.

Verſ. 1. Then Job anſwered and ſaid;

And what ſaid he? His anſwer conſiſts of three general parts.

In the firſt, he confutes what Eliphaz had aſſerted; which he doth to the eighteenth Verſe of this ſixteenth Chapter.

Secondly, He proceeds to corroborate and confirm his own Tenet or Opinion; which he doth to the eleventh Verſe of the ſeventeenth Chapter.

Thirdly, He renews his former complaints and deſires; which he doth from that eleventh Verſe to the end of the Chapter.

The firſt part of his anſwer, is confutation; and he begins his confutation with an accuſation; with an accuſation of thoſe who had diſputed with him: and that's the ſubject of theſe five Verſes, in all which he taxeth, or checks his friends for their unfriendly and uncomely dealing with him; and he checks them (as Eliphaz had done him at the beginning of the former Chapter) upon five points of errour and unfriendlineſs.

Firſt, For ſpeaking unprofitably, or for telling him no more than he knew before, at the entrance of the ſecond Verſe, I have heard many ſuch things.

Secondly, He chargeth them for ſpeaking ſuch things, as did rather increaſe, and boyl up, than mittigate and allay his ſorrow, Miſerable comforters are ye, in the cloſe of the ſecond Verſe.

Thirdly, He accuſeth them for ſpeaking ſo much, or for endleſs ſpeaking; their diſcourſe was tedious, they would not give over, Thus he takes them up at the third Verſe, Shall vain words have an end? What, will you be endleſs? will you never have done?

Fourthly, He accuſeth them for their cauſleſs ſpeaking, in the ſame third Verſe, What emboldeneth thee? (or what provoketh thee) that thou anſwereſt? As if he had ſaid, Have I given thee any cauſe?

Fifthly, and laſtly, He reproveth his and their whole carriage towards him, by a ſerious profeſſion of his contrary carriage, or that he was purpoſed to deal better with them, upon ſuppoſition that they were in his caſe; and this he doth two wayes;

Firſt, Telling them what he could do, if they were in his caſe; Verſe 4. I alſo could ſpeak as you do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead, I could heap up words againſt you,&c.

Secondly, Telling them what he would do; But I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief, Verſe 5. That's the courſe which I would take; I could deal as harſhly with you as you do with me, but I would not; you ſhould find me in another ſtrain and temper. Then Job anſwered and ſaid.

Verſ. 2. I have heard many ſuch things: miſerable comforters are ye all.

We find this point toſſed both wayes; Jobs Friends telling him, that he ſpake but ordinary matter, and he telling them that they ſpake ſo too. Bildad chargeth Job with it, Chap. 8. 2. How long wilt thou ſpeak theſe things? And how long ſhall the words of thy mouth be like a ſtrong wind? As if he had ſaid, Thou ſpeakeſt impertinently, or what thou ſpeakeſt doth not much concern the point in hand, it comes not up to the matter; yea, it is quite beſides the mark. And ſo Zophar (Chap. 11. 2, 3.) Should not the multitude of words be anſwered? And ſhould a man full of talk be juſtified? Thou doeſt but Verba dare, thou ſpeakeſt to little purpoſe, or little to the purpoſe, though thou ſpeakeſt much.

Eliphaz puts the ſame language upon him, (Chap. 15. 2, 3.)

2, 3.) Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the Eaſt wind? Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk, or with ſpeeches wherewith he can do no good? Thus his Friends accuſed him of that for which now he accuſeth them; and he himſelf had accuſed them once and again of this before: So (Chap. 12. 2, 3.) Who knoweth not ſuch things as theſe? They are but vulgar truths which you have told me; and (Chap. 13. 1, 2.) Loe mine eye hath ſeen all this, mine ear hath heard, and underſtood it; what ye know, the ſame do I know alſo; I am not inferiour to you. You produce nothing all this while but what I am well acquainted with; which is fully the ſenſe of this Verſe: I have heard many ſuch things: that is, Every man can ſpeak as much as this. Here Job playes the Oratour, or Rhetorician, whoſe buſineſs and deſign (as the great Oratour tells us) is as much as he can to extenuate, and lay low the arguments and reaſons of him that he oppoſeth. Job ſtands as Defendant here, his Friends as Plaintiffs; therefore he endeavours to render their Charge weak, and what they ſaid, ſinnewleſs; I have heard many ſuch things as theſe.

Rhetorico modo principium ſumit ab extenuatione, vice quippe defenſoris agit. Pined. Defenſor cauſam fuiſſe negabit ſi poteſt, aut eam vehementer extenuabit. Cic. l. 2. ad Heren.

Job doth not accuſe his Friends, as giving out falſe and erroneous Doctrine: for himſelf had heard and learned thoſe things before; but he accuſeth them for bringing proofs which were not to the purpoſe, or which were inſufficient to prove their purpoſe: As if he had ſaid, I expected when you would produce ſome ſtronger arguments to maintain your opinion, or clearer anſwers unto mine: I waited for ſome new matter, and to have heard ſomewhat that I had not heard before, but you have deceived my expectation: For, I have heard many ſuch things as theſe.

Hence Note, Firſt, Some truths are of very common obſervation.

Who knoweth not ſuch things as theſe? Every Child that hath been Catechiſed, knows them. 'Tis no diſparagement to any truth, that it hath been often heard, and is commonly known, The more common a truth is, the more weighty it may be, Yet, Which gives us a ſecond Obſervation.

Ordinary truths will not ſerve in extraordinary caſes, and that which every man knows and hears, will not reſolve us in thoſe points which few men know or hear.

As Jobs Perſon was a Phænix in the World, his age afforded not his ſecond; There is none like him in the earth, ſaith God himſelf to Satan (Chap. 1. 8.) So Jobs condition was a Phænix, it had no ſecond; there was no man tryed like him in the whole earth; and therefore his caſe could not be meaſured by the common Standard, or rule of Providence. He had need hear that which was never heard before, who bears and feels that which was never born nor felt before. There are ſome temptations on afflictions, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (1 Cor. 10. 13.) which are common to man: Common truths may comfort and ſatisfie the conſciences of ſuch. But there are temptations (ſuch were Jobs) which are not common to man, we can hardly find their parallel, or a preſident of them in the Records of any age: Common truths will not comfort, nor ſatisfie the conſciences of ſuch. Every diſpenſation hath a doctrine ſuitable to it; diſpenſations which are ſeldome ſeen, call up doctrines which are ſeldome heard.

Secondly, Job complains, that he hears only thoſe things which he had often heard.

Hence obſerve, It troubles a man in trouble, to be often preſſed with the ſame thing.

A man at eaſe is pained with unneceſſary repetitions; much more a man in pain, and though they who like and love the things which they have heard, do both love and like to hear them often; yet (in ſome caſes) they may hear them too often. Some indeed ſpeak very prophanely, what Job ſpake juſtly; who when they would not put off ſubmiſſion to, and attendance upon holy Doctrine, ſay, We know before we go what he will ſay: We know ſuch things as the Preacher uſually ſpeaks; what can he tell us, that we have not heard before? That's the language of the Prophane; We know as much as he can teach us.

Though it be granted, that a man knows as much as the Preacher can tell him, yet he ought to hear it again. Though the matter be known before, yet to hear it often may work a better knowledge, and leave a ſtronger impreſſion upon the heart than ever. 'Tis profitable to write the ſame things, therefore it cannot be unprofitable to hear them (Phil. 3. 1.) Brethren, to write the ſame things, to me, it is not grievous, and to you it is profitable: If to write, then to ſpeak the ſame things is profitable. In the Story of the Acts of the Apoſtles, when Paul had preached in the Synagogue; the Jews being gone, the Gentiles beſought him, That thoſe words might be preached the next Sabbath (Acts 13. 42.) The repeating and inculcating the ſame thing, is not alwayes blameable, and it is ſometimes deſireable: but when a man is under ſore afflictions and temptations, when he is burthened with many ſorrows, it is very grievous to have thoſe things that have been often anſwered or aſſented to, again objected, or aſſerted. A weak ſtomach muſt have variety and change, to entice the appetite, and ſo muſt a troubled and diſtempered ſpirit: I have heard many ſuch things: And hereupon he inferrs:

Miſerable comforters are ye.] As if he had ſaid, This is a miſerable way of comforting, alway to be beating upon, and inculcating the ſame thing; Job calls his Friends Phyſicians of no value, (Chap. 13. 4.) Here he expounds himſelf, while he calls them, Miſerable comforters: He is a Phyſician of no value, who inſtead of curing, increaſeth the diſeaſe; and he is a miſerable comforter, who inſtead of abating our ſorrow, adds to it, and heightens it, Miſerable comforters are ye.

It ſeems the Friends of Job (at leaſt to his ſenſe) had forgotten the deſign they propoſed to themſelves when they firſt undertook this viſit, (Chap. 2. 11.) They made an appointment together, to come, and mourn with him, and to comfort him. That was the intendment of Jobs Friends at their firſt addreſſes. Yet, after ſo long a conference, he makes this report, Miſerable comforters are ye; ye rather vex than heal any ſore; you, my Friends, have troubled me more than my wounds, you have wounded my ſpirit more than Satan did my fleſh; Miſerable comforters are ye.

One of the Ancients renders the words thus, Ye are comforters of evil men; or, poſſibly, you may comfort evil men; but you cannot comfort me. As that which is one mans meat is another mans poyſon; ſo that which is one mans comfort is another mans ſorrow. All good men cannot take in their comforts the ſame way; but the way of comforting good and evil men, differs as much as good and evil. The words of flattery and falſhood will ſerve to comfort the one, no words will comfort the other, but thoſe of ſincerity and truth. I dare not conceive Jobs Friends ſuch as would ſow Pillows under the elbows of evil men, yet ſurely they put hard ſtones under the ſore and aking arms of this good man.

Conſolatores malorũ, i. e. malos poteſtis conſolari. Auguſt.

The Vulgar tranſlation ſpeaks thus, Ye are burdenſome comforters. A comforter ſhould take off burdens; ſorrow is a burden: As the judgments that God threatned upon the Jews, and other Nations, are repreſented in the Prophets, under the name of burthens, The burthen of Judah; the burthen of Iſrael; the burthen of Moab; the burthen of Babylon; the burthen of Idumea: So any affliction upon a perſon, is his burthen; and the buſineſs of thoſe who come to comfort a ſoul in affliction, ſhould be to take off his burthen, at leaſt to lighten it. Jobs Friends did indeed bind the burthen faſter upon his ſpirit, and therefore he might well call them Burthenſome comforters. Falſe hearts count all truth a burthen: The land (ſaith Amaziah) is not able to bear his words (Amos 7. 10.) yet his were words of truth, and tended to peace. Some truths may be burthenſome at ſome times to a good heart. Hard words are alwayes burthenſome; Job had ſtore of them.

Conſolatores Oneroſi. Vulg.

The letter of the Hebrew gives the ſenſe thus; Ye are comforters of trouble; that is troubleſome comforters: As if he had ſaid, Ye do not comfort me in my troubles, but ye trouble me with your comforts: Ye are comforters made up of trouble; that's the predominant Element, which denominates your complexion and conſtitution; ye are ſo troubleſome, that you ſeem to be nothing but trouble. Our rendring in the concrete is clear to Jobs ſcope, Miſerable comforters are ye all:

מנחמי עמל Conſolatores laboris aut moleſtiæ. Heb.

Hence obſerve, Some, while they go about to act the part of comforters, do but add to their ſorrow, whom they pretend to comfort; and inſtead of comforters, prove tormenters.

But when doth a man deſerve this title, A miſerable comforter? That which cauſed Job to charge his Friends with this miſcarriage of their pains with him, will reſolve the queſtion; and tell us when.

Firſt, They gave him little hope of good, or they did not open to him a door of hope wide enough: 'tis true, they made ſome overtures that way, which yet (comparatively to what they ought) were ſcarce conſiderable. And Eliphaz, who had been ſomewhat large upon the point in his firſt congreſs with Job, ſpeaks nothing of it in his laſt: For, as if he thought his caſe deſperate, and had given him for a loſt man, he ſhuts up in the dark, as we ſee, in the cloſe of the former Chapter; where he thunders out the judgments of God upon Hypocrites, and Bribe-takers, without ſo much as one word of comfort to the penitent: This is to be a Miſerable comforter. The ſong of comforters ſhould at leaſt be mixt, like that of David to the Lord, of mercy, and of judgment (Pſal. 101. 1.) A ſong of judgment alone, or moſt of judgment to a heavy heart, may be called (like that of Jeremie) A Lamentation, but it is not a Conſolation.

Secondly, They (as was toucht before) tyred out his afflicted ſoul with tedious diſcourſes, and unpleaſing repetitions; they alwayes harped upon the ſame ſtring, and that makes no muſick to a diſconſolate Soul. As God complains of thoſe Prayers as unpleaſing, which are full of unneceſſary repetitions; ſo alſo thoſe counſels are unpleaſing to man, which are made up of needleſs repetitions. To preſs the ſame point, though true, oft and oft, is a wearineſs to the ſpirit; and becauſe it ſuggeſts this ſuſpition, that the hearer doth oppoſe, or reſiſt that truth, it proves an upbraiding, rather than a teaching, or a comforting: Comfort muſt be ſtollen in unawares, by a holy ſlight of hand, it muſt not be beaten in with beetles, as it were by force of hand.

Subrepere debet conſolatio & fucum facere affectibus. Sen.

Solomon tells us (Prov. 25. 12.) As an ear-ring of Gold and an ornament of fine Gold, ſo is a wiſe reprover upon an obedient ear. What he ſpeaks of a reprover is as true of a comforter; and he onely is fit to be a reprover, who is skill'd, or knowes how to be a comforter. He that will open or launce a ſore, had need be acquainted with the means of healing it. The ſpirit of God, who is the Reprover, (John 16. 8.) is alſo the Comforter (John 14. 26.) We may therefore take up Solomons Proverb here, As an ear-ring of Gold, and an ornament of fine Gold, ſo is a wiſe comforter upon an obedient ear. They who hang Jewels in their ears (as it was the cuſtome of thoſe times, and is to this day) take that which is of great price and value, yet of little weight: No man hangs a Talent, or a great lump of Gold in his ear: Gold is precious, but much Gold is ponderous, and burdens, rather than adorns the ear; the bulk of it is more comberſome, than the beauty of it is conſpicuous. So comfort, which is the moſt pleaſant Jewel of the ear, ſhould be pure and precious as the Gold of Ophir; but yet it muſt be like an ear-ring, which, though it be not light, in regard of worth, yet it is light in regard of weight. We muſt not load, but guide a man with counſell, nor muſt we burden him with many, but eaſe him with pertinent words of comfort.

Eſto correptio non levis pretii ſed levis ponderis.

Thirdly, That which rendred them yet more miſerable Comforters, was, their unkind grating upon that ſtring of his ſinfulneſs and ſtudied hypocriſie. Job acknowledged himſelf a ſinner, and that he could not be juſtified in the ſight of God by any righteouſneſs of his own; yet ſtill his friends were unſatisfied about his ſincerity; and ſtill they preſented him with ſuſpicions of ſecret wickedneſs, as the cauſe of all his ſufferings; ſtill they told him of the ſad fate of Tyrants, of Oppreſſours, of unjuſt Judges, of unſound, and falſe-hearted Worſhippers; and though they did not apply theſe Parables perſonally to Job, yet the general diſcourſe ſounded, as if they had ſaid, Thou art the man.

Now as the Apoſtle ſpeaks concerning death (1 Cor. 15. 56.) ſo may we ſay concerning any affliction, The ſting of affliction is ſin; the ſting of ſickneſs, the ſting of poverty, the ſting of diſgrace is ſin: when the leaſt trouble is armed with ſin, the ſtrongeſt tremble at the ſight of it. A godly man can eaſier bear the weight of all afflictions, than the weight and burthen of one ſin; ſo long as he ſees all clear between God and his own ſoul; ſo long as he can look up to God, as having his ſin pardoned, and can approve his heart to God, that he lives not in any known ſin; in this caſe, though the Lord lay the heavieſt burthen of affliction upon him, he can go lightly under it; The ſpirit of a man will bear all theſe infirmities: but if his ſpirit be wounded, either with the guilt of ſin, or with the fear of the wrath of God, how can he bear it? This afflicts more than all other afflictions. This was it which cauſed Job to cry out, Miſerable comforters: His Friends ever upbraiding him with his ſin, his ſin, his ſin, as the root, and therefore as the ſting of all his troubles. They applied nothing but theſe corraſives to his wounded ſoul, which called aloud for the balm of Gilead. There are two ſorts of miſerable comforters.

Firſt, They who flatter the ſoul that lives in ſin.

Secondly, They who imbitter, and burden their ſouls, who, being under burdens of ſorrow, are alſo in bitterneſs for their ſin.

Some ſow Pillows under the elbows of thoſe who delight in ſin, and dawb them up with untempered mortar; others thruſt ſwords, and ſhoot arrows into the bowels of thoſe who mourn for ſin; and inſtead of bringing well-tempered mortar to bind and cement their ſouls, lay hard ſtones under them, which vex and gall their ſouls. Both are Miſerable comforters.

They who undertake the office of comforting others, ſhould conſider theſe three things eſpecially.

Firſt, The nature of affliction, whether internal, or external; that which will comfort a man in bodily afflictions, will not do it in ſoul afflictions.

Secondly, The degree, or meaſure of affliction: If the Plaiſter be too narrow for the Sore, how can it heal?

Thirdly, They ſhould conſider the temper of the Perſon afflicted, if he be preſſed in conſcience for ſin, they ſhould not preſs his conſcience with ſin; much leſs ſhould they thunder out judgment and terrour againſt him for ſin; if he be very weak, they ſhould uſe few words; if he be paſſionate, they ſhould uſe gentle words, leſt, inſtead of perſwading, they provoke his ſpirit: Many a ſoul is caſt down, and ſwallowed up in deſpair, by the ignorance or unfaithfulneſs of thoſe who would be called Comforters, and Supporters: (Ezek. 13. 19.) They ſlay the ſouls that ſhould not dye, and ſave them alive that ſhould not live. Unskilful Phyſicians of the body, kill more than bodily diſeaſes. And though the unskilfulfulneſs of Soul-phyſicians doth not indeed kill ſouls that ſhould dye (for 'tis their own ſin that kills them) nor can kill the ſouls that ſhould not dye (for the medicine of Chriſts moſt precious blood will heal and ſave ſuch from their ſins) yet un-skilful ſoul-phyſicians ſhall be judged and dealt with, as having done all this, becauſe they have done their utmoſt to do it; which is alſo the meaning of that Text (1 Cor. 8.) And through thy knowledge ſhall the weak brother periſh, for whom Chriſt dyed: that is, an indiſcreet uſe of that liberty which thy knowledge teacheth thee, doth that which may be accounted a deſtroying of thy weak Brother. As that knowledge, ſo the ignorance before ſpoken of, ſlayes the ſouls that ſhould not dye. As it requires the power, ſo the wiſdome and teachings of God to comfort and extricate poor ſouls, in and from the Labyrinth of their ſorrows.

The Lord hath given me the tongue of the learned: What to do? That I ſhould know how to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary (Iſa. 50. 4.) It is a great piece of learning to ſpeak aright to a weary ſoul, to deal with them ſo, as neither to flatter them in their ſins, nor oppreſs them under their ſins; to deal with them ſo in their affliction, as that we neither cauſe them to ſlight the hand of God, nor yet to ſink under it. He that can guide and ſteer the courſe of a ſoul that is afflicted, and toſſed with the tempeſt of ſin and ſorrow, between this rock and gulf, the Scylla of preſumption, and the Charybdis of deſpair, he is a learned Pilot indeed.

This Learning is the ſpecial gift of God; Chriſt himſelf acknowledgeth, that the Lord his Father had given him the tongue of the learned for this end. This learning is not taught in the Schools of men: Philoſophers and Orators never taught ſuch an art of conſolation; nor can it be attained by the bare teaching of the holieſt Doctors and Preachers of Divine truths. We may have a rich furniture of materials for this work, and yet make no work of it, nor be able to put truths and conſciences rightly together, unleſs the anointing teach us. As the Prophet brings in our great Maſter and Tutor in this heavenly ſcience, again confeſſing of himſelf (Iſa. 61. 1.) The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, becauſe the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek, he hath ſent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives. Till we are anointed by God, we cannot ſpeak effectually to man; without the Spirit who is the Comforter, we prove but miſerable comforters; we bungle at the work, and rather undo ſouls, then do them any good: We may preach good tidings, good news, from Heaven (the Goſpel is nothing elſe but good news) yet no good comes of it, till the good Spirit comes with it, both inſtructing the hearts of thoſe that hear, and the tongues of thoſe that ſpeak, duly to apply the Word.

Maſter Calvin upon this place ſaith, Some Comforters have but one ſong to ſing, and they have no regard to whom they ſing it: All perſons, all eſtates, and all conditions are alike to them. The wiſdom of a Comforter conſiſts in diſcerning and making theſe differences: As the Apoſtle Jude hints unto us (Ver. 22, 23.) And of ſome have compaſſion, making a difference; and others ſave with fear: As faith ſaves all, ſo (in a ſence) fear ſaves ſome; that is, they muſt be terrified and made afraid, that they may be ſaved. Job's Friends would needs ſave him with fear, whereas they ſhould have had compaſſion of him, and have ſpoken kindly to him: Becauſe they could not make this difference, therefore they took a wrong courſe with him, and were juſtly taxed without diſtinction, Miſerable comforters are ye all.

Verſe 3. Shall vain words have an end?

As if he had ſaid, I have got no comfort, I would fain get ſome reſt: your words have not refreſhed me, I deſire you would not trouble me, you have done me no good, will you have done?

דברי רוח Verba venti, i.e. ventoſa, parum ſolidæ rationis habentia.

Shall vain words have an end?] The Hebrew is, Shall words of wind have an end? That expreſſion hath been opened twice before. How long ſhall the words of thy mouth be like a ſtrong Eaſt-wind, ſaith Bildad (Chap. 8. 2.) Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the Eaſt-wind? ſaith Eliphaz (Chap. 15. 2.) Job retorts it upon them, Shall words of wind have an end? You tell me that my words are windy, yours are ſo indeed: I muſt hide my ſelf from theſe blaſts and ſtorms of your tongues, unleſs you grow calmer; Shall windy words have an end? Words are windy:

Projicit ampullas, &c.

Firſt, When they have no ſolid reaſon, no ſubſtance in them: Reaſon is the ſubſtance of words, and ſo is truth; theſe two go alwayes together; and where theſe are not, nothing goes out of the mouth but wind we ſay of all words which are not followed with action, Words are but wind; we may ſay ſo alſo of all words which are not accompanied with reaſon.

Verba plena ſpiritu ſuperbiæ.

Secondly, Words are windy when they have much pride, and ſwelling conceitedneſs in them: The Scripture calls ſuch words, Swelling words of vanity: That which ſwells our hearts, will quickly ſwell our lips; pride doth both. Pride is a wind within us; vain words are a wind without us: The proud man knows not how to eaſe himſelf of this wind within, but by breaking it out in words.

Thirdly, Words are windy when they have much paſſion in them, when they are angry and furious; an angry man bluſters rather then ſpeaks, and makes a noiſe rather then a diſcourſe. While David (Pſal. 39. 2, 3.) was dumb with ſilence, while he held his peace from good, his ſorrow was ſtirred, his heart was hot within him, and while he was muſing, the fire kindled: While ſome are even hoarſe with ſpeaking, while they cannot hold their peace from evil, their anger is ſtirred, their hearts are ſtorming within them, and all their talk is only a wind blowing without them.

Iſh ruach.

We read of a ſtrange diſtemper in two ſorts of men, who ought of all others to be moſt compoſed and temperate (Hoſ. 9. 7.) The Prophet is a fool, the ſpiritual man is mad: Our Tranſlators put in the Margin, The man of the Spirit; for Ruach in Hebrew, ſignifieth both the wind that blows in the air, and the Spirit of God which moveth in our hearts: We take that ſence, The ſpiritual man, or the man of the Spirit; that is, the man that pretends to have, or ſhould have the Spirit of God (his buſineſs lying wholly in ſpirituals) this man is mad; he is ſo far from acting to the height of thoſe graces which the Spirit gives, that he acts below that Reaſon which Nature gives.

Yet the Original may be rendred thus (and ſo divers learned Hebricians render it) The man of wind, or the windy man, is mad: Anger is a ſhort madneſs, and he that ſpeaks angerly, is in danger to ſpeak madly.

Job's Friends were not men of wind, nor were they mad, and the words which they ſpake had a general ſence and ſavour of truth and ſoberneſs in them; yet (as to Job's particular caſe) they wanted ſome grains of truth and reaſon, they were too high and ſwelling, conſidering how low and humble he was; they were too full of paſſion, being ſpoken to a man ſo full of ſufferings. And therefore though that cenſure of his Friends words, as vain (who indeed were wiſe and grave men) was too cenſorious and ſharp, yet it muſt be granted, that their words alſo were too ſharp, even ſuch as vexed his ſpirit, and wore out his patience, upon which account he expects and begs an end of them. Shall vain words have an end? That is, Will you make an end of vain ſpeaking? I pray do, I wiſh you would: Cut of the thread of this diſcourſe, you have ſpun it out and continued it, but too long already.

קץ Finis a קצץ præcidit abſcidit. Quia finis eſt tam temporis quam rei præciſio & terminus.

The Hebrew word which we tranſlate an end, ſprings from a root which ſignifies to cut off, becauſe every end, whether of time, or things, is the cutting off of that time or thing, the end of which it is. While Job asks the Queſtion, Shall vain words have an end? He ſpeaks the vehemency of his own deſire and expectation, to ſee an end of them. I ſhall not ſtay here to give any Obſervations upon theſe words, but refer the Reader to the Texts before alledged, in the eighth and fifteenth Chapters, where this expreſſion is more fully opened.

Only Note, Firſt, Vain words are very burdenſome to a ſerious ear, much more to a ſad heart.

Secondly, It is good to end that quickly, we ſhould not have begun.

Profitable words may be too long continued, but unprofitable words cannot be too ſoon ended! It is beſt not to ſpeak vainly, and it is next beſt to ceaſe, or give over ſuch kind of ſpeaking quickly. There is a time to be ſilent from good words, as well as a time to ſpeak them; but there is no time to ſpeak evil words; all times, in reference to them, are times of ſilence. An Apoſiopeſis, or ſudden ſtop of ſpeech, is the moſt ſutable figure of Rhetorick which they can uſe, who ſpeak unſutably. As the end of what we ſay or do well is beſt; ſo the ending of what we ſay or do amiſs is beſt. Perſeverance in every good word and work is Angelical, and the higheſt perfection of duty; but perſeverance in an evil, whether word or work, is Diabolical, and the utmoſt departure from duty. Let not thy mouth open to utter vanity; but if it doth, ſhut it quickly: be not heard ſpeaking that twice, which ſhould not be ſpoken once.

Or what emboldeneth thee that thou anſwereſt?

If thou wilt not make an end, then tell me why? Give me a reaſon; what is it that ſtirs thee to reply upon me, What emboldeneth thee to anſwer? The Hebrew word ſignifies, firſt, To ſtrengthen, to fortifie, or confirm; he that is ſtrengthened, is emboldened. It ſignifies alſo to be ſharp, or bitter (1 Kings 2. 8.) David on his death-bed, tells Solomon his Son, and Succeſſor in the Kingdom, that Shimei had curſed him with a grievous curſe; that is, with a ſtrong, bitter, and provoking curſe, of which we read the Story (2 Sam. 16. 5.)

נמרץ Eſt robarare, fortificare acris eſſe.

This Query is rendred three wayes.

Firſt, As we, What emboldeneth thee that thou anſwereſt?

As if he had ſaid, I thought I ſhould have ſilenced thee before this time, or that thou wouldeſt have put ſilence upon thy ſelf; I wonder who, or what it is that ſets thee on to ſpeak ſtill; Doſt thou think by thy renewed onſets to weary me, and make me yield at laſt? Haſt thou a hope to prevail upon me by thy importunity, when thou canſt not by thy reaſon? Or haſt thou further ſtrength of reaſon, freſh arguments to produce in confirmation of thine opinion? Are theſe but fore-runners, or thy Vauntguard? Is the main battel yet behind? Haſt thou ſome reſerves of greater power then thou haſt yet led up againſt me? Let me ſee them if thou haſt: If not, give over, and hold thy peace; For what ſhall either I or thou get by a further progreſs? What emboldeneth thee to anſwer?

Job ſpeaks wonderingly, his reaſon was at a loſs about the cauſe of his Friends boldneſs, and therefore he admires it: There are two things which may embolden a man to anſwer.

Firſt, The goodneſs and juſtice of that cauſe which he undertakes.

Secondly, The ſtrength and aſſiſtance of God to carry him through it.

Upon theſe grounds, the youngeſt David may be bold to enter the Liſts, and dare the Combate with the ſtrongeſt Goliah. But there are two other things which uſually embolden men to anſwer.

Firſt, Self-confidence.

Secondly, Unwillingneſs to yield.

They who are thus emboldened, will not give over anſwering, though they have no further light of truth, or reaſon to hold out in their anſwers: Job ſurely had ſuch apprehenſions of his Friend Eliphaz, which moved him to aſk, What emboldeneth thee that thou anſwereſt?

Hence Note, Such is the ſtiffneſs and vanity of ſome, that they will hold on a contention, though they have no further grounds of truth or reaſon to continue it upon.

They will ſpeak on though it be the ſame thing, only in a new dreſs of words. They have ſtore of words, though ſcarcity of matter; we may juſtly ſay to ſuch, What emboldeneth you to anſwer? It is more then boldneſs, a kind of impudence in ſuch to anſwer: Pertinacy of ſpirit diſdains to lay down the Bucklers. They who contend for victory, rather then for truth, will not be anſwered, how much ſoever they are anſwered: And they who are more loath to be foiled, then will to be rectified, will hardly ſubmit to the plaineſt and cleareſt evidence.

Quid exacerbat te ut reſpondeas. Jun.

The ſecond reading is, What doth provoke thee to anſwer? Or, What imbitters thy ſpirit that thou anſwereſt? As if Job had ſaid, Surely Eliphaz my fair diſcourſe with thee, ſhould have ſtopped the courſe of this ſevere proceeding with me before this time; thou haſt loaded me with hard words, and uncharitable jealouſies; But have I ſpoken provokingly, or bitterly to thee? My conſcience tells me that I have not, and thou knoweſt I have not.

He that impartially reads over Job's anſwers to Eliphaz, may find here and there a ſowre paſſage; but as we ſay proverbially, You muſt give looſers leave to ſpeak. The wiſe Phyſitian hears his Patient giving him uncomely language, yet will not hear it, much leſs retort or anſwer ſo again: They who are in pain muſt be born with; though they provoke, it muſt not be called a provocation; and though they give offence, yet it muſt not be taken. When the Child cryes, the Nurſe ſings: God himſelf bears with the manners of his people (ſo the word intimates, Acts 13. 18.) as a Mother doth with a froward Child; and ſo ſhould we with the frowardneſs of our weak and afflicted Brethren. So that in this ſence, the provocations which Job gave his Friends, were not to be reckoned as provocations; and he might well ſay to Eliphaz, What provoketh thee to anſwer? If I (in the caſe I am in) have ſpoken paſſionately, Wilt thou be provoked by it? Thou ſhouldſt not. Thou oughteſt to paſs it by, and cover it with the garment of charity.

Yet further, we may take the words as a total denial of any provocation given on his part.

Whence Note, Some will ſpeak harſhly to, and of thoſe who never provoked, or gave them cauſe.

Water runs clear till 'tis troubled and ſtirr'd by ſome outward violence: But the ſpirits of ſome men run muddy, though nothing from without ſtirs them. The Prophet compares all wicked men to the troubled Sea, when it cannot reſt, whoſe waters caſt up mire and dirt (Iſa. 57. 20.) The Sea is not alwayes troubled, when the Winds are quiet, that is quiet; we often ſee a ſmooth Sea, as ſmooth as Glaſs: A wicked man is like the Sea when 'tis enraged, he is ſuch a Sea as knows no calm; he is like the Sea, not only when it is troubled, but when it cannot reſt. Though no breath of Wind from abroad offend him, yet he ſtorms: He hath luſts in his own bowels, which provoke him when nothing elſe doth; yea, thoſe luſts within provoke him, when all without labour to pacifie him.

So David complains (Pſal. 120. 5, 7.) Wo is me that I ſojourn in Meſech, that I dwell in the Tents of Kedar; that is, with the Sons or Deſcendants of Iſhmael, who have learned of their Father to mock and perſecute; I dwell in the Tents of Kedar: But what cauſed them to mock and perſecute? Was it any provocation that David had given them? No, for he ſaith in the next words, I am for peace (I would live quietly with all my heart) but when I ſpeak, they are for war. A motion for peace, becomes a provocation to war? It is ſinful to ſpeak raſhly, or harſhly, though we are provoked; What is it then to ſpeak ſo when we are not provoked? They angred Moſes at the waters of ſtrife, they provoked his ſpirit; yet it went ill with Moſes for their ſakes, when he ſpake unadviſedly with his lips (Pſal. 106. 32, 33.) But what was this unadviſed ſpeech. Moſes reports his own infirmity (Numb. 20, 10. 11.) And Moſes and Aaron gathered the Congregation together before the Rock; and he ſaid unto them, Hear now ye Rebels muſt we fetch you water out of this Rock? And Moſes lift up his hand, and with his Rod he ſmote the Rock twice, &c. The error of Moſes in this buſineſs was twofold.

Firſt, That he did not only ſmite the Rock, but ſmite it twice with the Rod in his hand, whereas he had order only, to take the Rod in his hand, and ſpeak to the Rock before their eyes, and it ſhould give out water (Verſ. 8.)

His ſecond error was, that he did not only ſpeak to the people (for which in that tranſaction he had no order from God) but ſpake bitterly and harſhly to them, calling them Rebels, and ſlighting them, Muſt we fetch water for you? &c. What, for you, who are a murmuring and gainſaying people? God knew the ſtubbornneſs of that people, and their rebellions againſt him, yet he did not call them Rebels, but ſaid in the cloſe of the eighth Verſe, So ſhalt thou give the Congregation, and their beaſts drink. God had more reaſon and power to call them Rebels then Moſes had, yet he did not. And becauſe Moſes did, that unadviſed ſpeech of his, and the actions which attended it, were called Rebellion, at the twenty fourth Verſe of the ſame Chapter, Ye (ſaith the Lord of Moſes and Aaron) rebelled againſt my word at the waters of Meribah.

Now, if Moſes was thus reproved and cenſured by God himſelf, for ſpeaking paſſionately, to a people who had provoked both God their Deliverer, and him their Leader; What reproof do they deſerve, who, either upon none, or very little provocation, call their Brethren, Hypocrites, Hereticks, Schiſmaticks, Rebels, perjured Perſons, Men of proſtituted conſciences, or at leaſt, of unſetled and uncertain Principles? Will not the Lord take notice of this bitterneſs, even in thoſe who are his precious Servants, towards their fellow-ſervants, when he laid ſo heavy a penalty (as non-admiſſion into the promiſed Land) upon a pair of the moſt eminent and faithful Servants that ever he called forth to his work, ſince he laid the foundations of the World?

This falls heavy upon the preſent Age: Whence is that bitterneſs, that Gall and Wormwood which falls from many, both Tongues and Pens, every day? What hath provoked them thus to ſpeak and write? I confeſs there have been provocations, and ſome do but give Gall for Gall, and Wormwood for Wormwood; yet it cannot be denyed, but that many ſpeak and write bitterly, when they have had no provocation; yea, moſt who ſpeak bitterly, have been treated gently; and few who anſwer angerly will be able to give a good account what had provoked them thus to anſwer; and how much ſoever any man hath been provoked; voked, the Lord may juſtly make him ſmart for ſuch ſmartneſs in anſwering. It will not bear us out in acting or ſpeaking beſides the rule, becauſe others do ſo. Paul ſhews us our duty in his own practice (1 Cor. 4. 12, 13.) Being reviled we bleſs, being defamed we entreat: We muſt not defame them that defame us; we muſt not revile our revilers. Then woe to thoſe who revile ſuch as bleſs them, and defame ſuch as entreat them: O what provoketh ſuch to ſuch wayes of anſwering?

There is yet a third reading of this clauſe, which I will but touch, When ſhall vain words have an end? But what trouble is it to thee if thou ſpeakeſt? Or, Is it any trouble to thee if thou ſpeakeſt? As if he had ſaid, I cannot much wonder though thou doſt not end theſe vain ruffling diſcourſes, for I am perſwaded they are no great trouble to thee, how much ſoever they are to others; ſuch words coſt thee little ſtudy; thou needeſt not beat thy brains, or bite thy nails for ſuch matter as this. That which comes next, and lyes uppermoſt, is all that ſome men have to ſay, when they have ſaid all. They that ſpeak moſt to the pain of others, take leaſt pains themſelves. We ſay, Good words are cheap, it coſts little to ſpeak fair; but ill words are cheaper. Foul language coſts little in the preparation, though it may prove coſtly enough in the event. There is a profitable ſence in this tranſlation, though I will not give it for the meaning of the Text.

Quid tibi moleſtum eſt ſi loquaris? Vulg.

It is our duty to conſider before we ſpeak, as well as before we act; and to put our ſelves to ſome trouble in preparing what we have to ſay, before we give others the trouble of hearing it. When God calls us to ſpeak, either in our own defence, or for the edification of others, on a ſudden, we may expect (according to the Promiſe, Matth. 10. 19.) That it ſhall be given us in that hour what we ſhall ſpeak. If the Providence of God ſtraiten us, the Spirit of God will enlarge us; that Promiſe will help us, when we have no time to prepare our ſelves; but it will not, if we neglect the time in which we ſhould prepare our ſelves: For when Chriſt ſaith in that place, Take no thought how or what ye ſhall ſpeak; we muſt expound it like that (Matth. 6. 25.) Take no thought for your life, what ye ſhall eat, or what ye ſhall drink; which is not a prohibition of all thought about thoſe things, but only of thoſe thoughts which are diſtracting and diſtruſtful.

Job having reproved his Friends theſe three wayes, for the manner of their dealing with him; now reproves them by a ſerious profeſſion of his better dealing with them; in caſe (as we commonly ſay) The Tables were turned, they coming in his place, and he in theirs: This he doth in the two Verſes following.

Verſe 4. I alſo could ſpeak as ye do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead: I could heap up words againſt you, and ſhake mine head at you.

5. But I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

Job in this context tells his Friends two things.

First, What he could do.

And ſecondly, What he would do.

The former of theſe is laid down expreſly in the fourth Verſe.

Verſe 4. I alſo could ſpeak as you do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead, &c.

The Soul is here put (as often elſewhere in Scripture) for the whole man; then, his meaning is (and ſo Maſter Broughton tranſlates) If you were in my place, or in my condition. If God ſhould tranſcribe my wounds and ſorrows upon your backs and conſciences, or if my grief dwelt in your bowels, I could ſpeak as you do, &c.

The ſufferings of the ſoul hold out the ſufferings of the whole man, upon a twofold conſideration.

Firſt, Becauſe the ſoul is the principal part of man. When that which is chief ſuffers, all may be ſaid to ſuffer.

Secondly, Becauſe afflictions which lye upon the ſoul are moſt afflictive: The ſenſitive power of the body, is called the ſoul, and we are moſt ſenſible of thoſe afflictions which fall immediately upon the rational ſoul. That man forgets the ſorrows of his body, whoſe ſoul is ſorrowful. The more inward any ſuffering is, the more grievous it is.

I alſo could ſpeak as you do, if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead, &c.

Some read the words Interrogatively, Could I ſpeak as you do? If your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead, could I heap up words againſt you, and ſhake my head at you? Mr. Broughton gives that ſence fully, Would I ſpeak as you, if you were in my place, would I compoſe bare words againſt you, and nod upon you with my head? The meaning is Negative, If you were in my ſouls ſtead, I could do none of theſe things. Could I do them? No (as we ſay.) I could as ſoon eat my own fleſh as do them: If I were at eaſe, and you in pain, could I deal thus with you? I would dye rather then deal ſo with you. This reading is good, and hath a greater emphaſis in it then our bare affirmative reading, though the ſence and ſcope of both be the ſame.

If your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead.] Some read this Optatively, or as a wiſh, O that your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead; and then the latter words are taken as a promiſe or profeſſion of offices of love: Firſt, I would heap up words for you.

The Hebrew word which we tranſlate to heap, ſignifies properly to prepare and fit a thing, to faſhion and put it into a good frame; it is not a rude, inartificial heaping of things together, without form or faſhion, as the firſt Chaos was; but a beautiful elegant digeſtion, or compoſure of them, into the exacteſt form and faſhion, like that of the ſeveral pieces of the World, conjoyned in that work of the ſix dayes creation: As if he had ſaid, O that your ſoul were a while in my ſouls ſtead, ſee how I would uſe you, how I would deal with you; truly, all the hurt I would do to you, ſhould be this, I would prepare the ſofteſt and the ſweeteſt words I could with all my skill and rhetorick, to eaſe your ſorrows; I would ſpeak muſick to your eares, and joy to your hearts; I would ſtudy and compoſe a ſpeech on purpoſe, to revive and raiſe your drooping, deſponding ſpirits.

Concinnare, aptè diſponere.

So alſo the ſecond branch may be interpreted, And ſhake mine head at you, or over you: For to ſhake the head, notes pity and compaſſion; to ſhake the head is the poſture of thoſe who mourn with, or for their Friends. Hence the word is tranſlated to bemoan (Nah. 3. 7.) Who will bemoan him? (Chap. 42. 11.) Job*'s Friends came to bemoan him;* 'tis this word, They came to ſhake their heads over him, becauſe of all the evil which the Lord had brought upon him. One of the Ancients makes this expoſition of the Text, I would have ſhaken my head over you bemoaningly, or with compaſſion: The ſame word may well ſignifie to ſhake the head, and to pity, ſeeing they who pity others, uſe to ſhake their heads over them, and ſay, Ah my Friend, or Ah my Brother.

ϗ ἐκίνησα ἂν ἐφ' ὑμῖν τὴν κεφαλὴν συμπαθῶς. Et moviſſe ſuper vos caput condolenter. Chryſoſt.

So then, if we read the words as a wiſh, O that your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead; yet Job did not wiſh it for their hurt, but that he might have an opportunity to ſhew how much he would labour to be their Servant in Love, to do them good.

Hence Note, A good man doth not wiſh ill to thoſe who have rewarded him with evil upon any other terms, then a diſcovery of his own goodneſs.

'Tis ſin to wiſh that they who are in a comfortable condition might fall into our miſery, though they have been miſerable comforters to us in our miſery. We may not (in this caſe) wiſh pain or ſorrow to any ſort of men, except upon one of theſe two conſiderations.

Firſt, That we may give them an experiment of our tenderneſs towards them, in doing them all the good we can in their affliction.

Or ſecondly, That God may give an experiment of his graciouſneſs towards them, in doing them good by their afflictions.

The Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 14. 10.) foreſhews how they who had been weakened by the power of Babylon, ſhould inſult over weakened Babylon, All they ſhall ſpeak and ſay unto thee, Art thou alſo become weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? The people of God ſhall at laſt rejoyce (in reference to the glory of God, and publick good) to ſee their deſtroyers deſtroyed, and thoſe weak who have weakened them. But the people of God (in reference to any private, or perſonal intereſt) cannot rejoyce at the deſtruction, or in the weakneſs of any man, much leſs can they wiſh them weak that they might have an opportunity to rejoyce over them. Paul was a Priſoner, and in bonds, yet he did not wiſh the worſt of his enemies in priſon, or in bonds with him; he only wiſht that they might enjoy the ſame liberty by Jeſus Chriſt, which himſelf enjoyed. For when he had almoſt perſwaded King Agrippa to become a Chriſtian, he ſaid, I would to God, that not thou only, but alſo all that hear me this day, were both almoſt, and altogether ſuch as I am, except theſe bonds (Acts 26. 28,29.) I would keep my chains and troubles to my ſelf, I would have none of you know my ſorrows; but I would that all your ſouls were in as good a ſtate as mine, and knew my comforts. A holy heart wiſheth all well, as well as it ſelf; and if at any time he wiſneth that to the worſt of his enemies, which is penally evil, he doth it with an eye both to their ſpiritual and eternal good.

Thus of the words as they are read in the form of a wiſh.

We read them as a Suppoſition, If your ſouls were in my ſouls ſtead: And then the two latter branches muſt be interpreted as acts of unfriendlineſs, ſhewing what Job could, but would not do, as was toucht before.

I could heap up words againſt you.] That is, I could make long ſpeeches, and enlarge my ſelf in diſcourſe, I could ſpeak terror, and thunder out whole volleys of threats againſt you; I could deaf your ears with loud voyces, and ſad your hearts with heavy cenſures. There is a figure in Rhetorick called Congeries, or The heap. Many words to the ſame ſence, eſpecially when there is little in them but words, are called juſtly, a heap of words: Now, ſaith Job, I could be as nimble at this figure as you; and with my ſpeech I could mix your action.

Quaſſare caput, apud authores Latinos geſtus eſt hominis irati aut minantis aut lamentantis. Druſ. Ridentes caput motitant. Druſ.

Shake my head at you.] Shaking the head, notes ſcorn and threatning (Pſal. 22. 7.) All they that ſee me, laugh me to ſcorn; they ſhoot out the lip, and ſhake the head, ſaying, He truſted on the Lord, &c. So the afflicted Church complains (Pſal. 44. 14.) Thou makeſt us a by-word among the Heathen, a ſhaking of the head among the people. We have this action joyned with two more, which ſignifie the greateſt contempt, by lamenting Jeremiah (Lam. 2. 15.) All that paſs by clap their hands at thee, they hiſs, and wag their head at the Daughter of Jeruſalem, ſaying, Is this the City that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole Earth?

Our bleſſed Saviour (upon whom contempt and ſcorn was to vent it ſelf all manner of wayes, he being to bear all that ſcorn, as well as all that pain which was due to our ſins; our bleſſed Saviour, I ſay) was ſcorned this way (Matth. 27. 39.) And they that paſſed by reviled him, wagging their heads. So then to ſhake, or wag the head at a man in affliction, ſpeaks, as ſometimes our pity, ſo moſt times our contempt; and as it is uſually accompanied with audible mockings, ſo it ſelf is a viſible mock: Which being interpreted, ſpeaks thus to the perſon afflicted, Thou evil-doer, or thou hypocrite, thou doſt even well become thy ſufferings, all theſe miſeries are well beſtowed on thee, &c.

In this ſence Job ſeems to ſpeak here, I could ſhake my head at you: I have indeed been as one mocked of his Friend (Chap. 12. 4.) and I could mock my Friends, I could laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh; but my conſcience bears witneſs with me, that if it ſhould come, I would not.

Hence Note, Firſt, A godly man hath a power to do that evil which he hath no will to do.

A carnal man hath a will to many evils, for which he hath no power or opportunity: A godly man would not do any evil, how much power and opportunity ſoever he hath. And indeed though he hath a natural, or civil, yet he hath not a moral power to do any evil. In which ſence the Apoſtle ſpeaks of a regenerate perſon (1 John 3. 9.) He that is born of God cannot ſin: He hath a natural power to ſin any ſin, to lye, to be drunk, to be unclean, &c. He may have a civil power to oppreſs, to deceive, to wrong his Brother; yet he cannot turn either his hand or his heart to ſuch works as theſe are; he hath learned better, and is better. He is born of God, his blood and pedigree is ſo high, that he cannot meddle, nor trade in ſuch low things. Wiſdom is too high for a fool (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 24. 7.) and folly is too low for a wiſe man. When Joſeph was ſolicited by his Miſtreſs to commit folly with her, he anſwers, How can I do this great wickedneſs, and ſin againſt God? (Gen. 39. 9.) Joſeph wanted neither power nor opportunity to do that wickedneſs, yet he ſaith, How can I do it?

Paul and his fellow-Apoſtles had wit and parts ſufficient to oppoſe the truth, yet he ſaith (2 Cor. 13. 8.) We can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth. Paul was a great doer, and he ſaith (Phil. 4. 13.) I can do all things through Chriſt ſtrengthening of me; but Paul could do nothing to the diſhonour of Chriſt. Doubtleſs Paul could have maintained an Argument, and drive on an Objection as far as another man, againſt the truth, if he would have ſet himſelf to it, and have made that his buſineſs; but he had not a mind to do it: The bent of his ſpirit did not lye that way, he was all for Chriſt, and the Goſpel; he was a Giant for the truth; but an Infant, a weakling, as weak as water againſt it; he had neither an underſtanding to conceive, nor a tongue to ſpeak to the diſſervice of Jeſus Chriſt.

Narrat juſtus quid facere potuit, ſed ne juſtitiam deſerat, quod facere potuit declinat. Greg.

It is a good Obſervation of one of the Ancients, upon this place, A juſt man declares what he can do; but that he may not deſert Juſtice, he forbears to do what he can. The providence of God ſets bounds to the power of a carnal man; but the Spirit of God ſets bounds to the power of a holy man: if a carnal man keep within compaſs at any time, it is becauſe he is reſtrained; but a godly man keeps within compaſs, becauſe he is renewed. Laban tells Jacob (Gen. 31. 29.) It is in the power of my hand to do thee hurt: And why did not Laban hurt Jacob? Was it from any principle of love or righteouſneſs in Laban's breaſt? The Text is ſilent in that, and Laban himſelf ſeems to tell us, whence it was, in the ſame Verſe, The God of your Fathers ſpake unto me yeſternight, ſaying, Take thou heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob, &c. And this his ſpeaking to Laban, Jacob calls, Gods rebuking of Laban (Verſ. 42.) implying, that if God had not ſtopt him, he would have done him hurt.

It was more then once in the power of David's hand, to hurt, yea, to ſlay Saul, and he was ſtrongly moved by ſome of his great Officers to do it, yet he ſtrongly refuſed to do it, or to ſuffer it to be done, becauſe it would have been ſin in him to do it, himſelf being a private perſon, and the way in which he had any opportunity to do it, being only a private way, when Saul was in the Cave, covering his feet (1 Sam. 24. 3.) or in a Trench faſt aſleep (1 Sam. 26. 7.) and therefore (though he had ſtrengthened himſelf againſt Saul with an Army, and was ready (upon his provocation) to ſtretch forth his hand againſt him in battel, yet) he ſaith, Who can ſtretch forth his hand againſt the Lords anointed, and be guiltleſs? David was not ſtopt from hurting Saul, by a rebuke from God, but by the rule and dictate of his own conſcience. The thing might have been eaſily done, but becauſe it could not be innocently done, therefore David could not do it.

Secondly, Obſerve more ſpecially to the matter of this Text,

A godly man (when himſelf) cannot be harſh and grievous to others, though he have never ſo much advantage to be ſo.

His cannings are not for ſuch uſes. What the Apoſtle ſaith of his Miniſterial power, a gracious heart ſaith of all his power, It is for edification, not for deſtruction (2 Cor. 13. 10.) He deſigns his power for the help and comfort of all, not for the hurt or grief of any. A good man is merciful to his Beaſt; how then can he be unmerciful to his Brethren? He pitieth a beaſt fallen under a burthen; how then can he be cruel to his Brother when he is under burthens? Nature, or common humanity abhors ſuch actings; much more doth Grace. Paul gives this charge to Believers, Bear ye one anothers burthens, and ſo fulfil the Law of Chriſt (Gal. 6. 2.) This Law of Chriſt is written in the heart of every man, who is Chriſts, and therefore he is far from adding to another mans burden: He that hath a fellow-feeling of his Brethrens ſorrows, will not encreaſe their ſorrows: no man will purpoſely encreaſe, or add to that burthen which himſelf muſt bear. Could I ſpeak as you do?

Thus for the Negative, what Job would not have done, if their ſoul had been in his ſouls ſtead.

But, What would he have done? He tells us in the next Verſe, this is the courſe that I would take.

Verſe 5. I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

This is my deſign, and all the hurt I intend you. Theſe words in the ſubſtance of them have been opened (Chap. 4.4.) where Eliphaz tells Job, that he had done, what here he promiſed he would do, Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou haſt ſtrengthened the feeble knees: Thou haſt inſtructed many, and thou haſt ſtrengthened the weak hands. Eliphaz had given teſtimony for Job, that he had done, what Job now profeſſeth he was reſolved to do, and would do, in caſe he were put into their condition, and they into his, I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth: That is, with the words of my mouth; and (which is the ſame) The moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

Here are the two parts of conſolation, and the two great duties of a Comforter.

The firſt, is to ſtrengthen ſorrowful man.

The ſecond, is to abate the ſtrength of his ſorrows.

Job was reſolved upon both: Were they weak in faith, and hope, he would ſtrengthen them: were their fears and doubtings ſtrong, he would endeavour to weaken them, I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief.

Motio labiorum meorum prohiberet. Heb. ſc. dolorem veſtrum.

The word Grief is not expreſſed in the Hebrew; there it is only thus, The moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage; be it what it will that grieves you, I would labour to aſſwage it: I would aſſwage your fears, your ſorrows, your impatience, your unbelief; whatever ſpiritual evil were upon you, the moving of my lips ſhould be for the removing of it: Or (as others render) For the turning of it away. For the word ſignifies,

First, to abate in degree.

Secondly, To turn away, or to ſtop altogether.

My deſign ſhould be upon both, I would ſtudy to the utmoſt of my power and parts, not only to mitigate, but quite to remove whatſoever I ſhould find an affliction to you.

It hath been ſhewed (Chap. 4.4.) what power words have, both to ſtrengthen weak faith, and to aſſwage the ſtrongeſt grief, thither I refer the Reader; only take two brief notes from it.

Firſt, A good man doth not only abſtain from the hurt that he might do another, but he labours to help him, and to do him good.

Not to heap words in anger upon them that are in miſery, not to ſhake the head at them in contempt, is only a Negative piece of charity and kindneſs: 'Tis our duty to uſe our utmoſt endeavour to refreſh and comfort them. Negative acts of kindneſs are not the fulfilling of the law of love; it is not charity to the poor, to ſay I will not make them poorer, I will take nothing from them; it is our duty to give them of what we have. When a man is ſorrowful, it is not enough to ſay, I will not increaſe his grief: it is our duty to leſſen it, yea, to turn it into joy.

And this is more conſiderable, in reference to the perſons with whom Job had to do; they had given him very hard meaſure, yet he would not requite them with hard meaſure; he would meaſure that to them which was good, and he would give them good meaſure. It is the common rule of humanity, to do good to thoſe who do us good; it is more then beaſtly, even devilliſh cruelty, to hurt thoſe that do us good; it is the height of Chriſtianity, to do good to thoſe who have been a hinderance to us, and to comfort thoſe who have cauſed our ſorrow. The Apoſtolical rule is, Recompence to no man evil for evil (Rom. 12. 17.) And again (ver. 19.) Dearly beloved, avenge not your ſelves, but rather give place unto wrath: The Apoſtle doth not mean, that we ſhould give place to our own wrath; if we do ſo, we give place to the Devil, as the ſame Apoſtle intimates (Eph. 4. 26.27.) Our own wrath muſt be ſtopt and reſiſted, quenched and put out. Then, what, or whoſe wrath is it, that we are commanded to give place unto? This wrath may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, For the wrath of that man who is our enemy; we muſt give place to his wrath, not by approving him or his wrath, but by not anſwering him with wrath. If when another ſtorms we are calm, if when he rages, we ſhew all gentleneſs and meekneſs both of ſpeech and ſpirit, then we give place to his wrath; that is, we make it room to paſs away and evaporate: Solomon's Proverb is the ſum of this Expoſition (Prov. 15. 1.) A ſoft anſwer turneth away wrath; but grievous words ſtir up anger.

Secondly, When Paul adviſeth us not to avenge our ſelves, but rather to give place to wrath, we may underſtand it of the wrath of God; and the very next words, which the Apoſtle alledgeth from (Deut. 32.35.) carry the ſence clearly this way, For it is written, vengeance is mine, I will repay, ſaith the Lord: As if the Apoſtle had ſaid, If you take upon you to avenge your ſelves, you take Gods work out of his hand; it belongs to God as much to take revenge, as it doth to give reward. And therefore as a man, who having done good, is over careful and anxious how to get his reward, takes rewarding work out of Gods hand, and ſhall have no more reward then he can get himſelf; as Chriſt tells the Phariſees in that caſe (Mat. 6. 2.) Verily I ſay unto you, ye have your reward: And all that a man can get himſelf, is not worth the having.

So the man, who having ſuffered wrong, goes about to revenge himſelf, takes revenging work out of Gods hand, and ſhall be righted no further then he can right himſelf, which is but little, if any thing at all; whereas if he would give place to the wrath of God; that is, let God alone, by ſuch wayes as his Juſtice ſhall raiſe up, to right him, againſt his adverſary, he would right him fully. So that our Intereſt doth not lye in returning evil ſor evil, but in returning good for evil to our enemies; as Saint Paul concludes (Rom. 13. 20.) Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirſt, give him drink; for in ſo doing, thou ſhalt heap coals of fire on his head: That is, thou ſhalt either melt and mollifie his ſpirit towards thee, as hardeſt metals are by coals of fire (ſome ſuch melting we may ſee in Saul towards David, when he ſorbore to take vengeance on him (1 Sam. 24. 16. Chap. 26. 21.) or thou ſhalt heap coals of divine vengeance upon him, by making his malice and hatred againſt thee more inexcuſable: Which latter, though it may be looked upon as a conſequent of our doing good to our enemies, yet we muſt take heed of making it the end why we do ſo, for that were to ſeek revenge while we forbear it, and to do good for that end, were to be overcome of evil; which the Apoſtle forbids in the cloſe of that Chapter.

Job in this Text was far from profeſſing a readineſs to aſſwage the grief of his unkind, or enemy-like Friends, upon hope that God would encreaſe their ſorrow.

Secondly, Obſerve, Words duly ſpoken and applyed, are of great power.

How forcible are right words? Is Job's queſtion (Chap. 6. 25.) He doth not there anſwer his queſtion, nor tell us how forcible they are, but here he doth. They are of ſuch force, that they ſtrengthen weak ſouls, and aſſwage the moſt ſwelling floods of ſorrow.

God at firſt gave being and motion to all creatures, with the moving of his lips: He by the moving of his lips hath ever ſince ordered all their motions: The word of man produceth great effects; the tongue ſets all hands on work; and what almoſt cannot the tongue of man do? The tongue is a little member (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 3. 5.) and boaſteth great things: Now as the tongue of vain men boaſt great things which they cannot do; ſo the tongues of wiſe men can really do great things. Vain men (as we ſay) will take thirteen to the dozen, but cannot perform one. Wiſe men though they ſpeak not much, yet they can perform much with a word ſpeaking. And though as the ſame Apoſtle declaims moſt holiliy againſt the tongue of a wicked man (Verſ. 8.) that his tongue is ſuch an unruly evil, that no man can tame it; yet there have ſcarce ever been found any men ſo unruly, but the tongues of wiſe and godly men have tamed them: Yea, the tongue of a wiſe man is to an unruly man, and often to a multitude of unruly men, as a bit in a Horſes mouth, or as a Rudder to a Ship, turning him or them about which way ſoever he liſteth; as this Apoſtle teacheth us by theſe ſimilitudes (Verſ. 3, 4.)

the tongue of every man is to, and doth to himſelf, whether it be good or evil. And as the tongue is thus powerful in civilizing the rude, and in appeaſing the humours of thoſe who are moſt outragious; ſo it is very powerful in ſupporting thoſe that are ready to ſink, and in aſſwaging the grief of thoſe who are moſt diſconſolate and ſorrowful.

Laſtly, Whereas Job ſpeaks peremptorily, as if he ſaw the effect, or were aſſured of it aforehand, I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief: Job knew that the ſucceſs of all his counſels depended upon the concurrence and bleſſing of God; yet thus he ſpeaks.

Hence Note, A man may ſay he hath done that, for the doing of which he hath uſed ſuitable and faithful endeavours, whether the thing be done or no.

The Lord ſaith to Jeruſalem by the Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 24. 13.) Becauſe I have purged thee, and thou waſt not purged. Now as God takes it upon him, that he had purged them, though they were not purged, becauſe he gave them ſo many means and helps for their purging; ſo any man in his proportion, may take it upon him, that he hath ſtrengthened their faith, abated their grief, yea, and ſaved their ſouls, among, and towards whom he hath diligently uſed thoſe means appointed by God for the attaining of thoſe great and noble ends, though poſſibly thoſe ends be not attained. God himſelf reckons thus of all the labours of his faithful ſervants, they ſhall be rewarded as having done that which they have been doing with their hearts, hands, and tongues, though they ſee little fruit of either. Then I ſaid, I have laboured in vain (Iſa. 49. 4.) but though it was in vain to thoſe for whom he laboured, that is, they got no good by it, yet it was not in vain to him who laboured, he got much good by it; as it follows in the ſame Verſe, Surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work (or my reward, one word ſignifies both reward and work, to ſhew that theſe can never be ſeperated, my work, ſaith he) is with my God: And Verſ. 5. Though Iſrael be not gathered, yet ſhall I be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and my God ſhall be my ſtrength.

As we are not to judge of the goodneſs of any cauſe by the ſucceſs, but by the juſtice of it; ſo neither doth God adjudge the reward of any work by the ſucceſs, but by the goodneſs of it, together with the ſweat and ſincerity of him that doth it. As the will of a godly man is accepted for the deed, ſo his deed is accepted for the ſucceſs.

VERS. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Though I ſpeak, my grief is not aſſwaged: and though I forbear, what am I eaſed?

But now he hath made me weary: thou haſt made deſolate all my company.

And thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, which is a witneſs againſt me: and my leanneſs riſing up in me, beareth witneſs to my face.

He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me: he gnaſheth upon me with his teeth, mine enemy ſharpeneth his eyes upon me.

They have gaped upon me with their mouth, they have ſmitten me upon the cheek reproachfully, they have gathered themſelves together againſt me.

God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over to the hands of the wicked.

IN the five former Verſes of this Chapter, Job reproved the perſonal failings of his Friends towards him; he now enters upon the confutation of their opinion. This is the conſtant method, both of Job and his Friends; they never come to the matter till they have fallen upon the man; nor touch the opinion, till they have dealt with the perſon. And this is the tenor of moſt mens ſpirits, to this day, in diſputes and controverſies; and ſome do not only deal with the man before the matter, but loſe the matter in dealing with the man, entangling, and engaging themſelves ſo much in perſonal quarrels, that they forget, or deſert the doctrinal quarrel. Job and his Friends, though they were too mindful of the former, yet they did not forget the latter, and here Job addreſſes himſelf unto it. Yet before he enters upon the ſtate of the queſtion, he ſets forth his own ſtate, and ſhews how it was with him; granting (which Eliphaz had made the ground of his accuſation) that he was in an extreamly afflicted condition, yet denying what he from thence inferred, that he was therefore wicked, or continued knowingly in any ſinful courſe. He deſcribes his afflictions with much variety of Argument and Elocution, to the ſeventeenth Verſe.

Firſt, Aggravating them by their unmoveableneſs, or remedileſneſs: His ſorrows were ſtubborn, and ſuch as would not yield to any kind of remedy.

Verſe 6. Though I ſpeak my grief is not aſſwaged, and though I forbear, what am I eaſed?

In the former Verſe, Job ſpeaks in a high ſtrain of aſſurance, that if his Friends were afflicted, The moving of his lips ſhould aſſwage their grief: But it ſeems, his own experience had taught him, that the moving of his lips could not aſſwage his own grief; Though I ſpeak (ſaith he here) my grief is not aſſwaged.

Hence Obſerve, A man may do that for others which he cannot do for himſelf.

He may comfort others in their ſorrows, when he cannot comfort himſelf; he may reſolve others in their doubts, when he cannot reſolve himſelf; he may anſwer to caſes which their conſciences put him, when he cannot anſwer his own; yea, tis poſſible for a man to ſpeak ſuch words to another, as may turn him from his ſin, and ſave his ſoul, and yet himſelf continue in ſin, and loſe his own ſoul for ever. Naturaliſts have a rule concerning the Senſes, That, when a ſenſible object is brought too near, or laid upon the ſenſe, it not only hinders, but takes away the preſent ſenſation. This holds a proportion in rational actings: the nearer any one is to us in relation, the harder it is to fix counſel upon him; and becauſe we are neareſt to our ſelves, therefore it is hardeſt of all to counſel our ſelves.

Our Saviour Chriſt prevents what he foreſaw ſome ready to object againſt him (Luke 4. 23.) Ye will ſurely ſay unto me this Proverb, Phyſitian heal thy ſelf. The Proverb in its Original is (I conceive) to be underſtood perſonally; but as Chriſt ſuggeſts it there, it is to be underſtood Nationally, or Provincially, Heal thy ſelf, is, heal thy own Countrey; exerciſe thy power of working miracles there, as well as thou haſt done it in other places; that this is the meaning of it, appears plainly by the next words, Whatſoever we have heard done in Canaan, do alſo in thine own Countrey: For Chriſt as yet had wrought no mighty works of healing there (Mark 6. 5.) But why was Chriſt ſo ſlow in manifeſting himſelf to his own Countreymen? He gives the reaſon (Verſ. 24.) And he ſaid, Verily I ſay unto you, no Prophet is accepted in his own Countrey: The Goſpel of Mark (Chap. 6. 4.) adds two cloſer relations, His own Kin, and his own Houſe: They in a mans houſe are nearer to him then his kindred abroad; and his kindred are nearer to him then his Countrey-men; now among theſe, a Prophet hath no honour: They know him ſo much, that they do not reſpect him, or his ſayings. The Jews ſaid, Is not this the Carpenter, the Son of Mary, the Brother of James, &c. Chriſt being thus near to them, had little honour among them. Now for as much, as a man is nearer to himſelf, not only then his Countrey-men, but then any of his Kin; therefore his own counſels and comforts have ordinarily ſo little effect upon himſelf; he is not accept in his own breaſt, There are ſome indeed ſo gracious, or great in their own eyes, that they will ask counſel of none but themſelves, nor follow any advice but their own; but uſually man ſeeks out, as being neither able to ſatisfie his own doubts, nor abate his own ſorrows, though poſſibly more able for both, then he to whom he ſeeks. Though I ſpeak, my grief is not aſſwaged; and though I forbear, what am I eaſed?

Some conceive Job ſpeaking here like an Orator, who ſeems to ſtand in doubt what to do, and threfore trembles out his Preface in ſuch words as theſe, Shall I ſpeak, or ſhall I be ſilent? Shall I open my lips, or ſhall I forbear? Job's pain received no check which way ſoever of theſe theſe he took, and therefore it ſeemed vain to attempt either.

Eloquar an ſileam? Quid agã? Si locutus fuero, &c. Vulg.

Nunc eo re, redierunt, ut quo me vertam neſciam aut quid agam, nam nec loquendo nec tacendo quicquam proficio. Merc.

Though I ſpeak.] That is, If I ſtand up in my juſt defence to anſwer, and take away your Objections, yet my grief is not anſwered; that is as buſie with me, and as talkative as ever it was; yea, then you object my impatience under ſufferings, as an argument of my ſin.

And though I forbear.] That is, If I bite in my pain, and ſpeak not, if I ſtand mute, as attentive to hear you ſpeak, yet my ſorrow moves not; yea, then you judge my ſilence an argument of my ſecret guilt, and that all is true which you have ſaid againſt me, becauſe I ſay nothing for my ſelf. Thus,

What am I eaſed? Saith the Text in our tranſlation? The Hebrew ſaith, What goeth from me? That is, What of my pain, what of my ſorrow goeth away from me, when I ceaſe, or forbear to ſpeak? So that,

The general ſence of this Verſe is to ſhew that his troubles were paſt hope of redreſs; they found no cure; none by ſpeech, none by ſilence: Grief is ſometimes eaſed by ſpeaking, ſometimes by ſilence, either our own or others.

To ſay nothing is a medicine for ſome mens ſorrow: the ſorrow of others cannot be medicin'd, but by ſaying much: A plaiſter of words hath cured many a wound, and the more words have been uſed, the more ſome wounds have feſtered, and the anguiſh of them hath increaſed.

> Hence Obſerve, There is no means of remedy left for that evil which is not remedied by the uſe and tryal of contrary means.

If neither ſpeech nor ſilence eaſe a mans mind, what can? We find ſuch a kind of arguing (though in a different caſe) uſed by Chriſt (Mat. 11. 16,17.) Where when he would ſhew how impoſſible, or at leaſt how extreamly difficult it was to pleaſe the Jews (they were a humorous people, and let a man put himſelf in what poſture he would, they would find ſome fault, or have ſomewhat to object againſt him) Whereunto (ſaith Chriſt) ſhall I liken this generation? (they were ſo untoward, that Chriſt ſpeaks as if he were ſtraitened, how to find out a fit compariſon for them, or could ſcarce tell to what they were like; yet he tells us) They are like unto children ſitting in the markets, and calling to their fellows, ſaying, We have piped and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not lamented. When a man will neither mourn with us, nor rejoyce with us, what ſhall we do with him? How ſhall we pleaſe him? For what company is he fit? That ſuch was the tendency of this ſimilitude, appears plainly in the application which Chriſt makes (Verſ. 18.) For John came neither eating, nor drinking, and they ſay he hath a Devil: They did not like the mournful, auſtere courſe of John: The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they ſaid, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of Publicans and ſinners: They did not like the free converſe of Chriſt. When a people are of this ſpirit, or at this lock, that neither a man who is affable and courteous, ready both to receive, and give civilities, is welcome to them, nor yet he who is auſtere, and reſerved, cloſe and ſtrict in his way, can give them any content, who, or what can content them? When neither piping nor mourning, when neither dancing nor ſorrowing takes with us, what can? When we would deſcribe a perſon, whoſe troubleſomeneſs of ſpirit ſeems unanſwerable, we ſay of him, He is quiet neither full nor faſting: That is, He is never quiet, or nothing can make him quiet. Abraham ſaith to his Nephew Lot (Gen. 13, 8, 9.) Let there be no ſtrife I pray thee, between me and thee, and between thy Herd-men and my Herd-men, for we are brethren, &c. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right, or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left. Now as it is an Argument of the ſweeteſt ſpirit, and faireſt diſpoſition, when a man is ready to take either hand, rather then break the peace; ſo it argues the ſowreſt ſpirit, and moſt untractable diſpoſition, when a man will neither go to the right hand nor to the left, when he will neither move forward nor backward; when he will neither give nor take, neither buy nor ſell, there is no dealing with ſuch a man, for he waves all the wayes of dealing.

Thus alſo we conclude a people incorrigible, who continue in their ſins, whether God ſmite or heal, whether he deliver them from, or deliver them up into the hand of judgments, becauſe theſe are the utmoſt bounds, or the extreams of all thoſe providential diſpenſations which God uſeth at any time to turn a people from their ſin.

Again, We ſay they are unperſwadeable, whom neither fair means, nor foul, can reduce; ſpeak them fair, they are naught; ſpeak them foul, they are naught ſtill; promiſe them good, they remain evil; threaten them with evil, they will not be good. You may carry it out in all experiments, whereſoever you find an evil frame of mind or body, or of affairs, which mends not, or doth not alter for the better, by the application of the other contrary, when the former hath been applyed without ſucceſs, you may write under it (as to humane helps) This is a deſperate caſe, a diſtemper incurable.

Yet further, Job in theſe words reflects upon his Friends; as if he had ſaid, Some men by complaining, and opening their ſoars to thoſe who viſit them in their affliction, find their Friends relieving them preſently with ſound counſel, and pouring the oyl of conſolation into their wounded ſpirits; but alaſs, it is not ſo with me, for whether I ſpeak or hold my peace, it is all one; ye are all againſt me, and are neither perſwaded by my ſpeech nor by my ſilence, to apply proper remedies for the aſſwaging of my grief, or the eaſing of my pains.

> Hence Note, It is the duty, and ſhould be the care of thoſe who viſit Friends in affliction, to pick ſomewhat out of what they ſay, or at leaſt to take occaſion from their ſilence, to adminiſter conſolation to their grieved minds.

When the Servants of Benhadad came to Ahab to ſue for their Maſters life; the Text ſaith (1 Kings 20. 33.) The men did diligently obſerve whether any thing would come from him (that is, whether any word of hope would come from Ahab) and they did haſtily catch it: And Ahab had no ſooner ſaid, He is my Brother; but they catcht at this word of comfort, they had what they lookt for, and ſaid, Thy Brother Benhadad. If thou owneſt him as a Brother, ſurely thou wilt not uſe him as an Enemy: There is (to the point in hand) a holy cunning in catching up words, which drop from the lips of men in affliction; and 'tis our wiſdom to make improvement of them.

As for inſtance, There was an ancient Profeſſor (as I have been informed) in much diſtreſs of conſcience, even to deſpair; he complaining bitterly of his miſerable condition to a Friend, let this word fall, That which troubles me moſt, is, that God will be diſhonoured by my fall: This word was haſtily catcht at, and turned upon him to the aſſwaging of his grief, Art thou careful of the honour of God, and doſt thou think God hath no care of thee, and of thy ſalvation? A ſoul forſaken of God regards not what becomes of the honour of God: Therefore be of good cheer; if Gods heart were not towards thee, thine could not be towards God, or towards the remembrance of his Name. Thus words ſhould be watcht, yea, and ſilence ſhould be watcht for advantages to eaſe a diſtreſſed ſoul.

Laſtly, Theſe words may refer to God; as if Job had ſaid, Whether I ſpeak, or whether I forbear, God doth not come in to my help, I find no comfort from him; he puts no ſtop to my pain, nor doth he aſſwage the floods of grief which are ready to ſwallow me up. He gives me no eaſe at my complaining cryes, nor doth he give me any at my patient ſilence. The next Verſe ſeems moſt ſutable to this expoſition, where Job applyes himſelf to God, ſhewing what he did to him, both while he ſpake, and while he held his peace; he wearied him ſtill, and left him in a wearied condition.

Verſe 7. But now he hath made me weary, thou haſt made deſolate all my company.

We may ſee (in this context) that the ſpirit of Job was much troubled, by the troubledneſs of his ſpeech. At this ſeventh Verſe he ſpeaks in the third Perſon, He hath made me weary: And before he gets to the end of it, he ſpeaks in the ſecond Perſon, Thou haſt made deſolate: In the eighth Verſe, Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles: In the ninth Verſe, He teareth me in his wrath: The tenth Verſe is Plural, They have gaped upon me: Strange kind of Grammar, ſometimes in the third Perſon, ſometimes in the ſecond, ſometimes in the Singular, ſometimes in the Plural number; His mind was uneven; or unſetled, and ſo was his diſcourſe. We muſt not play the Criticks with the words of man in pain, nor ſubmit their ſentences to a Deſk of Grammarians: Broken language, and incongruities of ſpeech, do well enough become broken hearts, and wounded ſpirits: God will not call his Scholars in the School of affliction to the Ferula for ſuch faults or falſe Latine falling from their mouthes, either in prayer or conferences, while their hearts are true, and the language of their ſpirits pure.

But now he hath made me weary.

But now.] Now, is not here a Particle of time only, or a ſpecification of the ſeaſon, noting that then God either began, or ſtill continued to make him weary; but it carries alſo a ſtrong aſſeveration, or the certainty of the thing; as in that promiſſory exhortation (Hag. 2. 4.) Yet now be ſtrong, O Zerubbabel, ſaith the Lord, and be ſtrong, O Joſhua. Though you ſee things yet below expectation, though this be a day of ſmall things, yet take heart and encourage your ſelves to carry on this reforming work. Yet now be ſtrong, even now, when ſo many things might weaken both your hearts and hands, and be ye aſſured that I will not reject your confidence, but will cauſe you to proſper in it. And in promiſes, beſides the certainty of the thing promiſed, and the ſpeedy fulfilling of them, it intimates much ſweetneſs of affection in him that makes the promiſe. On the contrary, in threatenings, and comminations, beſides the certainty and ſpeed of them, it notes the ſharpneſs and ſeverity of his ſpirit, who gives thoſe threats. So (Iſa. 5. 5.) And now go to, I will tell you what I will do to my Vineyard. Now, go too, is chiding chear. As if the Lord had thus rated them; What? Have you ſerved me thus, as ſure as I formerly planted and hedged this Vineyard, ſo ſurely will I now pull down the hedge, and root it up. In this fulneſs of ſence take it here, But now he hath made me weary; certainly, or of a truth he hath; I was once ſweetly and ſtrongly hedged about with mercy, But now he hath made me weary and deſolate.

He hath made me weary.] He, is not expreſſed in the Hebrew, and therefore there is a doubt who is meant by this He.

Nunc autem oppreſſit me dolor meus. Vulg.

Some underſtand it of his grief and ſorrow, and read it thus, But now it hath made me weary; my pain hath tyred me.

Secondly, Others underſtand it of what had been ſpoken by his Friends; your tedious diſcourſes, and ſeverer cenſures have quite ſpent my ſpirits, and made me weary.

Our Tranſlation leads us to a perſon, and our Interpretation leads us to God; He, that is, God, hath made me weary. Job every where acknowledgeth, that God was the Author and Orderer of all his ſorrows: Now he Hath made me [weary] Or, He hath wearied me; it is but one word, and it ſignifies not an ordinary wearineſs, nor ſuch a wearineſs as comes upon us after a turn or two in the Fields: A man who walks into the air, to refreſh himſelf, may come home weary; but it notes ſuch wearineſs as we feel after long and tedious travel, or after a hard journey; yea, it notes not only wearineſs of body, but the wearineſs of the mind. It is poſſible for a man to weary his body, and yet his mind remain unmoved; bare outward action ſtirs not the mind. To ride, to run, to dig, or threſh, weary the body, not the mind; but thoſe works which with action have contention in them, as to argue, and diſpute, do at once exerciſe and weary both mind and body. The wearineſs of the mind is the moſt painful wearineſs: Job's wearineſs takes in both; Thou haſt wearied my body, and wearied my mind too; I am full of ſores without, and of ſorrow within. And ſuch was that wearineſs ſpoken of by the Prophet (Iſa. 47. 13.) Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counſels: That is, In going long journeys, to ask counſel of thy adored Wiſe men, or Wizzards rather, of Southſayers, and Diviners; in this purſuit thou haſt laboured thy body, and vexed thy ſoul, but profited neither. After all thy travels what haſt thou brought home but wearineſs? Tyred fleſh, and a tyred ſpirit, is all the fruit of our addreſſes for comfort to any but God, or in the way of God.

Sept. Exponunt de defectu rationis q. d. vix præ dolore ſum mei compos.

The Septuagint tranſlate yet higher, Thou haſt made me mad, or beſide my ſelf: The Hebrew word ſignifies to diſtract, or to put one out of his wits: As if Job had ſaid, I am ſcarce my own man, being over-burdened with thoſe ſorrows God hath laid upon me.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, A ſtate of affliction is a weariſome eſtate.

A man may be wearied who never ſtirs foot from the place where he ſtands or ſits. O the wearineſs of a ſick bed! Suffering wearies more then doing; and none are ſo weary as they who are wearied with doing nothing.

Obſerve Secondly, Some afflictions are a wearineſs both to ſoul and body.

There are afflictions which ſtrike quite through; and there are afflictions which are only ſkin-deep: As there is a filthineſs of the fleſh, and a filthineſs of the ſpirit, properly ſo called (for though every ſin of the fleſh, or outward man, defile the ſpirit, yet there are many filthineſſes of the ſpirit, which are never acted by the fleſh, or outward man.) Thus the Apoſtle diſtinguiſheth (2 Cor. 7. 1.) There are alſo ſome filthineſſes which ſtrike quite through fleſh and ſpirit, body and ſoul. Thus there are ſome afflictions which are meerly upon the fleſh; there are other afflictions which are purely upon the ſpirit; the skin is whole, the body is in health, but the ſoul is wounded, an Arrow ſticks within: And there are a ſort of afflictions which ſtrike quite through body and ſoul; as old Simeon tells the Virgin Mary, A Sword ſhall pierce through thy ſoul (Luke 2. 35.) Or as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks of Joſeph (Pſal. 105. 18.) according to the letter of the Hebrew, Whoſe feet they hurt with fetters, his ſoul came into iron, or the iron entred into his ſoul: Such afflictions are like the Roll ſpoken of by the Prophet Ezekiel (Chap. 2.) Written with lamentations, mourning, and woe, within and without: Some woes are written only without, ſome woes are written only within, others are written without and within. Their characters are legible upon the fleſh; and their effects deſcend and ſink into the ſpirit. Job's afflictions were of this extenſion, he was ſmitten all over, and written quite through with woes and lamentations.

Thirdly, As the word reacheth the diſtemper of the brain.

Obſerve, Some afflictions do not only afflict, but unſettle the mind.

They unſettle not only the comforts, but the powers and faculties of it: A man under ſome afflictions can ſcarce ſpeak ſence while he acts faith, or do rationally while he lives graciouſly.

A ſoul that hath grace, yea much grace, may appear much ſcanted in the uſe of reaſon: As oppreſſion (from men) makes a wiſe man mad (Eccleſ. 7. 7.) And the more wiſe a man is, the more mad it makes him: Fools can bear oppreſſion, and not be troubled much, becauſe they do not underſtand what juſtice and right means; and that's the reaſon why in thoſe parts of the World where Tyrants reign, they love to keep the people ignorant, poor, and low, for ſuch are not much ſenſible of their oppreſſions; but oppreſſion is very grievous to an ingenious, wiſe, and underſtanding man, and therefore 'tis ſaid to make him mad: The pureſt intellectuals have the quickeſt ſenſe of injuries. Thus alſo ſome afflictions from the hand of God may (in a degree) make a godly wiſe man mad, and put him for a preſent plunge beyond the command of his underſtanding. It is the confeſſion of holy David (Pſal. 73. 22.) I was even as a beaſt before thee, ſo fooliſh was I and ignorant: If David a godly man acted below reaſon, when he ſaw the proſperity of the wicked; how much more may a godly man act below reaſon, under the feelings of his own adverſity. Heman is expreſs in this (Pſal. 88. 15.) While I ſuffer thy terrors I am diſtracted: Yet the word in the Pſalm doth not ſignifie properly the diſtraction of a man that is mad, but the diſtraction of a man that is in doubt; or the diſtraction of a man who knows not what to do, not of a man who knows not what he doth, and yet that diſtraction doth often lead to a degree of this; for a man who is much troubled to know what to do, and cannot know it, grows at laſt to do he knows not what. We may alſo take in that about diſtraction ariſing from affliction, which was toucht about diſtraction cauſed by oppreſſion: Thoſe Chriſtians, who are higheſt in ſpirituals, and have the quickeſt ſenſe of Gods diſpenſations towards them, do ſooneſt fall into it; whereas a ſoul upright in the main, yet being of weak and low parts, and of ſmall experience in the things of God, will go, yea groan under a heavy burden of affliction all his dayes, and not be much moved with it.

Affliction is the burthen which God layes upon us, and it is our duty, not only to bear it, but to bear it with contentedneſs; yea we ſhould labor to bear it with joyfulneſs. My brethren (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 1.) Account it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; that is, Into divers afflictions. But yet the beſt cannot alwayes rejoyce in temptations, nor triumph under a croſs; when affliction according to that deſcription of the word (*Heb.*4.12.) comes quick and powerful, as a two edged Sword, and pierceth to divide between the ſoul and the ſpirit, the joynts and the marrow, when affliction (I ſay) cuts to the quick, a Believer is put hard to it; he may be ſo far (for a time) from triumphing and rejoycing, that he can ſcarcely find himſelf contented or patient; his burden may cauſe him to cry out, O, the wearineſs!

Carnal men cry out at every burden of duty in the ſervice of God, O what a wearineſs is it! They are tired with an hours attendance in holy things; O the burthen! Much more do they cry out under the lighter burdens of affliction. How tedious is a day, or an hour of affliction; two or three fits of an ague, an aking tooth, a ſoar finger, O what a wearineſs is this! They ſink preſently. True Believers, as they have more patience in doing, ſo in ſuffering; yet even their patience doth not alwayes hold out; they, as Job, ſpeak ſometimes mournfully, and complainingly: But now, he hath made us weary.

Thou haſt made deſolate all my company.

Quod loquitur nunc in ſecūda nunc in tertia perſona nihil in ſententia mutat id quod admodum frequēs eſt in Scriptura Pined.

It was He in the firſt clauſe, Thou in the ſecond; he and thou are the ſame perſon in Jobs Grammar, as was toucht before.

שמם Vaſtari ſeu deſolari, ita ut videntes obſtupeſcant & horreant.

Thou haſt made [deſolate.] The word Shamam, ſignifies to waſte, and deſtroy, and that not by an ordinary deſtruction, but ſo to deſtroy, as works the beholders into amazement and wonder: This word ſignifies both to wonder, and to deſtroy; becauſe great deſtructions cauſe wonder.

Thou haſt made deſolate [all my company:] Thou haſt made ſuch a deſolation among them, that all who are about me lift up their hands (as we ſay) and bleſs themſelves, admiring to ſee this day. God brought ſuch a deſolation upon Jeruſalem, as ſet the World a wondering (*Lam.*4.12.) The Kings of the Earth, and all the Inhabitants of the World would not have believed, that the Adverſary and the Enemy ſhould have entered into the Gates of Jeruſalem: Chriſt will come (at laſt with ſuch mercies) to be glorified in his Saints, as will cauſe him to be admired in all them that believe (2 *Theſ.*1.10.) He now comes ſometimes with ſuch afflictions to his Saints, as eaſily cauſe them who believe much more thoſe who believe not to admire. Thou haſt wonderfully deſolated, or waſted,

Et in nihilū redacti ſunt omnes artus mei. Vulg.

All my [company.] The word which we tranſlate Company, is rendred, The joynts or members of the body by the Vulgar Latine, Thou haſt reduced all my members to nothing: As if he had ſaid, Thou haſt looſened the whole compages, or ſtructure of my bones and body, thou haſt untied, or cut aſunder all the ligaments that held me together. This tranſlation is but an alluſion; becauſe the members of the natural body are like a company of men joyned together in a civil or ſpiritual body, which is therefore commonly called a Corporation. Some contend much for this ſenſe, Thou haſt made deſolate all the members of my body: Eſpecially, becauſe the ſcattering of his Family doth not ſo well agree, or comply (ſay they) with the wearineſs before complained of, nor with the leanneſs, and wrinkles, which are ſpoken of afterward; both which belong properly to the body.

Yet I paſs that, and take the word as we read it, to expreſs a diſtinct affliction, thou haſt wearied me in my perſon, and haſt made deſolate all my company; What company?

q. d. deſolaſti omnē Synagogā meā. Bold.

Firſt, Some underſtand it of the company which uſed to flock to his Synagogue, in holy duties, and exerciſes: As if he had anſwered the words of Eliphaz (*Chap.*15.34.) The Congregation (or Company) of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate: Here, ſaith Job, I grant it, God hath made deſolate all my company. The Synagogues, and places of publick meeting were wont to be filled, but now that reſort is ſtayed, they are all ſcattered, or diverted, and thoſe publick places are filled with howlings and lamentations. Thus he grants Eliphaz what he had objected, and yet denies what he thence inferred, that he was an Hypocrite.

Secondly, Rather, interpret it of the company he had in his own Houſe, or for his particular Family. So it is a renewed complaint of the loſs of his Children and Servants, of his Friends and Familiars, who uſed to reſort to him, and ſtay about him.

Thou haſt made deſolate all my company: Some of Job's company were made deſolate; that is, they were deſtroyed; moſt of his Servants were ſlain by the Chaldeans, and Sabeans, and all his Children were ſlain by the fall of a Houſe (*Chap.*1.) This company was made deſolate indeed: Yet when he ſaith, Thou haſt made deſolate all my company, his meaning is, as Mr. Broughton tranſlates, Thou haſt made me deſolate of all my company; that is, I am left alone.

Hence Obſerve, The company of Children, and Friends, is a very great mercy.

Heman complains much when he wanted this mercy, Lover and Friend haſt thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkneſs. Job makes, as a more particular, ſo a more pathetical enumeration of this loſs (Chap. 19.13, 14.) To be deſolate, is ſo great an affliction. that it is often put for all afflictions; and to be deſolate of company, is the worſt deſolateneſs. When David had ſaid, I am deſolate and afflicted, he preſently adds, The ſorrows of my heart are enlarged (*Pſal.*25.16, 17.) A man may be much afflicted, and yet not deſolate, but a man cannot be at all deſolate, but he muſt be extreamly afflicted. When the Prophet would put all the miſeries of the Jews into one word, he puts it into this (*Iſa.*1.7.) Your Countrey is deſolate, your Land ſtrangers ſhall devour it in your preſence: And when a Land is devoured of ſtrangers, either it is made deſolate of its own company, or its own company is made deſolate. Babylon boaſts (*Revel.*18.7.) I ſit a Queen, and am no widow; that is, as I have power, ſo I have reſort and company enough, I am not deſolate: The Apoſtle puts theſe two together, Widow-hood, and Deſolateneſs (1 *Tim.*5.5.) Now, ſhe that is a widow and deſolate, &c. So that when Babylon ſaith, I am no widow, her meaning is, I am not deſolate; and hence the puniſhment of Babylon is threatned in this language (*Revel.*17.16.) The ten horns which thou ſaweſt upon the Beaſt, theſe ſhall hate the Whore, and make her deſolate, &c.

Thoſe ten horns are ten Kings, who ſometime doted upon the painted beauty of that Whore, and then made frequent addreſſes to her, and did throng about her from all parts of the World; but when once their eyes ſhall be opened, their hearts will ſoon be alienated; They ſhall hate the Whore. And then as they withdraw affection, ſo viſits and meſſages; Babylons Courts ſhall be crouded with Suiters no longer: Thus they ſhall make her deſolate of the company of her old friends, before they make her deſolate by bringing in new enemies, who ſhall ſtrip her, not only of her company, but of her cloathes, yea of her skin; they ſhall make her naked, and eat her fleſh, and burn her with fire (*Revel.*17.16.) Thus, as the miſery which came upon Jeruſalem, ſo the miſery which ſhall come upon Babylon meet in this, The making of their company deſolate: yet in this they differ, the deſolations of Jeruſalem ſhall be (at leaſt myſtically) repaired, but the deſolations of myſtical Babylon (when they are fully come upon her) ſhall be irreparable.

Man is naturally (as the Philoſopher calls him) a ſociable creature, he loves company; they who are for a ſolitary life, Monks and Anchorets, ſeem to have put off the nature of man. There is an elective aloneneſs, or retiredneſs, at ſometimes very uſeful for contemplation and prayer, And we are never leſs alone, then when we are ſo alone; for then God is more ſpecially with us, and we with him. It is ſaid of Jacob (*Gen.*32.24.) Then Jacob was left alone, not that Jacob's company had left and forſaken him, but that Jacob for a time had left his company: So, ſome render the Text actively, He ſtayed, or remained alone. Jacob ſtayed alone purpoſely, that he might have freer communion with God in that receſs and retirement from the creature: It is good for man to be alone from the company of man, that he may enjoy (more fully) the preſence of God.

Yet God himſelf ſaid at the firſt when man was created, It is not good for man to be alone: There was no moral evil in that aloneneſs (for when God ſpake this word, there was no ſuch evil in the viſible World) but God called it evil, becauſe it was ſo incovenient for the civil well-being and inconſiſtent with the natural propagation of man. And therefore as in reference to both theſe evils, God ſaid with his own mouth, It is not good for man to be alone; ſo in reference to the former of the two, God ſaid by Solomon, Two is better then one, and wo to him that is alone (*Eccleſ.*4.9,10.) Job puts his aloneneſs among his woes, Thou haſt made deſolate all my company.

But it may be ſaid, Had Job no company? Were not his Friends about him? Did not theſe three come to mourn with him, and to comfort him? And had they not been in diſcourſe with him all this while?

Yes, he had company, but it was not ſuitable company; he had evil ones about him, as he complains (Chap. 19. & *Chap.*30.) and though his three Friends were good men, yet to him they were no good company, becauſe ſo unpleaſant in their converſe with him.

Hence Note, Some company is a burthen.

We ſay of many men, We had rather have their room then their company. Man loves company, but 'tis the company of thoſe he loves. The comfort of our lives depends much upon ſociety, but more upon the ſuitableneſs of ſociety: It is better to dwell in the corner of a houſe top, then with a brawling Woman in a wide houſe (Prov. 21. 9.) And it is better to be in a Deſert among wilde Beaſts, then in a populous City among beaſtly men. This made the Prophet deſire a lodging in the Wilderneſs (*Jer.*9.2.) The Countrey about Sodom was pleaſant, like the Garden of God, yet how was the righteous ſoul of Lot vexed with the filthy and unrighteous converſation of the Sodomites? How uneaſie are our lives made to us by dwelling among either falſe Friends or open Enemies?

In the Creation, when God ſaid, It is not good for man to be alone; he ſubjoyns, Let us make him a help meet for him. Adam had all the beaſts of the earth about him, but they were no company for him, man knows not how to converſe with beaſts, or employ his reaſon with thoſe that have none. As, it is not good for man to be alone, ſo to be in company that is not meet for him is as bad, or worſe then to be alone. Therefore ſaith God, Let us make him a help meet for him; the making of a Woman brought in meet company for mankind; yet ſome men are as unmeet company for men as beaſts are, and are therefore in Scripture called Beaſts. Paul fought with ſuch beaſts at Epheſus; there are few places free of them, and many places are full of them. David crys out, Wo is me that I am conſtrained to dwell in Meſech, &c.

There was company enough, but it was woful company. The Primitive Saints aſſociated themſelves, they continued in fellowſhip one with another, as well as in the Apoſtles Doctrine, or in breaking of bread and prayer (Acts 2:42.) They were all of one mind, and were therefore fit to make one body. The communion and fellowſhip of the Saints, is the lower heaven of Saints. And the making of ſuch a company deſolate, is the ſaddeſt deſolation that can be made on earth: Communion of Saints in Heaven, is one great acceſſion to the joy of Heaven. And 'tis a great comfort to the Saints in the midſt of all the ill neighbourhood which they meet with here, to remember that they ſhall meet with no ill neighbours there; none but Friends there, none but loving Friends. There ſhall not be a croſs thought, much leſs a croſs word or action among thoſe many millions of glorified Saints for ever; nor ſhall there be any among them there but Saints; no tares in that field, nor chaff in that floor, no Goats in that Fold, no nor any Wolves in Sheep-skins, no prophane ones there, no nor any Hypocrites there. Unſutable company would render our lives miſerable in Heaven it ſelf. If God ſhould ſay to the godly and the wicked (as David once did to Mephiboſheth and Ziba, Thou and Ziba divide the Land) divide Heaven among you; might not they anſwer (with reverence) as Mephiboſheth did to David, Nay let them take it all to themſelves, O our ſouls come not into their ſecret, and unto their aſſembly let not our honour be joyned: if Swearers, Adulterers, Lyers, ſhould be our company in Heaven, Heaven it ſelf, were unheaven'd, and everlaſting life would be an everlaſting death. And that which further argues the burthenſomneſs of unſutable company, is, that even wicked men themſelves cannot but confeſs that they are burthened with the company of thoſe who are good; if ſuch come in preſence where they aſſociate in any ſinful converſe, how weary are they of their company? How do they even ſweat at the ſight of them? And how glad are they when ſuch turn their backs, and are gone: the only reaſon why they like them not, is becauſe they are not like them, and they are not good company, becauſe they are good. All company is made deſolate to us, which is not made ſuitable to us. Job had many about him, yet he complains, Thou haſt made deſolate all my company.

Job goes on yet to deſcribe his troubles; he wanted deſireable company about him, but he had ſtore of witneſſes againſt him; he was emptied of his comforts, but filled with ſorrows, as might be ſeen in the ſymptoms and effects of ſorrow.

Verſ. 8. Thou haſt filled me with wrinckles, which is a witneſs againſt me: and my leanneſs riſing up in me, beareth witneſs to my face.

As if he had ſaid, Though I hold my peace, and ſay nothing, though I do not aggravate my grief, yea though I ſhould extenuate and hide it, yet there are witneſſes enow of it; my wrinkles ſpeak my grief, and my leanneſs ſhews that I am feaſted with the ſowre herbs of ſorrow: That's the general ſenſe of this Verſe.

Si vellem cælare aut verbis extenuare dolorē meũ rugæ meæ teſtimonium dant, &c.

Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles.] It is but one word in the Hebrew, we might render it, Thou haſt wrinkled me; or as Mr. Broughton, Thou haſt made me all wrinkled. The word is not found in this ſenſe any where elſe in Scripture; but very frequently among the Rabbins. There are alſo two other ſignifications of it which Interpreters have taken in here.

קמט Rugas contraxit active corrugavit.

First, It ſignifies, To cut off, or to cut down (*Chap.*22.15, 16.) Haſt thou marked the old way which wicked men have troden? Which were cut down out of time: That old way was the way of ſin (the way of holineſs is the oldeſt way, but the way of ſin is a very old way.) They who have trod the way of ſin, were cut down by judgment, and they were cut down out of time; that is, the courſe of Divine Juſtice prevented the courſe of nature and ſtruck them to death before death uſeth to ſtrike. So ſome render it here, and then the ſenſe riſeth thus, Thou haſt cut me down by the ſtroke of theſe afflictions, and this is a witneſs againſt me.

ותקמטני & corrugaſti me. Non alibi quã in hoc libro in ſcriptura reperitur. Quod ſuccidiſti me, teſtimonio eſt. Merc.

Secondly, The word according to the Chaldee, ſignifies to bind, and faſten one with Cords, or with fetters of Iron, as Malefactors are bound in Priſon (*Prov.*5.22.) His own iniquity ſhall take the wicked, and he ſhall be holden with the Cords of his ſin. The Hebrew word which we render to hold, or faſten, is expreſſed by this of Job in the Chaldee Paraphraſe. Taking this ſenſe of the word, the interpretation given of the whole is, Thou haſt bound, or ſtraitened me with the cords of my affliction, leſt I ſhould get out, or make an eſcape, and this is a witneſs againſt me: There is a truth in both theſe readings, as to this place; but becauſe wrinkles are more proper to the leanneſs which follows, therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon them, but keep to our own reading.

In ſignificatione Chaldaica exponitur pro ligare & cõſtringere.

Quod his dolorũ vinculis conſtrictum me tenes, ne quã elabi queam, teſtimonium fecit in me. Merc.

Thou haſt filled me with [wrinkles.] Wrinckles are cauſed two wayes.

Firſt, Through old age; for then the moiſture of the body being conſumed, and ſo the skin contracted, wrinckles appear: Theſe natural wrinckles cannot be avoided, if nature hold out to old age.

Secondly, There are accidental wrinckles, ſuch as are cauſed by ſtrong diſeaſes, which ſucking up, or drawing out the moiſture of the body, fade the beauty of it. Great ſickneſſes haſten on gray hairs, and make a young man look old. Job was not filled with the wrinckles of old age (he was in the ſtrength of nature at that time) but he was filled with the wrinckles of ſickneſs and ſorrow; grief had made furrows in his face, and his tears had often filled them: we commonly ſay, Sorrow is dry; 'tis ſo, becauſe it is a drier. Solomon tells us, that A merry heart doth good like a medicine, but a broken ſpirit (which is the effect of much ſorrow) drieth up the bones (Prov. 17.22.) The Church crys out in the Book of Lamentations, My fleſh my skin he hath made old (Lam. 3.4.) How did God make them old? He made them old not by giving them many years, but by giving them many troubles. Many troubles in one year, will make a man older then many years.

We have heard of ſome, whoſe hearts being filled with vexing cares have filled their heads with gray hairs in a very ſhort time. As ſome have an Art to ripen Fruits, before nature ripens them; ſo the Lord hath a power to haſten old age, before nature makes us old. Thou haſt made my skin old; that is, full of wrinckles and leanneſs; theſe are the liveries which old age gives. The Apoſtle aſſures us, that Chriſt ſhall one day preſent the Church to himſelf, in the perfection of ſpiritual beauty and glory; that beauty and glory is deſcribed by the removal of that from her ſpiritual eſtate, which Job complains of in his temporal eſtate: Job was full of ſpots and wrinkles, but ſhe ſhall appear, Not having ſpot or wrinckle (Epheſ. 5.27.) that is, Without any note or mark of old age upon her. A ſpot defaceth the beauty of a Garment, and wrinckles ſpoil the beauty of the face. An old Garment is full of ſpots, and an old face is full of wrinkles. Old things paſs away when we are made new creatures by grace; yet in that ſtate (becauſe we are not perfectly freed from the old man) our garments have ſome ſpots, and our faces ſome wrinkles upon them: But in the ſtate of glory, when all old things, even all the image of the old Adam ſhall be totally aboliſhed, we ſhall not have ſo much as one ſpot or one wrinkle. Believers have now a righteouſneſs in Chriſt without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; they ſhall then have a holineſs in themſelves, without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; that is, They ſhall not only not have any ſpot or wrinkle upon them, but they ſhall have nothing like it, nothing which hath any relation to it, nothing which either themſelves or others ſhall miſtake for it, they ſhall neither ſuſpect nor be ſuſpected to have a ſpot or a wrinkle about them. A perfect ſoul-ſtate, and a perfect ſtate of body, hath no wrinkle in it. Job to ſhew the decays and blemiſhes of his body, ſaith he was full of wrinkles.

Again, Theſe wrinkles by an elegant metaphor may refer to his whole outward condition: For as a mans face is wrinkled when he grows old, ſo are his riches when he grows poor, and ſo is his honour when he grows out of repute. Poverty is the wrinkle of riches, and diſgrace is the wrinkle of honour; we may take in all three here, for not only was Job's body, but his wealth and honour were extreamly wrinkled, and therefore he had great cauſe to cry out according to all the interpretations, Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles.

Which witneſs againſt me.] I ſhall give the meaning of that, when I have opened the latter clauſe, where it is repeated, My leanneſs riſing up in me, beareth witneſs to my face: both parts of the Verſe have the ſame meaning.

My leanneſs riſing up in me.] Some think, that Job anſwers what Eliphaz had given, as part of the deſcription of a wicked man, in the fulneſs of his proſperity (Chap. 15.27.) where he tells us, that, He covereth his face with fatneſs, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks; as if he had ſaid, Friend Eliphaz, thou haſt told me, that wicked men are fat and full, if ſo, what are they who are lean and meagre? canſt thou according to thy own rule, read wickedneſs in my phyſiognomie? My leanneſs riſeth up in me, canſt thou raiſe an argument from that againſt me?

My leanneſs.] Job's body was lean, his Purſe and Name were lean, his leanneſs and his wrinkles were of the ſame extent, both reaching all his worldly concernments. The Lord threatens Idolaters (Zeph. 2.11.) that he will famiſh, or make lean (ſo we put in the Margin) all their Gods. Jehovah, the true God, who ſaith to man (Pſal. 50.12.) If I were hungry, I would not tell thee, tells theſe falſe Gods, that he will make them hungry: But what was the meat of theſe Gods? It was the honour and credit, the worſhip and ſervice which they had among men. Indeed they who deny the true God, his due honour and worſhip, do what they can to famiſh, or make him lean; and when the true God (as he hath done by the Preaching of the Goſpel) turns men from Idols to ſerve, and worſhip him the living God, then he famiſheth thoſe Gods: When Idols loſe their eſteem, their leanneſs riſeth up, and they go down. Thus alſo it is with man, his leanneſs may be ſaid to riſe when his credit falls.

Further, There is a twofold leanneſs.

First, Of the ſoul, or inward man.

Secondly, Of the body, or outward man.

When the Jews luſted in the Wilderneſs, and called for fleſh to ſatisfie the fleſh: God (ſaith the Text, Pſal. 106.15.) gave them their requeſt, but ſent leanneſs into their ſoul. The ſoul in a proper ſenſe, is neither fat nor lean, and therefore the ſoul in this place of the Pſalm, muſt be taken improperly, or elſe the leanneſs of it muſt. The ſoul is put improperly for the body, or for the whole man, and ſo, he ſent leanneſs into their ſouls, is, the curſe of God cauſed them to pine ſecretly, or he ſlew the fatteſt of them (openly) and ſmote down the choſen men in Iſrael: So this leanneſs is expounded (Pſal. 78.31.) as if he had ſaid, God made them a thin and a lean company before he had done with them. Yet beſides this (I conceive) the Text doth intend ſome ſpiritual judgment; and then the ſoul is taken in a proper ſenſe, but leanneſs in an improper ſenſe: and ſo, he ſent leanneſs into their ſouls, is, while they inordinately deſired meat for their bodies, God withheld the ordinary food of their ſouls: He did not adminiſter his grace and holy ſpirit (which are the fatners of the ſoul) while they were thus hungry after dainties for the fleſh.

Job's Friends thought him a lean ſoul, but he here confeſſes the leanneſs of his body; and in that his continual ſorrow the cauſe of it. So the Prophet crys out, My leanneſs, my leanneſs, wo unto me (Iſa. 24.16.)

My leanneſs [riſing up.] Fatneſs riſeth up, and not leanneſs, when a man grows lean, his fleſh falls and abates; skin and bone ſtick together, Why then doth he ſay, My leanneſs riſeth up?

Though, when a man is lean, his fleſh falls, yet his bones riſe: A fat mans bones are (as it were) buried in fleſh, you can ſcarce feel his ribs, but when he grows lean, his bones ſtick out, and riſe up: That is the meaning here, my leanneſs riſing up.

Job aſcribes a rational act, both to his wrinkles and to his leanneſs, as if both did ſpeak, and which is more, give evidence concerning him; he brings them forth as witneſſes at the bar, this ſpeaks, and that ſpeaks, he doubles it, My wrinkles witneſs againſt me, and my leanneſs riſing up witneſſeth to my face: When a witneſs is to give in his evidence in any cauſe before a Judge, he riſeth up, or ſtandeth forth, that all may ſee him; Job preſents his leanneſs in the proper poſture of a witneſs riſing up.

Maciei videtur dare perſonam ut paulo ante rugis.

The Original varies ſomewhat in the latter clauſe from the former; we render both by witneſſing, but we may read it thus, Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, that hath been, or is a witneſs, or (as M. Broughton reads) a proof, my leanneſs riſing up (or which riſeth up againſt me) anſwers (or ſpeaketh) to my face. The meaning is, Theſe outward evils are evidence enough to my Friends, that God is angry with me, and that I am wicked againſt God.

Job grants that thoſe wrinkles, and this leanneſs were witneſſes of his afflictions, he never queſtioned their teſtimony, as to that point, neither indeed could he. Jonadab ſaid to Amnon, Why art thou being the Kings Son, lean, or thin, from day to day, wilt thou not tell me? (2 Sam. 13.4.) His leanneſs told his Friends plain enough, that all was not well; he read that in his face, only he could not read the particular ilneſs there. If we ſee a young man, eſpecially the Son of a Great man, or of a King (who is waited upon with all worldly delights) wrinkled, and lean, is it not a witneſs that he hath been ſick, or is overwhelmed with ſorrow? theſe teſtifie to his face, he cannot conceal it.

But Job's Friends ſaid, theſe were witneſſes of his ſin: they produced the wrinkles of his body as a witneſs of his wrinkled ſoul; and the leanneſs of his outward man, as an argument of his inward leanneſs; they ſaid, theſe teſtified plainly, that he was not only a great ſinner, but an Hypocrite: And thus they argued all along, this was their conſtant plea; Job muſt needs be (according to this opinion) a man of an evil life, becauſe his life was filled with evils; Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, which is a witneſs againſt me, &c.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Great afflictions leave their marks behind them.

Little afflictions leave no wrinkles, no leanneſs behind them, we recover out of them, and nothing appears of them; as it is in ſinning, ſome ſins leave no mark, ſuch are our daily infirmities, and common failings; but there are other ſins, which leave a mark behind them, you cannot get them off ſuddenly, it may be you cannot claw off the marks of ſome ſins as long as you live: though the ſin be fully pardoned, yet the mark, the wrinkle, the leanneſs of it may remain to your dying day. David being defiled with adultery and murder, prays, Cauſe the bones which thou haſt broken to rejoyce: Thoſe two were ſuch ſins as broke his very bones; they were to his ſoul, as the breaking of a bone is to the body: If a man break a bone, though it be well Set, yet it leaves a mak. David carried the skar of thoſe ſins to his Grave: Though God had forgiven thoſe ſins, and did not remember them, to impute them to David, yet when God had occaſion to ſpeak of David to his higheſt commendation, he could not forbear the mention of thoſe ſins (1 Kings 15.5.) David did that which was right in the Lord, and turned not aſide from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, ſave only in the matter of Uriah. The wrinkle or ſtain of that ſin ſtuck upon David's reputation, when the guilt of it was quite removed, and waſhed off from his perſon. 'Tis ſo with afflictions, ſome afflictions leave no mark, others go deep: Though all afflictions are light comparatively to the weight of glory, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (2 *Cor.*4.17.) For our light affliction which is but for a moment, works for us a far more exceeding, and eternal weight of glory: Yet afflictions being compared among themſelves, ſome are light, and ſome are heavy: As a Cart that is heavy laden, cuts deep into the earth, and tells you where it hath gone; ſo doth the wheel of a heavy affliction drawn over body, ſoul, or ſtate.

Secondly, Obſerve (which is the natural theology of the Text.)

Wrinkles, and leanneſs in youth, or ſtrength of age are an argument of extraordinary ſorrow.

Thirdly, Take the words according to the ſenſe of Jobs friends, which Job alſo hints as meeting with their objection, They witneſs againſt me: that is, You uſe them, you bring them as witneſſes againſt me:

Then Note, Great afflictions are looked on as proofs, or witneſſes of great ſins.

We no ſooner hear of, or ſee a man under great afflictions, but our firſt thought is ſurely he hath committed ſome great ſin. This is almoſt every man's ſuſpicion; but it is an ill grounded ſuſpicion. This point was ſpoken to (Chap. 10. 17.) where Job tells the Lord, Thou haſt renewed thy witneſſes againſt me, &c. There 'twas ſhewed how afflictions are brought in by God and man as a witneſs; and this was the greateſt evidence, and (upon the matter) all the evidence which the Friends of Job brought againſt him, his wrinkles, and his leanneſs: I ſhall here only add this caution.

Take heed of paſſing judgment upon the evidence of ſuch witneſſes as theſe, wrinkles, and leanneſs; for though every wrinkle witneſſeth that a man is a ſinner (were it not for ſin we ſhould have remained ever in our body and outward condition, as Believers ſhall be reſtored by Chriſt, without a wrinkle) yet they are not witneſſes that a man is wicked: I may ſay two things of theſe witneſſes.

First, They are alwayes doubtful witneſſes.

Secondly, For the moſt part they are falſe witneſſes.

It is a very queſtionable and uncertain evidence which afflictions give againſt us: For no man knows love, or hatred, by all that is before him: We can but gueſs at the beſt, by what they ſay. But uſually they bear falſe witneſs againſt the innocent; ſo they did againſt Job; they witneſſed that of him to his Friends which was not right. Therefore the Vulgar tranſlates the latter branch (though not well to the letter of the Original, yet well as to the ſenſe) A falſe witneſs is riſen up againſt my face, contradicting me; that is, Oppoſing or weakning all that I have ſaid concerning my own innocence. Yea if we make affliction a witneſs, we may rather make it a witneſs of ſincerity, and of grace, a mark of adoption and ſonſhip, a mark of divine favour and fatherly love, then of man's wickedneſs, or of God's rejection and diſfavour. The word is clear and expreſs for this (*Heb.*12.6, 7,8.) For whom the Lord loveth he chaſteneth, and ſcourgeth every Son whom he receiveth, &c. But if ye be without chaſtiſement whereof all are partakers, then are ye Baſtards and not Sons. So then, our wrinkles and our leanneſs may upon Scripture warrant, be brought as witneſſes for us, but we have no warrant to conclude upon their witneſs, either againſt our ſelves, or others.

Rugæ meæ teſtimonium dicunt contra me, & ſuſcitatur falſiloquus adverſus faciē meā cōtradicēs mihi. Vulg.

But it ſeems Job had a higher witneſs againſt him (if ſuch witneſſes might be allowed) then a wrinkled skin, or a lean face: Behold now his torn fleſh, and his limbs rent in ſunder, as if (not only like Daniel) he had been caſt into a Lyons Den, but as if (which Daniel did not) he had felt the worſt of the Lyons teeth and pawes.

Verſ. 9. He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me; he gnaſheth upon me with his teeth, mine enemy ſharpeneth his eye upon me.

Strange language! He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me. Job gives us a deſcription of the Lords dealing with him, in alluſion to the fury of wild Beaſts, Lyons, Tygers, and Bears, who gnaſh their teeth, and ſparkle with their eyes. when they either fight one with another, or fall upon their prey.

He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me.

'Tis doubted whom Job meaneth by this Tearer: Some judge this Title applicable only to the Devil, and interpret Job ſpeaking of him; the Devil hateth me, He teareth me in his wrath: Job was delivered into the hand of the Devil (*Chap.*2.) And this is the courtſhip of Hell, He teareth.

Secondly, Others underſtand it of his extream pain and torturing diſeaſe, that tore him like a ſavage Beaſt.

A third expounds it of his Friends, as if he compared them to wild Beaſts, who in ſtead of comforting his ſpirit, did (upon the matter) tear his fleſh between their teeth.

Fourthly, 'Tis conceived, he means thoſe vain ones of whom he ſpeaks (Chap. 19.) that came about him, and troubled him.

But fifthly, and moſt generally, this Text is interpreted of God himſelf, He teareth me in his wrath who hateth me. For though Job ſpeaks here diſtractedly, diſcovering rather his grief then his enemy; or as a man wounded and ſmitten in the dark, he pereeives he hath an enemy, he feels the ſmart, and bears the blows, but he is not able to ſee who hurts him, yet in this confuſion of language, his heart was ſtill upon God who ordered, and diſpoſed all thoſe armies of ſorrow, which aſſaulted him on every ſide.

Ejuſmodi querimoniæ in neminem certo jactatæ afflicti hominis propriæ ſunt.

He [teareth] me in his wrath.] The Hebrew word Taraph is near in ſound to our Engliſh Tear, and it ſignifieth to tear as a Lyon his prey (*Gen.*49.9.) Judah is a Lyons whelp, from the prey my Son thou art gone up. The ſame word in the Verb notes Tearing, and in the Noun a prey, becauſe the prey is torn by the teeth, or claws of the Lyon.

טרף Ferarū prædā rapiētiū & lacerātiū propriū eſt.

He teareth me in his [wrath.] Wild Beaſts tear not ſo much for wrath, as for hunger; they tear out of a deſire to fill themſelves, rather then out of malice to deſtroy others. But Job ſaith, He teareth me in his wrath who [hateth] me.

The word ſignifies not an ordinary, but an inward hatred, and with the change of a letter it is the ſame by which the Devil is expreſſed, Satan, an adverſary, or the adverſary; ſo called becauſe of his extream hatred againſt mankind, yea againſt Chriſt himſelf. Job ſpeaks of God as if he bare ſuch a hatred againſt him as Satan doth, an inward perfect hatred.

שטם Eſt totis viribus adverſari, idē cū Satan, unde & Satanas dictus. Ira ſua rapit quaſi odio inteſtino proſequatur me. Jun.

Thus ſome tranſlate, He proſecutes me with inward hatred: A hard expreſſion of God; Doth he tear a harmleſs ſoul, and tear him in wrath? Yet this is not all; to make up the meaſure of this exceſſive language, take two aggravations more.

He gnaſheth upon me with his teeth.] Job purſues the alluſion ſtill: Beaſts (as it were) whet their teeth that they may devour their prey: This action of gnaſhing the teeth is aſcribed to men, and it notes four things.

חרק Frenduit dentibus; eſt invidētiū, iraſcentium irridentium habitus. Loquitur ad ſimilitudinem beſtiæ quæ homini cōminando dentes contra ipſū parat. Aqnin.

Firſt, Extream envy (*Pſal.*12.10.) The wicked ſhall ſee it and be grieved, he ſhall gnaſh with his teeth and melt away; the deſire of the wicked ſhall periſh: But at what was this wicked man grieved, till he gnaſhed his teeth? Was it a grief of compaſſion at the miſery of others? No, it was a grief of envy at the proſperity of others, as is clear from the words immediately foregoing. The horn of the righteous ſhall be exalted with honour: Envy is the vexation and depreſſion of our own ſpirits, at the exaltation of another man in riches or in honour. It is not a ſickneſs catcht from another mans diſeaſe, but a ſickneſs catcht from another mans health.

Secondly, Gnaſhing of the teeth, notes extream deriſion, or higheſt contempt and inſultation over a man in miſery (Pſal. 35.15, 16.) But in mine adverſity they rejoyced, and gathered themſelves together (that is, they gathered themſelves together for joy, or to rejoyce) yea the very abjects gathered themſelves together (ſuch as all honeſt, or civil men had caſt out of their company and ſociety, aſſociated and knotted themſelves into companies) againſt me, they did tear me (that is, my good name) and ceaſed not; with hypocritical mockers at feaſts, they gnaſhed upon me with their teeth: Where it is alſo obſervable, that we have the former act complained of by Job, joyned with this, Tearing, with gnaſhing of the teeth.

Thirdly, Gnaſhing of the teeth is the effect of extream pain; thus the damned in Hell ſhall gnaſh their teeth for ever (*Mat.*8.12. *Mat.*13.42.) That gnaſhing of teeth ariſeth from a mixed paſſion, partly from envy, and partly from ſorrow; envy at the good which the Saints enjoy, and ſorrow at the evil which themſelves feel; hence comes gnaſhing of teeth in Hell.

Fourthly, Gnaſhing of teeth is an argument of extream wrath and anger (Acts 7.54.) where it is ſaid of Stevens at once Auditors and Enemies, When they heard thoſe things, they were cut to the heart (Peters Auditors, Acts 2. were prickt at the heart with godly ſorrow, Stevens Auditors were cut to the heart with ungodly anger) and they gnaſhed upon him with their teeth. The gnaſhing of teeth here ſpoken of is the concomitant of ſuppoſed wrath, He teareth me in his wrath, and gnaſheth upon me with his teeth.

Yet further:

Mine enemy ſharpeneth his eyes upon me.] This notes the fierceneſs of an enemy: Wild Beaſts when they fight, whet their eyes as well as their teeth; and a man that is extreamly enraged, looks upon his oppoſite as if he would look through him: Thus Job repreſents the Lord in all the poſtures of an enemy, He ſharpneth his eyes againſt me.

The word ſignifies to ſharpen as a Sword, or a Spear, or any inſtrument of Iron is ſharpned (1 *Sam.*13.20.) There was no Smith in Iſrael; but all the Iſraelites went down to the Philiſtims to ſharpen every man his ſhare, &c. That word is uſed here, Mine enemy ſharpneth his eye like a Sword, as if he would ſtrike me through with his eye; we ſay a man hath a piercing eye, when he looks very angerly.

When we are well-pleaſed, kindneſs is ſeen in our eyes; we give our Friends a pleaſant and gentle look; Chriſts tells the Spouſe (*Cant.*4.9.) Thou haſt raviſhed mine heart, my Siſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt raviſhed my heart with one of thine eyes. The Hebrew is, Thou haſt taken away my heart with one of thine eyes. A holy love-look ſtole away Chriſts heart; he could not but love the Church when (through the comlineſs which he had put upon her) ſhe looked ſo lovely on him. As thus a look of love from the Churches eye ſtole away Chriſts heart, ſo a look of mercy from Chriſts eye broke Peters heart, yea and opened the Flood-gates of his eyes too (*Luk.*22.61, 62.) And the Lord turned, & looked upon Peter, and Peter went out & wept bitterly.

There are ſoft looks as well as ſoft words, and there are hard looks as well as hard words: The eye is a Spear and an Arrow, yea a ſharp Sword as well as the tongue; He ſharpneth his eyes upon me, as if he would ſtab me to the heart with a glance of his eye. The eye hath its ſcintillations, its ſparklings, even as bright burniſht Braſs, or as a burning Lamp, or as the morning Sun ſends forth his rays and beams, ſuch ſcintillations doth the eye of ſome men ſend forth naturally. The Roman Hiſtorians report of Auguſtus Cæſar, and our Turkiſh Hiſtorian reports of Tamerlane, that ſuch a majeſtick luſtre ſparkled from their eyes, as dazled the eyes of their beholders, which (ſaith my Author) cauſed the latter, in a comly modeſty, to abſtain from looking earneſtly upon ſuch as ſpake with him. What the eyes of theſe great Princes did naturally, the eyes of many do when they look paſſionately. Chriſt hath a ſharp eye, ſo ſharp, that his eyes (as repreſented to John in a Viſion) were like a flame of fire (*Rev.*1.14.) The eyes of God are ſo ſharp naturally, or according to the excellency of his nature, that no eye can behold his face; and himſelf beholdeth not only every face, but pierceth into every heart: yet beſides this natural ſharpneſs of his eye towards all, he angerly ſharpens his eye againſt his Enemies. God was indeed Job's Friend, and Job was Gods Favourite, yet here he ſpeaks of God (as he had alſo done before) as of his Enemy; and as of an Enemy, declaring himſelf at his eye, Mine enemy ſharpneth his eye upon me.

Job attributes this to God, in the extremity of his pain; this was the voice of his fleſh, it was not the voice of Job himſelf: this was the voice of his ſenſe, not the voice of his Faith. Would you know what was the voice of Job himſelf, or of Job's Faith? Hear that (*Chap.*13.15, 16, 18.) Though he kill me, yet will I truſt in him. He alſo ſhall be my ſalvation, and I know that I ſhall be juſtified. Hear again his Faith ſpeaking (*Chap.*19.25.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I ſhall ſee him again with theſe eyes: Though ſenſe ſaw God as an Enemy ſharpning his eyes upon him, yet Faith ſaw God his Redeemer, in this aſſurance, that he alſo ſhould behold him with an eye of ſenſe, I ſhall ſee him with theſe eyes.

Adverſariũ ſuum vocat Job nõ amicos ſolũ ſed omnẽ creaturã, quæ reſiſtit Domino reſiſtẽ{re}, accuſat Domino accuſante, damnat Domino dãnante, aut ipſum Deum adverſariũ intelligas. Brent.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That God dealeth with thoſe whom he loveth dearly, as if he hated them.

Secondly, They whom God doth love, may be under preſent apprehenſion that God hates them.

I only name theſe points as ariſing from this place; they have been handled (*Chap.*13.24. *Chap.*14.13.) upon thoſe words, Until thy wrath be paſt; and therefore I ſtay not upon them here.

Thirdly, Note, God (to ſenſe) doth ſeem to exerciſe a kind of cruelty (even the cruelty of wild beaſts) towards thoſe whom he dearly loves.

What are tearing and gnaſhing of teeth? What is the ſharpning of the eye? Is not any one of theſe, much more all theſe in one, the diſcovery of cruelty? Job ſaith all this: and doth not Hezekiah ſay as much (*Iſa.*38.13.) I reckoned till morning, that as a Lyon, ſo will he break all my bones, from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me. We find God taking upon himſelf thoſe ſimilitudes, not only in reference to his Enemies, but alſo to his own people; for as he deals with the wicked when they provoke him, ſo in proportion with his own. Outward diſpenſations make no difference; I will take vengeance, I will not meet thee as a man (*Iſa.*43.3.) that is, I will not ſhew ſo much as any humane pity or compaſſion, much leſs Divine, but I will meet thee as a Beaſt. Thus God threatned to deal with Babylon; and thus he appears to deal with Sion, with the choiſeſt Sons and Daughters of Sion.

And thus he profeſſed (*Hoſ.*5.14.) For I will be unto Ephraim as a Lyon, and as a young Lyon to the Houſe of Judah; I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none ſhall reſcue him.

Job having ſhewed what hard uſage he had from God himſelf, who appeared as an enemy, proceeds now to ſhew what hard and courſe uſage he had from men, who were indeed his enemies, into whoſe hands God had delivered him.

Verſ. 10. They have gaped upon me with their mouth, they have ſmitten me upon the cheek reproachfully, they have gathered themſelves together againſt me.

The perſon is now changed, as alſo the number; before it was He, now They: And who were they? We have no Names to give them; only in general. Theſe were the inſtruments which God let looſe upon him; his Friends, ſay ſome; his Enemies, ſay others. Whoſoever they were, doubtleſs they were either down-right Enemies, or Enemy-like Friends; their own behaviour ſpeaks them ſo, They have gaped upon me, &c.

He varies, or heightens their enemy-like behaviour by three expreſſions.

Firſt, They have gaped upon me with their mouth.

Secondly, They have ſmitten me upon the cheek reproachfully.

Thirdly, They have gathered themſelves againſt me.

I ſhall open them diſtinctly.

They have gaped upon me with their mouth.

Gaping with, or opening the mouth, implies two things.

Firſt, Scorn and deriſion (*Lam.*2.16.) All thine enemies have opened the mouth againſt thee, they hiſs and gnaſh the teeth; they ſay we have ſwallowed her up: certainly this is the day we looked for. The Church in affliction was afflicted with ſcornful geſtures.

Secondly, As gaping with the mouth notes ſcorn, ſo alſo cruelty; he that gapes at another, tells him (though he ſay nothing) that he could devour him, and eat him up (as we ſay) Without Salt; Such a one ſhews that he needs no Sauce (*Pſal.*22.13.) They gaped upon me with their mouthes, as a ravening and roaring Lyon: A Lyon gapes at his prey to devour it. Job often complains both of the contempt and cruelty of many againſt him; and their gaping upon him includes both; which are alſo again intimated in the next clauſe.

They have ſmitten me upon the cheek reproachfully.

Some render it, Reproaching me, they have ſmitten me on the cheek: Smiting on the cheek is taken two wayes.

Literally.

Metaphorically.

What literal ſmiting is, all know, and moſt have felt: but had Job any about him who uſed him thus rudely? I conceive, not; and therefore we may underſtand him metaphorically. So, ſmiting on the cheek, is to reproach: And theſe words, They have ſmitten me on the cheek reproachfully, are no more nor leſs, then, They have reproached me. To ſmite on the cheek, is a thing ſo reproachful, that, by an Hebraiſm, it ſignifieth to reproach (*Lam.*3.30.) He giveth his cheek to him that ſmiteth him, which is expounded in the latter clauſe by this, he is filled full with reproach. The ſufferings of Chriſt, which were full of reproach, are thus Propheſied, I gave my back to the ſmiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair: I hid not my face from ſhame and ſpitting (*Iſa.*50.6.) Chriſt was ſmitten on the face literally (*Matth.*26.67.) Then did they ſpit in his face and buffetted him, and others ſmote him with the palms of their hands. He was ſmitten alſo tropically, being put to open ſhame, and diſgracefully dealt with. That of the Apoſtle clears this ſenſe (2 *Cor.*11.20.) Ye ſuffer a man to bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himſelf, if a man ſmite you on the face, that is, If he diſgrace you: So the Apoſtle expounds it (*Verſ.*21.) I ſpeak concerning reproach. Paul (*Chap.*12.) had a meſſenger of Satan ſent to buffet him, to cuff, or ſmite him with the fiſt, ſo the word ſignifies; what that was, at leaſt in part, he explains (*Verſ.*10.) I will therefore take pleaſure in reproaches. Thus the Prophet deſcribes the diſhonour which ſhould be put upon the Judge (*Micah.*5.1.) Now gather thy ſelf in Troops, O daughter of Troops, he hath laid ſiege againſt us; they ſhall ſmite the Judge of Iſrael with a rod upon the cheek, that is, The enemy ſhall pour contempt upon thy Kings and Princes; in which ſenſe they may be ſaid to be ſmitten upon the cheek, though no rod nor hand touch them. And ſome interpret that (*Mat.*5.39) If any man ſmite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the left alſo, not of hand, but tongue-ſmiting, or of ſuffering reproach. As if Chriſt had ſaid, If any one diſgrace thee a little, bear it, yea though he ſhould diſgrace thee a great deal more, yet bear it: Smiting upon the right cheek, notes a leſſer injury received. When a man ſmites another on the right cheek, he ſmites with his left hand; the left hand ſtrikes the right cheek, and the left hand is the weaker in moſt, and gives a weaker blow. If thou receive a blow on thy right cheek with the left hand, turn the other, and let him ſmite thee with the right hand, let him give thee a ſmarter, a harder blow: that is, If a man diſgrace thee a little, reward him not with diſgrace, but prepare to bear a greater, turn the left cheek. And the reaſon of this was, becauſe ſlaves and condemned perſons were thus ſmitten, as alſo ſuch as were ſuppoſed to ſpeak irreverently to the Magiſtrate.

Percutere maxillā Hebraica locutio eſt, quæ ſignificat graviſſima contumelia aliquem afficere.

Cum aliquis propter gravē aliquam ignominiam pudefit, licet vis omnis abſit, & plaga verberari dicitur in maxilla. Sanct. in Mic.c.5.v.1

Hence it was that when Paul had ſpoken freely to the Councel, ſaying, Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conſcience before God until this day: preſently Ananias the high Prieſt, commanded thoſe that ſtood by him to ſmite him on the mouth (*Act.*23.1,2.) In which caſe Chriſt himſelf was ſmitten by an Officer that ſtood by (*Joh.*18.22.) From all which Scripture teſtimonies it is more then manifeſt, that to ſmite a man on the cheek, is to diſgrace, becauſe they who fell under diſgrace, were uſually ſmitten on the cheek: and this I take to be the moſt ſuitable interpretation of Jobs complaint in this place, They ſmite me on the cheek reproachfully.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The beſt Saints on earth have been ſmitten and deeply wounded with reproach.

God himſelf gave an honourable teſtimony of Job, there was none like him, he had no peer on earth, for holineſs and uprightneſs; yet men gave teſtimony againſt him, as if he had been the ſcum of the World, for unholineſs and hypocriſie. David, a man after Gods own heart, was (not only reproached, but) a reproach among all his Enemies, but eſpecially among his neighbours (or neareſt Friends both in habitation and relation) and he heard the ſlander of many (*Pſal.*31.11, 13.) The word of God was made a reproach to the Prophet Jeremy (*Chap.*20.8.) And the ſpirit was made a reproach to the Apoſtles (*Act.*2.13.) Others mocked, ſaying, Theſe men are full of new Wine: When indeed they were filled with the holy Ghoſt (*Verſ.*4.) Drunkards made Songs upon David, but the Apoſtles were ſung about for Drunkards.

We are fools, ſaith Paul (that is, We are ſo called and accounted) for Chriſt, and being defamed (or as the word bears, blaſphemed; to ſpeak againſt any thing of God in Man, is blaſphemy, as well as ſpeaking directly againſt God) we entreat. And to ſhew, that this was no prick with a Pin, or ſmall ſcratch upon their credit, which made him complain, he tells us what this ſame did amount unto, We are made as the filth of the World, and as the off-ſcouring of all things unto this day (1 *Cor.*4.13.) The whole World lieth in wickedneſs (which is a moral filthineſs) ſo that to be the filth of the World, is to be the filth of filthineſs; the filth of a clean thing is bad enough, what then is the filth of a filthy thing? The off-ſcouring of any thing is baſe, then what is the off-ſcouring of all things, which muſt needs include the baſeſt things? Theſe Apoſtles who were the ornament and glory, the pureſt and moſt refined pieces of the whole inferiour World, were yet made (not that theſe reproaches did at all change them from what they were in themſelves, but they made them to be in the opinion of others, what they leaſt of all were) the rubbiſh, and the refuſe, the ſweepings, and the droſs of the whole World. The Apologies of Tertullian and others, do abundantly teſtifie what reproaches the Primitive Chriſtians ſuffered, both in reference to their practice and worſhip. Athanaſius was called Sathanaſius (as if he had been a Devil incarnate) by the Abbettors of the Arrian Hereſie, which he ſtiffly oppoſed: And ſome who were diſpleaſed with the Opinions and Writings of Cyprianus, called him in contempt, Coprianus, or one that gathers dung, as if his Books were nothing but dung-heaps.

κόπρος eſt ſtercoreus, hinc Copriō ſcarabeus, à luto ſcilicet. Bech. de Orig. Ling. Lat.

How Luther, Calvin, and other Reformers of the former age, were ſmitten reproachfully, both by the tongues and Pens of the Popiſh Party, is known of all theſe parts of the World: And how much this trade (which is indeed the Devils trade) of ſlandering the footſteps of Gods annointed ones, is continued unto this day, we have but too much evidence. A man can ſcarce appear, indeed, for God, but he is thus ſmitten on the cheek by men. Religion and the power of godlineſs have ever been an occaſion of contention; and for the moſt part, to ſmite with reproach, hath been the manner of contending.

There are not many enemies of good men, who have a Sword to draw againſt them, but all the Enemies of good men have ill words enow at command to throw againſt them, and of them they are ſeldom ſparing: And, though (which is bad enough, yet no better can be expected of them) this trade of reproaching be driven moſt by evil men againſt thoſe who are good, yet (which is far worſe) we may learn from this inſtance between Job and his Friends (for even they did not ſpare to reproach him) that (which ſhall be a ſecond Obſervation)

A ſecond Obſervation.) A good man may ſo far forget him-as to ſpeak reproachfully againſt his Brother.

Yea, the reproaches of Profeſſors one againſt another, have been (as they are the ſaddeſt, ſo) the ſharpeſt and bittereſt reproaches. They who agree in moſt things, take it moſt unkindly when they differ in any thing; and are more ready to revile one another about the points wherein they differ, then to bleſs God for thoſe wherein they are agreed. The Papiſts did not more reproach Luther and Calvin, whoſe judgements concurred in oppoſing them, then Lutherans and Calviniſts have reproached each other, where they are oppoſite in judgement: The corrupt remains even in good men, tell them that whoſoever differs from them ſtands in their light and obſcures their excellency, and therefore that themſelves may ſhine the brighter in what they hold, they little care (when maſter'd by ſelf and paſſion) how obſcure, yea fowl they render them, who hold the contrary.

While Infidels reproached Chriſtians, it was the glory of Chriſtianity, and while the wicked reproach the godly, it is the glory of godlineſs; but while one Chriſtian reproaches another, the glory is departed from godlineſs. Is it not enough that the Servants of God are thus ſmitten by the world, muſt they needs ſmite their Fellow-ſervants, and revile thoſe who are (upon the main) in the ſame way of God wherein they are, only becauſe they are not fully in their way? Yea, when poſſibly, they may be in a higher and more perfect way then they? Is it not enough that the Bryars and Thorns, which are among the Lillies, tear and ſcratch them? Shall the Lillies degenerate into Briars and Thorns one towards another? Or if at any time a Lilly of the one ſide tear, and be harſh, ſhould not the Lilly on the other ſide be kind and gentle? If Iſrael tranſgreſs, let not Judah offend too. Luther was often at Sharps with Calvin, but Calvin profeſſed (and that was a Noble profeſſion) Though Luther call me Devil, yet I will honour Luther as a Servant of God.

Holy Job cannot be excuſed for his failings in this, who as he complains here, that he was reproached by his Enemies, yea and by his Friends too, yet he gave his Friends ſome advantage to complain alſo of harſh words, if not of reproaches caſt upon them.

Thirdly Obſerve, Reproach is a very heavy burthen.

Remember (Lord) the reproach of thy Servant, how I do bear in my boſom the reproach of all the mighty people, wherewith thine Enemies have reproached thee, O Lord, wherewith they have reproached the footſteps of thine annointed (Pſal. 89. 50, 51.) And again (*Pſal.*69.9.) The reproaches of them that reproached thee, are fallen on me. Yet more (Pſal. 42. 10.) As with a Sword in my bowels (or in my bones) they reproach me, while they ſay, &c. Reproach is not only a burthen upon the back, but a Sword in the bowels. A reviling, reproaching tongue is compared in Scripture to three things.

First, To a Razor.
Secondly, To a Sword.
Thirdly, To an Arrow.

A Razor is ſo keen, that it takes off every little hair; reproach cuts a hair, it will have to do even with undiſcernable evils. A Sword wounds at hand, and ſmites thoſe that are near; an Arrow wounds afar off: So that whether a man be far off, or near, whether his errour be ſmall or great, or but imaginary, it is all one to a reproachful ſpirit; his tongue ſerves him for all turns. David was tryed by all manner of reproaches; but thoſe which pinched and preſſed him moſt, were his reproaches about ſpiritual things. Any reproach is bad enough, but a reproach in Religion, is worſt; to be reproached with our prayers and with our God, Where is your God? Such reproaches, how deep do they go? They ſtrike to the very heart. Credit is a precious commodity; a man is more tender of it, then of his fleſh; now all reproach falls upon our credit, and the more excellent that piece of our credit is, upon which the reproach falls, the more grievous is that reproach to us. Credit in ſpiritual things is the moſt excellent credit: Thus David was reproached, and ſo was Job, Is this thy fear, and thy confidence? Is this the thing thou haſt ſo long boaſted of? Chriſt was to bear the greateſt burthen of affliction, and therefore he did not only bear the Croſs, but reproach with it; he ſuffered death, and reproach with death; he ſuffered the ſhameful death of the Croſs, in which there was more then a reproach, a curſe, Curſed is every one that hangeth on a Tree: Chriſt muſt die an ignominious death, as well as a painful, and the ignominy was a heavier burden then the pain. We are exhorted (*Heb.*13.13.) To go out bearing his reproach; as intimating, that to bear the reproach of Chriſt, would be harder to us, and a ſtronger temptation, then to bear the croſs of Chriſt. As the greateſt part of Chriſts ſufferings for us, was to bear our reproach, ſo the greateſt part of our ſufferings for Chriſt, is to bear Chriſts reproach: Let us go forth unto him without the Camp, bearing his reproach. And indeed reproach is ſo great a burthen, that were not this conſideration in it; that it is Chriſts, no man would bear it; and they will yield to do any thing rather then ſuffer reproach, who are not able to ſay that their reproach is the reproach of Chriſt. Moſes looked upon his reproach, as the reproach of Chriſt, he did not eſteem his own reproach, but the reproach of Chriſt greater riches, then the treaſures of Egypt (*Heb.*11.26.) Our reproach is nothing but dung or droſs which hath weight in it to preſs us, but no worth in it to enrich us; but the reproach of Chriſt is treaſure, which though it have weight in it to preſs us, yet it hath abundance of worth in it to enrich and crown us. The Apoſtle calls it, The reproach of Chriſt, both becauſe Chriſt did bear ſuch reproach himſelf, and becauſe Chriſt owned Moſes in bearing that reproach; yea he owned that reproach which Moſes bare, as if he had born it himſelf; while we are reproached for Chriſts ſake, Chriſt is reproached; and though it ſhould grieve us that Chriſt is reproached in us, yet it may comfort us, that Chriſt takes our reproach as his. They have ſmitten me on the cheek reproachfully, and yet they have not done with me.

They have gathered themſelves together againſt me.

It ſeems they contemned and reproached him not ſingly or every man apart; but they joyned all together in conſulting and plotting againſt him.

The word that we tranſlate to gather together, hath a ſecond ſignification, namely, to fill, either as a room is filled with Goods, or Perſons, or as the ſtomack is filled with meat, or food, or as an Army with Men. Hence Mr. Broughton tranſlates, They come by full Troops upon me: And another, They will be filled with me, or upon me. The Vulgar explains it thus, They are filled or ſatiated with my puniſhment: or as a third, They have taken their fill of pleaſure at my miſeries. The reaſon of this ſenſe ariſeth from the former; becauſe, where many things or perſons are gathered together, they fill up that place.

1. Implere; complere.
2. Colligere; congregare; quod rebus collectis impleantur loca.

Firſt, It ſignifies to gather together, as men are gathered in a civil Society, and combination: Job ſuppoſed his Friends conſpired his hurt, and that they gathered themſelves together againſt him, who pretended to gather themſelves together for him; or we may apply this to his profeſſed Enemies, who were very unanimous to vex and trouble him.

Hence Note, Men are apt to agree in doing hurt.

Union is not alwayes a ſign of a good cauſe: 'Tis but ſeldom we can agree to do a common duty. Good men want the cement of love in a good cauſe; evil men ſeldom want it in a bad. Behold ſaith God, *Gen.*11.5,6.) This people are one, and they all ſpeak one language: their language was one, and ſo were their hearts, to build a Tower, whoſe top might reach to Heaven: The builders of Babel are more united, then the builders of Sion. The Pſalmiſt complains of the Enemies oneneſs (*Pſal.*83.5,6,7.) They have conſulted together with one conſent (or heart) they are confederate againſt thee. Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, the Philiſtims, and them that dwell at Tyre: Aſhur is alſo joyned with them, &c. All Nations, even Heterogenial Nations, can joyn in miſchief; men of ſeveral Kingdoms, and ſpirits, Pilate and Herod joyn to crucifie Chriſt; but as it is moſt beautiful and pleaſant (*Pſal.*133.) So, O how hard a thing is it for Brethren to dwell in unity? They who have one God, one Lord, one Faith, one Spirit, one Baptiſm, one Hope; yea they who (in one ſenſe) are one Body, and one Spirit (*Epheſ.*4.4,5.) are ſeldom one.

Super me implebuntur. Mont.

Satiati ſunt pænis meis. Vulg. In manis meis voluptatem ſuam expleverunt. Tygur.

From that ſecond ſenſe of the word, They have filled, or ſatiated themſelves with me,

Note, It is a kind of pleaſure to ſome to ſee others in pain.

We ſhould be pained with the pain of others; fellow-feeling is a duty; how far are they departed from this duty, who are ſo far from feeling the ſufferings of others, that they take pleaſure in their ſufferings?

There are two ſorts of pleaſure, which every good man ſhould abhor.

Firſt, Pleaſure in ſin, our own, or others: The worſt that was ſaid of the wicked Gentiles was this, They not only do ſuch things, but take pleaſure in them that do them (Rom. 1.32.)

Secondly, Pleaſure in the ſufferings and ſorrows of others; ſome do not only put others to the ſuffering of ſorrow, but take pleaſure in the ſorrow which they ſuffer; they make their tears as Wine, their aſhes as Bread; and until they ſee them weeping and feeding on aſhes, their own Wine is as tears, and their Bread as aſhes to them. Haman came full from the Queens Banquet, and he was invited by her to a ſecond Banquet the next day, yet ſtill he was hungry, and ſaid (Heſt. 5.13.) All this availeth me nothing, ſo long as I ſee Mordecai the Jew ſitting at the Kings gate: 'Tis like, Haman had eaten and drunk freely, yet the Banquet had not filled his belly: All this availeth me nothing. More then forty of the Jews bound themſelves under a curſe, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul (Act. 23.12, 13.) It would have been better to Haman then meat and drink to have killed Mordecai, and all the Jews.

Some have been heard to ſay, O how ſweet is revenge! What a pleaſant draught is a draught of blood! Spightful ſpirits hunger and thirſt for the downfal and miſery of thoſe who ſtand in their way; nor will any thing ſatisfie hatred, but the ruine of thoſe who are hated; and when once they ſee them ruined, they are ſatisfied. As envy is troubled at the good which another enjoyes more then at all the evils which it ſelf feels; ſo malice is more ſatisfied with the evils which befal others, then with all the good which it ſelf enjoyes (Exod. 15.9.) The enemy ſaid, I will purſue, I will overtake, I will divide the ſpoil, my luſt ſhall be ſatisfied upon them. Pharaoh and his Courtiers, yea all the Egyptians hungred and thirſted for the fleſh and blood of Iſrael: They had a luſt, or a longing rather (as women with Child have ſometimes inordinate appetites after ſtrange meats) to eat mans fleſh, and drink the blood of the ſlain: Revenge is as craving a luſt as covetouſneſs, but it is a luſt more eaſily ſatisfied then covetouſneſs. This encreaſes by receiving what it deſires, but that (if it may have it) is ſatisfied: That which covetouſneſs receives, is only as fewel to a fire, but that which revenge receives, is as food to the ſtomack; the deſire of the end is infinite, but the end being once attained, deſire is at an end: Ye are filled with me.

Appetitus finis eſt infinitus.

Job having thus deſcribed the inſtruments and manner of his affliction, turns his thoughts from them to the ſupream efficient, and orderer of his afflictions.

Verſ. 11. God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked.

The words ſeem to bear an alluſion to the proceeding of an earthly Judge, who having tryed a Malefactor, and found him guilty, pronounceth ſentence of death upon him, and then delivers, or turns him over to thoſe whoſe office it is to ſee execution done accordingly.

The word which we render to deliver, ſignifies alſo to ſhut up, which ſuites well with the former notion; for a condemned Perſon is more cloſely ſhut up, and more narrowly watcht, then before: But who were the ungodly to whom he was delivered? and the wicked into whoſe hands or power he was turned? Theſe were not only the Chaldeans, and Sabeans, but alſo all ſuch as ſhewed any malice againſt him, or willingly afflicted him in his afflictions.

ירט A via divertit, deflexit, declinavit.

The words carry in them a correction of his former complaint, as if he had ſaid, Why do I trouble my ſelf with men, why do I complain of their unkindneſs or cruelty againſt me? God hath done it; he hath delivered, and turned me over (as a Magiſtrate doth a Malefactor whom he hath condemned) into the hands of theſe tormenters, he hath ſealed a writ for my execution. Thus Job aſcribes all to God; he ſometimes wrangles with men, but as often before, ſo now again, he looks beyond them, at once ſeeing and adoring the hand of God, putting him and his eſtate into the hands of men.

Hence Note, Firſt, Wicked men are ordered by Providence.

They cannot take till God puts into their hands: a Sparrow falls not to the ground without God, much leſs doth a godly man fall into the hands of the wicked without God. They do but execute what God decrees, though they do it without any reſpect to his decrees, and quite croſs to his commands. Many will be found at once executing the decrees and diſobeying the commands of God.

Secondly, God delivers his deareſt Children into the hands of wicked men, for trial and correction.

Their graces and goodneſs appear moſt, when they are under the handling of evil and graceleſs men. Many of their corruptions are purged out, while they are in their power who are not at all purged from their corruption. Foul hands may ſerve to waſh that clean which is foul; and they who are but droſs, may fetch off the ruſt which cleaves to the pureſt mettal.

Thirdly, Note, It is an aggravation of affliction to be given up to wicked men.

Eſt hoc in judicio Domini graviſſimũ quod adverſariis videatur Favere, & a parte eorum ſtare, conſilia conatuſque ipſorum contra nos proſperando. Brent.

It is an affliction to be in their company, what is it then to be under their power? Wo is me, ſaith David, that I dwell in Meſhec; how woful then is it to be a Priſoner in Meſhec? While God keeps the Rod in his own hands, the ſmart is not ſo grievous: We learn this in David's choice (2 Sam. 24.14.) when three evils were offered him, he reſolves, Let me fall now into the hand of the Lord (for his mercies are great) and let me not fall into the hand of man. A good man can eaſier die by the hand of God, then receive a ſlight wound by the hand of an Enemy: As thoſe comforts are ſweeter, ſo thoſe ſufferings are not ſo bitter which Believers receive immediately from God.

It is hard to ſuffer from equals, much more from inferiours, but moſt of all when we ſuffer the fatherly diſpleaſure of God from thoſe who are the objects of his diſpleaſure as a Judge. Let the righteous ſmite me (ſaith David, Pſal. 141.) a reproof from them is oyl, but a reproof from the wicked is Gall and Vinegar to a godly heart: The reaſon why a godly man chuſes rather to be ſmitten by the righteous, then the wicked, is, becauſe they have ſomewhat, poſſibly, much of God in them; therefore much more doth he ſay, Let the righteous God ſmite me. It is a mercy, if we muſt needs be chaſtiſed, when God will chaſtiſe us himſelf, and not give us into the hands of men whoſe mercies are cruel.

There are two things which make it ſo grievous to the people of God, when they are delivered up into the hands of the ungodly.

Firſt, Their cruelty: Their mercies are cruel, how unmerciful then are they in their cruelties? As they know no meaſure in ſinning againſt God, ſo they keep none in vexing man. The Lord promiſeth (Pſal. 126.3.) The Rod of the wicked ſhall not reſt upon the lot of the righteous; implying, that by the good will of evil men it ſhould reſt there; they would never take it off, if God did not.

Secondly (which troubles more then the former) Their blaſphemy. And that firſt againſt God himſelf, as if he either could not deliver out of their hands (2 Chron. 32.14.) What is your God that he ſhould be able to deliver you out of my hand (Pſal. 42.) Where is now their God? Thus the wicked Jewes into whoſe hand God delivered his Son, did even dare God to come to his reſcue (Mat. 27.43.) Or, as if he took their part, and favoured the cauſe which they have in hand. Secondly, They blaſpheme, or ſpeak evil both of the wayes and people of God. What's become of your prayers now? Where's your faſting now, of which you boaſted, that it would do ſuch wonders? It is a ſoar affliction to be under the rule of wicked men, much more to be under their rage: that prophetick curſe which David denounceth againſt his Enemy, is thus expreſſed (Pſal. 109.6.) Set thou a wicked man over him: A wicked man were better be under the power of good men, then of the wicked (for a good man cannot be ſo ſevere to a wicked man, as one wicked man is to another) but if a wicked man be ſo cruel to wicked men who are ſo like him, how cruel muſt he needs be to godly men who are altogether unlike him?

Fourthly, Note, Godly men look through all ſecond cauſes to the firſt.

As they reſt not in the creature for the good which they receive, ſo they ſtay not in the creature when they receive evil; they ſee a hand of God in and over all.

Note Fifthly, We glorifie God as much in acknowledging afflictions, as in acknowledging mercies and bleſſings to come from him.

He is the Author of both; he takes it as much upon him, that he creates darkneſs, as that he forms light; that is, as the next words expound it, That he creates evil as well as makes peace (Iſa. 45. 7.) Now if the Lord challenges this as a part of that glory which he will not give to Idols, then, we give him the glory of the only true God, while we acknowledge this.

Sixthly, Note, There is no way to ſettle or quiet the heart, till it look up to God as the diſpoſer of our troubles.

This was Job's laſt reſort: And this was David's when Shimei curſed him, God hath bid Shimei curſe: This kept down thoſe angry motions, which muſt elſe have boiled up as high in his ſpirit, as they did in Abiſhai's, himſelf being more deeply concerned in it then Abiſhai was. Job having diſcovered this frame of ſpirit more then once before, I here only touch upon it.

Laſtly, Take this comfortable Corolary from the whole.

Though God doth often deliver his choiceſt Servants into the power of wicked men, yet he never delivers them up to the will of wicked men: They cannot do with his people what they pleaſe; they ſhall only do what God himſelf pleaſeth, though they diſpleaſe God highly in doing it. God never turns the leaſt of thoſe who believe in his Name, out of his own hand, though he turn them over into the hand of the ungodly: as God keeps his title to them ſtill, ſo he ſtill keeps the poſſeſſion of them. Saints in the hand of the vileſt men, are in the hand, or poſſeſſion of God two wayes.

Firſt, They are in the hand of his power, he can fetch them out of the hands of men when he will.

Secondly, They are under the hand of his care, and this five wayes.

Firſt, To provide, that though they endure much hardſhip in their hands, yet they ſhall receive no hurt; God doth not turn his into the hands of evil men for evil, but for good.

Secondly, He hath them in the hand of his care to furniſh them with ſtrength to ſuffer.

Thirdly, To teach them how to profit by ſufferings.

Fourthly, To moderate the hands of the wicked towards them; their hands ſhall not be heavier then he hath appointed, they ſhall not give you a ſtroak more then he hath numbred-out.

Laſtly, As to order how much, ſo likewiſe how long they ſhall ſuffer: Our times are in Gods hand, when we are in the hand of men. As they cannot add a drop to our cup, ſo not a Sand to our Glaſs, beyond what the Lord hath appointed out.

VERS. 12, 13, 14.

I was at eaſe, but he hath broken me aſunder: he hath alſo taken me by my neck, and ſhaken me to pieces, and ſet me up for his mark.

His Archers compaſs me round about, he cleaveth my reins aſunder, and doth not ſpare; he poureth out my Gall upon the ground.

He breaketh me with breach upon breach, he runneth upon me like a Giant.

JOB ſtill proſecutes the ſame argument, ſetting out his afflictions in their darkeſt colours to the ſeventeenth Verſe of this Chapter, and then with higheſt confidence atteſting, yea calling Heaven and Earth to atteſt both the righteouſneſs of his wayes towards men, and the rightneſs of his worſhip rendred unto God.

Theſe three, with the two Verſes following, contain two general points.

Firſt, He tells us how, and in what manner he was handled by God in thoſe days of his affliction, Verſ. 12, 13, 14.

Secondly, He tells us how he behaved himſelf under the hand of God, or how he was affected with theſe afflictions, Verſ. 15, 16. I have ſowed ſackcloath upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the duſt, &c. As Gods hand was heavy upon him, ſo he held out all the demonſtrations and emblems of a heavy heart: I ſowed ſackcloth upon my skin.

He begins with, or rather proſecutes the deſcription (for he had ſpoken much of it before) of his ſad afflictions. And becauſe contraries illuſtrate, and ſet forth one another, therefore, he firſt ſhews what condition he had been in: Secondly, what he then was in. Our preſent wants and evils are aggravated by our former comforts and enjoyments.

This courſe and method Job takes to aggravate his;

Firſt, Telling us that he was once whole and at eaſe.

Secondly, What he at that time was, pained and broken to pieces.

I was at eaſe.

But how doth this agree with what Job affirmed (Chap. 3. 26.) I was not in ſafety, neither had I reſt, neither was I quiet, yet trouble came. It ſeems Job was never at eaſe, and yet he ſaith here, I was at eaſe: He that is not in ſafety, and hath neither reſt nor quiet, ſurely, He is in little eaſe.

There is no contradiction between theſe two, we may eaſily reconcile them, and make up the ſeeming difference, thus. When Job ſaith (Chap. 3.) I was not in ſafety, neither had I reſt, neither was I quiet; his meaning is, that his ſpirit did not truſt upon his outward proſperity: He had abundance in the World, but he had no carnal confidence in worldly things. Job never ſaid to his ſoul (when his Barns were full, and his ſubſtance multiplyed) Soul take thy eaſe, eat and be merry, thou haſt enough laid up for many years. Job had much of the creature in his hand, but he kept it all out of his heart; and when he was furtheſt from miſery, he was far enough from ſecurity; he did not think his life ſafe, becauſe he had ſufficient to live upon, nor was he at reſt, becauſe he was rich. A believers reſt is not in any outward comfort which he receives from God, but in God, from whom he receives all his comforts. So then, Job ſpeaks there of the ſpiritual frame of his heart, but here he ſpeaks of the temporal frame of his worldly eſtate, in which he had eaſe, and the affluence of all good things, no man moleſting him: As if he had ſaid, Time was when I was not at all pinched with poverty in my eſtate, nor blaſted with reproach in my credit, nor tortured with pains in my body; I can remember the time when I was at full eaſe in all theſe: That's his ſenſe in this Text, and between theſe two there is no oppoſition: A man may be at eaſe in the World, and yet not make the World his eaſe, nor reſt upon the World.

I was at eaſe.] Such was my former flouriſhing condition. The word ſignifies to be peaceable, quiet, or well ſetled: the Vulgar tranſlates, I was a rich man: the ſame word in the Hebrew ſignifies a rich man, and a man at eaſe, for two reaſons.

שלו הייתי Pacificus, tranquillus, quietus eram. Fui opulentus. Vulg.

Firſt, Becauſe riches and eaſe uſually go together; and unleſs a man live at eaſe, that is, in outward peace, it is hard to gather riches. Times of War and trouble are ſcattering and impoveriſhing times: The rowling Stone gets no Moſs. As men have the beſt opportunity, ſo they are moſt active to gather wealth when all is ſtill and quiet: There are but few who know how to fiſh in troubled waters, though ſome make their beſt trade there.

Secondly, The ſame word ſignifies, both to be rich, and to be at eaſe, from the effect; becauſe, men that are rich, uſually take their eaſe: as eaſe and peace give them opportunity to gather riches, ſo riches cauſe them to take their eaſe, both outward civil eaſe, and oft-times inward ſinful eaſe; that is, to ſit down, and make their riches, and outward accommodations, the very baſis of their quiet and contentment. So the rich are expreſſed (Ezek. 23. 42.) Thou ſateſt upon a ſtately Bed, and a Table prepared before it, &c. And a voice of a multitude being at eaſe with her, and with the men of the common ſort were brought Sabeans from the Wilderneſs, which put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful Crowns upon their heads : Here's the deſcription of a rich people; and what were they? A multitude being at eaſe, having gotten goodly furniture for their houſes, full tables for their bellies, pretious ornaments for their hands and heads; that is, having abundance of all things, they gave themſelves up to ſecurity, and took their fill in the creature: And by how much the greater a carnal man's worldly felicity is, by ſo much doth it the more triumph over all jealouſies and ſuſpitions of evil (Revel. 18. 7.) Babylon ſaith, I ſit a Queen, and am no widow, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow. Babylon is at eaſe, ſhe feels no evil, and ſhe fears none. Jeruſalem was once in ſuch a condition through the favour of God, and ſo ſhe ſhall be in due time again (*Zech.*7.7.) Should ye not hear the words which the Lord hath cryed by the former Prophets, when Jeruſalem was inhabited, and in proſperity(or at eaſe)and the Cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited the South of the plain? The ſouth of the plain, was a Region or Countrey, extreamly infeſted with Enemies, where no man durſt dwell or make his habitation, for fear of hoſtile incurſions: yet Jeruſalem was in ſuch proſperity, or at ſuch eaſe, that the South of the plain, the open Countries and unwalled Villages were as ſafe to the Inhabitants as walled and fortified Cities: At ſuch eaſe, and in ſuch ſafety ſhall Jeruſalem be again, when the Lord ſhall appoint ſalvation unto her, in ſtead of Walls and Bulwarks.

Miſerationē movet à priore ſtatu. Merc.
Primus locus miſericordiæ eſt per quē quibus in bonis fuerit, & nunc quibus in malis ſit oſtenditur. Cic. de Invent.lib.1.

I was at eaſe.] Job makes this report of his former proſperity, that he might move his Friends to pity him in his preſent miſery. It is a rhetorical argument: The Oratour gives this rule, when we would ſtir up compaſſion towards a man in miſery, we muſt firſt deſcribe in what heights he hath ſtood, and then ſhew how low he is fallen; we are not ſo much affected with any man's being in a low eſtate, as with his falling from a high eſtate. When Lucifer the Son of the morning, falls from Heaven, and falls into Hell, to the ſides of the Pit, this ſets all men a wondering (*Iſa.*14. 11, 12, 15.)

Hence Obſerve, To have been in proſperity, adds to the burden and bitterneſs of preſent adverſity.

Cor dolet, quam ſcio nunc, ut ſum atq; ut fui. Plaut. in Moſtel.
Cernite ſim qualis, qui modo talis eram. Ovid.
Fuimus Troes, &c.

It is an affliction, never to have been in proſperity; but it is a greater affliction to be caſt down from a ſtate of proſperity: for him that hath been great, and rich, and powerful in the World, to become mean, and poor, and powerleſs, this pinches ſoar, and goes to the quick. Job aggravates his ſorrows at large upon this account (*Chap.*29.*Chap.*30.) The Candle of God ſhined upon my head, I waſhed my ſteps in butter, my glory was freſh in me, &c. But now they that are younger then I have me in deriſion, &c. So (*Lam.*4.2.) The precious Sons of Sion, comparable to fine Gold, how are they eſteemed as earthen Pitchers. And (Verſ. 5.) They that did feed delicately, are deſolate in the ſtreets; they that were brought up in Scarlet embrace dunghils. From delicate feeding to deſolation, from Scarlet to a dunghil is a great change; the dunghil would not be ſo loathſom, were it not for the Scarlet, nor deſolation ſo grievous were it not for the remaining taſte of the late delicate feeding. Every remembrance of the Wormwood and the Gall of their preſent affliction in Babylon, was made more bitter by the remembrance of the Milk and Honey which flowed in the Land of Canaan. They who have alwayes been in a low condition ſcarce feel or know the want of great things, becauſe they never knew the meaning of their enjoyment.

Euripides.

The Greek Poet tells us of Hecuba, not daring for ſhame, ſo much as to lift up her eyes, or look Polymneſtor in the face, becauſe ſhe had been a Queen, but was then a poor Captive. Common Captives can eaſily lift up their eyes and cryes to thoſe that are in proſperity, for relief and help, whereas others who have lived at eaſe, can with more eaſe ſtarve then beg.

As a downfal from a ſeeming height in ſpirituals into the mire of ſin, hath more wickedneſs in it then a bare continuance in ſin; ſo a downfal from a real height in temporals into the mire of miſery, hath more trouble in it, then a bare continuance in miſery. They who have made a fair ſhew, or an outward flouriſh in the Faith, and afterward fall back, are worſe then thoſe who never made any ſhew at all. It is ſad for any one to live openly in ſin; but for ſuch as have made an open profeſſion of godlineſs, to apoſtatize, and fall back to ſin, this is matter of ſaddeſt lamentation: For as the Apoſtle Peter ſpeakes, It had been better for them that they had not known the way of God, then after they have known it to turn from the holy Commandment : It is better (in ſpiritual reſpects) never to have been a Profeſſour, then to be an Apoſtate. Thus alſo it is better (in civil reſpects) never to have been high, or great in the World, then after all this to ſuffer a miſerable downfal, and to be numbred among the loweſt of the People.

And in this we may ſee the wonderful love of Jeſus Chriſt to poor ſinners, who ſuffered ſo great a change for our ſakes; he might well ſay, I was at eaſe, but he hath broken me aſunder. Chriſt was broken all to pieces for us, he was broken and bruiſed for us, but he had been at eaſe: How great was his love who willingly ſuffered not only for ſinners, but as a ſinner, having reigned in righteouſneſs from all eternity? The Apoſtle uſeth this argument, more then once, to advance the kindneſs of Chriſt to ſinful man (2 Cor. 8. 9.) Beloved, You know the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who though he were rich, yet he became poor for our ſakes, that we through his poverty might be made rich : For Chriſt who was rich to become poor, argues the riches of his love; this ſhews the great affection he bare to us, becauſe it ſhews that he bare ſuch great affliction for us.

Again (*Phil.*2.6,7.) Who being in the form of God, thought it no robbery to be equal with God; but made himſelf of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a Servant : He emptyed himſelf, to fill us; and to raiſe our reputation with his Father, laid down his own.

Now ſeeing Jeſus Chriſt ſuffered ſuch a wondrous change, from the form of God to the form of a Servant; from the fulneſs of God, to the emptineſs of the meaneſt man; this is the higheſt teſtimony of his love. The courſe which Chriſt did run to ſave us, declares that there went as much of his love, as of his worthineſs to ſave us: For as no creature had worth enough to ſave us any way, ſo no creature had love enough to ſave us ſuch a way. If one had come out of poverty and miſery to die for us, it had ſhewed wonderful love, but to leave riches and become poor, to leave glory and become baſe, to leave fulneſs and become empty, to leave (in regard of viſible manifeſtations) his God-head, and become Man: How unchangable was his heart to us, who yielded himſelf up to ſuch changes for us? He being at eaſe was broken aſunder that we might not be broken, or rather that we might be made whole for ever.

Secondly, I was at eaſe : What follows? He hath broken me aſunder.

Hence Obſerve, All worldly proſperity may quickly be daſht and loſt.

Do not think any new thing happens under the Sun, when you ſee men that were at eaſe, broken; men that were full, empty; men that were rich, impoveriſhed; men that were in health, ſick. The holy Apoſtle (1 *Cor.*7.30.) at once counſels and commands us, Uſe the World, as not abuſing it, that is, uſe it well: There is much evil in the World, yet we may, yea we muſt make a good uſe of the World: Why? Becauſe the faſhion of this World paſſeth away. As faſhions in the World alter and change every day, ſo doth the faſhion of this World; there is a World to come, the faſhion whereof ſhall never go or paſs away; but the faſhion (or ſcheme)of this World paſſeth continually. The word which we tranſlate faſhion, ſignifies a Geometrical figure, or artificial form, habit, veſture, as alſo any rhetorical fineneſs or bravery of words: Now all the beauty of this World is but like ſome of theſe ſchemes, which have more ſhew then ſubſtance in them; and the whole World below put together, is but like a Pageant, or Maſk, on the ſcene whereof many perſons are repreſented to act their parts, but they ſoon diſappear, and the ſtage or ſcene it ſelf is pulled down.

As thus the whole World paſſeth away, ſo doth the ſtate of each man in the World. And as there is in the World an affected varying of faſhions, or a voluntary paſſing from one vain faſhion to another, from one proud faſhion to another; ſo there is an inflicted variety of faſhion in the World; God makes man paſs from one faſhion to another, whether he will or no, or much againſt his will; when his faſhion was fulneſs, he makes it emptineſs; when his faſhion was riches, he makes it poverty; when his faſhion was Peace and quietneſs, he makes it Warr and confuſion; theſe are the changes which God makes among the faſhions of the World. The pride of man changes from one vain faſhion to a other; the providence of God changes man from his moſt delightful, to a mournful faſhion: And when the Garments of outward proſperity ſeem to us ſo ſtrong, that they will never wear out, how much or how long ſoever we wear them, he tears and breaks both them and us, as Job complains with his next breath.

He hath broken me aſunder.

ויפרפרני à radice. פור contrivit, irritũ fecit. Verba grandia ſelegit ad exaggerandam mali ſui vim. Merc. In conjugatione quadrata auxeſin habet. Merc. q. d. Frequentatis ictibus in minutiſſimas partes contrivit me. Bold.

This ſentence is but one word in the Hebrew, yet more then a ſingle word; it is elegantly doubled in conſtruction to imply double affliction. Grammarians tell us, that two words put together, or the ſame word twice put, increaſe the ſenſe. Ordinary words will not ſerve to expreſs an extraordinary condition; he ſpeaks great and compounded words, becauſe his ſorrows were great and compounded ſorrows. Jobs was not a ſingle, but a double breaking; yea, his was a manifold breaking: He was often broken, and utterly broken; the repeated ſtrokes which fell upon him (by divine diſpenſation) from all hands, had beaten him to duſt and atomes: He hath broken me in ſunder.

Further, The root of the word ſignifies, to make void, to diſſipate, to ſcatter, to bring to nought, or to make nothing of (Pſal. 33. 10) The Lord brings to nought the counſel of the heathen. So again (Iſa. 8. 10.) It is uſed often for breaking the Law, by frequent and wilfull ſinning againſt it. Proud ſinners would break the Law in ſunder, or pull it all in pieces: They have made void thy Law (Pſal. 119.) As if they would not onely ſin againſt the Law, but ſin away the Law; not onely withdraw themſelves from the obedience of it, but drive it out of the World; they would make void, and repeal the holy acts of God, that their own wicked acts might not be queſtioned; and leſt the Law ſhould have a power to puniſh them, they will deny it a power to rule them; that's the force of the ſimple word here uſed, as applied to higheſt tranſgreſſing againſt the Law of God.

Now as wicked men by ſinning, would batter the Law to pieces, ſo God by afflicting doth ſometimes break good men to pieces. Conſider what courſe uſage the holy Law of God hath in the hearts and lives of wicked men; O how they tear it, and vex it, and batter it every day: Thus doth the Lord deal with many of his holy ſervants, who (had they their wiſh) would not make the leaſt breach in the Law, and whoſe hearts are often broken with godly ſorrow, becauſe they cannot but break it, yet to theſe he doth not only give a bruiſe, or a blow, but breaks them aſunder.

Confractus ſum velut uvæ aut olivæ in torculari.

There is yet another elegancy in the ſignification of the word: For, as Hebricians obſerve, it notes a bruiſing, like that of Grapes or Olives, which are trodden in a preſs, to make Wine or Oyl; hence alſo a Noun from this Verb ſignifies the Wine-preſs (Iſa. 63. 3.) Now Grapes and Olives being trodden, are broken and bruiſed in pieces; not only is their form and beauty totally ſpoiled, but all their ſweetneſs, juyce, and Liquor, is wrought out of them, and they are left as a dry lump.

Now look what Grapes and Olives are, when taken out of the Preſs; even ſuch a lump was Job; he was broken aſunder in the Wine-preſs, though not of Gods wrath, as his Friends mis-judged, yet in the Wine-preſs of his chaſtiſements and ſevereſt tryals; all his worldly moiſture was ſqueezed out, and his earthly glory was quite defaced, he had nothing left of that, but (as it were) a dry husk; yet his ſpiritual eſtate was ſtill juicy, and his ſoul, by theſe preſſings, treadings, and breakings, had diſtilled much ſweet Oyl and Wine, and much more was ſtill remaining in him. From theſe heightned ſignifications of the word laid together;

> Obſerve in general: God doth not onely afflict thoſe whom he loves, but afflict them ſorely and ſeverely.

He afflicts ſome, not onely to the impairing and abating, but to the undoing and ruining of their outward comforts, and worldly enjoyments: Nothing can be ſaid to decipher an afflicted ſtate beyond what this word will bear. And that God doth afflict his choſen ones to the utmoſt rack of this phraſe, will appear alſo from all that follows to the end of the fourteenth Verſe; the opening of which will be a continual proof and illuſtration of this great and often experimented truth, upon, and among the precious Sons of Sion: This I ſhall hint all along, beſides thoſe obſervations which ariſe out of them: He hath broken me aſunder; and what follows in the ſame Verſe;

> He hath alſo taken me by my neck, and ſhaken me to pieces.

Is not this to deal ſeverely? A loving Father takes his Son about the neck and kiſſes him; what a rough ſalute did the Lord give this Son of his, when he took him by the neck and ſhook him to pieces? Such a carriage ſeems not to be after the manner of men, much leſs after the manner of Fathers; yet this was the manner of God to Job, who was alſo his Friend and Father.

He hath taken me by my neck.] The neck is as the tower and ſtrength of the body; and when a man is taken by the neck, he is aſſaulted in his chiefeſt ſtrength, and taken at the greateſt advantage.

There is a threefold metaphor, or alluſion in theſe words, which being conſidered diſtinctly, will let out their meaning yet more fully.

Firſt, They bear an alluſion to Wreſtlers, who take one another by the neck, or collar; he that is ſtrongeſt, not onely takes his Antagoniſt by the neck, but ſhakes him, as if he would ſhake him to pieces. God wreſtled with the Patriarch Jacob literally and corporally (though the greateſt labour and ſtreſs of Jacobs wreſtling was ſpiritual and internal.) And when he ſaw that he prevailed not (Jacob prevailed with God for ſo much ſtrength, that now God could not (according to that diſpenſation) prevail againſt Jacob, yet) he touched the hollow of Jacobs thigh, and made him halt. God wreſtled with Job, not corporally, yet in corporal things; the ſtreſs alſo of his wreſtling was ſpiritual, and he prevailed with God, and over Satan; yet God was pleaſed not only for the preſent, to touch a joynt, and make him halt, but even to ſhake every joynt and limb to pieces.

Secondly, It is an alluſion to Serjeants or Bailiffs, that are ſent to arreſt men for debt, or for their evil deeds: This ſort of men are boyſterous enough, they having power, will not forbear to lay hold on Perſons obnoxious, and take them by the neck, when they attach them. We have that uſage expreſſed (Matth. 18. 28.) The evil Servant, to whom the Lord had forgiven ten thouſand Talents (a vaſt debt) found one of his fellow-ſervants, who owed him an hundred pence (an inconſiderable ſum) and would needs exact the utmoſt from him: the Text ſaith, The ſame ſervant went out, and found one of his fellow-ſervants, which ought him an hundred pence, and he laid hands upon him, and took him by the throat, ſaying, Pay me that thou oweſt: He took him by the throat, the word ſignifies properly to choak, or to take another ſo rudely by the throat, as to choak, or (as we ſay) throttle him. It is tranſlated to choak with water, (Mark 5. 13.) and is appliable to any violent act by which the breath is ſtopt, eſpecially to taking by the neck, or throat.

Ἔπνιγε Premebat fauces illius debitoris tanquam ſuffocaturus: obtorto collo premebat. Eraſ.

Thirdly, It is an alluſion, as ſome conceive, to Conquerors in War, who, when they have worſted an Adverſary, take him by the Neck, and make him their Priſoner: As it is the laſt act of triumph and inſultation over an Enemy, to tread upon his neck (Joſh. 10. 24.) Joſhua called all the men of Iſrael, and ſaid unto the Captains of the men of War which went with them, Come neer, and put your feet upon the necks of theſe Kings: and they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them. Now as it is (I ſay) the laſt act of triumph to tread upon the neck; ſo it is the firſt act of triumph to take by the neck. Job thought himſelf uſed thus, He hath taken me by the neck, as a Wreſtler, as a Sergeant, or as a Victor in War.

ויפצ פצני A radice פרצ contrivit cum diſperſione, ſicut teſta: vel in minutiſſima fragmenta comminuit. Druſ.

And hath ſhaken me to pieces.] I will not let it paſs unobſerved, that the word which we tranſlate to ſhake in pieces, is but one in the Hebrew; but as that which we render to break aſunder, ſo this is doubled to heighten the ſenſe, and intimate no ordinary, but a terrible ſhaking; ſuch a ſhaking as is followed with ſcattering, or a ſhaking, like the breaking of a Potters Veſſel with an Iron Rod. The word is uſed to ſignifie the irreſiſtable efficacy of the Word of God, whether to convert, or to confound, to break the ſtony heart into contrition for ſin; or to batter the obſtinate heart, which continueth in ſin. Is not my word a fire? (ſaith God) The word of God is a fire, to conſume the droſs and corruption that is in the hearts and lives of men. And is not my word a Hammer? What kind of Hammer? A Hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces? Yes, the word of God is all this, 'tis a Fire, and 'tis a Hammer, it burns, it batters all that ſtands before it. Now as the Word of God is to the hearts of men, ſo the Rod of God is to the eſtates of men; it ſhakes, ſhatters, and breaks them to pieces: To ſhake, or break a man to pieces, is in common ſpeech appliable to the eſtates of men, as well as to their perſons; for of ſuch a man we ſay, He is broken.

Λαβὼν με τῆς κόμης. Sept.

The Septuagint reads this clauſe with an expoſitory addition; He hath taken me by the hair of the head, and ſhaken me. They who follow that reading, interpret it, by a metaphor, He hath taken me by the hair; that is, by my outward eſtate, by my riches, honour, and greatneſs (theſe are to men, as the hair is to the head, ornaments, yet excrements) he hath taken me by theſe hairs, even all my outward ſplendour and glory, and ſhaken them in pieces.

All this diverſity, whether of reading, or expounding the Text, meets in the main point, That God deals ſeverely with many whom he loves dearly.

He hath ſhaken me in pieces, and yet he hath not done with me; as the Lord broke and ſhook me aſunder when I was whole, ſo he wounds me now I am broken: If he can but find enough of me left together to make a mark of, I ſhall be ſure to feel his Arrows.

Proverbialis locutio quo ſignificamus aliquem eſſe omnibus telis & injuriis propoſitum.

And ſet me up for his mark.] Job was caſt down by affliction, and yet he was ſet up to receive more affliction: 'Tis a Proverbial ſpeech, ſignifying that a man is made the common receit, or ſubject of miſery. A Mark is purpoſely ſet up to receive Arrows, Darts, or Bullets ſhot at it; ſo that for a man to be ſet up as a mark, is to ſtand as a common object, upon which all calamities center themſelves; what Job here complains of, he had expoſtulated with God about (Chap. 7. 20.) Wherefore haſt thou ſet me up as a mark, ſo that I am a burden to my ſelf? I ſhall ſpeak the leſs to it here, having ſpoken to it there already.

A נטר ſervo, quod eum diligenter obſervent jaculatores ne oberrent.

Σκοπὸς, propriè ſignificat ſignum præfixum ſagittantibus, unde quod animo deſtinamus aut præfigimus ſcopus eſt. Eraſ.

The ſame Original word is not uſed in both places, though the ſenſe be the ſame: There Job ſpeaks in a Paraphraſe, Thou haſt ſet me oppoſite, or over againſt thee: Here he uſes a ſingle term, which notes a mark, ſtrictly taken; for it comes from a root which ſignifies to obſerve; becauſe the mark, or white, is diligently obſerved by him that ſhoots; the Archer keeps his eye upon the mark, that he may ſend his Arrow to the mark. A mark is that to the eye in ſhooting, which the end is to the mind of man in all his wayes of acting; and therefore our Engliſh word Scope from the Greek (σκοπὸς) which properly ſignifies an Archers mark, is uſed figuratively, to ſignifie the end which we deſign to our ſelves in every undertaking. And hence the eye with which we take aim, is put for the end (Matth. 6. 22.) If thine eye be ſingle, the whole body is light; that is, if the end, or the thing that thou aimeſt at be juſt and right, all thy actions will be right too: Every man is regulated by his end, all he doth looks that way; therefore, if thy end and aim be honeſt and ſincere, all thy wayes and works will be ſuch. So then, as the end is the mark of the mind, ſo a mark is the end of the eye; it directs all unto it. And while Job ſaiths He hath ſet me up as a mark, his meaning is, I am the But or white, at which the Lord aims all his Arrows, he empties his Quiver at my breaſt. So the Church cries out (Lam. 3. 12, 13.) He hath bent his bow, he hath ſet me as a mark for the Arrow; he hath cauſed the Arrows of his Quiver to enter into my reins: The Hebrew is, He hath cauſed the Sons of his Quiver to enter into my reins. Arrows are the Sons of the Quiver: Sons are called Arrows (Pſal. 127. 4, 5.) As Arrows in the hand of the mighty, ſo are the Children of the youth: bleſſed is the man that hath his Quiver full of them. Now as Sons are compared to Arrows in a Quiver, ſo Arrows are compared to Sons; becauſe as Sons are together in their Fathers houſe, ſo are Arrows in the Quiver. Chriſt is deſcribed by old Simeon, as a mark ſet up to ſhoot at (Luke 2. 34, 35.). This Child is ſet for the falling and riſing of many in Iſrael; and for a ſign to be ſpoken againſt. What ſign? A But-ſign, or a But-mark. A ſign to be ſpoken againſt; that is, All ſhall direct the Arrows of their words againſt him. Bitter words are compared to Arrows; many ſhowers of theſe were ſhot againſt Jeſus Chriſt: He was aimed at on every ſide, by envious ſpirits and malevolent tongues: He might ſay as Job, Thou haſt ſet me up as a mark.

Ego ipſe poſitus fui in ſcopum ut mille jacula, mille ſagittas exciperem.

Significat Chriſtum veluti ſcopum fore, quem omnes certatim figere contendant. Beza.

Obſerve from this Alluſion, Firſt, The Servants of God muſt expect many afflictions from the hand of God.

A mark is not ſet up (or it is very rarely ſet up) for one ſhot: As God hath more mercies then one in ſtore for his people, ſo he hath more Arrows then one for them in his Quiver. When thou haſt received one ſhot, prepare for a ſecond, and a third.

Obſerve, Secondly, God ſeems to take pleaſure in afflicting his people.

This alſo contributes to the proof of the general Obſervation before given: For the more pleaſure any one takes in afflicting, the more ſeverity he ſhews in afflicting. A Father chaſtiſeth his Child with tears in his eyes; every ſtroke which a wiſe Father gives his Child, is as a wound to himſelf, and this abates the ſmart of the blow; but for Fathers to do it, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (Heb. 12.) For their pleaſure, or when it pleaſeth a Father (in that ſenſe) to do it, this encreaſeth the ſmart. The ſufferer feels moſt pain, when it is a pleaſure to another to make him ſuffer. Now, what is ſhooting at a mark? No man ſhoots at a mark for toyl, to make a labour, and a buſineſs of it, but men ſhoot at a mark for their recreation and pleaſure.

God delights not properly in the ſorrows and ſufferings of his people; he is not like thoſe cruel Tyrants, who faſten their Captives to a Poſt, and then ſhoot them dead for ſport: God doth not willingly, much leſs ſportingly, afflict the Children of Men (Lam. 3. 33.) yet it pleaſeth him to afflict them; yea, as Job ſpeaks (Chap. 9.) He laughs at the tryal of the innocent; that is, He carries himſelf (as to their ſenſe) as if he did not regard what they ſuffered, though indeed he be infinitely tender of them all in their ſufferings; yet becauſe they do not alwayes underſtand the language of this laughter, it makes them cry out as if God had forſaken them, and were either really turned an Enemy againſt them, or at leaſt, did not uſe them as his Friends; from which near relation, nothing appears more remote, than to be ſet up, and ſhot at as a mark.

There is a great difference between ſhooting at randome, and ſhooting at a mark. God doth not draw his bow at a venture (as he who ſlew Ahab did, 1 Kings 22. 34.) or ſhoot at the whole hoſt of mankind, let the Arrow light where and on whom it will, but he ſingles out the particular perſon whom he intends to hit. Every one of his Arrows goes upon a ſpecial errand, and touches no breaſt but that againſt which it was ſent: And as this ſpeaks the honour of God, who determines as much, upon whom, as what to do; and chuſeth out thoſe at whom he means to ſhoot, as well as the means by which he ſhoots at them; ſo it ſhould eſtabliſh our hearts to receive his ſhot, and in this ſenſe, to be like a ſenſeleſs mark, which ſtirs not from the Arrow, nor withdraws from the deadly Bullet. It is not onely the grace, but the glory of a Believer, when he can ſtand as a But-mark, and take affliction quietly. The Apoſtle ſpeaks near this language, and fully this truth (1 Theſ. 1. 3.) I would that no man ſhould be moved for theſe afflictions; for you your ſelves know that we are appointed thereunto. As if he had ſaid, I would have you ſtand as Poſts, notwithſtanding all theſe afflictions: Not that he would have them careleſs or ſecure, but couragious, and full of holy undauntedneſs: I would have no man flinch, or ſtir a foot, no more than a mark that is ſhot at; Why? Knowing that we are appointed thereto: As a mark is appointed to be ſhot at, and ſet up on purpoſe that the Arrow may be directed againſt it; ſo the Lord ſets up his Saints and Servants on purpoſe, that he may ſhoot the Arrows of affliction at them; therefore let us keep our ground, and not be moved. We honour God, yea, it is our honour alſo, when we are unmoveable in active obedience, as the Apoſtle exhorts (2 Cor. 15. 58.) Wherefore my Brethren, be ſtedfaſt and unmoveable, alway abounding in the work of the Lord, foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord. But as it is our honour, and Gods honour too, when we are unmoveable in doing the will of God; ſo it is a greater honour both to him and us, when we are ſo in ſuffering his will, or in paſſive obedience; when we ſtand to it, and move no more in way of cowardiſe and impatience then a Poſt when it is ſhot at. This is the glory of a Chriſtian, and it is his duty; this is the glory of God, and it is his due; though it be put here as an aggravation of the greatneſs of Jobs affliction, that he was ſet as a ſtanding mark, yet it is a heightning of our praiſe contentedly to be ſo.

God will make wicked men his ſtanding mark to all eternity, againſt whom he will ſhoot the Arrows, the poyſoned Arrows of his indignation, which ſhall drink up their ſpirits, and yet their ſpirits ſhall not be conſumed. God makes his precious Servants and faithful people, his ſtanding mark for a time, they feel the Arrows of affliction, and are deeply wounded; as Job further proſecutes his ſad condition, continuing the Allegory in the next Verſe.

Verſ. 13. His Archers compaſs me round about, he cleaveth my reins in ſunder, &c.

God hath a Bow, he hath his Arrows, and his Archers, all ready at a call. The decree of God is his Quiver, his Arrows are his purpoſes, and the Inſtruments which execute them are his Archers; whether rational or irrational, whether men, or things, any thing which God uſeth to afflict man by, is his Archer: His Archers have compaſſed me about: The word is (Rabbi) His Archers. from Rab, great; ſo ſome read it, His great Ones have compaſſed me about. The word Rab, doth not only ſignifie greatneſs in bulk, or continued quantity, but in number, or diſcreet quantity. Hence Archers are called, Rabbi, great ones; not from their magnitude, but from their multitude, becauſe Archers go in company; two at the leaſt, and uſually many are a ſet; or they are called many, becauſe every one hath many Arrows. Men carry but one Sword, and one Spear, but they carry many Arrows, therefore the word ſignifies many. His Archers, or many, compaſs me round about. Hence note, in proſecution of the ſame point, רביך Magni ejus: ſed hic quadrare non poteſt. Licet enim רבב ſig. magnitudinē ſive in quantitate continua ſive in diſcreta, hic tāmen in diſcreta eſt accipienda, a multitudine enim ſagittarii dicuntur. Rabin.

That, God hath variety of means to afflict.

He can make any creature his Archer; and he hath many Quivers full of Arrows. Old Jacob ſaid of Joſeph (Gen. 49. 23.) The Archers ſhot ſore at him, and grieved him. Joſeph was a mark of envy, becauſe God had put ſo many marks of honour upon him: His own Brethren were the Archers. Job had many Archers ſhooting at him: I can name you ſeven eminent Archers that ſhot at Job.

Firſt, Heaven was an Archer; the Heavens ſhot fire, which burnt up his flocks of ſheep.

Secondly, The Air was an Archer, that ſhot wind, and down fell the Houſe upon his Children.

Thirdly, The Chaldeans and Sabeans were Archers, and they ſhot ſpoyling and plundering; they took away all his Cattel, and ſlew his Servants with the edge of the Sword.

Fourthly, The Devil was an Archer, he ſhot diſeaſes, and wounded his body all over with ſores.

Fifthly, The earth was an Archer, and that ſhot Worms, he was cloathed with Worms, and clods of Earth.

Sixthly, His Wife was an Archer, or an Archereſs, ſhe ſhot terrible Arrows, evil and bitter words.

Seventhly, His Friends were Archers, they ſhot reproofs, and uncomfortable comforts; they pierced him with their ſalves, and the very means that they uſed to heal him, grieved him more.

All theſe ſhot at him; he muſt needs have many hurts, who was compaſſed about with ſo many Archers. David felt the anguiſh of theſe Arrows (Pſal. 38. 1.) O Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, neither chaſten me in thy hot diſpleaſure: For thine arrows ſtick faſt in me, and thy hand preſſeth me ſore. David was full of Arrows; what thoſe Arrows were, is not determined in the Text. One of the Ancients ſaith, They were the threatnings of God, with which his conſcience was wounded for ſin: as for his body and outward eſtate, they were in a whole skin. 'Tis true, judgments or wrath threatned, wound the ſpirit deeper then judgments or wrath executed wound the outward man; and as the whole word of God, ſo that part of it eſpecially which conſiſts of threatnings, is, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks (Heb. 4. 12.) Quick and powerful, and ſharper then any two-edged Sword, piercing, even to the dividing aſunder of the ſoul and ſpirit, &c. Yet I rather conceive, that Davids Arrows were bodily troubles or diſeaſes already inflicted, the immediate cauſe of which was the anger of God, and the cauſe of which was his own ſin, both which are expreſſed at the third Verſe, There is no ſoundneſs in my fleſh, becauſe of thine anger, neither is there any reſt in my bones, becauſe of my ſin: When ſin ſtirs up the anger of God, the anger of God can quickly ſend his Arrows abroad; nor is there any thing in this World ſo near unto us, but he can make an Arrow, or an Archer of it; His Archers compaſs me round.

And ſee what kind of Archers his were, they were no bunglers, they were good marks men; like the left-handed Benjamites (Judg. 20. 16.) They could ſhoot at a hairs breadth and not miſs. For it follows:

He cleaveth my reins aſunder.] They are expert Archers who can cleave the reins: The reins are in the middle of the back. He that ſhoots at a Butt, and hits the middle of it, ſhoots exactly; the whole Butt is not the mark, but the White, which is ſet (according to a Geometrical proportion) in the middle of it. He that hits the mark, hits the middle of the Butt; but he that cleaves the Pin, (that's the Archers Dialect) which faſtens the mark to the Butt, That's the Archer, or That's He (as they alſo uſe to ſpeak at their ſport) he wins the prize: An Archer may hit the man, and not his reins; but to hit his reins, is skilful archery: Jobs Archers were thus cunning in their art, They compaſs me about, and cleave my reins aſunder: That's the firſt.

Further, We may underſtand it by a metaphor, and ſo two wayes.

Firſt, The reins being the ſeat of deſire, as Naturaliſts ſpeak; ſome interpret, he cleaveth my reins aſunder, thus, He ſmites me in that which is to me moſt pleaſant and deſireable: and then the ſeat of affection is put for the thing which we affect. This holds out a profitable truth.

Renes ſedes ſunt affectus & libidinis vehementiſſimi. Renū nomē in Hebræo à deſiderando dicitur.

כליותי Vulnerare renes eſt teneriores affectus configere.

God can wound us in that upon which we moſt entirely ſet our affections.

He knows how to cleave our very reins aſunder, and he often doth it; that which we inordinately love, is uſually the mark at which he aims his Arrow: The readieſt way to loſe any comfort, is to over-love it (I add that by way of caution, not of direction.) And indeed, though it be a great deal of ſmart to us, yet it may prove a great deal of eaſe to us, to be wounded in that which we overlove. God in much mercy to thoſe he loves, takes that from them which they love too much, that ſo they may love him the more, to whom all their love, and more if they had it, is but due: He cleaves their reins, that their reins may cleave to him.

Secondly, The reins in a metaphor, ſignifie that which is moſt ſecret and hidden (Pſal. 16. 7.) My reins alſo inſtruct me in the night ſeaſon; that is, my moſt inward thoughts inſtruct me, I have ſecret communion with my ſelf, and my heart reads me a curtain Lecture every night. My reins inſtruct me in the night ſeaſon. This metaphorical interpretation gives us this plain Note.

God pierceth into our moſt retired thoughts, and can puniſh our moſt ſecret ſins.

Thoſe ſins which lye as much out of ſight as the reins do, he ſeeth, and he ſeeth them as plainly as an Archer doth the white, or mark, which ſtands open to the eye; for all things are naked and manifeſt (anatomiz'd, or cut open to the reins of the back, ſo much the word bears, and ſo manifeſt are we) before his eyes with whom we have to do.

Take it literally, and then to cleave the reins, is an expreſſion of putting a man to the greateſt ſorrow or pain imaginable; if the back were chined (as we ſpeak) and cut quite down through the reins, this would be an exquiſite torment; the reins are a very tender part: A deep wound in ſome other parts of the body, is but a ſcratch, and ſuch wounding were a kind of embracing, in compariſon of that.

Secondly,

Plumbem reddere.

Secondly, To cleave the reins, is to weaken, becauſe the reins, or the loyns, are the ſtrength of a man, or of any creature; Loe his ſtrength is in his loyns, ſaith God of Behemoth, which is as ſome think the Elephant (Job 40. 16.) And a man of no loyns is a man of no ſtrength, in common language.

Mala immedicabilia indicat.

Thirdly, To cleave the reins, is to give a mortal wound. Chyrurgions and Phyſicians obſerve, That if the reins be ſtruck through, there is no help for it; cleaving the reins is much like piercing the heart; this is preſent death, and that leaves no hope of life, the wound of it is incurable.

There is a fourth interpretation, He cleaveth my reins, may note the torture of any acute Diſeaſe, eſpecially that of the Stone in the Reins or Kidneys; which is as it were the cutting of the back aſunder; poor Patients under it are often heard ſo complaining: Oh, 'tis like a ſharp Knife; the Stone is not only a grinding, but a cutting pain.

I ſhall onely lay in the conſideration of theſe four gloſſes from the literal ſenſe of the word, to a farther making out of the firſt general Obſervation, That God often deals very ſeverely in outward, or preſent diſpenſations, with many of his deareſt Servants: He doth that which they may call cleaving of the reins; and that, in the eaſieſt of the four ſenſes, is a very ſevere diſpenſation; much more (which we may ſuppoſe) when the pain of all four meets in one man, as doubtleſs they did in Job; He cleaveth my reins aſunder.

חמל Pepercit, ignovit, propitius fuit. Nullam Domihi in me miſericordiam, ſed omnigenam ſævitiam experior. Merc.

And doth not ſpare.] He that doth not ſpare, uſeth the utmoſt extremity, and ſhews no pity or indulgence: to ſpare, is both an act, and one of the kinds of mercy: Sparing is oppoſed to ſeverity, it is a doing leſs againſt another then we may, and that two wayes.

Firſt, When we do leſs then we can. We having power, though no right to do more then we do, no nor to do ſo much as we do: Thus a thief may be ſaid to ſpare a man, when he doth not take all from him, life and all.

Secondly, When we do leſs againſt another then we may, both according to the right of our cauſe, and the power in our hands: Thus a Magiſtrate ſpares a Thief, or a Creditor his Debtor; when the one exacts not the whole puniſhment, nor the other the whole Sum due. And in this ſenſe God ſpareth the Sons of men; he hath both power and right to puniſh ſinful man to the utmoſt, but he ſpares him: To hold the hand, though but a little, is ſparing mercy; but Job found not this mercy, He doth not ſpare; as if he had ſaid, The Lord layes on, layes on, and doth not forbear.

Hence obſerve; There is mercy in ſparing.

There is a five-fold mercy of God.

Firſt, Rewarding mercy, towards thoſe who have done well.

Secondly, Pardoning mercy, which is exerciſed towards thoſe who have done ill, or towards paſt ſin.

Thirdly, Preventing mercy, when he keeps us from evil, whether it be the evil of ſin, or of puniſhment.

Fourthly, Delivering mercy, when though he let us fall into the evil of ſin or puniſhment, yet he is pleaſed to help us up, and take us out again.

Fifthly, There is Sparing mercy; if, while we are in affliction, God deals gently with us, this is ſparing mercy: As God was not pleaſed to prevent Jobs ſorrows, nor to deliver him from them, ſo he did not ſpare him in them; his hand continued heavy upon him, he had no eaſe.

There is a four-fold degree of this ſparing mercy of God.

Firſt, Not to puniſh at all: thus God ſometimes ſpares his own people, as a Father ſpares his Son that ſerveth him (Mal. 3. 17.) Though they fail, yet he paſſeth it by, and doth not reckon with them for it. The Lord repreſented himſelf to Amos, forming Graſs-hoppers, which either in kind, or in a figure (ſhadowing the Aſſyrians) threatned to devour the land; this Viſion put the Prophet upon that earneſt prayer, O Lord God, forgive, by whom ſhall Jacob ariſe, for he is ſmall? The Lord repented for this, it ſhall not be, ſaith the Lord (Amos 7. 1, 2, 3.) Here was ſparing mercy, and this is repeated a ſecond time (Verſ. 6.) yet in the third Viſion of a Plumb-line (by which God was noted, taking exact notice of all the unevenneſs and crookedneſs of that people in that Viſion, I ſay) as the Prophet ſuſpended Prayer, ſo the Lord being reſolved no longer to ſuſpend their puniſhment, ſaith, I will not paſs by them again any more: that is, I will ſpare them no more, which is again repeated (Chap. 8. 2.) where by a Basket of Summer fruit the Lord ſhewed their ripeneſs in ſin, and his readineſs to puniſh, and not to ſpare.

Secondly, It is ſparing mercy, when puniſhment is deferred, or adjourned to a farther day; thus the Lord ſpared the old World, a hundred and twenty years, My ſpirit ſhall not alway ſtrive: It did a long time, he ſpared them many years to draw them to repentance, and to leave them inexcuſable, becauſe they repented not.

Thirdly, It is ſparing mercy, when judgment is moderated: When, though God puniſh, yet he doth not puniſh to the full; when, though the cloud break, yet he lets but a few drops fall on us, and doth not pour out ſhowers, or make an inundation to overwhelm us; when, though he ſtrike, yet he gives but few ſtrokes; yea, if he abate but one ſtroke, it is ſparing mercy. The Jews (2 Cor. 11. 24.) gave Paul, forty ſtripes, ſave one; and in this they would be thought to be merciful, becauſe they might have given him forty by the Law, (Deut. 25. 3.) therefore to abate one, was ſparing mercy. As to puniſh beyond the Law, though it be but a little beyond, is cruelty; ſo to puniſh leſs, though it be but a little leſs, is mercy: And this is brought in as an argument of great mercy (Pſal. 78. 38.) But he being full of compaſſion, forgave their iniquity, and deſtroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not ſtir up all his wrath: They felt his wrath, but God did not ſtir up all his wrath; they were ſmitten, but not deſtroyed, Juſtice did not make an utter end of them, there was mercy in that. The like read (Jer. 30. 11. Jer. 46. 28.) I will not let thee go altogether unpuniſhed (yet I will ſpare thee, though I puniſh thee) I will correct thee in meaſure, I will not make a full end of thee. But are not all the corrections of God, yea, and his judgments too, done in meaſure? All the judgments of God are done in meaſure, as meaſure notes a rule of equity, but not as meaſure notes a rule of equality. Again, to do a thing by meaſure, doth not alwayes note the rule by which it is done, but the degree in which it is done. And ſo to do a thing in meaſure, is to do it moderately; as when it is ſaid, (John 3. 24.) That God gives not the ſpirit by meaſure to Chriſt: the meaning is onely this, he gives him the ſpirit abundantly, infinitely, without ſtint or limit: So when it is ſaid, that he corrects man in meaſure, the meaning is onely this, that he corrects him moderately, mercifully, with many ſtints and limits. It is of the Lords mercy, (ſaith Jeremy, Lam. 3. 22.) What? That we are delivered? That we are crowned with comforts? Theſe are of the Lords mercy indeed: but he ſpeaks not of theſe, the mercy he ſpeaks of is, That we are not utterly conſumed. What kind of mercy is this? Sparing mercy. Suppoſe God take away many Children, yet if he leave but one, here is ſparing mercy to the Parents: Suppoſe he take many hundreds and thouſands of a mans eſtate, yet if he leave him a little to buy Bread, and to ſtand between him and Beggary, this is ſparing mercy: Suppoſe we are much conſumed, yet if we are not utterly conſumed, this is alſo ſparing mercy. In the Prophecy of Daniel, we read of a goodly tree, And behold a watcher, and an holy one came down from Heaven, and cryed aloud, Hew down the Tree, and cut off his branches, ſhake off his leaves, and ſcatter his fruit, &c. Nevertheleſs, leave the ſtump of his root in the earth, &c. Though it was judgment to ſhake off the leaves and fruit, to hew down the boughs and ſtock, yet it was ſparing mercy to leave the root, that gave hopes it might grow again, and not to be utterly conſumed; 'tis ſparing mercy when any thing is reſerved: But God did not ſpare Job, he took all; he did not leave him (as we ſay) A ſhirt to his back, nor a ſound patch in his ſkin: Satans power had no limit put to it, but as to life onely (Chap. 2. 6.) Behold, he is in thine hand, but (or onely) ſave his life: There was indeed ſomewhat of ſparing mercy in that, and that was more than Satan would have ſpared, yet it was but ſo much, as without which he could not have groaned out this complaint, as to the loſs of all other comforts, He doth not ſpare.

Fourthly, There is a ſparing mercy of God in the very act of afflicting, when he ſhews that he is unwilling to afflict, or diſcovers tenderneſs to them that are afflicted (Lam. 3.12.) He doth not willingly afflict, nor grieve the children of men. As there are many who will ſerve God in an outward form of worſhip, whom yet they neither ſerve nor worſhip with their will: So God will afflict ſome, whom he doth not afflict with his will; he doth not give out his ſpirit, or take delight in ſmiting, while he ſmites them. Thus the Lord expreſſed himſelf towards his ancient people the Jewes; he threatens Iſrael, That the Aſſyrian ſhall be his King; that is, the Aſſyrian ſhall carry them Captives to Babylon and exerciſe a tyrannical power over them (Hoſ. 11. 5.) Yea, the Sword ſhall abide on his Cities, and ſhall conſume his branches (Verſ. 6.) Now though God were reſolved to do this, and did alſo bring it to paſs; yet he ſaith (Ver. 8.) How ſhall I give thee up Ephraim? How ſhall I deliver thee, Iſrael? (ſc. into the Enemies hand) How ſhall I make thee as Admah? How ſhall I ſet thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together: I will not execute the fierceneſs of mine anger, I will not return to deſtroy Ephraim: that is, I will not deſtroy him wholly, by redoubling evil upon him: I will deſtroy once, but I will not return to deſtroy, a remnant ſhall be ſaved. The Lord gave up Ephraim, but he did not make Ephraim as Admah, and Zeboim, he did not utterly ruine him; and what he did againſt Ephraim, he did it with a ſecret conteſt in his own ſpirit, How ſhall I do this? I do it not with my heart, and whole mind; my heart is turned within me, while my hand is turned againſt thee; it grieveth me while thou art grieved; while I kindle this fire of affliction in thy borders, the fire of compaſſion kindles in my own bowels; My repentings are kindled together, while I puniſh thee for thine impenitency, and my heart is turned within me, while I muſt correct thee, for refuſing to return (Verſ. 5.)

Quam vellē neſcire literas!

Nero being deſired to ſign a Writ for the execution of an Offender, was ſo pittiful at his firſt entrance upon the Empire (though he proved a Monſter for cruelty after) that he could hardly be perſwaded or wrought to ſubſcribe it, and when he did it, in doing it he ſaid, How glad ſhould I be if I could not write my name; which wiſh occaſioned Seneca his Tutour, to write a Book of Clemencie, in which he extols Nero, as the pattern and mirrour of clemencie. When either God or man do acts of ſevereſt Juſtice, with meltings of ſpirit, and tenderneſs of affection towards thoſe who fall under their hand, thoſe acts of Juſtice have a great temperament of ſparing mercy in them.

For as it is in ſinning, when a Believer falls into a great ſin, yet becauſe his heart cannot go fully with it, he cannot delight or take pleaſure in it, therefore his may be called Sparing ſinfulneſs: whereas a carnal heart committing only a little ſin, for the matter, yet, becauſe he delighteth in it, and is pleaſed with ſin, he doth not ſpare to ſin. Now (I ſay) as it is in ſinning, ſo in puniſhing; he doth not ſpare to puniſh, who doth it with his whole heart, and takes delight in it, though the actual puniſhment be but little, whereas he whoſe heart retreats while his hand is ſtretched out in greater puniſhments, may be ſaid to ſpare in puniſhing.

Hence, to ſhew that God exacted the utmoſt of his Juſtice upon his Son our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, when he ſtood in our place; the Apoſtle ſaith (Rom. 8. 32.) He ſpared not his Son. How did he not ſpare him? He did not ſpare him any of theſe four wayes. He did not ſpare him, ſo, as not to puniſh him at all; for the Cup could not paſs from him. He did not ſpare him by deferring the time, but when the hour was come that he muſt ſuffer, he ſuffered in that moment. Nor did he ſpare him in the degree, he ſuffered to the utmoſt for our ſins, God did not abate one drop out of his Cup, not one dram of the weight of his ſorrows: Yea fourthly, God did not ſpare him, in regard of the affection with which he puniſhed him: The Lord may be ſaid willingly to afflict him for the ſins of the Children of men, though he doth not willingly afflict the Children of men; He was pleaſed to bruiſe him (Iſa. 53.) and that ſignifies not only (Voluntatem Dei) that it was the purpoſe and reſolution of God, that his Son ſhould be bruiſed for our ſins; but it ſignifies alſo (Voluptatem Dei) the delight and contentment that the Lord had in bruiſing his Son. He did not ſpare, but gave him up with his heart, to thoſe puniſhments which were due to ſinners. God ſhewed no more relenting towards his Son, when he ſtood ſuffering in the place of ſinners, then he doth to thoſe ſinners who ſtand in their own place to ſuffer without his Son: Yea, God the Father did not only not relent, or ſhew any yerning of bowels towards his Son in that ſuffering condition, but (as to ſenſe and preſent apprehenſion) he hardned his heart towards him, which cauſed that grievous out-cry of Chriſt upon the Croſs, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?

Not that God did really withdraw his love in the leaſt, from his Son, but he did infinitely delight to ſee his Juſtice ſatisfied; and his Son as a Conquerour, bearing up under the weight of it. Thus the Lord took pleaſure in afflicting his Son, or (as Job ſpeaks, Chap. 9.) He laughed at the tryal of that innocent and Holy one: And indeed, without this, the work of our redemption had not been accompliſhed by a full ſatisfaction to divine Juſtice; for it would have had ſomewhat of mercy in it towards the Redeemer, as well as it is all mercy towards the redeemed: But as it is all of mercy to us, ſo it was to be nothing at all of mercy to Jeſus Chriſt, that ſinners are redeemed: he was to have no more of his Father then he paid for, and his Father did not ſpare him, but made him pay the utmoſt Farthing, that upon the caſting up of the account between himſelf and ſinful man appeared a due debt unto his Juſtice. Job complains, that he was not ſpared, yet the truth is, that every man, how much ſoever he ſuffers on this ſide Hell, hath ſomewhat of ſparing mercy in his ſufferings.

Secondly, Foraſmuch as Job being about to ſhew the extremity of his affliction, tells us, That God did not ſpare, Obſerve, Sparing mercy is the loweſt degree of mercy: If God deny ſparing mercy, he denies all mercy.

It is argument enough that God ſhewed Chriſt no mercy, when the Apoſtle ſaith, He did not ſpare him. That we ſinners might have all mercy, he that ſaved us from our ſins had none. The Angels who ſinned found no mercy, no ſacrifice was provided for them, God caſt them down to Hell, and delivered them into chains of darkneſs, to be reſerved unto judgement: All which puniſhments are affirmed by the Apoſtle Peter, as the reſult of this Negative, God ſpared not the Angels (2 Pet. 2.4.) The ſame Apoſtle tells us alſo in the next Verſe, that, God ſpared not the old World, but ſaved Noah, the eighth perſon, a Preacher of righteouſneſs, bringing in the Flood upon the world of the ungodly. Neither the Angels who apoſtatiz'd from God, nor the old ungodly World had any ſhare in ſparing mercy. Job looked upon himſelf (in reference to preſent peace) as one in their caſe, He doth not ſpare, which appears further in the next clauſe.

He poureth out my Gall upon the ground.

Vulg.

The Original word which we render Gall, ſignifies properly, bitterneſs, becauſe the Gall is ſo. Peter ſpeaking to Simon Magus (Act. 8.23.) puts theſe two together, I perceive that thou art in the Gall of bitterneſs: He that continues in ſin, lives in the Gall of ſpiritual bitterneſs; and he whoſe Gall is poured out, is in, or ready to go into the gall of corporal death. For as cleaving of the reins, implyed the receiving of a deadly wound; ſo pouring out the Gall upon the ground, is a proverbial, ſpeaking preſent death. When the gall is out, the bowels are out; the gall is affixed to the Liver: So that, it is as much as to ſay, He kills me dead, or I am now upon the borders of death it ſelf: When the gall is indeed powred out, we cannot live; and he who is afflicted to ſuch a height, that he cryes, my gall is poured out, may well be numbred among the dead. The reaſon or original of this ſpeech was this (as I conceive) becauſe when a wild Beaſt, or any other (which are fit for mans eating) are taken and ſlain, it is uſual when the bowels are pulled out, to cut off, and throw away, or pour out the Gall upon the ground, leſt the overflowing of it ſhould diſreliſh the neighbouring parts: So that Job in this doth only proſecute the former theam of his grievous ſufferings, or that he was (as Paul ſpeaks of himſelf (2 Cor.1.18.) preſſed out of meaſure, above ſtrength, inſomuch that he deſpaired even of life; which he gives us yet more fully in the next Verſe.

Verſ. 14. He breaketh me with breach upon breach, and runneth on me like a Giant.

Job varies into all manner of inventions and alluſions, to ſet forth both the conſtancy and extremity of his afflictions. As before he compared himſelf to a mark, againſt which Arrows are ſhot; ſo now to a Stone-wall, or fortified Tower, againſt which, battering Rams of old, and Cannons in latter ages, are uſually planted to make a breach, that the Souldiery may come up to the aſſault.

פרץ Vi diſrupit, erupit. Poeticè variat orationis modos lugubres.

He breaketh me with breach upon breach.

Some men are like fortified Cities, which cannot be eaſily entred; yet when the Lord of Hoſts draws up his Armies and beſiegeth them, he hath Artillery and Ammunition enough to thunder down their higheſt Towers, and to make breach upon breach in their thickeſt walls. Satan complains (Chap. 1.) Thou haſt made a hedge about him: Job's hedge was the protection of God; that hedge was ſo ſtrong that Satan could not pull up a ſtake of it, nor make a gap in it, till God gave him leave. But though Job (as this ſimilitude implyes) were like a wall or fortified tower, yet God had made breaches in him: God can ſoon break our eſtates, our ſtrength, our health, our comforts, our peace, our all. And when Job ſaith, he breaks me with breach upon breach; he means a multitude of breaches made together, or continual breaches, made one after another: Jeremy laments (Chap.4.16.) My bowels, my bowels, I am pained at the very heart, my heart makes a noiſe in me: Why doth he thus double upon theſe words, My bowels, my bowels, my heart, my heart? The twentieth Verſe gives us an account of that, Deſtruction upon deſtruction is cryed, for the whole Land is ſpoiled: Deſtruction upon deſtruction is total deſtruction. Thus Sampſon repeats his Victory over the Philiſtines (Judg.15.16.) With the Jaw-bone of an Aſs heaps upon heaps; or (as the letter of the Hebrew) an heap to heaps; that is, I have made a great ſlaughter; or as himſelf explaines it in the cloſe of the Verſe, I have ſlain a thouſand men. We have the Prophet Ezekiels threat in the ſame language (Chap.7.26.) Miſchief ſhall come upon miſchief, and rumour ſhall be upon rumour: When the Prophet Iſaiah would convince the Jews of their unteachableneſs, that whereas (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Heb.5.12.) They ought to be teachers; yet they had need to be taught the firſt principles of the Oracles of God, like little Children, who muſt have the ſame precepts and lines often and often inculcated upon them, he gives it us in the form of this Text (Iſa.28.10.) For precept muſt be upon precept, line upon line; that is, they muſt be continually followed with precepts, they muſt have many, and yet they ſcarce learn one; or (as others expound that place) the Prophet deſcribes the ſcornfulneſs of that people who jeered the Meſſengers of God for their frequency in Preaching, with a riming ſcoff, Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little, and there a little; which ſingle tearms the Prophets had often uſed in their Sermons. Now which way ſoever we take the proper ſenſe of that place, yet the common ſenſe of the words reaches this in in Job: for precept upon precept, ſpeaks there a multitude of precepts, even as here, breach upon breach ſpeaks a multitude of breaches, or breaches all over. And the Apoſtle Paul expreſſeth himſelf in this ſtrain, while he gives the reaſon of the recovery of Epaphroditus from a dangerous ſickneſs (Phil.2.27.) He was ſick (ſaith Paul) nigh unto death, but God had mercy on him; and not only on him, but on me alſo, leaſt I ſhould have ſorrow upon ſorrow; that is, many ſorrows heaped up together. So then, when Job complains of his breaking with breach upon breach; the plain meaning is, that he had many, very many breaches: His very wounds were wounded, there was nothing in him, or about him to be ſmitten, but what had been ſmitten already. As if he had ſaid, I am ſo full of breaches and afflictions, that there is no whole ſpace or room left for a new breach, for another affliction: As he that lies upon the ground can fall no lower, ſo he that is all broken cannot be broken any more.

Vulnera ipſa vulnerat. Nō habet in nobis jā nova plaga locū.

Job had breach upon breach in his eſtate, his Cattle, and goods were taken away: Job had breach upon breach in his Family, moſt of his Servants, and all his Children were deſtroyed: Job had breach upon breach in his body, that was ſick and ſoar: Job had breach upon breach in his credit, he was called Hypocrite again and again: Job had breach upon breach in his ſoul, that was filled with fear and terrour from the Lord.

Hence Note, The beſt Saints on earth are ſubject, not only to great, but various troubles, to breach upon breach.

God is pleaſed to ſmite them ſundry times, and he ſmites them ſundry wayes: 'Tis no argument that a man ſhall be no more afflicted, becauſe he is afflicted, or that God will not ſmite again, becauſe he hath ſmitten already. God doth not ſtay his hand by looking upon the number, but upon the effect and fruit of our afflictions: Every Child of his, whom he corrects, muſt look for more corrections, till repentance hath had its perfect work; and every Champion of his whom he tryes, muſt look for more tryals, till faith and patience have had their perfect work. God would not give his Children ſo much as one blow, or one breach, not ſo much as a little finger of theirs ſhould ake, were it not for one of theſe ends; and until theſe ends be attained, they ſhall have many blowes and breaches, even till the whole head be ſick, and the whole heart faint, till from the ſole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no ſoundneſs in them, but wounds and bruiſes and putrifying ſoars. As the Vine-dreſſer cuts, and cuts, prunes, and prunes the Vine, this day and the next day, becauſe once cutting or pruning will not ſerve to make it fruitful: So the Lord prunes, and cuts, and pares, and breaks, and breaks, not to deſtroy his people, but to make them (as pleaſant Vines) bring forth abundantly, either the fruits of godly ſorrow for their ſins committed againſt him, or the proofs and experiments of the graces which they have received from him. This latter was Job's caſe, and the chief cauſe why he was broken with breach upon breach. And no ſooner had the Lord by his roaring Cannon, made breaches in him, fair, and aſſaultable, but he preſently takes his advantage, as Job ſhewes elegantly (purſuing the Allegory) in the laſt clauſe, Ut in vineis labor labori, cura curæ, ſemper additur, &c. Sanct.

He runs upon me as a Giant.

When a breach is made in the wall, the beſiegers run up to aſſault and ſtorm the place. Job keeps to the Souldiers language, the Lord hath made breach upon breach, and and now He runs upon me as a Giant. There are three things in this expreſſion.

כגבור Sicut fortis potens idem valet Gigas & ἰσχυρός.

Firſt, The ſpeed which God made to aſſault him, He runs.

Secondly, The ſtrength that God puts forth in aſſaulting him, he runs, not as a Child, not as a weak man, no nor as the ordinary ſort of ſtrong men; but as a Giant, or mighty man, who exceeds other men, as Goliah did David, both in ſtrength and ſtature.

Thirdly, Running as a Giant, notes courage as well as ſtrength. A Giant runs fiercely and fearleſly.

David compares the Sun at his riſing, to a Bridegroom coming out of his Chamber, and to a Giant, or ſtrong man (it is the word of this Text) who rejoyceth to run a race (Pſal. 19.5.) Giants are ſwift, and Giants are ſtrong. Some men are ſtrong but not ſwift of foot, but no man can be ſwift of foot unleſs he be competently ſtrong: Giants are both in exceſs: And therefore Job puts both together, He runs upon me as a Giant. And yet (I conceive) this running doth rather imply the fierceneſs of the Giant, then his ſwiftneſs. Giants are dreadful and terrible to behold; they are called Nephilim in the Hebrew, of diverſe Texts, which coming from the root, Naphal, to fall, ſignifies fallers, and that in a twofold ſenſe.

Quando aliquis dicitur aut currere, aut aliquid agere, ſicut Gigas, nihil aliud denotat, quam magno animo & ſtrenuè rem aliquam aggredi. Bold.

Firſt, Becauſe they Apoſtatiz'd or fell from God, his truth and worſhip, which Moſes ſeems to intimate while he deſcribes the firſt great perſonal defection of the World (Gen. 6.4.) There were Giants in the earth in thoſe dayes: theſe he oppoſeth to the Sons of God, in the ſame Verſe, who had alſo greatly corrupted themſelves, ſo that (Verſ. 5.) God ſaw the wickedneſs of man was great upon the earth: For the Sons of God, they who owned a profeſſion of Religion (being the Poſterity of Seth, they) mingled themſelves with the wicked of the World. As for the Giants, they diſowned God, and were totally departed, or fallen from his obedience, and were therefore as ſome apprehend, called Nephilim, or Fallers.

Secondly, They were ſo called, becauſe either through the vaſtneſs of their ſtrength and ſtature, or through the fierceneſs of their mindes and ſpirits, they were men of violence, great oppreſſours, cauſing others to fall before them: In ſo much that the very name of a Giant was dreadful. And when thoſe unbelieving Searchers of Canaan brought up an evil report of that Land, the worſt which they could ſay of it to the diſcouragement of their Brethren, was this (Numb. 13. 33.) And there we ſaw the Giants, the Sons of Anak, which came of the Giants: and we were in our own ſight as Graſs-hoppers, and ſo we were in theirs. Men of ſtrength and courage were as much afraid at this ſtory of Giants, as Children are of Bugbears and Fairies.

So then, when Job ſaid, That God did run upon him as a Giant, his intent was only to ſhew, with how much terrour God was pleaſed to cloath himſelf, and how much ſtrength he put forth, while he thus contended with him. The truth is, God needs not lay out his ſtrength to afflict man, he can cruſh the ſtrongeſt of men as a moth, with the touch of his finger. The weakneſs of God is ſtronger then man; yet God in afflicting his people, will ſometimes perſonate a mighty man, exerciſing his power to the utmoſt, and arming himſelf from head to foot, while he combates with an enemy: which ſtill confirms the general Obſervation, That God doth not only afflict ſuch as he loves, but he afflicts them ſorely. Doth he not ſo, when he ſhakes them in pieces? Doth he not ſo, when he ſets them as his mark? When a multitude of skilful Archers compaſs them about; when he cleaves their reins aſunder; when he pours out their Gall upon the ground? Doth he not ſo, when he ſets Engines of battery to make breach upon breach, and then runs up as a Giant to the aſſault? Thus God hath dealt with many precious ſouls, and thus he dealt (beyond his dealings with many) with his precious Servant Job.

And as no man, either in his eſtate or health, either in his credit or comforts, is ſo ſtrong a wall, but God by his Artillery can quickly make a breach upon him; ſo who is able to ſtand in the breach, or make it good, when God comes up to the aſſault? Can thine heart endure, or can thine hands be ſtrong in the dayes that I ſhall deal with thee? ſaith the Lord (Ezek. 22. 14.) When the Lord as a Giant runs upon man, the ſtrongeſt Giant among the ſons of men, is but as a Pigmie, yea but as a Piſmire, he is but as the Chaff before the wind, or as the potters Veſſel before the Iron-Rod. But though fleſh and blood cannot ſtand in the breach when God aſſaults; yet Faith and patience can. Moſes by Faith ſtood in the breach, and turned away the wrath of God, when he came to deſtroy Iſrael (Pſal. 106. 23.) Job by patience ſtood in the breaches which God made upon him, when he ſeemed utterly to deſtroy him.

For what did Job to God, when God did all this to him? Did he oppoſe? Did he ſtrive with his Maker? The two next Verſes ſhew, that prayers and tears were all the Weapons he uſed in this holy War with God.

VERS. 15, 16, 17.

I have ſowed ſack-cloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the duſt.

My face is foul with weeping, and on my eye-lids is the ſhadow of death.

Not for any injuſtice in my hands: alſo my prayer is pure.

THE former words ſhewed in what manner Job was afflicted; and becauſe the manner of his afflictions did almoſt exceed words, therefore he ſtrained himſelf to the higheſt pitch of holy rhetorick, to make his unkind Friends ſenſible of it. And as there he told us what God had done to him, ſo here he tells what he did, or how he behaved himſelf under the hand of God; he tells us how he took thoſe tearings, and thoſe wounds; how he received thoſe ſhowrs of Arrows from the Almighties Bow. Eliphaz taxed Job in the fifteenth Chapter, with height and haughtineſs of ſpirit in his low eſtate (Verſ. 12, 13.) Why doth thine heart carry thee away? And what doth thine eyes wink at, that thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God, and letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth? And (Verſ. 25.) he more then intimates that Job ſtretched out his hand againſt God, and ſtrengthened himſelf againſt the Almighty. In both paſſages he is ſeverely charged, not only with impatience under the hand of God (which is bad enough) but with oppoſition againſt the hand of God, which is far worſe.

Job refutes theſe unfriendly cenſures, and profeſſeth another kind both of ſpirit and practice in this Text. As if he had ſaid, I am not ſo mad as thou takeſt me to be, to run upon God, or to ſtretch out my hand againſt him while he ſmiteth me; I have learned better, then to ſhoot the arrows of blaſphemy againſt God, whilſt he ſhoots the arrows of calamity againſt me; and if you deſire to know what I have been doing, ſeeing I deny that I have been doing what you ſuggeſt; This is the account which I give of my ſelf, and of my behaviour.

Verſ. 15. I have ſowed ſack-cloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the duſt.

That is, I have humbly ſubmitted my ſelf to receive, and entertain thoſe saddeſt diſpenſations.

> Hence Obſerve, That the ſureſt way to confute the cenſures, and wipe off the aſperſions which are caſt upon us, is to ſhew our ſelves doing contrary to what others are ſpeaking of us.

A practical anſwer is the ſtrongeſt anſwer; we may ſpeak more for our ſelves by our hands, then we can do by our tongues in many caſes. The Papiſts mouths are ſtopt (who call us Solifidians) when they ſee Proteſtants forward in, and zealous for good works: He that is accuſed of uncharitableneſs, may beſt free himſelf from that charge, by giving freely to the poor; and he that is accuſed of injuſtice, may ſooneſt do himſelf right, by ſhewing that he hath done right to every man. Bare denials that we have done evil, are nothing; but when our doing of good appears, who can deny it? The old Philoſopher anſwered him that denied motion, by riſing up and walking, not by arguing: Job anſwered Eliphaz, who affirmed that he turned his ſpirit, and ſtretched out his hand againſt God, by falling down and ſubmitting to it. I have ſowed ſack-cloth upon my skin, &c.

And this Job offers, as to remove, and take away that objection of miſ-behaviour towards God; ſo to move his Friends to better behaviour, even to compaſſion and pity towards him. He was in a ſorrowful caſe, and he had acted the part of a ſorrowful man; God had laid him low, and he laid himſelf low; this might have taught them moderation; why ſhould they ſpeak ſo harſhly againſt him, who had dealt but courſely with himſelf? Sowing ſack-cloth upon his skin; and ſeeing he abaſed himſelf, even to the defiling of his horn in the duſt, why ſhould they abaſe him too? It ſtirs up pity towards a profeſſed adverſary to ſee him in miſery, eſpecially, when he ſubmits unto it, and ſuffers with patience: Much more ſhould the miſery of a profeſſed Friend, he alſo quietly ſubmitting to it, ſtir up the bowels of pity. So then, the ſcope of this report which Job makes of himſelf, was not only to anſwer what Eliphaz had charged him with, but alſo that he might obtain from his Friends, a milder anſwer.

Hoc affert ut ad miſerecordiã ſocios moveat, pœnitentiã, ſc. ſuã & humilitatẽ, quod ſeſe in his afflictionibus nõ extulerit. Merc.

I have ſowed ſack-cloth upon my skin.] The word which we render Sack-cloth, is of the ſame ſound in the Hebrew, and almoſt in all other languages; which is obſerved as an argument of its antiquity, and that it is the mother of all languages. But how did Job ſow ſack-cloth upon his Skin? This is a hard piece of Sempſtery.

שק Saccus, vox quæ hic habetur Sak habet eundẽ ſonũ in omni fere lingua, quod unum arguit linguã Hebræã omnium eſſe matrem.

The Roman Hiſtorian reports of cruel Nero, that when he fled out of the City (fearing the ſentence of the diſpleaſed Senate which quickly purſued him) and had got into a grove or thicket like a wild Beaſt, he commanded thoſe about him to make a trench in the earth, fitted to the dimenſions of his body, which he ordered them to line with ſuch pieces of Marble, as were to be had upon the place; thus as it were, preparing his own Tomb, he wept and often cryed out, See what a workman is here now ready to periſh. What that wretch ſaid of himſelf, I may ſay of this holy man in the Text, whom I find thus buſied at his Needle, as if he were preparing his own grave-clothes, or winding ſheet, What a workman have we here ready to periſh? Job looked upon himſelf as a dying man, and behold he is ſowing ſack-cloth upon his skin. When men of worth die, they are wrapt in fine linnen; ſo Joſeph of Arimathea wrapt the body of Jeſus (Mar. 15. 46.) And Qualis artifex pereo.

And a living man full of ſores needs the fineſt and ſofteſt linnen to wrap him in: Sack-cloth is a courſe ſtubborn cloth, grievous to a ſound body, painful to thoſe who have never a breach upon their fleſh; but for a man (as Job deſcribes himſelf) full of breaches, having breach upon breach; his body being broken all over, as if it were but one continued breach, to lap up ſuch a one in ſack-cloth, is an extream addition to his pains and ſorrows. How is it then, that Job was thus ſevere to his own ſores? To clear this, Sack-cloath may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, Properly. Secondly, Improperly.

Properly, ſo, ſack cloth is that hairy, rough Garment which was very uſual among mourners, whether in times of ſorrow for ſin or judgement. Sack-cloth was the Livery of both theſe ſorrows. The King of Iſrael was a cloſe-mourner in ſack cloth (2 King. 6. 30.) The King rent his clothes as he paſſed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and behold he had ſack-cloth within upon his fleſh. There being a terrible Famine in Samaria, that King wore Sack-cloth as an emblem of his ſorrow, yet he wore it ſomewhat concealedly; it was within upon his fleſh. And ſo (2 Kings 20.31.) when the Servants of Benhadad came to Achab, they put Sack-cloth upon them. And (2 *Kin.*21.27.) Achab himſelf when he heard that ſore judgement denounced againſt him, humbled himſelf, and put on Sack-cloth, and went ſoftly. In a time of common calamity, the Prophet tells us, Every head ſhall be bald, and every beard clipt: upon all the hands ſhall be cuttings, and upon the loyns Sack-cloth (*Jer.*48. 37.) And that it was the uſual wear in time of repentance, is taught us in the Propheſie of Jonah (*C.*3.8.) Where Proclamation was made, by the King of Niniveh, That all ſhould faſt and put on Sack cloth. Chriſt himſelf deſcribing what Sodom and Gomorrah would have done if the Goſpel had been Preached, or the mighty works done in them which were done in Bethſaida and Corazin, ſaith, They would have repented long ago in ſack-cloth and aſhes: that is, they would have put on ſack cloth, and ſate in aſhes, in token of deepeſt humiliation for ſin. Thus ſack-cloth properly taken was often uſed in times of great affliction, whether perſonal, or publick; as alſo in times of deepeſt and moſt profeſſed repentance.

Secondly, We may take Sack-cloth improperly, and ſo two wayes.

Firſt, As to Job's then preſent condition, he was full of ſores, and thoſe ſores were to him as a courſe covering of ſack-cloth; for he was ſore all over: In ſome extraordinary diſeaſes, a ſcab puts forth all over the body, like the bark of a tree. Job's ſcabs and ſores were like the bark of a tree, or a garment of ſack-cloth; he ſpeaks near this language (Chap. 30.18.) By the great force of my diſeaſe is my Garment changed: As if he had ſaid, I have another kind of Garment then I was wont to wear; I was wont to wear the beſt, and the coſtlieſt Garments; but now, By the force of my diſeaſe is my Garment changed, it bindeth me about as the colour of my coat, that is, My ſores bind me about as the colour of my Coat. Thus the Greek Expoſitors render this Text, affirming, that his Skin was diſcoloured and black, and began to look like ſack-cloth, through the heat and diſtemper of his inward parts: As health and ſoundneſs of conſtitution put out a freſh and lively tincture, ſo ſickneſs and diſeaſes deface and darken the beauty of the body.

גלד. Cutis vox Arabica nõ alibi in Scriptura reperitur. Et Gelad propriè ſignificare cutim & cruſtã quæ plagæ ſiccæ ſuperinducitur Rab.Levi. Nigrorē nacta eſt cutis mea propter cruciatum, acerbitatem quaſi ſaccus quidam ex vellis contextis effectus. Sanct.

Secondly, Take it again improperly, as to Job's then preſent action; and then, I ſowed ſack-cloth upon my skin, is, as if he had ſpoken plainly, I have greatly abaſed, or humbled my ſelf, I have been as one who putteth on ſack-cloth. Such was his poſture (*Chap.*2.8.) He took a pot-ſheard, and ſcraped his ſores, and ſate down among the aſhes. As he who wore ſack-cloth did humble himſelf greatly, or at leaſt would be accounted to have done ſo; ſo he that is really humbled, and that greatly, may be ſaid to have put on ſack cloth. The ſign is often put for the thing ſignified, in reference both to joy and ſorrow. White garments and unctions were ſigns of joy; and therefore when Solomon exhorts to joyfulneſs, he ſaith, Let thy garments be alwayes white, and let thine head lack no oyntment (*Eccleſ.*9.8.) which we may expound either by that which goes before, Eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy Wine with a merry heart (*Verſ.*7.) or by that which follows (*Verſ.*9.) Live joyfully with the wife of thy youth: As to bid a man put on white garments, is to bid him rejoyce, ſo to bid a man put on blacks, or ſack-cloth, is to bid him mourn; and he who ſaith as Job here, that he hath done it, ſaith, That he hath mourned, though he hath not done it. Job did not ſow ſack-cloth upon his skin when he ſpake thus, but his ſorrows did truly ſpeak ſack-cloth: Such alſo is his ſenſe of the next clauſe; where he profeſſeth,

And I defiled my horn in the duſt.] Horns are proper to a beaſt, but they are often by a figure or improperly aſcribed to man. The horn imports two things in figure.

Firſt, Strength, and Power.

Secondly, Dignity, and Ornament.

It is often put for ſtrength and power; for the ſtrength and power of good men (1 *Sam.*2.10.) Hannah ſings, Thou ſhalt exalt the horn (that is, the ſtrength and power) of thine anointed. (*Pſal.*132.17.) There ſhall he make the horn of David to flouriſh. David was a type of Chriſt, and of him this Pſalm is expounded. (*Luk.*1.69.) God hath raiſed up a horn of ſalvation for us in the houſe of his ſervant David: A horn of ſalvation, is, ſtrong ſalvation, or ſtrength of ſalvation: God laid help for us upon one that is mighty, when he laid help for us upon his Son.

The horn, notes alſo the ſtrength and power of wicked men (*Pſal.*75.5.) Lift not your horns on high, ſpeak not with a ſtiff neck: At the tenth Verſe of that Pſalm, we have both; All the horns of the wicked alſo will I cut off, but the horns of the righteous ſhall be exalted. Thoſe ten Kings, who gave their power and ſtrength to the Antichriſtian Beaſt, are ſhadowed under the title of Ten horns (*Revel.*17.12.) Strength and power are expreſſed by a horn, in alluſion to Beaſts, whoſe ſtrength to defend themſelves, and to hurt others, is in their horns; and hence it is that the word by which the Greeks expreſs harmleſs, ſignifies properly hornleſs (Phil. 2.15) That ye may be blameleſs and harmleſs, the Sons of God without rebuke, &c.

Secondly, As the horn is put for ſtrength, ſo for ſplendour, and dignity: The Texts before alleadged may be ſo expounded. And again (*Hab.*3.4.) His brightneſs was as the light, and he had horns coming out of his hand, and there was the hiding of his power: We in the Margin put, Bright beams out of his ſide: For the Hebrew word which ſignifies a horn, ſignifies to radiate, and ſhine forth (*Exod.*34.29,30.) When Moſes came down from the Mount, the Text ſaith, He wiſt not that his face did ſhine. And when Aaron, and all the people of Iſrael ſaw Moſes, behold his face ſhone: The Vulgar tranſlates, The face of Moſes was horned, or had horns upon it: that is, beams and rayes of light like horns appeared, or darted from his countenance, ſo that the eyes of the beholders were dazled: And the reaſon why Moſes is commonly pictured with horns, is, becauſe this word ſignifies, both beams, and horns. So here, I have defiled my horn in the duſt: that is, My dignity, and excellency; thus the Chaldee expreſſeth it: as if he had ſaid, I have taken off, or laid by all ornaments to put my ſelf into the poſture of an humble ſupplicant; I have defiled my horn in the duſt.

Splendorem meum. Chald.

[Duſt] alſo is taken properly, or improperly; properly, duſt is light, ſmall, crumbled earth. Chriſt chargeth his Diſciples (*Mat.*10.14.) Whoſoever ſhall not receive you, nor hear your word, when ye depart out of that City, ſhake off the duſt of your feet: That action was emblematical, and noted one of, or all theſe three things.

Firſt, That the earth was polluted, where ſuch refuſers of the precious Goſpel did inhabit, and was therefore to be ſhaken off as a filthy thing.

Secondly, That they were baſe and vile as duſt, ſuch as God would ſhake off.

Thirdly, That the duſt of the Apoſtles feet there left, might be as a witneſs (ſo the other Goſpels expreſs it) againſt them, that the Goſpel had been Preached there.

Duſt alſo in a proper ſenſe, was uſed in times of humiliation and ſorrow among the Jewes; for then, they either ſprinkled duſt on their heads, or lay down in the duſt: Joſhua and the Elders of Iſrael put duſt on their heads (*Joſh.*7. 6.) and Job profeſſeth (*Chap.*42.6.) Therefore I abhor my ſelf, and repent in duſt and aſhes: Which we may underſtand either ſtrictly, that he ſate down in the duſt, teſtifying his repentance; or largely, that his was a great and a deep repentance, even like theirs, who are humbled in duſt and aſhes. That carnal worldly ſorrow of the Merchants and Friends of Babylon is thus expreſſed (*Revel.*18.18,19.) And they caſt duſt on their heads, and cryed, weeping and wayling, ſaying, Alas, alas, that great City.

Improperly, duſt ſignifies any very low condition (Pſal. 113.7. 1 Sam. 2. 8.) He raiſeth the poor out of the duſt. And again (1 Kings 16.2.) For as much as I exalted thee out of the duſt, and made thee a Prince over my people Iſrael, &c. To be exalted from the duſt, is to be exalted from among the common people to a Princely ſtate, as that parallel place tells us (1 Kings 14.7.) All men are but level with the duſt in their natural conſtitution; but all Magiſtrates are above the duſt (that is, the common people) by their civil conſtitution. When Job ſaith, I have defiled my horn in the duſt; it may be underſtood either properly, that he did ſit down in duſt and aſhes as he ſpeaks (Chap. 10.) or improperly, that as God had brought him into a low condition, ſo he was willing to ſubmit himſelf to a low condition, and to be, not only as man, who is duſt in his nature, and muſt return to duſt, but as becomes that man, whoſe power and honour, whoſe excellency and greatneſs is laid in the duſt: David imprecates (Pſal. 7.5.) If I have done this, if (as ſome charge and ſuſpect me) there be iniquity in my hands, &c. Let the enemy perſecute my ſoul, and take it; yea, let him tread my life down to the earth, and lay mine honour in the duſt: That is, Let him totally ruine me, or lay me as low as low can be. The Church is thus excited to riſe from her captivity (Iſa. 52. 1,3.) Awake, and ſhake thy ſelf from the duſt, ariſe, and ſit down, O Jeruſalem*: looſe thy ſelf from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of* Zion. To lye in captivity, is to lye in the duſt; and as to ſhake off the duſt, is to return from captivity; ſo to defile the horn in the duſt, is to lay aſide our dignity.

Job gives yet a further deſcription of his ſelf-humiliation.

Verſe 16. My face is foul with weeping, and on my eye-lids is the ſhadow of death.

As Job put on his mourning garments, ſo he was indeed a mourner; he wept, and he wept plentifully: much eye-water doth not cleanſe, but foul the face, My face is foul with weeping; or my face is ſwoln, and my cheeks blubbered with weeping, ſaith the Latine Tranſlator.

Facies mea intumuit à fletu. Vulg.

Note here three ſorts of tears ſpoken of in Scripture.

First, There are tears of worldly ſorrow.
Secondly, Tears of godly ſorrow.
Thirdly, Tears of Hypocriſie.

The laſt ſort is applyable to both the former; it reſpects ſometimes worldly ſorrow, and ſometimes godly ſorrow; for both may be feigned: Such were thoſe tears (Jer. 41.) When Iſhmael had killed Gedaliah, the Text ſaith, Iſhmael went to Mizpeh, and met the men, weeping all along as he went; as if he had been greatly troubled for the afflictions of the Land; but they were Crocodiles tears. Iſhmael wept only till he had gotten thoſe men (as a prey) in his power, and then he deſtroyed them. Iſhmael was a State-hypocrite, and ſeemed full of compaſſion, that he might get an opportunity to vent his malice.

There are many Church-hypocrites, who can foul and disfigure their faces with weeping, as Chriſt reproves the Phariſees (Matth. 6. 16.) while they have no thought of waſhing or reforming either their hearts or lives. Job's face was foul with weeping, but his heart and life were clean; he needed not ſtrain for tears, or weep by art; how could he reſtrain tears, whoſe troubles were inlarged? The word which we render foul, is doubled in the Original, which ſpeaks thus much, that his face was double-dirtied, or double-dyed in his own tears: Neither yet was this all the argument of his real ſorrows; for he had not only quite wept away his beauty, but he had almoſt wept away his life too, and was even dead with grief, as it follows in the next words.

And on my eye-lids is the ſhadow of death.

That is, Mine eyes are darkened, and I look like one that's ready to give up the ghoſt: As if he had ſaid, My ſorrow may be ſeen upon my eyes and eye-lids, which with extremity of grief, and multitude of tears are even waſted away, and ſunk in my head, as when a man is dead, or dying: Much weeping weakens the eye-ſight; yea, ſome are ſaid to weep out their eyes. David gives us that effect of weeping (Pſal. 6.7.) I water my couch with tears: That is, I weep abundantly: Then it follows, Mine eyes are conſumed becauſe of my grief: And (Pſal. 38. 10.) My heart panteth, my ſtrength faileth, as for the light of mine eyes, it is alſo gone from me: I am even grown blind with ſorrow, or (as the Church bemoans her ſad eſtate, (Lam. 2.11.) Mine eyes do fail with tears: Abundance of tears bring failing of eyes; and he that uſeth his eyes to much weeping, ſhall have little uſe of them for ſeeing: we may aſſign the reaſon of it from Nature, becauſe continual pouring forth of tears ſpends the ſpirits, and ſo weakeneth the viſive power. Now as death is a total privation of ſight; ſo they whoſe ſight is much impaired, look ſomewhat like the dead: Hence Job's complaint, On my eye-lids is the ſhadow of death.

Shadow of death.] Notes the cleareſt appearance, the ſtrongeſt ſigns of death: Or this ſhadow of death upon his eye-lids, together with the fouling of his face, in the former clauſe, may be an alluſion to ſome faſhions or cuſtoms of mourners in thoſe times or places. This phraſe (which alſo often occurs in other Scriptures) was opened (Chap. 3.5.) thither I refer the Reader.

Hos geſtus in humiliationibus Orientalis etiam Græcos uſurpaſſe teſtatur & ridet Plutarchus in libello de ſuperſtitione. Denſiſſima caligo eſt oculis meis offuſa. Mer.

Thus we have Job's behaviour in his affliction by a twofold act, and a twofold effect of it.

The firſt act was, Sowing ſackcloth on his fleſh.
The ſecond was, Defiling his horn in the duſt.
The firſt effect was, Foulneſs upon his face.
The ſecond was, Death upon his eyes.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, They are moſt ſenſible of the hand of God, who are moſt ſubmiſſive to it.

As Job's afflictions were great, ſo was his ſorrow, and ſo was his ſubmiſſion: Sorrow is not contrary to patience; Job was the moſt patient, and the moſt ſorrowful man in the World. There is an immoderate ſorrow inconſiſtent with patience; but great ſorrow is not only conſiſtent with patience, but an argument of it; and unleſs we have ſome ſorrow, we are not patient at all: How can he be called patient, who either feels not, or ſlights his affliction. It is as ill a ſymptome of a diſeaſed ſoul to be unſenſible of judgments, as to be unſenſible of mercies. Unleſs we feel the rod, we cannot hear the voice of the rod, nor receive inſtruction by it. To be as a Trunk or a Stone, under correction, is not to be patient under it, but to deſpiſe it: Humble your ſelves under the mighty hand of God, is the advice of the Spirit, by the Apoſtle (1 Pet. 5.6.) As God humbles us for ſin, or for the tryal of grace, ſo they who have grace receive power to humble themſelves; and to humble our ſelves, is not only an act, but an high act of grace; both the grace of God toward us, and the graces of God in us, are exalted when we are low in our own eyes.

Secondly, From the manner of this ſorrowful humiliation, He ſowed ſackcloath upon his skin, and defiled his horn in the duſt.

Obſerve, That as God letteth out viſible tokens of his afflicting hand upon us, ſo we ſhould let out viſible tokens of our humiliation under his hand.

As we are viſibly afflicted, ſo we ſhould be viſibly affected. We may make our humblings ſeen, though we muſt not do it to be ſeen. As the light of our active obedience, ſhould ſo ſhine before men, that they may ſee our good works, and glorifie our Father which is in Heaven (Matth. 5. 16.) So alſo ſhould the light of our paſſive obedience ſhine before men, that they may ſee our holy ſufferings, and glorifie our Father which is in Heaven. It is as great a ſin to to boaſt of our poverty, as it is to boaſt of our riches, and as great a vanity to be proud of a croſs, as to be proud of a Crown; yet it is an honour to God, when men ſee that we are not aſhamed either of poverty, or of a croſs. The croſs ſhould be carried upon our ſhoulders, not put up in our pockets: God loves to ſee us own our troubles as well as our comforts; and as he will condemn thoſe who wrap the Talent of their gifts and abilities in a Napkin, and hide it from the uſe of others; ſo he doth not approve thoſe who wrap up their croſſes and afflictions in a Napkin, and hide them from the ſight of others; eſpecially conſidering, that even theſe alſo are Talents for which we ſtand accountable, how we have uſed them, both for our own good, and the good of others. I have ſurely heard Ephraim bemoaning himſelf thus (ſaith the Lord) Thou haſt chaſtiſed me, and

I was chaſtiſed (Jer. 31. 18.) Ephraim's outward moans were as muſick in the ears of God; Ephraim did not murmure againſt God, but he bemoaned himſelf; Ephraim was not angry at his chaſtiſement, but Ephraim mourned being chaſtiſed; God heard this fully; in hearing he heard it, or, it pleaſed him to hear it. It is our duty to teſtifie our ſorrow by the ſaddeſt notes of a troubled ſpirit, and it is a delight to God when we do ſo; not that he delights in our ſorrows; but he delights in the witneſs which we bear to his Wiſdom, Righteouſneſs, and Faithfulneſs, in ſending thoſe ſorrows. I heard Ephraim bemoan himſelf. Will an Offender that looks for mercy come before the Judge in rich apparel, or in ſome affected dreſs? Comes he not rather in his priſon clothes? Puts he not on the garments of heavineſs? The Meſſengers of Benhadad, put duſt on their heads, and ropes about their necks, and ſack-cloath on their loins, when they came to mediate for the life of their Maſter. And thus the Lord ſpeaks to the Iſraelites (Exod. 33. 5.) when they had ſinned, and he was wrath, Put off your Ornaments that I may know what to do with you: Ornaments are uncomely when God is threatening judgments: It is time for us to lay by our bravery, when God is about to make us naked. Sack-cloath ſowed upon the ſkin, and our horn in the duſt, are the beſt enſigns of an afflicted ſtate. The Prophets counſel indeed is (Joel 2.13.) Rent your hearts, and not your garments. (Rending the garments may be taken, not only ſtrictly for that act, but largely for all outward actings of ſorrow.) Yet when he ſaith, Rent not, this is not a prohibition of, but a caution about the outward acting of their ſorrow. Not, in Scripture, is not alwayes totally negative, it is often directive and comparative: So in this place, Rent your hearts, and not your garments; is, your hearts, rather then your garments; or be ſure to rend your hearts, as well as your garments: The one muſt be done, the other ought not to be left undone. See more of this (Chap. 1. Ver. 20.) upon thoſe words, Then Job rent his Mantle.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Great ſorrow produceth great effects, and leaveth ſuch impreſſions as teſtifie where it is.

The Apoſtle ſaith of the ſorrow of the World, That it worketh death (2 Cor. 7. 10.) The ſorrow of the World may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, For the ſorrow of carnal worldly men, whoſe ſorrow for ſin is only a vexing of their hearts, not a breaking or humbling of their hearts; which being ſeparate both from true faith for the pardon of ſin, and from any real purpoſe of leaving their ſin, worketh death, both temporal death, often wearing out their natural life lingringly, and ſometime deſtroying their natural life violently, as in Judas, as alſo haſtning them on to eternal death, of which it ſelf is a foretaſt, or beginning.

Secondly, This ſorrow of the World, is a ſorrow for the loſs of, or diſappointments about worldly things. This alſo worketh both of thoſe deaths in meer worldly men; and when it is exceſſive (as under a temptation it may be) in a godly man, it may be ſaid to work the death of the body in him; yea, great and continued ſorrow, though it be not exceſſive, worketh towards this death in a godly man, drying his bones, and drawing out his ſpirits, as is clear in Job, on whoſe eye-lids the very ſhadow of death ſate, while he wept and ſorrowed. 'Tis hard to diſſemble a little grief; but a great deal cannot be hid: As godly ſorrow manifeſts it ſelf in excellent effects upon the ſoul, of which the Apoſtle numbers up ſeven at the eleventh Verſe of that Chapter, For this ſelf ſame thing that ye ſorrowed after a godly ſort, what carefulneſs it wrought in you; yea, what clearing of your ſelves, &c. Now I ſay, as godly ſorrow manifeſts it ſelf in manifold effects upon the ſoul, ſo doth the ſorrow of the World ſet its marks upon the body: As a good mans heart is made clean by weeping the tears of godly ſorrow; ſo every mans face is made foul by weeping the tears of worldly ſorrow: and as godly ſorrow worketh repentance unto ſalvation and life eternal; ſo the ſorrow of the World worketh an entrance to temporal death; yea, we may ſay that godly ſorrow doth ſometimes work temporal death; Paul was afraid leſt the inceſtuous perſon, while he was repenting, might be Swallowed up with over much ſorrow (2 Cor.2.7.) which as we are to underſtand chiefly of a ſwallowing up in the gulf of deſpair, ſo we may take in that alſo as a conſequent of the other, a ſwallowing of him up in the grave of death: As if he had ſaid, The poor man may both deſpair and dye under this burden, if you let it lye too long upon him. As ſoon as Heman had ſaid (in his deſertion) My ſoul is full of troubles; he preſently adds, And my life draweth nigh unto the grave; I am counted with them that go down to the pit, free among the dead (Pſal. 88. 3, 4, 5.) To which he ſubjoyns (Ver. 9.) Mine eye mourneth by reaſon of affliction; and then expoſtulates (Ver. 10.) Wilt thou ſhew wonders to the dead? Shall the dead ariſe and praiſe thee? As if he had ſaid, Theſe ſorrows will bring me to my grave; or in the language of Job, On my eye-lids is the ſhadow of death.

Till we enjoy a life beyond the reach of all ſorrows, we ſhall not be beyond the reach of death. Hence that promiſe (Revel. 21. 4.) God ſhall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying; neither ſhall there be any more pain: And as that life which hath no death in it, ſhall have no ſorrow in it; ſo that life which is a continual death (the life of the damned) is nothing elſe but ſorrow, There ſhall be weeping, and wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth, for evermore (Mat. 13. 42.) Their eyes ſhall ever weep, their faces ſhall ever be foul with weeping, and on their eye-lids the ſhadow of death ſhall dwell for ever.

Fourthly, The hand of God being heavy upon Job, He defiled his horn in the duſt, and fouled his face with weeping; he regarded neither the beauty of his face, nor the dignity of his condition, all was nothing to him.

Learn from it,

Great afflictions take off our reſpect to the World, and all worldly things.

What is Honour? What is Gold or Silver? What is a goodly Houſe? What is a beautiful Wife, and pleaſant Children? What are fine Clothes, or a fair Face in a day of ſorrow, or in the approaches of death? Spirituals are higheſt prized when we are loweſt: Grace ſhines cleareſt in worldly darkneſs; but the light of worldly enjoyments is darkneſs to us; and that which ſome eſteem as a Sun, is but a Cloud to us in the day of diſtreſs: That is beſt which is good to us in our worſt eſtate. The favour of God, the pardon of ſin, the fruits of the Spirit, are alwayes pleaſant to the Saints; but then moſt, when the years or times are upon them, of which they not only ſay with the Preacher (Eccleſ. 12. 1.) We have no pleaſure in them, but, we have much pain and trouble in them. The face of the new creature is never foul with weeping, nor is the horn of our ſalvation defiled when we lye in the duſt, or on the dunghil.

Job having (according to his manner) accurately deſcribed his calamities, and ſhewed with what deep ſenſe, and ſelf-abaſement he had entertained them; he paſſeth to a refutation of that inference which his Friends drew, and had often preſſed upon him from thoſe premiſes of his affliction. Eliphaz ſuggeſted him impious and unjuſt, becauſe he was thus ſmitten. Job plainly denyes it (Verſe 17.) I have not received theſe wounds in my body and eſtate, for any injuſtice in my hands, no, nor for any impiety in my heart, alſo my prayer is pure. This Verſe takes off both parts of that general aſſertion, as to Job's perſonal condition (Chap. 15. Verſ. 34.) The Congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate; fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery. There Eliphaz cloſely hinted that Job was an unjuſt man, and an Hypocrite: Job anſwers, No, my Tabernacle is not the Tabernacle of bribery, there is no injuſtice in my hands; my Congregation, or thoſe with whom I joyned in worſhip, were not a Congregation of Hypocrites, My prayer is pure: As if he had ſaid, Though it be a truth, that the Congregation of Hypocrites ſhall be deſolate, yet it doth not follow, that every man is an Hypocrite, whoſe Congregation is made deſolate, for mine is deſolate, and yet I know my prayer is pure: And though fire ſhall conſume the Tabernacles of bribery, yet every man is not guilty of bribery, whoſe Tabernacle is conſumed with fire, for ſo is mine; and yet I avouch it, there is no injuſtice in my hands.

Verſe 17. Not for any [injuſtice] in my hands.

The word that we tranſlate injuſtice, ſignifies rapine, violence, or wrong done by violence, any open tyrannical oppreſſion. The Harpy being a ravenous Fowl, hath his name from this root in Hebrew (as alſo in the Greek from one of the ſame importance) becauſe he doth not ſubtily ſurprize his prey, but openly aſſault it. It ſignifies alſo violence mingled with ſcorn and contempt; as is obſerved upon that of the Prophet (Ezek. 22. 26.) Her Prieſts have violated my Laws: The Prieſts did not go behind the door, they made an open breach upon the Law of God; they did not ſin ſecretly, as if they had been afraid to be ſeen, but avowedly and before the Sun. Hence ſome have rendred that Text, Her Prieſts have contemned my Laws; noting either that it was a violation with contempt; or that Laws which are once contemned cannot be long unviolated. Thus Job profeſſeth, there is no ſuch injuſtice in my hand; Job did not diſclaim all failings in doing juſtice, but all intendments of doing injuſtice; he did not peremptorily deny that there was no injuſtice in his hand ariſing from miſtakes of the Law, but none from the contempt of the Law, Not for any injuſtice.

In my [hand.] Injuſtice is aſcribed to the hand, not becauſe injuſtice is alwayes, though uſually it be done with the hand; with the hand men take away, and with that men detain the right of others. David ſpeaks thus (2 Chron. 12. 17.) Seeing there is no wrong in mine hand; that is, I have done no wrong. The hand is the great inſtrument of action, moſt injuſtice is done by the hand, though much be done by the tongue; and a Judge who gives an unjuſt ſentence with his tongue, may be ſaid to have injuſtice in his hands. Beſides, he may be ſaid to have injuſtice in his hands, who keeps any thing in his hands which was gotten by injuſtice; he alſo may be ſaid to eat injuſtice, who feeds upon what he got unjuſtly (Prov. 4. 17.) They eat the bread of wickedneſs, and drink the wine of violence: That is, They eat bread, and drink wine, gotten by wickedneſs and violence. Job diſclaims injuſtice in all theſe notions, There is no injuſtice in my hands: As if he had ſaid, I have not gotten wealth by injuſtice, nor inricht my ſelf by making others poor; I have not been as an Harpy, to ſcratch and tear from others to feed my ſelf: He gives a full account of this (Chap. 29. and Chap. 30.) wiping off thoſe aſperſions of injuſtice, by a large narrative of his proceedings in that publick capacity, as a Magiſtrate; the breviate of which is ſummed up in this negative, There is no injuſtice in my hand.

Further, Injuſtice may be taken two wayes.

Either ſtrictly, for the act of a Magiſtrate perverting the Law, and going beſides the rules of righteouſneſs.

Or largely; for any wrong that one neighbour in a private capacity, doth another.

To do juſtice is every ones duty as well as the Magiſtrates; We uſe to ſay, Every man is either a Fool, or a Phyſician; we may ſay, Every one is either a doer of juſtice, or a diſhoneſt man: For though to do juſtice is chiefly the Magiſtrates work, yet no man (who hath any thing to do in the World) can live as he ought, without doing juſtice: In this large ſence alſo we may expound Job's diſclaimer of injuſtice: As if he had ſaid, I have not willingly failed in any of thoſe duties which the Law of love towards my neighbour calls for, and obliges me unto: There is no injuſtice in my hands.

Alſo my prayer is pure.

Prayer is taken two wayes, as injuſtice is.

Either largely, for the whole worſhip of God, My houſe ſhall be called the houſe of prayer (Matth. 21. 13.) That is, All kind of publick worſhip ſhall be performed, and tendred to me there: Prayer being ſo principal a part of worſhip, may well comprehend all the parts of worſhip; that which is chief in any kind, often denominates all the reſt. So Love is put for all the duties of the Law, and Faith for all the duties, yea, and for all the Doctrines of the Goſpel; though in both, many other duties and doctrines are contained.

Strictly, Prayer is that part of worſhip which conſiſts in calling upon God: Prayer is the making known of our deſires, or the opening of our hearts to God. It is the aſcent of our ſouls to God. David being about to pray, ſaith, Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my ſoul. In this place we may take prayer in both the notions of it, My prayer

Is pure.] The word ſignifies ſhining, bright, glorious; a gracious prayer ſhines ſo bright that there is a glory in it; My prayer is pure. Zophar charged Job for ſaying, My doctrine is pure (Chap. 12. 4.) Now Job himſelf ſaith, My prayer is pure. The truth of Doctrine is the purity of it; and the ſincerity of prayer is the purity of it: Job did not boaſt his prayer pure without infirmity, but he did profeſs it pure without hypocriſie. Yet beſides this caſting out of hypocriſie, there are divers ingredients to be taken in towards the compoſition of a pure prayer, of which I ſhall touch more diſtinctly by and by. We read in the Inſtitutes of the Ceremonial Law of pure Myrrh, of pure Frankincenſe, of pure Oyl, of pure Incenſe, all which concurred to pure worſhip among the Jews, and typed out all pure worſhip, both among Jews and Gentiles; of the latter the Lord ſaith (Mal. 1. 11.) From the riſing of the Sun unto the going down of the ſame, my Name ſhall be called upon among the Gentiles, and in every place Incenſe ſhall be offered unto my Name, and a pure offering. This pure offering Job intends when he ſaith, My prayer is pure.

Under theſe two, There is no injuſtice in my hand, and my prayer is pure: Job contains the whole duty of man, both to God and to man: Here is Juſtice comprehending the duties of the ſecond Table; and Prayer comprehending the duties of the firſt Table: Thus Job was compleat in all the will of God, and had reſpect to all his Commandments. And thus he verified Gods teſtimony of him (Chap. 1. 1.) and approved himſelf to be A man perfect and upright, fearing God, and eſchewing evil, which is the whole duty of man.

His duobus membris utramque tabulam complectitur. Merc.

From the words in general,

> Obſerve, Firſt, Man hath great ſupport in bearing afflictions, from the witneſs which his heart gives of his own integrity.

'Tis matter of wonder that ever Job ſhould bear ſo many burdens, and endure breach upon breach, till we remember, that though he had many breaches upon his body and eſtate, yet he had none upon his conſcience: Indeed his ſpirit had breaches by way of tryal and temptation from God; but it had none by way of diſobedience againſt God. The ſpirit of a man, ſaith Solomon, will ſuſtain his infirmities (Prov. 18. 14.) There are two ſorts of infirmities.

First, ſinful infirmities, ſuch are impatience, doubtings, deadneſs of heart, and vanity of thoughts.

Secondly, Penal, or painful infirmities, ſuch as are poverty, ſickneſs, diſeaſes, or any outward croſs whatſoever.

Theſe latter are the infirmities which Solomon means; and theſe the ſpirit of a man will ſuſtain, even while his fleſh or body ſinks under them: Yet here ſpirit is not taken meerly in oppoſition to bodily, or material fleſh (though the ſpirit under that phyſical notion is able to bear much more then the body can) but as ſpirit is oppoſed to ſpiritual and ſinful fleſh; that is, to a carnal corrupt mind: The ſpirit of a man furniſhed with grace, ſupported with the favour of God, and the teſtimony of a good conſcience, will ſuſtain all his infirmities; that is, cauſe him to bear with much, not only patience, but courage and chearfulneſs, the heavieſt burdens of affliction, which either the wiſdom of God doth, or the malice of man can lay upon him. Holineſs makes the weak ſtrong, and the ſtrong like Giants, to endure all ſhocks of trouble and hardſhip. A whole skin feels no ſmart, though you bath it with brine; and if a man have a ſound conſcience, if his ſpirit be not galled and raw, he is able to ſtand at any time, and ſometimes to rejoyce in the ſalteſt waters of worldly ſorrow. For though he be not (as was ſhewed before) ſenſleſs of, or without outward ſmart; yet having no inward ſmart (which is the worſt ſmart) he is above it: The pains and wants of the body are almoſt loſt and ſwallowed up in the comforts and enjoyments of the mind. A wounded ſpirit who can bear? A ſpirit unwounded what can it not bear? He that hath no injuſtice in his hands, hath much peace in his heart; and while our prayer is pure, our ſpirits will not be much troubled in any of our troubles.

Secondly, Obſerve, It is poſſible to live without any known ſin.

Job knew of no injuſtice in his hand, nor was he conſcious of any impurity in his prayer. The Apoſtle John writes to all Saints of all Ages and Statures, under the title of His little Children, not to ſin (1 John 2. 1.) And in that he doth not only admoniſh them of what they ought not to do, but of what they might attain not to do: For though, He that ſaith he hath no ſin, deceives himſelf, and ſins in ſaying ſo (1 John 1. 9.) yet it may be ſaid of ſome without ſin, and they (in Job's caſe) may ſay it of themſelves without ſin, that they ſin not. The beſt Saints have, and know they have ſin in their natures, and ſin in their lives; yea, and ſometimes they fall into great ſins; yet ſuch a degree of holineſs is attainable in this life, that a man may be ſaid, not to ſin: For then (in a Goſpel-ſence) we are ſaid not to ſin, when we caſt off and are free from all groſs and ſcandalous ſins, and do both carefully avoid and make conſcience of the leaſt and the moſt ſecret ſin. Zachary and Elizabeth (Luke 1.16.) were both righteous before God, walking in all the Commandments and Ordinances of the Lord blameleſs: That is, They did not live in any open or known ſin; they lived ſo, that no man could blame them, or bring any juſt complaint againſt them, either in matters of morality, which ſeem to be meant in the word Commandment; or in matters of worſhip, which ſeem to be meant by the word Ordinance. And when I ſpeak of not living in any known ſin, I mean not only, that Saints may riſe ſo high as not to live in any ſin which the World takes notice of; but they may, yea, and often do arrive at that height of holineſs, not to live in any ſin known to themſelves; if once a true Believer diſcovers ſin, he cannot own it, much leſs live in it; be it injuſtice or wrong towards men; be it any failing in the worſhip and ſervice of God he will not ſuffer it to lodge with him. He that hath grace in his heart, cannot live with injuſtice in his hand; there is an inconſiſtence between theſe two, a life of grace, and to live in ſin. Sin may be much alive in him that hath grace; but he cannot live in ſin; he may be often tempted to the act of it, and ſometimes poſſibly overtaken with it, yet he cannot live in it: He cannot keep injuſtice in his hand, nor frame an impure prayer in his heart. A good man may do an act of injuſtice, but he continues not unjuſt; he reſtores what he hath taken unjuſtly from men, and repents before the Lord; but uſually he is not conſcious to himſelf of doing unjuſtly towards men. If a Laban (one with whom he hath had converſe and dealing twenty years together) ſhould come and ſearch his houſe, he is able to ſay to him as honeſt Jacob did to his Uncle Laban (Gen. 31. 37.) Whereas thou haſt ſearched all my ſtuff, what haſt thou found of all thy houſhold-ſtuff, ſet it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both: As if he had ſaid, Is there any injuſtice in my hand? Let it come to tryal. Or as upright Samuel to all Iſrael (1 Sam. 12. 3.) Behold, here I am, witneſs againſt me before the Lord, and before his anointed, whoſe Ox have I taken? Or whoſe Aſs have I taken? Or whom have I defrauded? Whom have I oppreſſed? Samuel had been long a Judge, yet he knew of no injuſtice in his hand, neither did any man know of any; and therefore all acquit him from the leaſt blemiſh of unfaithfulneſs in his Office (Verſ. 4.) Thou haſt not defrauded us, nor oppreſſed us, neither haſt thou taken ought (as a bribe) of any mans hand. And he ſaid unto them (Verſ. 5.) The Lord is witneſs againſt you, and his anointed is witneſs this day, that ye have not found ought (that is, ought gotten unjuſtly) in my hand: That man hath reacht the perfection of juſtice, who neither takes out of the hand of others violently, nor of the hands of others covetouſly to byas his ſpirit when he ſits in judgment. Such a perfect Juſticer was Samuel, all Iſrael could not find ought (ſo come by) in his hand: He might ſay (and he did ſay as much in effect) with Job, Not for any injuſtice in my hand.

And as a Believer may arrive at ſuch a blameleſs walking towards men, that they cannot ſay, He hath ſinned; ſo at ſuch a holy walking before God, that God himſelf will not ſay, He hath ſinned. And this God will not ſay, when he ſees a ſoul labouring (as Paul was once praying that the Coloſſians might) to walk worthy of the Lord, unto all pleaſing; being fruitful in every good work, Coloſ. 1. 10. And when he ſees, that his prayer is pure, and his worſhip tendered with a perfect or ſincere heart.

When a ſoul doth not wilfully neglect any duty towards God, God will ſay he hath performed all duty; and though there may be many failings in prayer, yet God will ſay, that mans prayer is pure. So then, we grant that no man lives and ſins not, yet we affirm, that no godly man lives in ſin; and that ſome godly men are ſo far from living in any ſin, that others cannot tax them, nor can they tax themſelves of acting any groſs ſins; yea, though the beſt of Saints here know they ſin, and know their ſins, yet they may be ſaid not to commit known ſins, that is, not to ſin knowingly: He is not properly ſaid to ſin knowingly, who knows he ſins, but he who ſins againſt his knowledge.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Holineſs conſiſts in a compleat uniformity, or in conformity to the whole will of God.

Job draws the picture of a holy man, in all his limbs and lineaments; equity and purity contain all; Some are Firſt Table Chriſtians; others are Second Table Chriſtians. Some are zealous for prayer, who are extream cold in doing juſtice; ſome are extream honeſt and juſt to men, righteous in all their dealings, but they care not for prayer, nor have they any delight in communion with God: The Law of God is one entire thing, and ſo muſt mans obedience be; He that offends in one point is guilty of all, James 2. 10. For though he that commits adultery cannot properly be ſaid to break that Law, Thou ſhalt do no murder; yet whoſoever commits adultery, may properly be ſaid to break the whole Law: the reaſon is given by that Apoſtle in the next Verſe: For he that ſaid, Do not commit adultery, ſaid alſo, Do not kill: Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a tranſgreſſor of the Law. He that breaks any one link of a chain, breaks the chain, though he break not a ſecond link: 'tis ſo here, the whole Law is copulative: and as in this ſence, the Law is one; ſo the Law-maker is altogether one: This the Apoſtle James hints, as the reaſon of it, For he that ſaid, Do not commit adultery, ſaid alſo, Do not kill: As if he had ſaid, There is one and the ſame Legiſlative power commanding all, and therefore, if ye tranſgreſs one, ye tranſgreſs all. And how can there be a ſtate of holineſs, without an equal reſpect to both Tables of the Law, ſeeing the breach of any one Law of either Table, is, though not formally, yet reductively a breach of every Law in both Tables. And therefore 'tis the aim of a Believer to fulfil both Tables of the Law, though he fail in every Law of both: He gives up his will wholly to God; yea, he may be ſaid to loſe his will in the will of God; and this is his doing the whole will of God. And indeed we do nothing, unleſs we be found doing all.

Fourthly, Obſerve, We may without hypocriſie make report of our own integrity.

Job doth it here, and had done it before, and we find holy men doing it often in Scripture; I (ſaith Paul, 2 Tim. 4. 7.) have fought a good fight, I have finiſhed my courſe, I have kept the Faith: This he ſpeaks of himſelf, but not for himſelf; not out of vain glory, or a deſire of eſteem with men, as the Phariſees, but that others might be encouraged by his example, and that God might have the glory of his free and powerful grace, enabling him to give and hold out ſuch an example. Other paſſages in this Book have led me to this note before, and therefore I only mention it here.

More particularly, Obſerve, Injuſtice towards men, and impurities in the worſhip of God, are great and provoking ſins.

Job diſclaims theſe by name: It is as if Job had ſaid, Were there injuſtice in my hands, or were I falſe in the worſhip of God, it were no wonder though all theſe judgments ſhould ſeize upon me; yea, though my burden were heavier, I had no reaſon to complain, I muſt thank my ſelf: Injuſtice and falſe worſhip, will certainly bring breach upon breach; they break not only ſingle perſons, but King-

Non ad jactantiam ſed ad divinæ veritatis aſſertionem commemorat.

Kingdoms and Nations. Oppreſſion and Superſtition are Kingdom-ſhaking ſins; much more will they ſhake the walls and foundations of a private Houſe, or Family.

Again Obſerve, If God afflict where there is no injuſtice, how juſtly doth he deſtroy thoſe who are unjuſt?

Shall they complain who are beaten for their faults, when ſome are beaten who have no fault? The Apoſtle Peter argues (1 Pet. 4. 18.) If the righteous ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and ſinners appear? I may alſo argue, if the righteous be not ſaved (from outward afflictions) if the godly are ſmitten, how ſhall the ungodly and ſinners eſcape unſmitten? Many are ſmitten, not for any injuſtice in their hand (there is ſome other end, and that a juſt one, why they are ſmitten) nor is God unjuſt in ſmiting them. Now, if juſt ones are (without any injuſtice) thus ſmitten; how juſt is it with God to ſmite thoſe who are unjuſt? The repenting Thief rebuked him that blaſphemed, and ſpake evil of Chriſt, upon this conſideration, Doſt thou not fear God, ſeeing thou art in the ſame condemnation? and we juſtly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds: This man and we are in the ſame condemnation, but not in the ſame fault; we are all condemned to dye, but we juſtly, and he unjuſtly; This man hath done nothing amiſs, but we have done much amiſs (Luke 22. 40, 41.) Now as this Thief was patient under his own juſt ſufferings, ſeeing another ſuffer who was juſt; ſo when we hear that the Lord afflicts thoſe who have done no evil, how ought ſuch to lay their hands upon their mouthes, who are afflicted for the evil which they have done. We know (ſaith the Apoſtle, Rom. 3. 19.) that whatſoever the Law ſaith (in a way of threatening) it ſaith to them who are under the Law (that is, who are not only under it, as having heard the precept of the Law, but are under it alſo, as having by ſin deſerved the penalty of it) That every mouth may be ſtopped, and all the World become guilty before God; or, ſubject to the judgment of God, not having a word to object why ſentence ſhould not be executed, becauſe they have tranſgreſſed.

My prayer is pure.] Taking prayer either for the worſhip of God in general, or for that ſpecial duty of calling upon the Name of God,

Note from it, That, Only pure prayer is acceptable prayer.

Cain brought an offering to God as well as Abel; But unto Cain and his offering God had not reſpect (Gen. 4. 5.) It is not what we do, but how we do it, which is acceptable to God.

Pure prayer is pleaſing to the pure God, and no other can pleaſe him. Heathens have told us, that their Gods require pure worſhippers, and pure worſhip: The impure ſpirit imitates God, he will be worſhipped, and he will have (according to mans opinion) a pure worſhip; How much more doth the holy God require pure worſhip?

Omnis præfatio ſacrorum, eos, quibus non ſunt puræ manus ſacris arcet. Liv. lib. 41. Præcipuum eſt non admittere in animum mala conſilia, puras ad cœlum manus tollere. Sen. li. 3. Nat. Qu.

But what is it which denominates prayer pure? Or when is prayer pure?

Prayer is pure:

Firſt, When it is directed to a right object, when we pray to God, and to God only: It is the ſole priviledge of God to receive prayer; O thou that heareſt prayer, to thee ſhall all fleſh come: There is but one hearer of prayer, and that is God. Daniel withſtood the Decree of the King, when he forbad him to make his prayers to God; he would rather be caſt to the Lyons, then not to pray, or pray to any beſides God; therefore he opened his window (to let them ſee his reſolution) and prayed to God thrice a day openly. We may petition living men, but we muſt pray only to the living God. All men (except ſuch as have ſinned unto death) are to be prayed for, but no man muſt be prayed unto: Neither Saint, nor Angel, nor any Creature, are the object of prayer, but God alone.

Secondly, Pure prayer muſt be right in the matter of it, as well as the object; if we pray for that which is unlawful, our prayer muſt needs be unlawful; as it is a ſin to do any thing which God commands not, ſo it is a ſin to aſk any thing which God allows not. God hath ſet ſpecial bounds to three things.

Firſt, To our Faith, he teacheth us what to believe.

Secondly, To our actions, he teacheth us what to do.

Thirdly, To our prayers, he teacheth us what to deſire.

We may make enlarged prayers, but we are not left at large in prayer. The ſquare or rule of prayer is the will of God (1 John 5. 14.) And this is the confidence that we have in him, if we aſk any thing according to his will, he heareth us. The will of God is the rule, not only of things to be done by us, but of things which we are to aſk God to do for us: As man naturally would rather do, ſo he would rather have his own will, then the will of God. Man would fain be his own carver, but God will not let him: It pleaſes man better to go two miles upon his own errand, then one upon Gods errand; and it pleaſes man better to have any one thing of his own chuſing, then two of Gods chuſing; but it ſhould not. The will of God under a threefold revelation is the rule and matter of prayer.

Firſt, The will of God in Commandments; whatſoever God hath charged upon us to do, we may pray for power and ſtrength to do it, or that it may be done.

Secondly, The will of God in Promiſes; what God hath ſaid he will give, we may pray to receive.

Thirdly, The will of God in Propheſies; what God hath foreſhewed ſhall come to paſs, we muſt pray that it may come to paſs. The prayer of man gives birth to the Propheſies of God. Thus ſaith the Lord, I will yet for this be enquired of by the Houſe of Iſrael, to do it for them, (Ezek. 36. 37.) God is a ſure pay-maſter, yet he expects we ſhould ſue him, before he payes. Daniel found by Books, that the time drew nigh, for the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon; and then (ſaith he) I ſet my face unto the Lord God, to ſeek by prayer and ſupplications, with faſting, ſack-cloath, and aſhes (Dan. 9. 1, 2.) The manifeſtation of the will of God in a Propheſie, is a ſtrong ground of prayer: Thus the matter of prayer is the will of God under one of thoſe three manifeſtations, a Command, a Promiſe, or a Propheſie.

A third thing in pure prayer, is the form of it. There is a twofold form of prayer.

Firſt, The internal, or eſſential form.

Secondly, The external, or accidental form of prayer.

The external form, is that habit of words and expreſſions with which we cloath our deſires, when we preſent them unto God: This form varies, not only according to the ſeveral occaſions and emergencies of this life, which call us to the duty of prayer; but alſo according to the ſeveral gifts and abilities of thoſe who pray. We are free as to this form, from all tyes and preſcriptions, except this, that we utter our minds to God ſoberly, gravely, ſpiritually, with an eye to thoſe forms and patterns of wholeſome words delivered to us in the Word of God; and eſpecially to that part of the word which Chriſt gave both as a compendium, and a copy of holy prayer.

But as for the eſſential and internal form of prayer, that is unchangeable, and muſt ever be one and the ſame; Namely, That we pray in the Name of Chriſt. One of the Ancients was much delighted in reading Tully's Hortenſius, yet this at laſt abated the edge of his delight in it, That he did not find the Name of Chriſt in it. As the Name of Chriſt is the greateſt ornament of all Books where it is; ſo the name of Chriſt is the eſſence of all prayers; and that is no prayer, where his Name is not. (John 14. 13.) Whatſoever ye aſk in my Name, I will do it, that the Father may be glorified in the Son: whatſoever ye do, do all in the Name of Chriſt, giving thanks to God, through him, Col. 3. 17. To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is more then to name Chriſt in prayer: It is eaſie to name Chriſt in prayer; but it is a hard thing to pray in the Name of Chriſt. To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is,

Auguſt. l. 3. Confeſſ. c. 4.

Firſt, To look up to Chriſt, as having purchaſed us this priviledge, that we may pray; for it is by the blood of Chriſt that we draw near to God, and that a Throne of grace is open for us.

Secondly, To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is to pray in the ſtrength of Chriſt.

Thirdly, To pray in the Name of Chriſt, is to pray in the vertue of the preſent mediation of Chriſt, which carries this acknowledgment in it, That what we aſk on earth, Chriſt obtains in Heaven.

To pray thus is no eaſie matter, and unleſs we pray thus, we do not pray at all. (John 16.23,24.) In that day ye ſhall ask me nothing: Verily I ſay unto you, whatſoever ye ſhall ask the Father in my Name, he will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my Name, ask and ye ſhall receive, that your joy may be full. But how do theſe parts of the Text conſiſt? Why doth Chriſt tell them, that they ſhall ask nothing in that day, and yet promiſe, that what they ask he will give? There is a twofold asking.

First, By way of Queſtion.

Secondly, By way of Petition.

The former is, asking, that we may know, or be informed in what we doubt; the latter, is asking, that we may receive and be ſupplied with what we want. Now, when Chriſt ſaith, In that day ye ſhall ask me nothing: he had a little before promiſed ſuch a manifeſtation of the mind of God to them, by the Spirit, that they ſhould not need to come and ask him: As if he had ſaid, Now ye put queſtions (as we read they did) about many things, ye underſtand little of the myſtery of the Goſpel; but in that day ye ſhall have ſo clear a revelation about the things of Heaven, that ye ſhall not need to propoſe your doubts, and deſire reſolution, for you ſhall be able to reſolve your ſelves by the light within you. This the Apoſtle John (1 Epiſt. 2.20.) tells the Saints, But ye have an Unction from the holy One, and and ye know all things: And again (Verſ. 27.) But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you; and ye need not that any man ſhould teach you: but as the ſame anointing teacheth you all things, and is truth, and is no lye; and even as it hath taught, ye ſhall abide in him. Theſe Scriptures are both a clear expoſition, and an illuſtrious verification of that Promiſe of Chriſt, In that day ye ſhall ask me nothing: That is, After my reſurrection.

But when he ſaith, Whatſoever ye ask the Father in my Name, he will give it: The meaning is, Your prayers ſhall be heard, while you keep cloſe to this eſſential form, Asking in my Name. Beſides this eſſential form of prayer, there is alſo another form, which we may call in a qualified ſence, eſſential: As when the matter we pray about is ſpiritual, and abſolutely neceſſary to ſalvation, then to pray in an abſolute form. If it be temporal, and outward, or if it be of a ſpiritual nature, yet ſuch as is only neceſſary to the well-being of a Believer, as ſpiritual gifts, yea, and the degrees of grace are, then to pray in a conditional form, as ſubmitting it to the will of God, not only for the time, and manner, and means, and meaſure, wherein, or by which we ſhall receive thoſe things, but alſo ſubmitting the very things themſelves to his good pleaſure, whether we ſhall receive them at all, or no. Nor doth conditional prayer hinder Faith, but looks to the rule. We may pray without doubting, though we pray with a condition; and when we are fulleſt of ſubmiſſion, we may be fulleſt of confidence; yea, without ſubmiſſion in thoſe caſes there can be no true confidence.

Fourthly, Prayer is pure, when the end which we aim at is pure: The end denominates every action, as to the quality or goodneſs of it. The great end of prayer, as of all other actions, and without which, neither thoſe, nor this, can be called pure, is, the glory of God. Hallowed be thy Name, is the firſt prayer, and that hath influence into all our prayers: we muſt pray for all, that God may be glorified, and pray for nothing, that our luſts may be ſatiſfied. Though we may pray that our wants may be ſupplyed (that may be an end) yet never that our luſts may be ſatisfied (James 4.3.) Ye ask and receive not, becauſe ye ask amiſs: Where was the fault which the Apoſtle found, and ſpecified in thoſe prayers? Not in the object, they prayed to God; not in the matter, they prayed for things lawful; not in the form, they prayed in the Name of Chriſt; but the fault was in the end, Ye ask amiſs, that ye may beſtow it on your luſts. It is poſſible for a man to pray, not only for evil things, but for good things; and not only for outward good things, but for ſpiritual good things, to beſtow upon his luſts; ſome pray for ſpiritual gifts, to beſtow them on their luſts, pride, vain-glory, and covetouſneſs; yea, it is poſſible for a man to pray for grace, to beſtow it on his luſt (ſo Hypocrites do) though it be impoſſible for any man, who indeed receives grace, to beſtow it upon his luſt: Let your end be pure, that your prayers may be pure alſo.

Fifthly, Prayer is pure when it is mingled with, and put up in Faith. By Faith Abel offered a more excellent ſacrifice then Cain (Heb. 11.4.) and without Faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe God (Verſ. 6.) Prayer is our coming to God, He that comes to God, muſt believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him. Faith takes hold of Chriſt, by whom only our prayers are purified; and therefore there can be no pure prayer without Faith. As God purifies our hearts by Faith, ſo our prayers are purified by Faith. Faith doth not only take hold of God for the granting of our prayer, in which ſence 'tis ſaid (James 1. 6.) If any one ask, let him ask in Faith; that is, That he ſhall receive: But Faith takes hold of Chriſt for the purifying of our prayer, that ſo it may come up with acceptance before God. He is of purer eyes then to behold evil, he cannot look on iniquity (to approve of it, or to like it, Hab. 1.13.) Seeing then there is much iniquity in our holy things; we muſt do all by our High Prieſt, who (as the typical High Prieſt did for the Children of *Iſrael, Exod.*28. 38.) bears the iniquity of our holy things, that we (as they) may be accepted before the Lord.

Sixthly, That, and only that, is pure prayer, which is breathed in, and breathed out, by the Spirit of God. Edifie your ſelves in your moſt holy Faith, pray in the holy Ghoſt (Jude, verſ. 20.) Or, Praying by the holy Ghoſt (as ſome tranſlate) that is, by the ſtrength and help of the holy Ghoſt. We cannot make pure prayer with our own breath, parts, and gifts; the holy Spirit breaths holy prayer into, and draws it out of our hearts: As we know not what to believe or do aright, till the Spirit teacheth us; ſo we know not what we ſhould pray for as we ought, but the Spirit it ſelf maketh interceſſion for us (Rom. 8. 26.) The Spirit maketh interceſſion, not as Chriſt doth; the Spirit doth not mediate between God and us; but as it is the office of Chriſt to intercede for us with God; ſo it is the office of the holy Ghoſt to make thoſe interceſſions in us, which we put up to God: So that the Spirit is ſaid to make interceſſion for us, becauſe the interceſſions and prayers which we make, are made by the Spirit; the Spirit forms them in us. As ſome duller Scholars in a School, who cannot make their Exerciſes, get their Exerciſes made for them by thoſe that are more pregnant; ſo the Spirit makes interceſſion for us. We are dull, and low, and ſtraitened, we cannot make a prayer, the Spirit makes them for us in our hearts: Hence it is ſaid in the beginning of the Verſe, The Spirit alſo helpeth our infirmities: The Greek word ſignifieth to help, as a Nurſe helpeth a little Child to go, or as a weak decripid old man is upholden by a ſtaff, or rather (as the compoſition of the word implyes) The Spirit helpeth together: And then it is a Metaphor taken from thoſe who lift a weight, or a piece of Timber (too heavy for one) together: The Spirit lends us his hand in this duty; and they who have received grace, act alſo with the Spirit: Thus, the Spirit helpeth together: The Spirit and a Believer are both at it, to carry on this praying work; yet all that ſtrength which we put to the work flowes from the Spirit; who as he raiſeth us when we are quite fallen, ſo he aſſiſts us when we are raiſed, and then we make good work, pure work of it in prayer.

συναντιλαμβάνεται, particula συν, ad nos laborantes refertur, quorũ tamen vis omnis ab eo ſpiretu proficiſcitur, qui ſicut nos penitus collapſos erexit ita etiam erectos regit; ideoque dicitur ipſe viciſſim onus attollere ne ſub eo fatiſcamus. Bez. in Epiſt. ad Rom.

Laſtly, That is a pure prayer which comes from a pure perſon: And there is a double purity of the perſon neceſſary to a pure prayer.

Firſt, There is the purity of his ſtate; he muſt be a converted, and regenerated perſon, otherwiſe his prayer is abominable, though he ſhould be right in as many of the forementioned requiſites, as it is poſſible for an unregenerate man to be; as ſuppoſe he not only prayeth to God, and for ſuch things as are agreeable to the will of God, but alſo (as he thinks) for the glory of God; yet the mans prayer is impure, becauſe himſelf is impure: God hath reſpect to the perſon, before he hath reſpect to his ſupplication. (Prov. 15.8.) The prayer of the wicked is an abomination to God; but the prayer of the upright is his delight: And again, He that turns away his ear from hearing the Law, even his prayer, ſhall be abomination (Prov. 28.9.)

Secondly, As there muſt be purity of ſtate, before there can be a pure prayer; ſo alſo purity of life; that is, he muſt be renewed in purity, not lying or continuing in any ſin. (1 Tim. 2.8.) I will that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubtings. Holy hands, note the purity of our actions, as a holy heart notes the purity of our ſtate: To lift up the hands is to pray, the ſign being put for the thing ſignified: The meaning is, let your prayers be holy. Firſt, Without wrath to men; come not to ſeek the favour of God, with anger and revenge in thy heart againſt man. Secondly, Pray without doubting; that reſpects God, and is oppoſed to Faith: As if the Apoſtle had ſaid, Pray both in actual Faith and Love. Yet the Greek word (διαλόγισμος) there uſed, is rendered by ſome, diſceptation, or wrangling; as if the Apoſtle had in that ſpecified one effect of wrath, 'Tis expounded alſo by others, for any internal diſtraction, or diſtemper of the mind; for the mind of man is often carryed away from God in prayer, and maintains ſecret Dialogiſmes, Diſcourſes, and Conferences, in, and with it ſelf, when it ſhould be wholly taken up with God.

The covetous mans heart talks of gold, and the voluptuous mans heart talks of pleaſures, when he ſeems to pray: yea, theſe Fowls will often come down upon the Sacrifice of an Abraham, only as ſoon as he eſpies them, he drives them away; yet by theſe interruptions in prayer, as well as by any ſinful action unrepented of before prayer, the holineſs of prayer, or the lifting up of holy hands in prayer, is hindered and defaced, even in thoſe, whoſe perſons are holy. David was a man that was pure in ſtate, he was a converted perſon; yet he ſaith (Pſal. 66. 18.) If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayers. Though I am pure in ſtate, yet if I am impure in life, the ear of God will ſhut againſt my ſuits (Iſa. 1. 14, 15.) God rejects the prayers of his own people, becauſe their hands were full of blood; and hence his counſel, Waſh you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, &c. Come now let us reaſon together, ſaith the Lord (Verſ. 18.) As if he had ſaid, While I ſee your ſins, I cannot hear your prayers; while your iniquities are before mine eyes, your ſupplications cannot enter into mine ear, nor will I anſwer them. How can any ſoul expect with Faith, that God ſhould do what he requeſts, when he will not do what God commands? Or that God ſhould fulfil our deſires, while we in any thing neglect his rules?

As the prayer of an unholy perſon is turned into ſin; ſo the ſin of a holy perſon may cauſe the Lord to turn away his prayer: Then take that counſel of the Apoſtle, writing to, and of Saints (Heb. 10. 22.) Let us draw nigh to God with a true heart, in full aſſurance of Faith, having our hearts ſprinkled from an evil conſcience, and our bodies waſhed with pure water: There is a twofold evil conſcience.

Firſt, That which lives in any known ſin unrepented of.

Secondly, That which is unquiet and unſetled about the pardon of thoſe ſins which we have repented of.

We ſhould get both theſe evil conſciences, but eſpecially the firſt, cured and removed by the ſprinkling of the blood of Chriſt, before we draw nigh to God in prayer; as alſo our bodies waſhed in pure water, which is either an alluſion to the old Ceremonies among the Jews, who before they came to worſhip at the Tabernacle, purged themſelves with divers outward waſhings, leading them to the conſideration of that moral purity, both of heart and life, in which God is to be worſhipped; or it is an alluſion to Baptiſm in ſpecial, in which there is an external waſhing of the body, ſignifying the waſhing of the ſoul by the blood of Chriſt, and by the effectual working of the Spirit: The ſum of all is, unleſs the perſon be pure, his prayer is not pure. Theſe are the ingredients which conſtitute pure prayer; all theſe met in Job, and therefore he concluded, not only confidently, but truly, My prayer is pure.

And as theſe are the ingredients of prayer, ſo they are all neceſſary ingredients; ſo neceſſary, that if any one of them be wanting, the whole prayer is impure: They are neceſſary by a double neceſſity.

Firſt, As commanded by God in prayer.

Secondly, As means without which man cannot attain his end in prayer.

The general end of prayer, is, that prayer may be heard, accepted, and anſwered; God hears, accepts, anſwers, no one prayer, without ſome concurrence of all theſe. The Incenſe of the Ceremonial Law was a ſhadow of prayer, which is ſo great a duty of the Moral Law: But if this Incenſe had not been made exactly according to the will of God, both for the matter and the manner of the compoſition, preſcribed (Exod. 30. 34, 35, 36.) If after it had been thus made, it had not alſo been offered according to thoſe rules given (Levit. 16. 12, 13.) it had been an abomination to the Lord; or as the Prophet Iſaiah ſpeaks (Chap. 66. 3.) Such a burning of Incenſe had been but as the bleſſing of an Idol. We may conclude alſo, That, if prayer be either compoſed, or preſented in any other way then God himſelf hath directed, it is not only turned away, but turned into ſin. That man hath ſpoken a great word, who can ſay (in Job's ſence) My prayer is pure.

Thus Job juſtifies the prayer he made to God, and maintains his juſtice towards men. There is no injuſtice in my hands, alſo my prayer is pure: A high profeſſion, yet in the next words he goes higher, and makes both an imprecation againſt himſelf, if it were not thus with him, and an appeal to God for his teſtimony, that it was thus with him.

VERS. 18, 19.

O Earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

Alſo now behold my witneſs is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

JOB having (with much confidence) aſſerted the integrity of his heart, and the righteouſneſs of his way, both towards God and Man, confirms what he had thus confidently aſſerted, by a double Argument.

Firſt, By a vehement imprecation (Verſ. 18,) O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

Secondly, By a free appeal, an appeal to God himſelf (Verſ. 19.) Alſo now behold my witneſs is in Heaven, and my record is on high: He ſhews the neceſſity of this appeal (Verſ. 20.) My Friends ſcorn me; therefore I am conſtrained to go to God. When men have done us wrong, and will not do us right, it is both time and duty to appeal to God. Upon this ground Job appeals, and he concludes (according to our tranſlation) his appeal with a paſſionate, yet holy wiſh (Verſ. 21.) O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his Neighbour. The reaſon both of his appeal and wiſh, is given further (Verſ. 22.) he looked on himſelf, as a man ſtanding upon the very confines of death, the grave was ready for him; therefore he begs, that this buſineſs might be diſpatched, and his integrity cleared before he dyed. He was loth to go out of the world, like a candle, burnt down to the ſocket, with an ill ſavour. He that hath lived unſtained in his reputation, cannot well bear it, to dye with a blot; and therefore he will be diligent by all due means to maintain the credit which he hath got, and to recover what he hath loſt: This was the reaſon of Job's importunity diſcovered in theſe two Verſes, now further to be opened.

Eſt juramenti deprecatorii forma, quo aſſeverat nullius ſibi iniquitatis conſcium eſſe. Aben. Ezra.

Verſe 18. O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

There are two branches of this imprecation, or rather theſe make two diſtinct imprecations.

The firſt in theſe words, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

The ſecond in theſe, Let my cry have no place.

Job engages all upon the truth of what he had ſaid, being willing that his worſt might be ſeen, and his beſt not heard, if he had not ſpoken truth.

O earth, cover not thou my blood.] Job ſpeaks pathetically, or as ſome render him, Poetically, while he beſpeaks the earth, and makes the inanimate creature his hearer. The ſacred Pen-men do often turn their ſpeech to the Heavens, and to the Earth: Thus Moſes (Deut. 32. 2.) in the Preface of his Sermon, his laſt Sermon to that people, Give ear O ye Heavens, and I will ſpeak, and hear O earth the words of my mouth. So the Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 1. 2.) Hear, O Heavens, and give ear, O Earth, I have nouriſhed and brought up Children, and they have rebelled againſt me: God ſpeaks to that which hath no ears to hear, either to reprove thoſe who have ears, but hear not; or to raiſe up and provoke their attention in hearing. Thus Job, O earth, &c. as if the earth were able to take his complaint, and return an anſwer; as if the earth were able to make inquiſition, and bring in a verdict about his blood.

O earth [cover] not thou my blood.] The word ſignifies not only common, but a twofold metaphorical covering.

Firſt, Covering by way of diſſimulation; to diſſemble a matter, is to cover a matter: In that ſence Solomon ſpeaks (Prov. 12. 16.) A fools wrath is preſently known, but a prudent man covereth ſhame: That is, He diſſembleth his wrath, or his anger, he will not let it alway break forth, for that would be a ſhame to him.

Secondly, The word ſignifies to cover by forgetfulneſs; That which is not remembred, is hid or covered. (Eccleſ. 6. 4.) He cometh in with vanity (ſpeaking of man) and departeth in darkneſs, and his name ſhall be covered with darkneſs: That is, He ſhall be forgotten, he ſhall be as if he had not been. And thus it is applyed to the pardon of ſin (Pſal. 32. 1.) Sin is vailed with the worthineſs and obedience of Chriſt, as with a garment, and is to God as a thing forgotten, or out of mind, when once it is forgiven: In both theſe ſences Job ſeems to beſpeak the earth, O earth, cover not my blood: That is, If thou haſt any of my blood, do not diſſemble it, bring it forth, be not as if thou knew-eſt of no ſuch matter. As ſimulation makes that to be, which is not; ſo diſſimulation makes that not to be, which is.

Sanguis terra tegitur quando facinus diſſimulatur, nec vindictam expoſcit.

Again, Cover not my blood: That is, Forget it not, if thou haſt ſuch a record upon thy File, let it be continued and remembred, that the Generations to come may judge how I have been dealt with by this preſent Age, or how I have dealt in it.

O earth, cover not my [blood.] But what is his [blood] which he would not have covered? His blood may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, Paſſively, for his ſufferings and grievous afflictions, which were even to blood: The Apoſtle tells the Hebrews, Ye have not reſiſted to blood, ſtriving againſt ſin (Heb. 12. 4.) There is a threefold ſtrife againſt ſin.

Firſt, Againſt ſin already acting and moving in our ſelves.

Secondly, There is a ſtriving againſt that ſin which others move us to act, whether by promiſes, or by threatenings.

Thirdly, There is a ſtriving againſt that ſin which others act.

The Apoſtle (as I conceive) intends one of, or both the latter ſorts of ſtriving againſt ſin, which is indeed a ſtriving againſt ſinners; and in this ſtrife he ſaith, Ye have not reſiſted unto blood; ye have (I grant) reſiſted, to the loſs of your goods, yea, and to the loſs of your credit and reputation in the World (Chap. 10. 33, 34.) but know, ye are not come to the heat of the Battel, till your bodies bleed; ye have loſt no blood yet, ſtriving againſt ſin. Job reſiſted, or rather ſubmitted to blood; he had loſt blood, in the great fight of affliction which he indured; he was wounded all over. Now, ſay ſome, he cryes, O earth, cover not my blood: That is, Theſe my bloody ſufferings; what I have endured, let it be remembred. But we cannot well accommodate this interpretation to the Text: For, firſt, there may be as much vanity in deſiring the evils we have ſuffered, as the good we have done, ſhould be known: We muſt let God alone to erect the monument of our ſufferings; that muſt be none of our care.

Ne tegas ſanguinem meum. i. e. injuriam mihi latam qua innocens pereo. Merc.

Secondly, We cannot ſo much as ſuſpect that Job would maintain the memory of his ſufferings againſt God; yet it was he who ſmote Job, though by the hand of Satan, and wicked men: This Job had acknowledged more then once, with much humble ſubmiſſion, and therefore he doth not deſire that his blood might be forth-coming in a way of conteſtation with him. Further, If we look only to thoſe inſtruments of his affliction, who had indeed done him wrong: Surely the ſpirit of this good man; as it was far from meditating revenge, ſo his ſcope and buſineſs here, was rather to bring himſelf to a tryal then them, rather to have his own innocency cleared, then their guilt proved: And therefore we have called theſe words, an imprecation upon himſelf, in caſe he were guilty, not an accuſation of their guiltineſs. In purſuance of which general ſence, we muſt expound blood under another notion. And therefore,

Secondly, Blood may be taken actively, and ſo it falls under a threefold conſideration.

Firſt, Blood is put for the general ſinfulneſs or corruption of mans nature, as alſo for any particular ſin, as it is wrapt up in mans natural corruption. One of the Ancients interprets David's prayer (Pſal. 51. 14.) Deliver me from blood, or bloods, or (as we render) from blood-guiltineſs, O God; not of that ſpecial ſin, or not of that only, the death of Uriah, but of all ſin, which (ſaith he) therefore bears that title, becauſe it flows from the polluted nature of man, which the Scripture calls fleſh and blood. That of the Prophet is more proper to this point (Ezek. 16. 6.) When thou waſt in thy blood, I ſaid unto thee live: That is, When thou was wrapt in, and defiled with thy ſin and miſery, then I had pity on thee, and ſpake life into thee. Every ſoul tumbles in blood till it is ſprinkled with blood; our blood is our filthineſs, and the blood of Chriſt is our holineſs, freeing us at once from the guilt, and from the ſtain of ſin. This corruption of nature, together with that iſſue of it, the tranſgreſſions of life, may be called blood, for two reaſons.

Auguſtine.

Firſt, Becauſe it deſerves death, and is a ſtate of death; we are dead in ſin, and the wages of ſin is death; and as any kind of death may be expreſſed by blood, ſo a violent death is the pouring out of blood.

Secondly, It may be called blood, becauſe ſin is expiated by blood, and without ſhedding of blood there is no remiſſion, no not of the leaſt ſin.

Secondly, Blood ſignifies ſome notorious ſin or ſins. Great ſins are not only bloody ſins, but (in Scripture language) blood. (Iſa. 1. 15.) When ye make many prayers, I will not hear: Why? For your hands are full of blood: That is, Of great and foul crimes: For ſhould we take blood there, for any ſin, according to the former interpretation, then whoſe prayer ſhall be heard? Who is it that ſins not? Yea, who is not full of ſin? So that by hands full of blood, he means hands ſtained with great ſins; or with ſins, if ſmall in themſelves, yet (which greatens the leaſt ſin) loved and unrepented of (Ezek. 9. 9.) Thus ſaith the Lord, The iniquity of the Houſe of Iſrael and Judah is exceeding great, and the Land is full of blood: That is, Of all kind of wickedneſs (Ezek. 24. 7.) For her blood is in the midſt of her; ſhe ſet it upon the top of a rock; ſhe poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with duſt: Which words deſcribe, as the ſin of Jeruſalem, ſo her impudence in ſinning. Her blood was in the midſt of her; it was not caſt behind the door, or put into a corner, She ſet it upon a rock; and not only ſo, but upon the top of a rock; as if ſhe not only cared who ſaw it, but had taken care that all might ſee it; She poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with duſt: In which words the Prophet alludes to that Law (Levit. 17. 13.) commanding that the blood of a beaſt ſhould be poured out, and covered with duſt. And Again (Hoſ. 4. 2.) By ſwearing, and killing, and ſtealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood: That is, One wickedneſs is heaped upon another. There is an aggregation, or a combination of many ſins together; their ſins are ſo thick ſet, that there is not the leaſt ſpace, either of time or place between them; they ſin continually; and they ſin contiguouſly; ſin toucheth ſin.

Sanguinis nomine intelligitur peccatum graviſſimū, ac deteſtandum facinus.

Aggregant peccata, peccatis. Chald.

Thirdly, By blood in this active ſence, we may underſtand thoſe ſpecial ſins which draw blood; the ſin of oppreſſion, and the ſin of murder. The Scriptures laſt cited include theſe principally, though not theſe alone, or not theſe excluſively to other ſins. Sins of cruelty are often called blood by name; and ſuch are named bloody men, who commit ſuch things (Pſal. 55. 24.) Blood-thirſty and deceitful men ſhall not live out half their dayes: That is, Murderers and Oppreſſors ſhall not. When Shimei curſed David, he ſaid, Go thou bloody man, thou Son of Belial (2 Sam. 16. 7, 8.) He calls him bloody man, in reference to that particular act, with which David had ſtained his hands, the murder of Uriah. Hab. 2. 12. Woe to him that buildeth a Town with blood, that ſtabliſheth a City with iniquity: That is, By the iniquity of oppreſſion: He builds with blood, who, to ſet his own neſt on high, throws down the right, or takes away the lives of others. Under this third, as alſo the ſecond notion of blood, we may beſt interpret Job's imprecation, O earth, cover not thou my blood: That is, The oppreſſions and cruelties which I have committed, if I have committed any. Some conceive that Job refers to the ſtory of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4. 10.) The earth would not cover Cain's blood; that is, the blood of Abel which Cain had ſpilt. Eliphaz told Job before in a third perſon, that his Tabernacle was a Tabernacle of bribery; as much as to ſay, That he had done wrong in his place, and had been a grinder of the faces of the poor. Now ſaith Job, O earth, cover not my blood; if I have been an oppreſſor, if I have drank the blood of the poor, or am guilty of ſuch like abominations, I deſire that the earth would not cover, or diſſemble it, but let it be publiſhed to my ſhame, and brought forth to my judgment. Mr. Broughton's note is full to this ſence, If there be any injury in my hands, let the earth reveal it. And the Tygurine, O earth, do not conceal my capital crimes.

Si quam cædem maleficiumvè quod objicitis patravi, illud revelet & teſtificetur terra. Jun.
O Tellus ne celes ſcelera mea capitalia. Tygur.

The ſecond branch of the imprecation falls croſs to this; for in this Job prayes, that his evil deeds might be diſcovered; in that he prays, that his very prayers (which were his beſt deeds) might not be accepted, if he had either been, or done, as was ſuſpected.

And let my cry have no place.] The word ſignifies a loud cry, a grievous cry, the cry of a man extreamly preſſed; yea, even utterly oppreſt: This cry is expounded three wayes.

Firſt, For the very cry of grief, or for a cry cauſed meerly by grief. Let my cry have no place: That is, Let not my pains and ſorrows, my groans and ſighs, in midſt of all theſe evils be regarded, either by God or Men, if I have done ſuch evils as I am accuſed of. 'Tis a great affliction which puts a man to his cry, whether to God or Man; but it is a greater affliction to cry and not to be heard, neither by God nor man: The cry of a poor man is then ſaid to have no place with a Judge, when he will not hear it, or take notice of it.

Secondly, Others expound this for the cry of ſin. Great ſins are called a cry, not only becauſe they make others cry, but becauſe themſelves are very clamorous and crying. Sin hath a tongue to ſpeak, and it hath teeth to bite: Every ſin ſpeaks, but ſome ſins have a loud voice, they cry, The blood of thy Brother, which thou haſt ſpilt, cryes unto me (ſaith God to Cain, Gen. 4. 10.) The ſin of Sodom cryed up to Heaven (Gen. 18. 20.) Oppreſſion cauſeth a cry; ſo here, Let my cry, that is, my crying ſins, or the cry of my ſins, have no place; that is, none to hide, or ſhelter themſelves in: And then this clauſe of the imprecation is of the ſame ſence with the former, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

Clamat quia innocens effuſus eſt, & dicitur interpellare dominum, non proſecutione Eloquii ſed indignitate commiſſi Ambroſ.

Thirdly, By this cry we may underſtand Job's prayer, and that of two ſorts: Firſt, Prayers, Petitions, or complaints to men; let not any Friend regard my cry. Secondly, Prayers to God; for as there are crying ſins, ſo there are crying prayers; The Lord ſaid to Moſes, Wherefore cryeſt thou unto me? Exod. 14. 15. Aſa cryed unto the Lord (2 Chron. 14.) The Ninevites were commanded to cry mightily to God (John 3. 8.) and Chriſt himſelf prayed with ſtrong cryes (Heb. 5. 7.) As there are two things eſpecially which make ſins crying ſins.

Firſt, When they are earneſtly committed.
Secondly, When they are conſtantly committed.
So two things make prayers crying prayers:
Firſt, When we pray with earneſtneſs.
Secondly, When we pray with continuance, or perſeverance.

We find David often crying to God in prayer; ſo that when Job ſaith, Let my cry have no place; his meaning is, Let not God hear my moſt earneſt prayer: A dreadful imprecation! When we, who have no help on earth, ſhall wiſh that we may have none in Heaven neither; What can we wiſh worſe to our ſelves then this?

Ne in Cœlū efferatur ſuſcipiaturve clamor meus ſi ſim ejuſmodi. Jun.

From the words in general Obſerve, It is lawful to uſe imprecations.

Job did not ſin in this: There are imprecations of two ſorts.

Firſt, Upon others, when we wiſh them evil, or curſe them; this in ſome rare caſes may be done; David uſeth imprecations againſt the incorrigible enemies of the Church, and ſo may we; but in reference to perſonal injuries, the Goſpel-rule is, Bleſs them that curſe you, pray for them that deſpitefully uſe you, Matth. 5. 44.

Secondly, Upon our ſelves; ſuch are the imprecations intended in this point. Job calls down miſchief upon his own head, in both parts of the Verſe, Let all my ſins be diſcovered, let all my prayers be refuſed, if ever I have done this thing. Imprecations, or wiſhes of evil upon our ſelves may proceed upon a double ground.

Firſt, For the aſſuring of what we promiſe, or engage our ſelves to do: As to ſay, I will do ſuch a thing, or I promiſe to do it; if I do it not, I wiſh evil may befal me: This is to put our ſelves under a curſe, which we do at leaſt implicitely in taking any promiſſory Oath. There are two ſorts of Oaths.

Firſt, Aſſertory Oaths, when we affirm ſuch a thing to be true.

Secondly, Promiſſory Oaths, when we promiſe to do ſuch a thing, calling God to witneſs, and laying our ſelves under a penalty, if we do it not. This is expreſſed in ſome, and implyed in all ſolemn Oaths and Covenants. The preſent point extends not to this ſort of imprecations.

Secondly, Imprecations of penal evils may be uſed for the ſtronger denial, or diſavowing of any ſinful evil, of which we are ſuſpected, or with which we are directly charged. To this ſort of imprecations the preſent point is confined: This was Job's caſe, he was deeply charged to have done wickedly; and he as deeply denied that he had done ſo. Thus David imprecates evil upon himſelf (Pſal. 7. 3, 4, 5.) The title of the Pſalm ſhews the occaſion of it. Shiggaion of David (that is, David's variable, or delightful ſong, or David's ſolace) concerning the words of Cuſh the Benjamite: That is, Either of Saul himſelf, whoſe ill diſpoſition towards him he cloſely taxeth under the word Cuſh, which ſignifies a Blackmoor, or Æthiopian; or it may deſign ſome of Saul's Courtiers, who had done ill offices to David, and accuſed him of a conſpiracy, to take away Saul's life, as appears (1 Sam. 24. 9.) And David ſaid to Saul, Wherefore heareſt thou mens words, ſaying, Behold David ſeeketh thy hurt. Now David compoſed this Pſalm in his own vindication, and fears not to call down vengeance upon his own head, if he were guilty. O Lord my God, if I have done this, if there be iniquity in my hands (that is, this iniquity, if I have done this) If I have rewarded evil to him that was at peace with me (what then? He imprecates) Let mine enemy perſecute my ſoul and take it, yea, let him tread my life down to the earth, and lay mine honour in the duſt. David layes all at ſtake, ſoul, and life, and honour, in the higheſt actings of holineſs towards God, and integrity towards man. He that is in David's caſe, and hath David's conſcience, may do the like, and fear no hurt. The Woman ſuſpected of adultery was by the Law (Num. 5.) to imprecate, and wiſh evil on her ſelf, if ſhe did not ſpeak true in denying it: For the Prieſt was commanded to bring the Woman, and to put the offering on her head, and then to give her the water of jealouſie to drink, ſaying, This water which cauſeth the curſe, ſhall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to ſwell, and thy thigh to rot; and the Woman was to anſwer, Amen, Amen: As if ſhe had ſaid, I pray God this miſery may come upon me, in caſe I have been falſe, or unfaithful to my Husband. Thus the Woman confirmed the curſe, and took it upon her ſelf, if ſhe were defiled; or teſtified her Faith in God, that he would clear her innocency, ſhe being not defiled; and therefore the word Amen was doubled.

And here it will not be impertinent to remember how the ſuperſtitious heart of man hath in times of former ignorance and darkneſs invented and adventured upon wayes of tryal in doubtful caſes, with ſome reſemblance to (poſſibly in imitation of) this appointment of God among the Jews.

The old Saxons had their Ordeal, which word ſignifies, Due part, or Dome and Judgment: There were four ſorts of Ordeal, by which when manifeſt proofs were wanting, they attempted (or indeed tempted God) to find out whether the party accuſed were guilty, or guiltleſs.

Verſteg. Reſtitut. of decayed Intel. in Antiquit. Chap: 3.

The firſt was by Combat, in which the perſon accuſing offered with the peril of his life at any weapon, to prove his accuſation: And if the perſon accuſed did refuſe the challenge, or did either yield, or was ſlain in the fight, he was without further evidence adjudged culpable.

The ſecond was by Fire, in which the perſons accuſed were to take red hot iron in their bare hands, or to go bare-foot and blindfold where red hot Irons were laid, and if they did either ſtep between them, or ſtepping upon them, felt no harm; this was a declaration of innocency.

The third tryal was made by Hot boyling water, into which if the perſon ſuſpected thruſting his naked Arm, found no evil effects, he was pronounced guiltleſs.

The fourth was by cold water; into which perſons accuſed, having a cord tyed about them, were caſt, and if they ſunk to the bottom, and continued a little there, till they were drawn up, they were held faultleſs; all theſe tryals were made with prayer and invocation upon the Name of God, that the truth might be made known.

Theſe cuſtoms drew their firſt breath from Paganiſm, and were continued by ſome who profeſſed Chriſtianity, till clearer light convinced them of their vanity, and unwarrantable boldneſs with the Name of God.

Now, as all imprecations uſed with theſe or the like Ceremonies and circumſtances invented by man are wicked and unlawful; ſo thoſe which are in themſelves lawful, are uſed by moſt unlawfully. And therefore I ſhall give ſome rules and bounds, beyond which we may not paſs, without ſinful preſumption.

Firſt, An imprecation muſt be uſed only in very great, ſerious, and weighty matters: Woe to thoſe who wiſh evil on, or curſe themſelves about trifles; ſome have been heard to wiſh themſelves hanged, yea damned, upon ſmall occaſions.

Secondly, It is not enough that the matter be great, and ſerious, unleſs it be done with ſerious deliberation, and ſelf-examination, as alſo with higheſt reverence of God, who knows our hearts, and will judge both our wayes and words.

Thirdly, It muſt be done with a deſire to honour God, as much as to exonerate our ſelves. David knew Gods Name was blaſphemed by thoſe who miſjudged him; Here's a man that would be thought ſo holy, and religious before God; ſee how perfidious and diſloyal he is to his King. When David ſaw the honour of God concerned in him, he was bold to ſay, Lord, if I have done this thing, let him perſecute my life and take it; he hath perſecuted my life, but he could not take it hitherto; but let him take it, if this be ſo.

Fourthly, Be ſure that you are clear in the matter, and that you imprecate in truth; God is an avenger of falſhood, much more of ſtudied falſhood. It is hard to deprecate his wrath, when we have ſpoken falſly; ſurely then he will pour out his wrath upon their heads, who imprecate it, to cover their falſhood. The Jews accuſed Chriſt falſly, and as earneſtly prayed judgment againſt him, crying out to the Judge, Let him be crucified: But when they ſaw they could not prevail with importunity, and that Pilate (who was doubtful of the juſtice of their clamour) took water, and waſhed his hands, and ſaid, Behold I am free from the blood of this man; then in a rage they imprecate, Let his blood be upon us, and upon our children (Matth. 27. 25.) As if they had ſaid, Be not thou ſo ſcrupulous to condemn him, if thou thinkeſt him innocent, let the vengeance of his innocent blood fall upon us and our poſterity. When a man is accuſed rightly, and the Judge reſts unſatisfied, the Accuſer may ſay to ſatisfie the Judge, Let his blood be upon my head; I have ſpoke my conſcience, and the truth. The Jews accuſed Chriſt falſly, yet called for his blood upon their heads; therefore God gave them their wicked wiſh, and they lye under the weight of this imprecation to this very day. They prayed that the blood of Chriſt might be upon them, and it is upon them. As God pours the blood of Chriſt upon ſome in mercy, ſo upon others in wrath. The blood of Chriſt is upon Believers, to waſh and cleanſe them from their ſins; but the blood of Chriſt hath been upon the Jews to condemn and ſcatter them, as a vile people, all the World over for their ſin: The Lord hath been moſt exact in anſwering this cry, even in the very place where they made it. The Hiſtory of the Jews reports, that about thirty eight years after this dreadful curſe upon themſelves, Herod called the Jews together, and demanded a ſum of Money of them for making a Water-courſe, which they refuſing to give, he ſent for Souldiers to come ſecretly armed, who ſlew great multitudes of them in that place, where they cryed, Let his blood be upon us, &c. At another time Florus, who was General of the Common Souldiers, made a ſecond, and that a more bloody maſſacre of them there. And when Jeruſalem was taken by Veſpaſian, the blood of Chriſt was poured upon the heads of many hundred thouſands, who were ſlain by Fire and Sword, Famine and Peſtilence; beſides more then ſeven thouſand of them, who were led captive: And the Story informs us further, that Cæſar ſold the younger and common ſort of thoſe Captives at that contemptible rate of thirty a penny; as they or their Fathers ſold Chriſt for thirty pence, ſo by the juſt judgment of God thirty of them were ſold for a penny. There was never any people in the World, who taſted more juſtly, or more deeply of that cup of ſelf-curſing then the Jews have done; yet many perſons have taſted deeply of it too beſides the Jews. This ſin hath ſo much, not only of wickedneſs, but boldneſs in it, that God never lets it go altogether unpuniſhed, though (being repented of) it may be pardoned. Maſter Perkins, in his Book Of the right government of the Tongue, touching upon this point, tells of certain Engliſh Souldiers in the time of King Edward the ſixth, who were caſt upon the French ſhore by a ſtorm; in which ſtreſs they went to prayer, that they might be delivered; but one Souldier, inſtead of prayer, cryed out, Gallows take thy right, or claim thy due; and when he came home he was hanged indeed. Mr. Fox, in his Book of Acts and Monuments, hath a notable example to this purpoſe, of one John Peters, Keeper of Newgate, who was wont to at every ordinary thing he ſpoke (whether it were true or falſe, it made (with him) no great matter) to averr it with this imprecation, if it be not ſo, I pray God I may rot before I dye; and ſo it came to paſs. I might give many inſtances of ſuch imprecations which God hath followed with ſevereſt vengeance: I ſhall add one more which is freſh in the memory of many yet living, of a Gentleman of quality, a Knight, that ſuffered at the Tower-hill, about the death of Sir Thomas Overbury, who confeſſed it was juſt with God that he ſhould undergo that ignominious death; for oft in gaming (ſaid he) I have uſed this wiſh, I pray God I be hanged if it be not ſo. I will conclude this point with a nearer inſtance, A Woman who accidentally came into the Congregation while this word was preached, did afterwards by writing certifie me, that ſhe being convinced in conſcience of her ſin in wiſhing evil upon her ſelf, thereby to cover a ſin, which ſhe had committed, but denyed, did feel the ſad effects of it according to her wiſh, begging earneſt prayers that it might be forgiven her, and that God would be entreated to take off his hand.

Sir Gervaiſe Elloways.

Let thoſe wretches hear and fear, and do no more ſo preſumptuouſly, who fear not to wiſh, The Devil take them, and God damn them, leſt indeed God let the Devil looſe upon them, and take them at their word. And here it may be obſerved, that ſuch as are moſt guilty are moſt apt to imprecate vengeance upon themſelves, that they may appear guiltleſs. They have no way left to perſwade others, that they are good, or have not done evil, but by wiſhing evil to themſelves. Such is the ſtupidity of a miſled conſcience, that when it is deepeſt in ſin, it dares defie Gods juſtice to gain an opinion among men, of its own innocency.

O earth, cover not thou my blood.

More particularly, Obſerve,

Great ſins, bloody ſins, eſpecially this ſin of ſhedding innocent blood, ſhall not paſs undiſcovered.

God will give a tongue to the earth, he will make ſpeechleſs creatures ſpeak, rather then blood ſhall be concealed. Blood may be concealed a long time, but blood ſhall not alwayes be concealed (Gen. 4. 7.) What haſt thou done? The voice of thy Brothers Blood cryeth to me from the ground: The blood had no voice, and the ground was ſilent; blood hath no more voice of its own, then water hath, or then a Fiſh that lives in the water hath; theſe did not ſpeak formally: but the Lord ſpeaks thus to ſhew that he will certainly bring bloody ſins, chiefly the ſin of blood, to light. The juſtice of God in all Ages hath ſent out his Writ of enquiry after bloody men, and for the blood of the innocent (Pſal. 9. 12.) When he maketh inquiſition for blood, he remembreth them, he forgetteth not the cry of the poor.

But doth not the Lord make inquiſition for all ſin? Or is there any ſin that God doth not enquire after?

Surely no, there was never any ſin committed in the World, but the Lord hath inquired after it; ſin ſhall not be loſt, God will find it out, and keep it upon record: But when it is ſaid, God makes inquiſition for blood, it argues the greatneſs of that ſin: For while that act of God, which extendeth to every ſin, is appropriated to ſome one particular ſin, it is an argument that God takes ſpecial notice of it, or that it is a very provoking ſin: Though God makes inquiſition for all ſin, yet as if he would let all other ſins paſs unſought, and un-enquired after, it is ſaid only of this ſin, that he makes inquiſition for it. We find not the like expreſſion about any other particular ſin in all the Book of God; though it be a truth, that he inquires for all ſin.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Innocency fears no diſcovery.

Come who will, Angels from Heaven, Devils from Hell, Men on Earth, let all Creatures be ſummoned into one Jury of grand Inqueſt, an innocent perſon will neither run nor hide his head for it: He whoſe heart bears witneſs with him, fears no witneſs that can be brought againſt him. While Conſcience acquits, the matter is not much who accuſeth, or condemns: He that is righteous knows that all his ſins are covered by the free grace of God in the righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt; and he knows that he hath not covered his ſin as Adam by excuſes; nor ſewed the Fig-leaves of carnal reaſonings together, to hide his nakedneſs; he knows alſo that he lives not in any known ſin, nor hath wickedly departed from the Lord. Now becauſe in all theſe reſpects he knows nothing by himſelf, therefore he cares not who knows him; he calls not for Masks, or Viſors, for Curtains, or coverings, to obſcure or diſguiſe himſelf, or his actions under, either from the ſight of God or Man, but is willing to ſtand forth in the open light. For though the beſt of men may have done ſome act, which is not fit for the open light, yet conſidering the whole frame of their hearts and lives towards God, together with what hath paſt between God and their ſouls about that act; they are not afraid that the worſt act which ever they have done ſhould ſtand forth in the open light; and as for thoſe crimes which men uncharitably charge upon them, every honeſt heart ſpeaks boldly the ſence of this firſt part of Job's imprecation, O earth, cover not thou my blood.

From the ſecond branch of Job's imprecation, Let my cry have no place, Obſerve, Not to have prayer heard and accepted by God, is the greateſt miſery that can befal man.

God is the laſt refuge of a diſtreſſed ſoul; and the means by which we make God our refuge, or fly to him for refuge, is believing, and fervent prayer: Prayer is a duty, and yet it is a priviledge; it is a priviledge, not only to receive an anſwer of prayer, but to put up our requeſts in prayer; he therefore that asks a ſtop upon his own prayers, hath at once asked a ſtop upon all his mercies; he cannot look to be relieved, who tells God he doth not look to be heard; and when prayer hath no place of acceptance in Heaven, we can have no place of contentment on the Earth: Upon this account we may conclude,

That, Man cannot beſpeak any thing worſe for himſelf, then not to be heard when he ſpeaks to God.

As it is one of the higheſt honours done to God, that men make prayers to him; ſo it is one of the deepeſt afflictions of man, for God not to hear his prayers: Such was Saul's condition (2 Sam. 28.) God doth not anſwer me, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by Prophets: He could get no anſwer from God, his cry had no place: This troubled him more then the invaſion of the Philiſtims. I am ſore diſtreſſed (ſaith he) the Philiſtims make war upon me, and God is departed from me. When trouble comes, and God goes away, man is in a woful eſtate. We have no promiſe to receive unleſs we ask; and though we do ask, we cannot receive, unleſs our prayer be received: God receives the prayer of man, before man receives any thing from God in prayer. All our treaſure lyes in Heaven; our comfort is in Heaven, our protection is in Heaven; and prayer is the meſſenger which we ſend to Heaven in the Name of Chriſt for all things, or, for whatſoever elſe we need on earth. Now if prayer cannot get in, if God will not hear prayer, if he ſend back our meſſenger without audience, what can we receive?

The ſinfulneſs of man appears in nothing more then in this, That he calleth not upon God (Pſal. 14. 4.) Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? Who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the Lord: Now as the ſin of man appears exceedingly in not calling upon God; ſo the wrath of God appears exceedingly in not hearing man when he calls (Prov. 1. 20.) Then ſhall they call upon me, but I will not anſwer; they ſhall ſeek me early, but they ſhall not find me. God will pour out wrath upon the Families that call not upon his Name (Jer. 10. 25.) but he pours out moſt wrath upon thoſe Families whom he hears not, when they call upon his Name. All our mercies are ſhut out at once, when prayer is ſhut out: nor ſhall that perſon have place or room in Gods heart, whoſe cry hath no place in his ear.

Holy Job was ſenſible enough of this, nor durſt he have imprecated, that his cry ſhould have no place, but that (being conſcious of no evil) he was aſſured that his cry had place; and therefore as in the ſincerity of his ſoul he made that imprecation; ſo in the confidence of his ſoul, he proceeds to make his Appeal to God in the next words.

Verſe 19. Alſo now, behold my witneſs is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

As if he had ſaid, I fear no evidence that can be brought againſt me on earth, and I rejoyce in the witneſs I have in Heaven: though I have none to teſtifie for me here, yet I have one that will teſtifie for me above: My witneſs is in Heaven, and my record is on high.

Some conceive, that as Job had ſpoken to the earth before, ſo now he ſpeaks to Heaven, O earth, cover not my blood: O Heaven, witneſs for me. But he ſaith not, my witneſs is Heaven, but my witneſs is in Heaven; nor doth he call the Heavens to witneſs for him; but he calls him who is in Heaven to witneſs, and that is God.

Utitur teſtificatione cœli poſtquam terræ teſtimonium produxit. Eugub.

There are two branches of this Appeal, and they both intend the ſame thing. My witneſs is in Heaven, and my record is on high. The words witneſs and record, are of the ſame ſignification, though they differ in the letter: The one is properly an Hebrew word, and the other Syriack: When Jacob and Laban were in that conteſt (Gen. 31. 47.) Jacob took a Stone, and ſet up a Pillar for a witneſs, And Jacob ſaid to his Brethren, Gather ſtones, and they made an heap, and they did eat there upon the heap, and Laban called it Jegar-ſahadatha, that is, a heap of witneſſes (as it is in the Margin) but Jacob called it Galeed, or Gilead: Jacob ſpeaking the pure Hebrew, and Laban the Syriack language, they take in both the words of Job's Appeal, My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high.

סהד Synonymum eſt עד Hieron. in Trad.

Job ſpeaks the ſame thing twice, to ſhew how ſtrongly he believed that the Lord would be witneſs for him, My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high.

Eſt forma juramenti, quo deū invocat innocentiæ ſuæ teſtem atque conſcientiæ ſpectatorem. Cajet.

Heaven and high are the ſame, as witneſs and record are. And when he ſaith, on high, or in the high place; he uſeth not the word Bamoth by which thoſe high places are expreſſed, wherein the falſe gods were worſhipped, or the true God falſely: Job puts that word into his Appeal, which belongs properly to God, and ſignifies in Scripture, the place of his glorious reſidence. Job's record was not only on high, but (Bemerumim, the Hebrew is Plural) in the heights: Some tranſlate it in the Superlative, not (in excelſis) on high, but (in altiſſimis) in the higheſt: As if he had ſaid, My witneſs is above all witneſſes, and therefore he is a witneſs above all exception. And Job did well, for his purpoſe, to ſay his record was on high; not only becauſe of the dignity of that which is high, but for the advantage which he hath, who is on high, or in the higheſt, to be a witneſs. God is ſaid to be a witneſs in Heaven, or on high, to ſhew how eaſily he can obſerve and take notice of thoſe things which are below: God hath eyes infinitely pure and piercing, he beholds all things, and he beholds them from on high, as from a watch-tower, which renders the object more obvious to the eye: The ſight is ſoon intercepted upon a level: but, The Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 14. 2.) looked down from Heaven upon the children of men, to ſee if there were any that did underſtand and ſeek God: If but one had ſought God, God had found him out; but the report which he makes upon that ſurvey, tells us, They are all gone aſide, they are altogether become filthy, there is none that doth good, no not one (Ver. 3.)

Further he ſaith, My witneſs is in Heaven, or on high; implying, that he was ſuch a witneſs as was able to protect him; a witneſs who is above all fear, and who needs no favour. Some witneſſes are not only men of no ſtate, but of no conſcience. Such underlings will be hirelings upon Oath againſt the truth, and are ready to teſtifie any thing for hope of gain, or for fear of a frown: My witneſs (ſaith Job) is in Heaven, my record is on high; ſuch a witneſs he is as cannot be corrupted by gifts, ſuch as hath no need of any mans gifts, ſeeing he gives to all men life and breath, and all things.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That as God is the Judge of all men, ſo he is their witneſs.

God is the Judge of all the earth, and God is the witneſs of all the earth too (Jer. 29. 23.) Becauſe they have committed villany in Iſrael, and have committed adultery with their neighbours Wives, and have ſpoken lying words in my name, that I have not commanded them; even I know, and am a witneſs, ſaith the Lord: He ſaith not, I know, and am Judge; but I know, and am Witneſs.

Let no man hope to eſcape the judgment of God, becauſe there is none to witneſs againſt him: for if God hath not the witneſs of man, if our ſin be a ſecret to all the World, yet God hath alwayes two Witneſſes.

Firſt, Our own conſcience.

Secondly, Himſelf.

An earthly Judge muſt not be a Witneſs; his duty is to give ſentence, not to give evidence; he muſt determine according to what is alledged, and proved upon teſtimony given; but he cannot give teſtimony; he cannot be Judge and Party too: But God is ſo tranſcendently Soveraign, that he is both Judge and Party, he pronounceth ſentence, and gives in evidence; Chriſt is called, The faithful, and the true Witneſs (Rev. 3. 14.) And yet, All judgment is given into his hand (John 5. 22, 27.) God judgeth upon his own knowledge, not upon the knowledge of others, and therefore as there can be no failing in, ſo no avoiding of his judgment.

Secondly, Obſerve, It is lawful to appeal to God, or to take God to witneſs.

An Oath is the calling of God to witneſs, and whenſoever we appeal to God, or call him to witneſs, it is an Oath. The Apoſtle Paul took an Oath, when he ſaid (Rom. 1. 9.) God is my witneſs, whom I ſerve with my ſpirit in the Goſpel of his Son, that without ceaſing I make mention of you in my prayers. Thus in higheſt holineſs he ſware that he prayed for the Romans ſpiritual good, while he was abſent from them, and had never ſo much as ſeen them; and that he paſſionately deſired to be preſent with them, and ſee them, that he might impart unto them ſome ſpiritual gift: Becauſe being a meer ſtranger, he had not yet made his actions a witneſs of his love to them, and becauſe no man can be an unerring witneſs of another mans heart, or of the moving of his affections, therefore he calls God to witneſs, who alone knows the heart, and can tell how much we love either himſelf, or one another.

He ſpeaks as much (though in another caſe) to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1. 23.) Moreover I call God for a record upon my ſoul, that to ſpare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth. As if he had ſaid, By this my earneſt adjuration, I aſſure you, that the reaſon why I have deferred my coming to you, was not from any levity of mind, or change of purpoſe in me, but only becauſe I was unwilling to uſe ſuch ſeverity as the diſtempers among you call for, and would have preſſed me unto being preſent. We find him in the ſame tenour of ſpeech towards the Philippians (Chap. 1. 8.) For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Chriſt: That is, I call God to witneſs, I love you: And again (1 Theſ. 2. 5.) Neither at any time uſed we flattering words, as you know, nor a cloak of covetouſneſs, God is witneſs: As if he had ſaid, Had I uſed flattering words, you might witneſs it; and that I have not uſed a cloak of covetouſneſs, God is witneſs. I might have worn a cloak of covetouſneſs ſo cloſely, that you could not have ſeen it, but God could; he can judge through the darkeſt clouds, and ſee through the thickeſt cloaks and coverings; but I appeal to him whether I have put on ſuch a cloak, or no. As Paul by Oath purged himſelf from covetouſneſs of ſpirit; ſo Abraham proteſted by Oath againſt all covetous practices (Gen. 14. 22.) I have lifted up mine hand to the moſt high God, the poſſeſſor of Heaven and Earth, that I will not take any thing that is thine. This geſture of lifting up the hand when an Oath is taken, is there put for an Oath it ſelf; by which Abraham appealed to God, as a witneſs of his ſincere intentions in taking up thoſe Armes for the reſcue of his Nephew Lot; and that as he had overcome his Enemies, ſo he had overcome covetouſneſs, which was, of the two, the far more noble victory.

This calling of God to witneſs is of two ſorts.

Firſt, When we are called by others, who have lawful power, to teſtifie the truth; ſuch is ſwearing before a Magiſtrate.

Secondly, When we offer it our ſelves, for the removal of ſuch jealouſies as are caſt upon us, and we have no other way left, to free, or vindicate our ſelves from them.

This latter was the occaſion of Job's Oath, as alſo of thoſe alledged concerning Paul and Abraham: but whether it be an Oath of the one ſort, or of the other, both meet in this, that God is appealed to, and called to witneſs by ſuch as uſe them: And ſeeing he is a jealous God, who will not hold them guiltleſs that take his Name in vain, I ſhall add ſome cautions for the bounding and directing of our practice.

Firſt, We may call God to witneſs in weighty matters; and unleſs the matter be weighty, either in it ſelf, or in the conſequents of it, we may not: God is my Witneſs, and God is my Judge, are not for common, much leſs for vain things. There are two things in every Oath or Appeal to God, which ſhew this.

Firſt, An Oath is for confirmation (Heb. 6. 16.) Vain things are not worthy the mentioning, much leſs are they worthy the confirming: We ought not to ſtrive at all about them, much leſs ought we to ſwear about them, which is an end of all ſtrife.

Secondly, In every Oath or Appeal to God, there is an invocation of the Name of God; but the Name of God muſt not be taken in vain; which it cannot but be, when it is taken into our mouthes about a vain thing,

Secondly, We may call God to witneſs when men give a wrong witneſs of us, or will not give a right witneſs for us; but if we can have teſtimony upon earth, we muſt not go to Heaven for it; God muſt be our laſt reſort. Job found none on earth to witneſs for him, and his afflictions were looked upon as ſufficient witneſſes againſt him, and therefore he was neceſſitated to make his addreſs to God.

Thirdly, When the matter is not only ſuch as others will not teſtifie, when they might, but ſuch as no man can teſtifie (none being privy to it, but only God and our own ſouls) then we have a juſt ground of appeal to God; who will bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs, and will make manifeſt the counſels of the heart: Job's ſincerity was ſuſpected; and that is ſuch a ſecret as man hath no acceſs unto, and therefore can give no witneſs to it: Who is ſincere, and who is an hypocrite, is reſolved only by the teſtimony of God, and of our own ſouls.

Fourthly, We muſt be ſure to call God to witneſs in truth; Thou ſhalt ſwear the Lord liveth in truth, in righteouſneſs, and in judgment (Jer. 4. 2.) Unleſs we have a witneſs within us, we muſt not call God to witneſs who is above us. God is ready to witneſs with our Conſciences; but woe to thoſe who call God to witneſs againſt their Conſciences. Holy Paul called God to record upon his ſoul (2 Cor. 1. 23.) That is, He did as it were (which is alſo done in every Oath) engage, or pawn his ſoul and ſalvation upon it, that he ſpake the truth: When our ſouls bear record with us, we may venture to call God to record upon our ſouls. But ſome, when they have no witneſs from their ſouls, yea, when their ſouls witneſs againſt them, will yet venture to call God to record upon their ſouls. They will needs be tryed by God, who dare not abide the juſt tryal of men; ſuch would make God (who cannot lye) witneſs to a lye: They uſe the glorious God, as ſome do a ſort of miſcreants, called Knights of the Poſt, who for a Fee, will not only ſay, but ſwear what you will. This is higheſt profanation of the Name of God: For as he that believes not the truth of God, makes him a lyar; ſo alſo doth he that appeals to God for the witneſs of an untruth.

More particularly, My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high. Job ſpeaks this, not only becauſe he wanted the witneſs of men, but becauſe of the high eſteem he had of the witneſs of God.

Hence Obſerve, The witneſs of God is the moſt deſireable witneſs.

The witneſs we have on earth is nothing worth, unleſs we have a witneſs in Heaven: If we have not the inward witneſs of our own conſcience, it is little advantage though we have a thouſand outward witneſſes: Conſcience is more then a thouſand witneſſes; but God is more then ten thouſand Conſciences: Therefore never reſt in any witneſſes, till you have the witneſs of God. We labour (ſaith the Apoſtle (2 Cor. 5.9.) and that word ſignifies not only an earneſt, or an induſtrious, but an ambitious labour) that whether preſent, or abſent, we may be accepted of him: As if he had ſaid, Poſſibly we might gain acceptation and applauſe among men, would we but ſtudy to pleaſe and apply our ſelves to them; but the favour of men will not ſerve our turn, nor can we ſit down and reſt our ſelves under their ſhadow. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy ſight, O Lord, was David's prayer (Pſal. 19.14.) David could not bear it, that a word, or a thought of his ſhould miſs acceptation with God: It did not ſatisfie him that his actions were well witneſſed unto by men on earth, unleſs his very thoughts were witneſſed to by the Lord in Heaven.

Some, as it is ſaid of thoſe Rulers (John 12. 42.) Love the praiſe of men more then the praiſe of God: So long as they have a record here below, they little regard his record who is on high. There is no greater argument of a carnal mind, then this: He that loves the praiſe or teſtimony of men as much as he loves the praiſe or teſtimony of God, doth indeed love it more: Seeing there is nothing more unequal then an equal partition of our eſteem between God and Man. Where our obligation unto two is unequal, we can never be diſcharged by paying each of them an equal ſum. We have cauſe to bleſs God when we have witneſs among men; but the witneſs of men ſhould be of no price with us in compariſon of the witneſs of God: Not only may we have recourſe to the witneſs of God, when we cannot obtain the witneſs of men; but we muſt prefer the ſingle witneſs of God before a throng of humane witneſſes; and when we have enough on earth, yet ſay with Job, My witneſs is in Heaven. The witneſs of the men of this world, or of evil men (while we keep a good conſcience) is a mercy. But as the witneſs of good men is more deſireable, then the witneſs of all other men, and the witneſs of a good conſcience is more deſireable then the witneſs of good men; ſo the witneſs of God is more deſireable then (without which we cannot have it, and with which we ſhall have it) the witneſs of a good conſcience.

For as the teſtimony of God againſt us, is more terrible, then that of our own hearts (1 John 3.20.) If our heart condemn us, God is greater then our hearts, and knoweth all things; and therefore knoweth more evil by us, and every evil more then our own hearts do; ſo the teſtimony of God for us is more comfortable, then that of our own hearts. If our hearts acquit us, God is greater then our hearts, and knowing all things; he knoweth more good by us, and every good more then our own hearts do. Who can expreſs or tell how pleaſant it is to receive this teſtimony from God, that we pleaſe God? Behold (ſaith David Pſal. 133.1.) how good and pleaſant a thing it is for Brethren to dwell together in unity: But O how good and pleaſant a thing it is for God and man to dwell together in unity; for man to be alwayes giving witneſs to God, that he is good and gracious, and for God to be alwayes giving witneſs to man, that he is upright and righteous. When Conſcience ſpeaks us fair, we have peace, and a continual feaſt; but when God ſpeaks us fair, and gives us an euge from Heaven, Well done good and faithful Servants, we have peace which paſſeth all underſtanding, and not only a joyful feaſt, but a feaſt of joyes which are unſpeakable, and full of glory. Yea, when we are at the fulleſt tables of this world, this is the ſauce in our diſh, and the ſugar in our cup: Go thy way (ſaith the Preacher, Eccleſ. 9.7.) eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; (Why? what's the matter now?) For now God accepteth thy works. Thou haſt a witneſs in Heaven.

Thirdly, Obſerve, A good man dares appeal and put his cauſe to God.

A wicked man will ſometimes appeal, and put his cauſe to God out of preſumption, and impudence: but a good man appeals to God in faith, and holy confidence.

As it is an act of grace or favour in God to receive an appeal from man; ſo it is an act not only of grace, but of courage in man, to make an appeal to God. It is an act of grace, as it is part of the worſhip of God; but it is an act of courage, or as I may call it, a daring work, as it is a putting our ſelves under the juſtice of God, yea, an implicit imprecating of the vengeance of God, in caſe we ſpeak untrue: Thus to appeal, or ſwear, is a daring work, and ſuch as no man durſt do (if he knew what he did) but in a good cauſe. It is a fearful thing thus to fall into the hands of the living God. Some have ventured upon falſe Oaths and Appeals to God, only for fear of men: Such ſay commonly, They had rather truſt God with their ſouls (by ſwearing falſly) then man with their eſtates, lives, or liberties, by confeſſing the truth. Which is not only as if a man ſhould flee from a Lyon, and a Bear ſhould meet him; but infinitely more then if a man for fear of the biting of a Whippet, or of the ſtinging of a Bee, ſhould willingly offer himſelf to the mouth of a Lyon, and to the ſting of a Serpent. To ſwear is not only to ſet our naked breaſts before the Cannons mouth, but with our own mouths to give fire to it, if we utter falſhood.

Fourthly, Obſerve, It is the joy and comfort of an upright heart, that there is a God in Heaven who knows his heart, and bears witneſs of all his wayes.

It is the terror of wicked men to think that there is a witneſs in Heaven, and a record on high. Hypocrites may pretend they rejoyce, that God is their witneſs, but its only a joy of the tongue, and from the teeth outwards, or to ſerve their turn; but an upright heart rejoyceth indeed at this, he riſeth every morning, and walks all the day long, and at night lyes down and reſts upon this thought, God is my record, God is my witneſs, he hath ſearched me, and known me, he knoweth my down-ſitting and my up-riſing, he underſtands my thoughts afar off, he compaſſeth my path, and my lying down, and is acquainted with all my wayes. In the midſt of all the clamours, miſapprehenſions. and miſ-judgings of men, it is an abundant refreſhing and conſolation to the Saints, that there ſits one in Heaven, who as he knows them fully, ſo he judgeth all men rightly, and will render to every man according to his works.

Laſtly, Conſider the place into which Job's faith aſcended while he ſpeaks of God. My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high. Who is in Heaven? Who is on high? You may know whom he means when he ſaith, He that is in Heaven, he that is on high, though his name be not expreſt. There are Angels in Heaven, but they are nothing compared to God; there are the ſouls of juſt men departed, and made perfect, in Heaven, but they are nothing compared to God: There's no name in Heaven but God; God is all in all in Heaven; and he ſhould take up all our hearts and thoughts while we are on Earth, eſpecially when we diſcourſe of Heaven.

Hence Obſerve, Though God be every where, yet he is eſpecially in Heaven.

God is upon the Earth, yea, God is in Hell, If I make my Bed in Hell thou art there (Pſal. 139. 8.) Yet when Job acts faith upon God, he ſaith not, I have a witneſs on Earth, but my witneſs is in Heaven (Pſal. 2.4.) He that ſitteth in Heaven ſhall laugh, the Lord ſhall have them in deriſion. God doth not ſit as circumſcribed in Heaven; but there the Scripture deſcribes him ſitting (Pſal. 123.1.) Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwelleſt in the Heavens. Chriſt teacheth us to pray (Matth. 6.) Our Father which art in Heaven; and when he himſelf prayed, He lift up his eyes to Heaven, and ſaid, Father, the hour is come, glorifie thy Son, &c. (John 17.1.) Jeſus Chriſt ſpeaks to God as in that place, and he ſpeaks of Heaven as of a place, as of a ſpecial and diſtinct place, to which he lifted up his eyes, when he prayed to his Father.

There is a new Divinity, which tells us, that Heaven is every place, and every place is Heaven: But why did Chriſt aſcend? Why was he carryed up (Luke 24. 51.) when he went to Heaven? If Heaven be every where, there's no need of aſcending to get into Heaven; and we may as properly deſcend into Heaven as aſcend up to Heaven, if Heaven be every where.

Non in Cœlo Brentii, quod nuſquam eſt. Vit. P.Mar.

Peter Martyr lying upon his death-bed, and having many Friends about him, diſcourſed ſweetly of Heaven and heavenly things: Bullinger ſtanding by, alledged that of the Apoſtle (Phil. 3. 20.) Our converſation is in Heaven: True, ſaid the ſick man, it is in Heaven, but not in the Heaven of Brentius, which is no where. He that makes Heaven every where, makes it no where: Though God be in all places, and whereſoever God is, Heaven is; yet there is more in Heaven, then is common to all places. That's Heaven properly, where the glory of God ſhines moſt, and where there is the ſpecial revealings of his honour and power; therefore it is called, The habitation of his holineſs, and of his glory (Iſa. 63. 15.) Heaven is (as we may ſpeak) the place of Gods glorious reſidence: This Heaven is not every where, for though God be every where, yet he doth not manifeſt himſelf equally every where. God hath built Heaven (as that great Monarch, Dan. 4. 3.) ſpake boaſtingly of Babylon, For the houſe of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majeſty. A meer Naturaliſt hath told us, That this principle is ſtampt upon the nature of man, that God hath his dwelling place on high, or in Heaven. Heaven is ſo proper to God, that God is often (by a Metonimy) called Heaven in the holy Scriptures. Thy Kingdom (ſaith Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 4. 26. ſhall be ſure unto thee, after that thou ſhalt have known, that the Heavens do rule: That is, When thou ſhalt be humbled and brought to this acknowledgment, that the God whoſe Throne and dwelling place is in Heaven, ſits alſo upon all earthly Thrones, and is King in all the Kingdoms of Men. Chriſt puts the Queſtion to the Jews (Matth. 21. 25.) The baptiſm of John, whence was it, from Heaven, or of Men? That is, Was it from God, or from Men? Was it a humane invention, or a divine inſtitution? The prodigal Son cryes out, Father, I have ſinned againſt Heaven, and in thy ſight: That is, Both againſt my earthly and heavenly Father. Some, becauſe theſe and the like Scriptures call God Heaven; and becauſe it is ſaid after the reſurrection (when all the Saints ſhall be gathered into Heaven) That God ſhall be all in all; upon theſe miſtakes, I ſay, they have run into that groſs error, That Heaven is God. But when the Scripture calls Heaven the habitation of God, the Throne of God, the City of God, the building of God, an houſe not made with hands; it cannot be but a perverting of Scripture, and a throwing up of Reaſon, to call it God, or to ſay that God and Heaven are the ſame. Nor doth it at all follow, that God is Heaven, becauſe God ſhall be all in all to us in Heaven. Paul was not teaching the Corinthians there what Heaven is, but wherein the happineſs of the Saints ſhall conſiſt, when they ſhall all be called up to Heaven, after the general reſurrection from the dead: Then Chriſt ſhall reſign up his Kingdom (as Mediator) to his Father, then God ſhall be all in all: In All, that is, There will be no more need of a Mediator between God and Man; there will be no more need of Preaching, nor of making Prayers, nor of uſing Seals. All the glaſſes through which we ſaw God, and the outward Ordinances, in which we enjoyed God in this life, ſhall be laid aſide, when we ſee him face to face; and then God will be King, and Teacher, light and life, glory and happineſs, to his Saints, immediately, and for ever.

Quaſi à natura inſitam fuiſſe opinionem Deum in Cœlo habitare aſſeruit Ariſtoteles. lib. 1. de Anima, cap. 3.

'Tis granted, That Heaven is nothing to us without God, yet God is ſomething, yea, he is infinitely more then Heaven. Solomon beſpeaks God thus in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (1 Kings 8. 27.) Behold the Heaven, and the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain thee; how much leſs this houſe that I have builded: If Heaven, even the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain God, then, it is not God. That which doth contain a thing, is not the thing contained; much leſs is that which cannot contain a thing, the thing which it cannot contain.

Again, that which Job calls Heaven in one part of the Verſe, he calls high in the other, My witneſs is in Heaven, my record is on high. God dwells in the high and holy place (Iſai. 57. 15.) And Chriſt, after he had finiſhed the work of mans redemption, is ſaid, To ſit down on the right hand of the Majeſty on high (Heb. 1. 3.) This high place is the higheſt place; all that we call Heaven is high; but all that we call Heaven is not alike high. Heaven is a building of three Stories. The Air is called Heaven: The Fowls of the Air are ſaid to fly above the Earth in the Firmament of Heaven (Gen. 1. 20.) The Clouds are called Heaven (Lev. 2. 19.) I will make your Heaven as Iron, and your Earth as Braſs: That is, I will make the Clouds, which are ſoft like Spunges, hard like Iron, they ſhall not yield a drop of water, to refreſh the wearied Earth.

The ſecond Story is the Starry Heaven, where the Sun and Moon move, and where thoſe other glorious Lights are ſet like golden ſtuds to adorn, comfort, and direct the World. His going forth is from the end of Heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it (Pſal. 19. 6.)

The third is called, The habitation of God, the Heaven of Heavens, the third Heaven, the higheſt Heaven. The Apoſtle ſaith of Chriſt, that He aſcended far above all Heavens (Epheſ. 4. 10.) And yet he then aſcended into Heaven; the meaning is, Chriſt aſcended above all the viſible Heavens, into that, which is inviſible to us who are on earth. This Heaven Job pointed at while he ſaid, My record is on high. Take four deductions from it.

Firſt, If Heaven be higheſt, then there is nothing but ſerenity in Heaven. The higheſt places in a civil ſence, are full of ſtorms, and ſo are high places in a natural ſence; but the higheſt places in nature are free from clouds, ſtorms, and vapours. Naturaliſts tell us of Olympus, a very high Mountain, lifting up its head beyond the middle Region, whither no breath of wind ever comes: You may draw Letters and Figures in the Sand, and come many years after, and find them no more ſtirred, then if they had been written in Marble; and if the higheſt places in nature are alwayes ſerene, how ſerene is the high place of glory? When you are once in Heaven, you are beyond, not only proper, but figurative ſtorms and winds for ever.

Secondly, Heaven is high, therefore it is a pure place. Every thing in nature, the more high it is, the more pure it is. Earth is the loweſt, and the groſſeſt of the Elements; the Water next to that, is more groſs then the Air; the Air is more groſs then the Fire, which Philoſophers call the higheſt of the Elements: The higher we go, the more purity we find; and when we are (in altiſſimis) at the higheſt, there is nothing but purity, perfect purity; there is not the leaſt mixture of droſs, nor the leaſt ſpot of dirt in Heaven: Heaven is all pure, and none ſhall come thither but ſuch as are pure. Pure perſons are fit for a pure place, and only they are fit: No unclean thing ſhall enter there; and he that hath this hope (of entring there) purifies himſelf, not only as Heaven is pure, but as God is pure, in whoſe ſight Heaven it ſelf is impure (Chap. 15. 15.)

Thirdly, Heaven is high, Then Heaven is a ſafe place. High places are ſecure places; the high places of the earth are ſo accounted; and when God promiſes ſafety to his people, he tells them they ſhall dwell on high, while they are here below. (Iſa. 33. 16.) He ſhall dwell on high, his place of defence ſhall be the munition of rocks; and I will cauſe thee to ride upon the high places of the earth (Iſa. 58. 14.) When thoſe builders of the Tower of Babel thought to make themſelves ſafe, they ſaid, Let us build a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heaven: If there ſhould come another flood, they hoped to be dry, and to get above the danger. Once in Heaven, and we are out of Gun-ſhot; not only beyond the reach of man, but of Devils too: They who are got into that high place, ſhall neither feel, nor fear the Deſtroyer any more.

Fourthly, Heaven is a high place, then it is a large and capacious place: As a Spherical, or round Figure, is the moſt capacious, ſo the utmoſt round of that Figure is the moſt capacious round; in Heaven there is room enough; though we are crouded here, yet there we ſhall not. We may call Heaven (as Iſaac did the Well, about which there was no contention between his Herdmen, and the Herdmen of Gerar) Rehoboth, room (Gen. 26. 22.) In Heaven we ſhall not contend for room; Chriſt aſſures us, that in his Fathers Houſe are many Manſions (John 14. 2.) He had ſaid before to his Diſciples (Chap. 13. 33.) Whither I go ye cannot come: And when Peter, troubled at this ſpeech, put the Queſtion (Verſ. 36.) Lord, whither goeſt thou? Jeſus anſwered him, Whither I go thou canſt not follow me now, but thou ſhalt follow me afterwards. Chriſt perceived his Diſciples more plunged in their ſpirits with this anſwer and promiſe to Peter; and therefore adds a prohibition of their fears, at the beginning of this Chapter, Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God, believe alſo in me: in my Fathers houſe are many manſions: As if he had ſaid, Do not think that I told you, ye cannot follow me now, and that Peter ſhall follow me afterwards, as if the place I go to were only large enough for me and Peter; for believe me, there are many manſions; I tell you not how many, neither can they be told, but there are enough, not only for my ſelf and Peter, but for you all; yea, for all thoſe, who either have, or ſhall believe on my Name; if it were not ſo, I would have told you, I would not delude you with vain hopes, I am well acquainted with all the rooms in my Fathers houſe: and though when I came into the World for your ſakes, there was no room in the Inn for me to be born in, but a Stable among Beaſts, yet I will take care that when you come to my Fathers houſe, you ſhall not be ſtraitened for Quarters, I who am your Redeemer, will alſo be your Harbinger, I go to prepare a place for you, and I am certain my Fathers houſe will hold all his houſhold.

Tophet is prepared of old, it is deep and large (Iſa. 30. 33.) Hell is large enough for a Priſon; there's room for all the Children of diſobedience to lye bound for ever: But Heaven is large, as a Pallace, or as a Paradiſe; there's room enough for all the Heirs of promiſe, to walk at liberty for ever.

VERS. 20, 21, 22.

My Friends ſcorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his neighbour.

When a few years are come, then I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return.

JOB having ſtrongly aſſerted his own integrity, at the ſeventeenth Verſe of this Chapter; and thereupon as ſtrongly imprecated the heavieſt vengeance upon his own head, in caſe he had not ſpoken truth (Verſ. 18.) Having alſo made his appeal to Heaven, calling God to witneſs, that it was truth which he had ſpoken (Verſ. 19.) Here at the twentieth Verſe, he gives us a reaſon why he made that appeal; and the reaſon was, he found no comfort in the creature, he had no hope of help on earth, and therefore he reſorts to Heaven.

Verſe 20. My Friends ſcorn me; but mine eye poureth out tears to God.

There is ſome variety in the tranſlation, but the ſence of all meets in one, My Friends ſcorn me; or, Scorners are my Friends: The word ſignifies to deride, or ſcorn, not in a rude homely way, but to do it with quaintneſs of ſpeech, or in refined language, to do it wittily, and cunningly, cloſe and home. Hence the word ſignifies a Rhetorician, or an Orator, and is ſo tranſlated here, by divers of the Learned, My Friends play the Rhetoricians, they ſpeak eloquently, they compoſe fine orations, and ſet ſpeeches againſt me; but alas! I only ſpeak tears.

Yet further, it ſignifies to interpret (Gen. 42. 23.) Joſeph ſpake unto his Brethren by an Interpreter, it is this word. That's the interlineal reading of this Text, My Friends are Interpreters, or rather (for that muſt be the meaning) Miſinterpreters; they put wrong expoſitions upon all my ſpeeches, and corrupt my Text with their unfriendly gloſſes.

We read in the ordinary acception of the word, My Friends ſcorn me; or, My Friends are ſcorners: As if Job had ſaid, Theſe my Friends, whoſe profeſſion and relation call them to adminiſter ſerious and wholeſome counſel to my troubled mind, even they break forth into ſcorn; they pour the vinegar of their ſharpeſt cenſures into my already rankled wounds, inſtead of the ſuppling, ſkinning Oyl of comfort and conſolation; and therefore mine eye is preſſed to pour out tears to God: Who can forbear weeping, while he is but reporting my ſufferings? How then ſhould I who ſuffer? My Friends ſcorn me, &c.

Hence Obſerve, The beſt of Friends may prove unfriendly.

Men are but men, and ſo they act: There is no repoſe, either upon the wiſdom, or ſtrength, or affection of the creature, they are all mutable, and may do that which is moſt oppoſite, both to their profeſſion and relation: A Friend, a Scorner! What more unſutable? And that may be a ſecond Note.

Scorn is wholly oppoſite to the Law of Love.

He departs far enough from the rules of friendſhip, who doth not pity and aſſiſt his afflicted Friend: How far is he gone from it, who ſcorns and derides his Friend in affliction?

Thirdly, Conſidering the Perſon who was thus ſcorned; Job, a man beloved of God, the great Favourite of that Age to the King of Heaven,

Hence Obſerve, They who are highly approved and honoured of God, may fall under the contempt and ſcorn of men.

As they who are applauded and flattered, yea, adored by men, may be the ſcorn and contempt of God. What Chriſt ſpeaks of things is true of perſons (Luke 16. 15.) That which is highly eſteemed amongſt men, is abomination in the ſight of God: So they who are highly eſteemed of God are often an abomination to men. God ſeeth not as man ſeeth, no not as good men ſee; God and good men are not alwayes of an opinion, either about things or perſons; and as the worſt of men find ſome to flatter and applaud them, ſo the beſt of men find ſome to undervalue and deride them, and they ſometimes find good men doing ſo. There is no judging either of men or of matters, by what is ſaid of them: In this ſence all men are, or may be lyars, carrying a falſe report in their mouths: Should we judge concludingly of men by the opinion of man, how baſe and contemptible would many precious ſouls appear to us? And how precious would many appear to us, who are only worthy to be contemned? Chriſt gives the rule (John 7. 24.) Judge not according to appearance (or by the face) but judge righteous judgment: We muſt not judge either of things or perſons, till they appear, nor may we judge of them by appearances, eſpecially not by thoſe appearances which the tongues of men put upon them. The Greek, in that Text of John, ſaith, Judge not according to the face: For though the face in its natural frame be the Index or diſcovery of the mind; yet as a man may artificially ſet his face to a look altogether unlike his mind; ſo others may ſet a face upon the wayes and actions of a man altogether unlike both the man and his actions. He that had judged Job by the face, which God had put upon his outward condition, or by that which Satan and his Friends put upon his wayes and actions, muſt have judged him either an Hypocrite, ſerving God only to ſerve his own turn; or elſe prophane, caſting off the ſervice of God. All the morally illfavoured faces in the World are of one of theſe two features or complexions; the opinions that went abroad of Job made him appear like both, and yet he was a man moſt beautiful in the eye of God; a man that had received the faireſt Letters commendatory under Gods own hand, that ever man had to that day, My Friends ſcorn me: What then?

κατ' ὄψιν Secundum vultum vel faciem.

But mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

As before he had appealed to God; ſo now his eye poureth out tears unto God.

The Hebrew is, Mine eye poureth out: The word ſignifies to flow forth like water, and to waſt in flowing forth; his eyes were as a Fountain, which flows continually, yet retains a perpetual ſtock of water; but his ſtrength abated, and his ſpirits iſſued with thoſe waters. Mine eye poureth out; we add the word Tears, becauſe tears are the only eye-waters, or all the waters which flow from the eye, Mine eye poureth out tears.

דלף Stillare ſive diffluere inſtar aquarũ & ſtillando quaſi attenuari.

The word ſignifieth ſometimes only to drop, either as a Limbeck drops down the water which is raiſed up by the heat into fumes, or as the Eaves of a houſe drop in a time of rain; ſo mine eye diſtilleth or droppeth tears. Job had a heat within him which might well cauſe thoſe diſtillations, and ſhowers without him, which might well cauſe thoſe droppings.

Tranſlatiõ eſt à ſtillicidiis.

This diſtilling, dropping, or pouring out of tears, was the pouring out of his ſorrows, and there was more in it then ſilent ſorrow, there was a voice in his ſorrows, or a voice of mourning was mingled with his weeping; yea, this word implyes ſpeaking, in many places of the old Teſtament, where to drop is to Propheſie, and Prophecying is a vocal act (Micah 2.6.) Propheſie ye not, ſay they to them that propheſie; the word is, Drop not: Both are expreſſed (Amos 7.16.) Propheſie not againſt Iſrael, and drop not thy word againſt the houſe of Iſaac. So (Ezek. 21.2.) Drop thy words towards the holy places, and propheſie againſt the Land of Iſrael. And the reaſon of it is, becauſe words fall into the ear of the hearers, as drops of rain upon the dry and thirſty ground, both to ſoften and make fruitful. Job's tears preacht; the dropping of his eye was a kind of prophecying: Tears are not words formally, but they are virtually. Weeping is inarticulate ſpeaking: And though God (by reaſon of his infinite and unchangeable happineſs) never ſpake that language, yet he underſtands it fully. There are (ſaith the Apoſtle, arguing againſt ſpeaking in an unknown tongue) it may be, ſo many kinds of voices in the World, and none of them are without ſignification (1 Cor. 14.10.) The voice of tears is very ſignificant, yet God only knows the ſpecial ſignification of it; man knows only the general, that it ſignifies ſorrow. Poſſibly words went with Job's tears; but if not, yet his tears had the force of words: Weeping ſpeaks, though the weeper ſpeak not: Mine eye poureth out (or ſpeaketh) tears.

Phraſi Hebraica ſtillare ſæpe pro loqui ſumitur.

There are ſeven or eight ſorts of tears ſpoken of in Scripture, and every one ſpeaks.

Firſt, Tears of worldly ſorrow. Eſau had enough of them; he found ſtore of tears when he loſt the bleſſing: He for one morſel of meat ſold his birthright, but he could not purchaſe it again with floods of ſorrow, For he found no place of repentance; that is, he could not prevail with his Father Iſaac to change his mind, though he ſought it carefully with tears (Heb. 12.17.) Eſau's tears ſpake his hunger after that which he had ſold to buy off hunger, or to pay a debt to Nature.

Secondly, There are the tears of repentance and godly ſorrow; ſuch were thoſe of Mary (Luke 7.83.) who wept, and waſhed Chriſt's feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head: She had been a ſinner, ſuch a ſinner as bore away the name from all the ſinners in the City; and ſhe mourned ſo for ſin, that ſhe bare away the name from all the mourners in the City: Mary's tears ſpake her tender reſpect to Chriſt who ſaveth ſinners, and her abhorrence of her ſelf for ſin.

Thirdly, There are tears of craft and wicked diſſimulation (Jer. 41.6.) Iſhmael goes forth to meet the men that came towards Jeruſalem, weeping all along as he went: his were made tears; he ſhed tears that he might ſhed blood, and weep himſelf into an opportunity of doing miſchief unſuſpected. Iſhmael's tears ſpake treachery, but becauſe thoſe plain-hearted men could not interpret them, they periſhed.

Fourthly, There are tears of love unfeigned and ſtrong affection: Thus David and Jonathan kiſſed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded (1 Sam. 20.41.) When Jeſus Chriſt wept at the Sepulcher of Lazarus, The Jews ſaid, Behold how he loved him (John 11.35,36.) They ſaw his heart at his eyes: Theſe tears ſpake mutual and real endearments.

Fifthly, There are the tears of holy prayers, and fervent deſires. Jacob wept and made ſupplication (Hoſ. 12.4.) He cryed and prayed: The voice of his tears was lowder then the voice of his ſupplication; and his prayers were (in this ſence) even drowned in tears: Jacob's tears ſpake the fervency of his ſpirit, and his faith in prayer: The Angel underſtood them ſo, and he prevailed.

Sixthly, There are tears of compaſſion for the miſeries of others. Weep with them that weep, is the Apoſtles rule (Rom. 12.15.) When Nehemiah heard the report of Jeruſalems ruine, and of the ſad condition of his Brethren there, He ſate down and wept (Nehem. 1.4.) His tears ſpake pity to his Country-men, and zeal for God.

Seventhly, There are the tears of paſſion, in reference to our own afflictions: Such tears ſpeak humane frailty, or the common infirmity of the fleſh.

Eighthly, There are the tears of damnation; Hypocrites and their aſſociates in Hell are deſcribed, Weeping, and wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth for evermore: Their tears ſpeak deſpair, or miſery without hope of remedy.

The tears which Job poured forth, were of the ſeventh ſort, tears of paſſion, or ſorrow, cauſed by the afflicting hand of God, but eſpecially by the unkindneſſes of his Friends; My Friends ſcorn me, but mine eye poureth out tears unto God. Job knew that as God had a Book for his prayers, ſo a Bottle for his tears; yea, he knew tears ſhould be heard as well as prayers. Tears are powerful Orators: God reads our hearts in thoſe lines which tears draw on our faces. One of the Ancient Philoſophers hath adjudged weeping unworthy a man, and tells us it is only for Women and Children to weep: But as there are tears of effeminate and childiſh puſillanimity, ſo there are tears of heroical and holy importunity. To weep for fear of ſufferings from man, is indeed below man; but to weep to God when we ſuffer, either under the hand of God or man, doth well become the beſt of men; not to weep to God, when we either ſuffer, or have ſinned, proceeds not from courage, but from ſullenneſs, and is not the argument of a noble ſpirit, but of a hard heart. Who ſo couragious as David? who feared not a Lyon, nor a Bear, who would not be afraid though an Hoaſt of men encamped againſt him, and though he walked in the valley of the ſhadow of death; yet how often do we read him weeping and crying to God (Pſal. 39.12.) Hold not thy peace (ſaith he) at my tears: David in that caſe could not hold his peace from crying to God, and he was perſwaded that God would not hold his peace at his cry; he expected to have his tears anſwered: He did not ſay, Hold not thy peace at my words, or at my prayer, but as importing that his very tears had a voice and language in them, he deſired that they might be anſwered. David did not weep for fear of men, but in faith to God. And ſo did Job: Mine eye poureth out tears unto God: God was the object of his tears, as much as of his prayers. God is above, and yet our tears fall into his boſom: Theſe waters aſcend; this rain doth not fall but riſe; theſe ſhowers do not come from the Clouds, but they pierce the Clouds. As the heat of the Sun draws the water upward, ſo doth the heat of Gods love. Some of the Ancients uſe ſtrange Hyperbolies about the power and motion of tears, I will not ſtay upon them, we may ſay too much of them; but thus much we may ſafely ſay, that from a heart rightly affected, and touched with the ſenſe, either of ſin, or ſuffering, they have much weight in them, and are preſſing upon God: Mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

Lachrymæ à viris claris auferendæ ſunt, mulieribus autem relinquendæ. Plat. de rep. Dial. 3.

From the connexion of this latter part of the Verſe with the former,

> Obſerve, When we are ſcorned by men, it is good for us to mourn to God.

My Friends ſcorn me, now I weep and pray: It is beſt for us to apply our ſelves to God when we live in the embraces of men; when all men ſpeak well of us, and applaud us, what is all this, if we have not the good word and the good will of God? Unleſs we have an applauſe in Heaven, it will do us no good to have the true applauſe, much leſs the flatteries of men on Earth. Suppoſe they ſpeak right, and give us but our due, yet we muſt not reſt in that, but go to God. The good word of God is better to us infinitely, then the beſt word of the beſt men; to him let us have recourſe when we have the greateſt favour, and faireſt Quarter in the World: but when the World ſcorns and rejects us, then is a ſpecial ſeaſon for us to haſten into the preſence of God; we ſhould live neareſt and cloſeſt to God, when men caſt us off, or throw us out of their ſocieties and affections.

There is a twofold recourſe to God; whereof the firſt is from choice, the ſecond from neceſſity. It is beſt to make our recourſe to God upon choice; but he will not refuſe us if neceſſity drive us to him: God is moſt worthy to be our choice, but he is willing to be our refuge; yet he is indeed a refuge to thoſe only in evil times, who have made him their choice in the beſt times. When all goes well with us in the World, we ſhould not think our ſelves well till we enjoy God: It is good for me to draw near to God, ſaith David (Pſal. 73. 28.) It is good for me to do it in good times, in the beſt times, this I make my election: And when David ſaith, It is good; he means, it is beſt; that poſitive bears the ſence of a Superlative; and therefore he had ſaid a little before (Verſ. 25.) Whom have I in Heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth that I deſire beſides thee: But in an evil time, God is both the choice and the refuge of his people. He is our refuge properly to whom we come when others caſt us off; and he is our choice to whom we come, when others call for us, and ſeem ambitious to be kind unto us. It is not thank-worthy to make God barely a refuge, to come to him becauſe we can go no where elſe; we ſhould think our ſelves no where till we are in his preſence, whereſoever we are; and that we have nothing till we have him, whatſoever we have. Not to prefer the leaſt of God before all the World, is not only uningenuous in us, but ſinful againſt, and diſhonourable unto God. Job, who here wept to God in his low eſtate, had often rejoyced in God in his beſt eſtate, and preferred him before his chiefeſt joy: They may confidently weep to God in ſad times, who have delighted themſelves with God in comfortable times.

Secondly, Obſerve, Liberty of addreſs to God, when men ſcorn and reject us, is the great priviledge of the Saints.

Every man cannot do this: Can the men of the world pour out tears to God when they are ſcorned by the world? Can they pour out prayers to God, when they are ill intreated by the world? Can they go into the imbraces of God, when they are caſt out by men? They cannot. They can vex themſelves, when they are vexed by others, and perhaps vex thoſe that vex them; they can be angry when they are ſcorned, and perhaps ſcorn their ſcorners; but how to ſpread their condition before God, or to pour out tears to him, they know not: They who can do thus are honoured by God, when ſcorned by men, and God will pour out comforts into their boſomes who can pour their tears into his; they can never be at any loſs, who find out God to weep to.

Job having thus given the reaſon of his appeal to Heaven, enforceth it farther with a ſtrong wiſh, according to our tranſlation, which is alſo confirmed by the concurring vote of divers other tranſlations.

Verſe 21. O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his Neighbour.

The ſum of his deſire may be drawn up into this Brief, That he might argue his caſe as freely with God, as men of the ſame rank and degree argue out their caſes with one another. Some expound it as a correction of his boldneſs in appealing to God. As if he had ſaid, I have indeed called God to witneſs: But what am I, or what is my Fathers houſe, that God ſhould deſcend to my concernments? The infinite diſtance which is between the Creator and the creature ſeems to forbid and check my motion, bidding me keep within my own line, or ſphere, and meddle with my equals; But O that I might ſpeak with God, as man with man, or man for man, I doubt not but I ſhould carry the day, and prove my ſelf innocent: not that Job intended a controverſie with God, or would ſtand upon his defence with the moſt High.

ויובח לנבר Utinam diſputare poſſet vir cum deo & filius hominis ſodali ſuo. Pagn. Optat exæquari hæc duo, hominis cum Deo, & hominis cum homine diſceptationem. Merc. Certè hic aliquid ſubauditur ut, & quis det viro, vel ut faciat ac concedat Deus ſc. hoc viro. Merc.

I have before ſhew'd how far this was from the temper of his broken ſpirit. All that he intends by the propoſal of this deſire, is the gaining of an opportunity to ſet himſelf right in the opinion of men, by that impartial deciſion of his cauſe, which he was well aſſured God would give upon the whole matter in queſtion between him and his Friends, if once he would be pleaſed to vouchſafe him a free and familiar hearing of it. As if he had further ſaid, I have not appealed to Heaven, becauſe I am unwilling to have my condition known on earth, that men ſhould ſee the worſt of me; for my deſire is, that I might plead before God, as a man for his Neighbour, and that I might be laid open in open Court, by the evidence of witneſſes, and a full examination of my cauſe. Taking theſe explications of the Text, in the form of a wiſh, the ſcope of it ſeems to be the ſame with what he ſpake before (Chap. 9. 33, 34, 35.) God is not a man as I am, that I ſhould anſwer him, and we ſhould come together in judgment, neither is there any Dayes-man betwixt us, &c. In which words, as in theſe before us, while Job lifts up the Majeſty of God, and humbleth himſelf, as unworthy to have to do with God, yet he diſcovers the vehement longings of his ſoul to receive a judgment or determination from God in this ſuit or controverſie, which had depended ſo long between him and his Friends.

Utinam mihi concederetur cauſam meam adverſum vos apud Dei Tribunal diſceptare ſicut agere homines cũ hominibus conſueverũt. Bez.

The Obſervations which ariſe from this reading and ſence of the Text, are of the ſame ſtrain with thoſe formerly given upon that, and ſome other paſſages, where Job knowing his own uprightneſs and integrity, declares not only willingneſs, but extream earneſtneſs, to have his cauſe tryed at the Bar, and before the Tribunal of God, who both ſaw his wayes, and ſearched his heart; who as he had juſtified him from all guilt in reference to himſelf, by not imputing ſin unto him, ſo he would juſtifie him againſt the ſins, which men imputed to him, by ſaying he was not at all guilty.

Theſe points having been more then once hinted already, I ſhall not inſiſt upon them here.

Secondly, The words are rendred as noting the deſign which Job had in pouring out tears to God, and then the connection between this and the former verſe ſtands thus, I pour out tears to God, that he would be pleaſed to plead the cauſe of a man with God, as the Son of man pleads the cauſe of his friend. Mr. Broughton joyns fully with this, Unto the puiſſant doth mine eye drop, that he would decide the cauſe for earthly-wight before the puiſſant, as the Son of Adam doth with his Neighbour.

Apud Deum ſtillat oculus meus ut diſceptet cauſam viri cum deo, ſicut filius hominis cauſam amici ſui. Jun.

Our tranſlation carries the ſence of a wiſh; that a man might have liberty to plead with God, as man with man; this carries the ſence of a wiſh, that God would plead the cauſe of a man with God, as a man pleads the cauſe of his friend; which is indeed to deſire God to be his Advocate. How God is an Advocate with God, will appear further in the proſecution of the Text.

A third reading keeps to this dependance upon the former Verſe, and to the ſame ſcope of this, yet varies the tranſlation, Thus, Mine eye poureth out tears to God, that he would judge for a man with God (and that he would judge) the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour.

Ad Deum ſtillat oculus meus ut judicet viro cum Deo, & filium hominis reſpectu proximi ſui. Coc.

The firſt reading makes the latter branch of the words a deſcription of the manner how Job deſired to plead with God even as man doth with man. The ſecond makes it a deſcription of the manner how Job deſired God to plead the cauſe of man with God, even as man pleads with man. This third makes it a ſecond diſtinct deſire, and the whole Verſe to conſiſt of two diſtinct deſires.

Firſt, That God would judge for a man with God.

Secondly, That God would judge the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour.

In the former he petitions for mercy with God; in the latter for right againſt man; or in the former he ſues for a judgment of acceptation for himſelf, and in the latter for a judgment of reproof and redargution upon his Friends.

This difference is grounded upon the different conſtruction of the words in the Original. For the word which is rendred to plead or judge, is conſtrued with, or governs (as Grammarians ſpeak) the Dative caſe in the firſt, and the Accuſative caſe in the latter clauſe of the Verſe.

Hence the former is rendred,

That he would judge or plead for a man with God, which notes favour, and a benign defence or patronage of his cauſe with God; ſo this is uſed by the Prophet (Iſa. 11. 4.) He ſhall reprove (argue, judge, or plead) with equity for the meek of the earth: That is, He ſhall reprove or plead in favour of the meek, or on their ſide; he ſhall undertake their cauſe, and make their defence for them. And thus at laſt God did judge or plead for Job, giving ſentence in his behalf, and caſting the ſcales on his ſide againſt his Friends, and therefore the latter clauſe is rendred thus,

That he would judge the Son of man in reſpect of his Neighbour: That is, That he would reprehend and reprove him for the wrongs which he hath done to, and for the uncharitable cenſures which he hath laid upon his Neighbour. The meaning of the whole Verſe, according to this tranſlation, may be repreſented and paralleld in that prayer of David (Pſal. 35. 1, 2, 3.) Plead my cauſe, O Lord, with them that ſtrive with me; fight againſt them that fight againſt me, &c. ſay unto my ſoul, I am thy ſalvation. Thus Job, as David, deſires the Lord to ſpeak a word of comfort to him, and to tell his enemies, or his uncomfortable friends, their own.

I ſhall only leave one Obſervation upon this Expoſition,

When Chriſt comes graciouſly to aſſert the innocency of his own people, he will ſeverely rebuke thoſe who have done them wrong.

Laban had given Jacob hard uſage, while he was a Servant in his houſe; and when he was gone, Laban purſued him with hard thoughts: but God pleaded for Jacob, and rebuked Laban (Gen. 31.42.) The Prophet foretels, That the mountain of the Lords houſe ſhall be eſtabliſhed in the top of the mountains; that is, he will not only deliver, but advance his oppreſſed Church, The houſe of the God of Jacob (Iſa. 21.2, 3.) and when he doth this, He ſhall judge among the Nations, and ſhall rebuke many people (Verſ. 4.) Some have obſerved the ſame difference in theſe latter words of Iſay, which hath been noted in the Text of Job, and render it thus, He ſhall judge among the Nations; that is, the Heathen Nations, who have vexed his Church, And he ſhall rebuke or plead (it is the ſame word in the Grammatical conſtruction, as here in Job) For, (or in the behalf of) many people; that is, for many of his own people, who have been oppoſed by thoſe Nations; the effect whereof we have in the next words, And they ſhall beat their ſwords into plow-ſhares; that is, God will ſo judge thoſe Nations, that his people ſhall not need to ſtand upon their guard, or learn war any more; becauſe their enemies ſhall either be turned to them, or be totally overturned. Woe to the Nations, when God ſtands up for his people; he will certainly ruine Babylon, when he undertakes the controverſie, and pleads the cauſe of Zion. Yea, the day haſtens when he will Convince all that are ungodly, of all the hard ſpeeches which ungodly ſinners have ſpoken againſt him (Jude v.15.) that is, againſt his people, for his ſake.

Fourthly, Beſides theſe three expoſitions of the Text, I find another which is more literal, and yet more ſpiritual then any of the three; and it is that which our late learned Annotators have given us, Mine eye pours out tears unto God.

And he will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend. The mind of which tranſlation is this, He, that is, Chriſt Jeſus the Mediator between God and man will plead for a man; that is, for me; he ſpeaks in the third perſon for modeſties ſake, though he means himſelf; he will plead for me (though you plead never ſo much againſt me) for me (I ſay) he will plead with God; that is, with God his Father: The Hebrew word here uſed for God, is in the ſingular number, Eloah, not Elohim, and ſo it is in the cloſe of the former verſe, Mine eye poureth out tears to (Eloah) God, and he will plead with God, which more then intimates a diſtinct perſonality, or ſubſiſtence in the Divine Nature. One, who is, and is called God acting towards another, who is, and is called God, though God be but one, or (uniſſimus) One-moſt in nature. Job weeps to God the Son, in aſſurance that he will plead for him with God the Father, He will plead for a man with God.

And the Son of man; that is, Jeſus Chriſt. whom he called God before, he calls now, The Son of man; this Title is frequently attributed unto Chriſt in the New Teſtament (Matth. 8. 20.) The Foxes have holes, &c. but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. So (Mat. 10.23. & 11.19.& 12.8,&c.) Jeſus Chriſt is called the Son of man.

Firſt, To ſhew the truth of his humane nature, he being lineally deſcended from David, according to the fleſh, and is therefore ſtiled, The Son of David.

Secondly, To ſhew the depth of his abaſement, Chriſt humbled, yea, emptied, and nothing'd himſelf, when Being in the form of God, he was made in the likeneſs of men (Phil. 2.) when being the Son of God, he ſubmitted to ſo mean a ſtile, The Son of man. Ezekiel amongſt all the Prophets is ofteneſt called, Son of man. The reaſon which ſome aſſign is very probable, That God ſpake to him under that Title, to keep him humble in the midſt of his many viſions and revelations; for which end, Paul in the ſame caſe had A Thorn in the fleſh, the Meſſenger of Satan to buffet him (2 Cor. 12.) And though Jeſus Chriſt needed nothing either to make or keep him humble (he being infinitely beyond the reach of pride) yet he needed much to ſhew and give proof how humble he was: Nor could there be any greater evidence of it, then this, that he was pleaſed to be The Son of man. Yet I conceive, Son of man may be here only an Hebraiſm denoting man, which kind of ſpeaking is alſo uſual among the Greeks. And that Job might ſpeak of Chriſt under this notion, is clear from that faith which he diſcovered in the myſtery of his incarnation, that great myſtery of godlineſs, God manifeſted in the fleſh, of which he ſpake ſo confidently (Chap. 19. 25, 26, 27.) I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he ſhall ſtand at the latter day upon the earth, whom I ſhall ſee for my ſelf, and mine eyes ſhall behold, &c. Job believed that he ſhould ſee this Redeemer with humane eyes, and therefore he did believe, that his Redeemer ſhould have a humane Nature, or be The Son of man. Jeſus Chriſt, was A Son of man, in reference to his participation with us in all things, which concern created Nature: And he was The Son of man, by way of Eminency in reference to his freedom from any participation with us in corrupted nature, otherwiſe then in the penal effects of that corruption, as the Apoſtle ſtates it (Heb. 2. 17. chap. 4. 15.) In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, and he was tempted in all points, like as we are, yet without ſin. He that is in all things like man, except ſin, is rightly called, The Son of man; for ſin is not at all the form, but all the deformity of man: Hence Job's faith propheſied, The Son of man will plead

For his friend.] The word in the Hebrew comes from a root, which ſignifies to feed either our ſelves or others, becauſe friends uſe often to feed together, and ſometimes one friend feeds, or provides, and offers food to another. It is taken ſometimes largely for a Neighbor, and not ſeldom ſtrictly for a ſpecial friend (Deut. 13. 6.) If thy friend who is as thine own ſoul entice thee, &c. that is, if the neareſt friend that thou haſt in the world entice thee, &c. In this ſtrict ſence the word is to be taken here; Job was not one of Chriſts friends at large, he was a ſpecial Boſom-friend, Job was not (according to the known uſe of that word among us) A friend of Chriſt extraordinary, but he was Chriſts friend in ordinary, a man who dayly converſ'd with Chriſt, and Chriſt with him; a man who daily performed Offices of dutiful love to Chriſt, and a man to whom Chriſt daily performed the Offices of bountiful and merciful love. Hence his holy aſſurance that Chriſt would perform that office of mercy for him, The Son of man will plead for his friend.

The words thus opened are (as I may ſay) An Epitome of the Goſpel, a little Goſpel, yea, I may call them, the whole Goſpel; what is the Goſpel but this good news, that Chriſt, God-man, mediates for his people. All that Chriſt was, is expreſſed in this; whatſoever Chriſt did more then this on earth, is implyed in this, and this is all Chriſt now doth for us in Heaven, He ever lives to make interceſſion for us, ſaith St. Paul, (Heb. 7. 25.) which is the ſame in effect, with what holy Job profeſſeth in this Text, He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend.

There is one thing further to be noted, for the clearing of this Text: For poſſibly the Reader may ſcruple how the ſame words ſhould be rendred by ſome, as a wiſh, O that one might plead for a man with God; and by others as a concluſion, He will plead with God for a man. Again, how the latter branch ſhould be rendred by ſome in the form of a ſimilitude, As a man for his neighbour, and by others as a direct aſſertion, And the Son of man for his friend.

I anſwer to the firſt, That the ſame word may be thus diverſly rendred according to differing Moods of Grammar; and ſo the ſign of the Optative Mood which is in the form of a wiſh, is by ſome judged moſt ſutable to the ſcope of this place. So that a wiſh may here be underſtood and ſafely ſupplied, though it be not expreſſed.

To the ſecond ſcruple I anſwer, that the particle Vau, in the Hebrew, placed at the beginning of a word, though it be uſually taken as a Conjunction, knitting one ſentence to another, yet according to the exigence and ſcope of the Scripture, it undergoes divers other ſignifications.

As firſt, A disjunctive (Exod. 12. 15.) Ye ſhall take it out from the Sheep, or from the Goats: The Hebrew is, And from the Goats; but becauſe the Law did not command both, but gave a liberty to chuſe either of the two; therefore we render not And, but Or, from the Goats: So (Judg. 11. 31.) See the Margin of our Bibles; which ſhews that Jepthtah did not bind himſelf to offer up whatſoever ſhould meet him, in Sacrifice; but one of the two he did bind himſelf to, either to dedicate that to the Lord, or to offer it up for a burnt-offering.

Secondly, It is often uſed Adverſatively, and is rendred, But (Gen. 42. 10. Pſal. 44. 17, &c.)

Thirdly, Caſually, and it is rendred For (Pſal. 60. 11. Iſa. 64. 5, &c.)

Fourthly, (Beſides divers other acceptions of it, which I ſhall omit) it is uſed Comparatively, or as a Note of likeneſs (Prov. 25. 25.) As cold water to a thirſty ſoul, ſo is good news from a far Countrey: The Hebrew is, And good news. So (Prov. 26. 7.) and very frequently in that Book. Thus in the Text the particle (Vau) is taken by ſome as a note of likeneſs; comparing the two parts of the Verſe with each other; but by others it is taken only as a conjunction copulative, knitting both parts of the Verſe together: He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend.

From the words according to this latter reading,

Obſerve, Firſt, There is an Advocate between God and Man.

Sin hath made a breach, there needs a Mediator to heal it. God and ſinful man are (as we ſpeak) Two, and they cannot be made One but by a Third. Man was created in a ſtate of amity with God, that ſtate needed no Mediator; man being reſtored is in a ſtate of reconciliation unto God, that ſtate needs a Mediator, both to ſettle and continue it: And he who is the Mediator between both parties, is an Advocate, a Pleader, a Patron for the one party. There was need of a Mediator, even in regard of God himſelf, that both his State might be preſerved, and his Juſtice ſatisfied: But there was need of an Advocate, only in regard of man, that ſo his wants and miſeries might be declared, and that mercy, together with help in the time of need, might be obtained. The Apoſtle (Gal. 3. 20.) deſcribing the nature of a Mediator, ſaith, A Mediator is not of one, or (as we ſupply) not a Mediator of one. A Mediator is of two, yea, and for two. But an Advocate, though he be between two, yet he is but for one, or of one, either of one individually taken, or of one ſpecifically taken, either of one man, or of one ſort or company of men, who though they are many in number, yet their ſtate or caſe is one. Thus Chriſt is an Advocate for one, or of one; all that he is an Advocate for, being in one and the ſame condition for the main, though ſome particulars in every mans caſe may vary.

The Greek word which is rendred Advocate in the New Teſtament, is applyed to the holy Ghoſt: But there is a great difference between Chriſt his being a Paraclete, or an Advocate, and the Spirit's being an Advocate (John 16. 7.) If I go not away (ſaith Chriſt) the Comforter (or the Advocate) will not come unto you: That is, The holy Ghoſt will not come unto you. One Advocate goeth away, that the other Advocate may come. Chriſt is an Advocate by way of impetration; the Spirit is Advocate by way of application: Chriſt is an Advocate with God, to get mercy for us; the Spirit is an Advocate with us, to prevail on our hearts to receive that mercy: Though Chriſt be our Advocate in Heaven, pleading for us with the Father, yet if we had not the Spirit to plead in our hearts on earth, we ſhould never receive the good that Chriſt hath purchaſed for us of his Father. Chriſt appears for us in Heaven (Heb. 9. 24.) He appears as an Attorney in Court for his Client; he is gone to Heaven to appear for us: the Spirit comes from Heaven and appears in us. Chriſt began the work of his interceſſion here (John 17.) He is gone into Heaven to continue and perfect it. The Spirit doth both begin and perfect his interceſſion here; he doth not plead for us, but in us; or the Spirit makes interceſſion for us by ſtirring us up to prayer, by teaching us how to word and mould, or rather how to ſigh and groan our prayers; Chriſt makes interceſſion for us, by preſenting, and tendering thoſe prayers to the Father which the Spirit helps to make, or by making prayers for us himſelf to the Father.

Some diſpute how, they inquire much after the manner how Chriſt makes interceſſion, or performs the office of an Advocate for us; but it is enough for us to know that he is an Advocate, or that he makes interceſſion for us, though we are not able to deſcribe the manner how: Whether it be,

Firſt, Only by preſenting himſelf to the Father, and his appearing for us, which is an equivalent, if not a formal interceſſion.

Or ſecondly, By the tendring of his righteouſneſs, and merits, as ſatisfaction to the Father.

Or thirdly, By expreſſing our wants and his deſires for us: Whether by all theſe, or by which of theſe, or whether by ſome other way, is not determinable by us; yet this is clear, that he performs the office of an Advocate for us, and that we receive every good thing from the hand of God through his hand.

Further, Chriſt may be conſidered:

Firſt, As an Advocate for the whole Church: There are ſome cauſes of common concernment to all the people of God. Thus he was an Advocate for Jeruſalem, when under bonds and captivity in Babylon (Zech. 1. 12.) Then the Angel of the Lord (not a created, but the creating Angel, or the Angel of the Covenant, who is the Son of God) anſwered and ſaid, O Lord of Hoſt, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jeruſalem, and on the Cities of Judah, againſt which thou haſt had indignation theſe threeſcore and ten years.

And as Chriſt pleads for the whole Church, ſo for every particular Member of the Church, and that alſo under a twofold notion.

He is Advocate, firſt, to take away our ſins. If any man ſin (ſaith the Apoſtle John, 1 Epiſt. 2. 1.) we have an Advocate with the Father, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, &c.

Secondly, Chriſt is an Advocate for us with the Father in our ſufferings and troubles, to get them taken off from us, or ſanctified to us. Doubtleſs Job made uſe of Chriſt continually as an Advocate, to take off the guilt of ſin; yet here he makes uſe of Chriſt as an Advocate to get off his ſufferings, eſpecially theſe miſ-judgings of his Friends, who deeply cenſured and aſperſed him, becauſe of his ſufferings; yea, a Believer makes uſe of Chriſt as an Advocate, to get any good thing, whether little or great, whether for ſoul or for body, as much as he doth for the removing of any evil, whether of ſin or trouble.

Secondly, Obſerve, The Doctrine of a Mediator between God and Man was known and believed in the World, long before Chriſt came into the World.

Many ſaw Chriſt by Faith before he was ſeen in the fleſh: Faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not ſeen (Heb. 1. 1.) And as it is the evidence of things, ſo of perſons that are not ſeen. Chriſt tells the Jews (John 8. 56.) Your Father Abraham rejoyced to ſee my day; and he ſaw it, and was glad: And when the Jews quarrelled at this, Thou art not yet fifty years old, and haſt thou ſeen Abraham? Jeſus ſaid unto them, Verily, verily, I ſay unto you, before Abraham was, I am. As Abraham ſaw his day by Faith, ſo David in ſpirit called him Lord (Matth. 22. 43.) And as theſe perſons, with all the holy Elders, ſaw Chriſt by Faith in the Promiſe, ſo the whole Ceremonial Law was a repreſentation of Chriſt to faith by ſenſe: Every ſlain Sacrifice ſpake the death of Chriſt; and the ſprinkling of that blood, the ſprinkling of their conſciences and ours for the remiſſion of ſins: Yea, They did all eat the ſame ſpiritual meat (that is, the ſame which we now eat) and did all drink the ſame ſpiritual drink; for they drank of that ſpiritual Rock that followed them (and leaſt we ſhould miſtake what was meant by that Rock, the Apoſtle expounds it himſelf) And that Rock was Chriſt. The Rock did not follow them, but Chriſt who was ſignified by that Rock did follow them. They who are built upon Chriſt the Rock, ſhall never be moved; yet Chriſt is a moving, as well as a living Rock, to thoſe who are built upon him; whitherſoever they move, he follows them. Thus Jeſus Chriſt was meat and drink to the Jews, as well as to us; for he is the Lamb ſlain from the foundation of the World (Revel. 13. 8.) That is, The vertue of his death ſaved all who have been ſaved from the foundation of the World. As Chriſt was ſlain from Eternity in the counſel of God; ſo he was ſlain from the beginning of time in the promiſe of God (Gen. 3. 15.) which was the publication of his death; he was then alſo ſlain as to the heart of Believers, whoſe Faith (having once a word for it) makes that which is abſent, in regard of place, ſpiritually preſent; and that which is not, in regard of time, truly to be.

Thirdly, Obſerve, The Mediator between God and man hath been known and believed in all Ages under a twofold nature, both God and Man.

We have both in this profeſſion of Job's Faith: He believed the Mediator to be God, for he ſaith, Mine eye poureth tears to God. There is the Divine nature. He believed that the Mediator ſhould be man, and therefore adds, The Son of man for his friend; there is his humane nature; ſo that not only the general Doctrine of the Mediatorſhip of Chriſt, but this particular about the conſtitution of his perſon as Mediator, was alſo known. Had not our Advocate been man he could not have ſuffered for us; and had he not been God he could not have ſatisfied for us. Theſe points of Goſpel Catechiſm are ſo neceſſary and fundamental, that in every Age Believers have in ſome meaſure been inſtructed about them. And whereas the Apoſtle ſaith (1 Tim. 2.5.) There is one Mediator between God and men, or, of God and men, the man Chriſt Jeſus: He doth not add man, to exclude the Divine nature from the Mediatorſhip, but emphatically to demonſtrate that nature, in which he gave himſelf a ranſom for us, of which he ſpeaks in the next Verſe. For though the ranſome was paid by him who is God, or had a Divine nature, yet it was paid in the Manhood, or humane Nature only. The humane Nature was the matter of our ranſome; but the Divine nature gave worth and value to it.

Further, Job ſpeaks with much confidence and aſſurance, both of Chriſts willingneſs to undertake his cauſe, and of the ſucceſs or good iſſue of his cauſe, if once Chriſt did but undertake it: He will plead for a man with God.

Hence Obſerve, Fourthly, Chriſt is very ready to ſpeak for, and plead the cauſe of poor ſinners before God his Father.

He will do it, ſaith Job; Chriſt is eaſie to be intreated, he is found of thoſe that ſeek him not, then ſurely he will be found of thoſe that ſeek him. His promiſe is (John 6. 37.) Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wiſe caſt out: As if he had ſaid, Whatſoever I do, I will not do this: And when he ſaith, he will not do this, his meaning is, that he will do much more for them, then the not doing of this comes to; he will readily receive their perſons, and undertake their ſuits, though they have no fee to give him, nothing to move him, but the need they have of him.

Fifthly, Obſerve, Chriſt is a powerful, and an effectual Mediator with the Father.

He carries the day; he is a prevailing Mediator. Chriſt is ſuch a Phyſitian, that no man ever dyed under his hand; and he is ſuch an Advocate, that no mans cauſe ever miſcarried under his hand. The Arminians maintain a propitiation made, or a Sacrifice offered by Chriſt for all; yet they dare not ſay, it is effectual for all; but the interceſſion of Chriſt (in their opinion) is effectual for all. Chriſt dyed (ſay they) for thoſe that he doth not ſave; but Chriſt prayeth for none but thoſe that ſhall be ſaved. They are not for univerſal Interceſſion, though they are for an univerſal Sacrifice, or propitiation; and their reaſon is, Becauſe they cannot deny, but many ſhall periſh for ever, which yet they could not, did Chriſt but pray for them. We believe that his Sacrifice is as effectual as his Interceſſion; and that therefore he dyed for none but thoſe for whom he prayes, his Interceſſion being for the drawing out, and bringing home the benefit of his Sacrifice to thoſe, and to all thoſe for whom he offered himſelf to God. But to the point in hand, The Arminian who leaves the death of Chriſt in the hand of mans free will, aſſiſted only by general Grace, to make it effectual to himſelf, or not, he (I ſay) aſſerts the Interceſſion of Chriſt not only ſufficient, but effectual for all, in whoſe behalf he intercedes: So that we are ſure all ſhall go well with us in the Court of Heaven, while we have Chriſt our Advocate with the Father.

And that we may have fulneſs of confidence to come to God by Chriſt, let us conſider theſe five things.

Firſt, Chriſt is moſt wiſe to mannage our cauſe; ſo wiſe, that he is the Wiſdom of the Father: If we had an Advocate at the Bar furniſht with as much wiſdom as the Judge, it were a great ſtep to obtain in a right ſuit.

Secondly, Chriſt is an eloquent Advocate, a powerful Orator. As the Lord hath given him the tongue of the learned, that he ſhould know how to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary (Iſa. 54.4.) So he hath a learned tongue to ſpeak a word for him that is weary: Chriſt is the Eſſential word, and the flower of all declarative words is with him; when he ſpake on earth, he ſpake with authority (Matth. 7. 29.) All wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth (Luke 4. 24.) Yea, his hearers ſomewhere teſtifie, never ſpake man as this man ſpeaketh: And as no man ever ſpake like him to man; ſo no man ever ſpake like him to God.

Thirdly, Chriſt is a faithful Advocate; his interceſſion is a part of his Prieſtly office; we have a faithful high Prieſt, ſaith the Apoſtle, therefore a faithful Advocate: He will never either deſert our cauſe, or betray it; he is as ſure to us as our own ſouls; yea, he and the ſouls of his are one.

Fourthly, Chriſt is a merciful Advocate, he layes our cauſe to heart, our cauſe is his cauſe: He hath eſpouſed the Intereſts of his people, and doth all for us upon his own account. When Saints are perſecuted, we may tell him that he is perſecuted, and that he is afflicted when they are: The Church may plead with Chriſt to plead for the removing of her ſufferings, under the title of his ſufferings, he being the head of the Church, and the Church being his body. Chriſt is, as a faithful, ſo a merciful high Prieſt (Heb. 2. 17.) and the Apoſtle ſaith, That in all things it behoved him to be like his brethren, that he might be ſo. Chriſt had an ability of ſufficiency to be merciful to us, as God, though he had never been made like unto us by becoming man; but he had not that ability (as ſome ſpeak) of Idoneity, or fitneſs to be merciful. His being made like unto us, hath given him a double Idoneity, for the tenderneſs of his heart towards us.

Firſt, In that he himſelf hath ſuffered being tempted (Heb. 2. 18.) His paſſions in the fleſh were great.

Secondly, In that himſelf ſuffers ſtill in all our temptations, his compaſſions with our fleſh are great.

Now an Advocate, who either hath had an experience of trouble in his own perſon, or is full of the ſenſe of his Clients trouble, and feels his ſmart, will certainly do his utmoſt to relieve him; becauſe in his relief himſelf is relieved alſo.

Fifthly, Chriſt is the Favourite of the Judge; it is a great advantage to have one pleading for us at the Bar, who is in favour with the Bench: Chriſt is highly in favour with the Bench: God hath teſtified from Heaven, This is my well-beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed (Matth. 3. 17.) The Judge is our Advocates Friend and Father.

Laſtly, That we may be further aſſured that he will do his utmoſt for us, our Advocate calls us his Friends: As the Judge is his Friend, before whom he pleads; ſo every Saint is his Friend, for whom he pleads. Some will do more for friendſhip then for a fee. We know it is ſo with Jeſus Chriſt, he pleads for his people, becauſe they are his Friends: This Job makes uſe of here, He will plead for a man with God, and the Son of man for his friend. As if Job had ſaid, I know I have a Friend of Chriſt, and Chriſt looks on me as his friend, and therefore I have higheſt confidence that he will plead my cauſe, and take off this ſcandal. So much for Job's earneſt deſire upon his appeal, that his cauſe might come to a hearing, and that Chriſt would undertake the pleading of it before his Father.

He gives a reaſon in the laſt Verſe, why he was thus preſſing to have the buſineſs brought to an iſſue; why he did thus appeal to God as his witneſs, why he did pour out tears to Chriſt, that he would plead for him? Why all this?

Verſe 22. When a few years are come, then ſhall I go the way whence I ſhall not return.

As if he had ſaid, For as much as I muſt dye ſhortly, I deſire to have this difference taken up before I dye: I cannot live long in this world, and I would not go out of the world, under ſuch a cloud as is now upon me: Is it not time for me to haſten my cauſe to an end when mine end haſtens? and to get my buſineſs determined before my years are?

Anni numeri. Heb. i. e. qui numerati ſunt adeo & breviſſima periodo circumſcripti.

When a few years are come.] The Hebrew is, years of number, that is, Years which may eaſily be numbred (Iſa. 10.19.) The trees that remain ſhall be few that a Child may write them, they ſhall be trees of number, that is, a ſmall number: and (Gen. 34.29.) Jacob ſaith, We are but few, the Hebrew is, We are men of number, we may ſoon be told, a Child may tell us, and yet you provoke City and Country againſt us. We very well tranſlate according to the Hebraiſm, years of number, a few years. When a few years are come,

I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return.] What way is that (which hath Veſtigia nulla retrorſum) where all ſteps are forwards, and none backward: this is ſuch a way as we meet not with in all our earthly travels, yet every man on earth is travelling towards ſuch a way: travel which way you will, you have as many ſteps backwards as forwards, men coming, and going: but (ſaith Job) I ſhall go the way I ſhall not return.

What way is this? This is the way of all fleſh (Joſh. 23. 15. 1 King. 2.2.) This is the way to the grave, that way hath no ſteps backwards.

But is there no return from the grave?

It is true, ſome have riſen; there have been ſome firſt-fruits of a reſurrection: but they who have come from the grave are ſo few, that their foot-ſteps are worn out by thoſe many and many thouſands of thouſands who have gone to the grave. What multitudes have gone the way to the grave, and are not returned? ſome few have returned, but theſe ſo few, that we may ſtill affirm, the way to the grave knows no returning. That which is very rarely done (the contrary being very frequently done) is ſaid not to be done at all, or never to be done.

But Job ſeems to deny his own return; he ſpeaks as if he ſhould not be only lodged for a while, but loſt for ever in the grave; I ſhall go the way, whence I ſhall not return.

I anſwer, That Job's faith was clear in the point of the reſurrection of the body appears by the confeſſion which he makes (Chap. 19. 25, 26.) and therefore when he ſaith, I ſhall not return, his meaning is (as was ſhewed upon a like paſſage Chap. 10.21.)

Firſt, That he ſhould not return by any power of nature.

Secondly, That he ſhould not return to a ſtate of nature; he believed fully that he ſhould return by the power of God, to an eſtate of glory. Our bodies which are ſown natural bodies ſhall be raiſed ſpiritual bodies. Though that which was ſowed ſhall return, yet when it returns it ſhall not be as it was ſowed.

Laſtly, whereas Job ſaith, I ſhall not return, his meaning is, when I die, or if I die, I ſhall no more return to my houſe and dwelling in the world, I muſt take my leave of all thoſe things for ever. My place ſhall know me no more, as he ſpeaks to the ſame ſubject (Chap. 7. 10.)

From the firſt branch of the verſe Note, The years of man's life are few, You may quickly number them.

Secondly, As the years of man's life come above quickly, ſo when they are come, we muſt go certainly, we muſt go with death.

I ſhall go (ſaith Job) there is no hindring, no ſtopping of that journey. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, He hath no mind to go; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, He is not at leiſure to go; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he is not fit to go, He is not prepared to go; he muſt go as he is, fit or unfit, prepared or unprepared, he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he will give all the treaſure in his houſe, all the money in his purſe, to be ſpared this journey; he muſt go. It will not ſerve any man's turn to ſay, he will get another to go for him, or he will ſend one in his room; There is no dying by proxie; every man when his few years are come muſt go in perſon.

Thirdly Obſerve, A Believer can ſpeak of death familiarly.

It is a comfort to him in his ſorrows, to think that he ſhall die ſhortly, When a few years are come, I ſhall go the way, &c. he ſpeaks pleaſantly, the mention of death was a life to him. Job's life was a kind of death, and therefore to him eſpecially death would be a kind of life; were our hearts rightly affected, they that have the moſt lively life, would think death better then this life, I deſire (ſaith Paul) to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt, which is beſt of all. Dearh was better to him then life; and leſt any ſhould ſay, no marvel if Paul deſired to die, who could ſcarce tell where to live; and no marvel if he would die once for all, who was in deaths often: to prevent this cavil, he adds, Which is beſt of all. Barely to die is better to ſome then a troubleſome life; but to die and be with Chriſt, is better then the beſt life, much more is it better then that life in this world, which is a continual death, as Job's was. How ſhould ſuch a man ſing out Job's verſe, When a few dayes are come, I ſhall go the way, whence I ſhall not return.

Fourthly Obſerve, It is good to put death before us under the eaſieſt notions.

Here Job calls it only a going, a going out of the world, that is all; he elſewhere calls it a ſleep, and the Spirit of God every where (in reference to Saints) ſpeaks of it in the moſt comfortable expreſſions. Death it ſelf is ſo embalmed, yea and cloathed in the holy language, that there is even a ſweetneſs and a beauty in it. When a man hath worn a ſuit of Apparel a great while, and hath even worn it out, or it becomes foul and naſty, would he not be glad to put that off, and get a new one upon his back? therefore death is called an uncloathing, a putting off the fleſh; there is no hurt in that; when a man hath tired himſelf all the day at his work, would he not gladly go to bed? therefore death is called reſt or ſleep. Under theſe or the like conſiderations held forth in Scripture, we may (as it were) bury all hard thoughts of death, as was further ſhewed (Chap. 14.12.) eſpecially while we remember that as now life is by many degrees, bits or morſels, ſwallowed up of mortallity, ſo then death ſhall (at one bit or morſel) be ſwallowed up of life (2 Cor. 5.4.) For Chriſt hath not only conquered, but aboliſhed death, and hath brought, not only life, but immortality to light through the Goſpel (2 Tim. 1.10.) Life is good; yet when it may be ſaid of a life, it ſhall die, that puts an evil into life: But if life be good, how good is immortality, which is a life that cannot die?

Sixthly, Note, Job is very importunate to have a blot upon his good name wiped out; his conſcience was clear, his ſoul was well, he could ſay (Chap. 13.) He is my Saviour, and I know that I ſhall be juſtified; yet becauſe he was under aſperſions and harſh cenſures, he haſtens to have theſe taken off, becauſe he was to die ſhortly.

If we ſhould on this ground, be careful to ſettle our outward eſtates and credits; how much more ſhould we be careful upon this ground to ſee that our ſouls be well ſetled? How ſhould each one ſay, I will haſten to get my ſins pardoned, my perſon juſtified; I will haſten to have all clear between God and my ſoul; For when a few years are come, I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return: And if I do not ſee theſe things done, while I am here, I ſhall never come back to ſee them done, nor can they be done at all in the place whither I am going. There is no repenting, no reforming, no believing in the grave: if our ſpiritual change be not before our natural change, it will never be. This argument ſhould provoke us to ſettle the affairs of our ſouls ſpeedily. It is not unlawful, nay, it is a duty to vindicate our credit, and to order the affairs that concern this life, becauſe we have not long to live: The haſt of death ſhould make us haſt our work, even the work of this life; much more upon this ground ſhould we ſee that our hearts be ſetled, that our eternal peace be ſetled; how ſhould the haſt of death make us haſt the work of the life which is to come? But as it ſhould make us haſten that work, ſo it muſt not make us huddle that work, or ſlubber it over, or do it to halves. Such haſt is waſt indeed: For, if we leave our ſouls half ſetled, and our peace half made, and our repentance and turning to God in the mid way, we ſhall never come again to finiſh and perfect them, no more then we ſhall to begin them. Therefore ſet ſpeedily about the work, and give your ſelves no reſt till the work be perfected; for when a few dayes are come, you ſhall go the way where ye ſhall not return.

Laſtly, Which was Job's ſpecial caſe,

It is an affliction for any man to die under a blot of diſgrace.

Our credit and good name ſhould be precious to us while we live; eſpecially we ſhould be careful to die with good credit, and not to let a blot lie on us when we are going out of the World. Job would not die under the name of an

Hypocrite, or an Oppreſſour, with which black titles he had been charged by his Friends. It is a mercy to go to the grave with honour among men, and to die deſired; though it be enough that we go to our Grave having honour with God, and being deſired of him. A good name is a Box of ointment powred forth; and a good report (eſpecially among thoſe that are good) is as the embalming of our memories to poſterity. And yet the Saints are not ſo ſollicitous for repairs in honour, becauſe of that eſteem which they have of their own eſteem (that's the ſtrain of ambition) and they have learned to go through good report and evil report, through honour and diſhonour; they know how to go forth without the Camp, bearing the reproach of Chriſt: But they are unwilling that Chriſt ſhould bear their reproach, or that his name ſhould be diſhonoured through them. And therefore ſeeing they deſire while they live, to adorn the Doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in all things, they cannot but be careful before they die, to remove from their own names whatſoever might reflect diſhonour upon his. How near Job was (in his own opinion) to the valley of the ſhadow of death, is yet more evident in the firſt words of the next Chapter: Here he only tells us, he muſt die ſhortly, there he tells us, upon the matter, that he was dead already; here he ſaith, When a few years are come, I ſhall go; there he ſaith not only that he had no more years to come, but no more dayes, my dayes are extinct, &c.

CHAP. XVII. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the Graves are ready for me.

Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eyes continue in their provocation.

Lay down now, put me in a ſurety with thee, who is he that will ſtrike hands with me?

For thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding: therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them.

He that ſpeaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his Children ſhall fail.

THE beginning of this Chapter purſues the Argument laid down in the cloſe of the former: Or as a learned Expoſitour ſpeaks, Job in this doth enliven the premiſes, and (as it were) put freſh ſpirits into what he had ſpoken before. For whereas he had before deſired the Lord to haſten his cauſe to a day of hearing, becauſe his day of death haſtned (Chap. 16. Verſ. 22.) When a few years are come, I ſhall go the way, whence I ſhall not return: Here to ſhew that he was a dying man, he deſcribes himſelf as a dead man; My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

Hoc capite intendit inanimare præmiſſa. Aquin.

Secondly, There Job made an appeal to God, O that a man might plead with God, as a man pleads with his Neighbour. (Verſ. 21.) And he gives the reaſon why, My Friends ſcorn me. (Verſ. 20.) He doth the ſame here in other language (Verſ. 2.) Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? And therefore he renews his appeal to God, and begs to be heard before indifferent Judges, or Umpires, Lay down now, put me in a ſurety with thee, who is he that will ſtrike hands with me? In the fourth and fifth Verſes he further urgeth the reaſons of his appeal, or he backs his motion, that God would do him right, from the inſufficiency of his Friends to do him right: Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding: As if he ſhould ſay, Who would ſtand to the judgement of thoſe, who want underſtanding? Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding: therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them, &c. To this honour of judging my cauſe, and deciding this controverſie, yea, I find them ſo unfit to be either my Judges, or my Arbitratours, that they are indeed but Flatterers; and therefore they may rather expect ſome ſudden judgement upon themſelves, or their Children, then that God ſhould do them this honour to judge for me: He that ſpeaks flattery to his Friends, even the eyes of his Children ſhall fail, (Verſ. 5.)

Thus I have opened Job's ſcope in the context of theſe five Verſes; which I have put together, becauſe the matter runs in a continued dependence. And though for the main it be the ſame with which he concluded in the ſixteenth Chapter, yet the variety of reading and expreſſion will yield us variety of meditation: I deſcend to particulars.

Verſ. 1. My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct; the graves are ready for me.

Here are three things, every of which ſpeaks a dying man.

First, Corrupt breath.
Secondly, Extinguiſhed dayes.
Thirdly, A grave made ready.

Firſt, My breath is corrupt: Ruach. There are three interpretations given of that word [My breath] Some underſtand it of his mind, or whole inward man: As if he ſaid, My thoughts are, or my mind is exceedingly troubled; and ſo moſt of the Greek Interpreters read it; and then the word which we tranſlate Corrupt, may ſignifie grieved, pained, or afflicted, and it is often applyed to thoſe pains which are moſt painful, even the pain of a Woman in travel. And ſo the ſenſe is made out thus, as if Job had ſaid, I am extreamly troubled, or I am pained, like a Woman in the hour of travel; as ſhe is in bodily pain, ſo I am pained in mind; I have felt many inward pangs, and throwes, and yet I am not delivered: But I conceive this expoſition unſuitable to the ſcope of the place, Job being about to deſcribe the ſtate of his body, or of his outward man, and not the affliction and trouble of his mind.

ligavit, conſtrinxit per antiphraſin ſignificat ſolutus, ruptus, corruptus, accommodatur etiam ad dolores intenſiſſimos quales ſunt parturientium, quia cor valde conſtringunt.

Secondly, The word (Ruach) ſignifieth the vital powers or ſpirits, which ſupport man, and ſerve him in all the functions of life; ſpirits are the promoters of action, and when the vital ſpirits are corrupted, man is unable, not only to act, but to live. The expence of ſpirits, is the moſt chargeable expence to the life of man, and when a mans ſpirits are much ſpent, he is like a dead man, though he be alive: We ſay ordinarily when we are weary, Our ſpirits are ſpent; that is, Our vital ſpirits which give activity and ſtrength to the whole body.

Spiritus vitales qui animæ inſtrumentum ſunt ad vitæ functiones. Aquin.

Thirdly, Rather underſtand it literally, and ſtrictly for the breath, which comes forth by reſpiration, My breath is corrupt: and then the corrupting here ſpoken of, is not to be taken for any illſavour in his breath: they who have corrupt breath are offenſive to others in breathing. The breath is ſaid to be corrupt, becauſe it ſmells of the corruption of thoſe parts from whence it is drawn; we muſt not underſtand Job ſo: But when he ſaith, My breath is corrupt, his meaning is, that either he had obſtructions and ſtoppings of breath, which diſtemper Phyſitians call the Tiſſick; a man under that infirmity may be ſaid to have his breath corrupted, becauſe he breathes difficultly. And as it is ſo in ſome diſeaſes, ſo it is alway ſo in the approaches of death; a little before a man dies, his breath ſhortens, he breathes hardly, or he hardly breathes, he lies gaſping for life, and catching for breath: Such a ſtate Job here intends. The Tygurine tranſlation takes that ſenſe, My life is departing, or I am giving up the ghoſt.

Corruptio non hic denotat ſpiritum graveolentum, ſed ſpiritum qui cum ingenti niſu & dolore emittitur. Pined. Medici Aſthma vocant; & quia Aſthmaticus ſuffocari videtur, ideo legitur hic; jam quidem ago animam. Tygur.

Hence Note, The breath of man is corruptible, though his ſoul be not.

Theſe two are very diſtinct: Some make the ſoul and breath one thing, and argue the corruptibility of the ſoul from ſuch Texts as this. But the breath differs, not only from the ſoul, but from the life: The ſoul hath a life of its own, and the life of the body is it union with the ſoul; breathing is the acting of life, proceeding from that union, and ending when that union is diſſolved. Breath may be corrupt, and life may vaniſh, but the ſoul continues; the breath is ſo vaniſhing, that the Prophet gives caution (Iſa. 2.22.) Ceaſe from man, whoſe breath is in his noſtrils. The breath of man is ſo ready to ceaſe, that it is our wiſdom to ceaſe from man; for when breath goes, man is gone, and all goes with him, in that day his thoughts periſh; and therefore Job had no ſooner ſaid, My breath is corrupt, but he adds,

My dayes are extinct.

נועכו Vox tantū hoc loco reperta ſignificat excidere amputare extinguere.

[My dayes] that is, The time appointed for my life, which is meaſured by dayes, by natural dayes, or by artificial dayes: Our dayes come and go continually; and when our tale of dayes is come and gone, our dayes are [extinct.] The word which here we tranſlate extinct, is found no where elſe in the Hebrew of the Old Teſtament: it is rendered three wayes.

*Exciſſi ſunt.*Pagn.

Firſt, Thus, my dayes are cut off; which metaphor is often uſed in reference to life; our dayes are (as it were) ſo many threads, and our life is like a piece of cloth woven together by many dayes; when the Web, be it more or leſs, longer or ſhorter, is finiſhed, the thred is cut: My dayes are cut off.

Breviabuntur dies mei. Vulg.

Secondly, The Vulgar reads it, my dayes will be ſhortned; they ſhall be put in a narrow room, into a little compendium, I ſhall ſoon be able to read over the volume of my dayes, they are but ſhort, a meer Epitome.

Thirdly, We read, my dayes are extinct, or put out. Which is a metaphor taken from fire, from a Torch, or Candle, which is the ſenſe of the Tygurine tranſlation.

*Deus mei vitæ lucernæ deficiunt.*Tygur.

Vita extinguitur quādo humor nativus in quo vita conſiſtit extinguitur.

My dayes fail, as a Candle, or as a Lamp, which, when the oyl is conſumed, goes out: Mr. Broughton keeps to the metaphor of fire, My dayes are quenched. There is a flame of life in the body, the natural heat is preſerved by the natural moyſture; theſe two, Radical heat, and Radical moiſture, work upon each other; and as long as Radical moiſture holds out to feed the Radical heat, life holds out; but when the heat hath once ſucked and drunk up all the moiſture (in ſome acute diſeaſes it drinks all at a draught) as the flame drinks up the Oyl of the Lamp, then we go out, or as Job ſpeakes here, Our dayes are extinct. Exceſſive moiſture puts out the fire, and for want of moiſture it goeth out.

Hence Note, Firſt, Man's life, as a Fire, or Lamp, conſumes it ſelf continually.

There is a ſpecial diſeaſe called a Conſumption, of which many die; but the truth is, every man who dies, dies of a Conſumption; he that dies of a Surfet, may be ſaid (in this ſenſe) to die of a Conſumption. The fewel and food of man's life is waſted ſometimes more ſparingly and gradually, but 'tis alwayes conſumed (except in thoſe deaths which are meerly occaſional, or violent) before man dies.

Again, Job ſpeaks peremptorily, My dayes are extinct. He was not then dead; but becauſe he ſaw all things in a tendency to death, and was himſelf in a dying poſture; therefore he concludes, My dayes are extinct.

Hence Note, Secondly, What we ſee in regard of all preparatory means and wayes ready to be done, we may ſpeak of as already done.

The Scripture ſpeakes often of thoſe things which are ſhortly and certainly to come to paſs, as come to paſs. And as the Apoſtle argues in ſpirituals, We know that we are tranſlated from death to life, becauſe we love the Brethren, and he that believeth hath eternal life: So we may argue about naturals, he that is ſick beyond the help of means, and the ſkill of the Phyſician, is tranſlated from life to death, and we may conclude of a man in this caſe, he hath temporal death; or he may ſay of himſelf, as Job doth in the next words,

The graves are ready for me.] The Original is very conciſe, it is only there, The graves for me; we ſupply thoſe words are ready. And becauſe of that ſhortneſs of the Language, there have been many conjectures for the ſupply or filling up of the ſence. Some thus, The graves for me; that is, there is nothing for me to think of now but only a grave, I may lay aſide all other buſineſs, and attend that alone, how I may lie down in the duſt with peace. I am not a man for this world, it is beſt for me to retire or withdraw my ſoul quite from the earth, ſeeing I have no hope to keep my body long out of it; or if I do let out my ſoul to the earth, it ſhall be only to ſo much of it, as will hold my body, or ſerve to make me a grave. The graves for me.

Secondly, The graves for me; that is, I deſire or wiſh for nothing but a grave, A grave for my money, as we ſay of a thing that we greatly deſire: ſo ſaith Job, A grave for me:

As if he had more largely ſpoken, thus,

Sepulchra mihi; ſupple opto, quæro, cogito, aut quid ſimile. Sepulchra mihi inhiāt, ego ſepulchris. q.d. Aliis omnibus rebus valedico atque renuncio. Jun.

As I perceive I am going to the grave, ſo I deſire to go thither; I have (as to this ſence) made a covenant with death, and an agreement with the grave. The grave and I ſhall not fall out, now that I am ready to fall into it. For if I had my vote, or might put down in writing what I would have, I would write, A Grave, A Grave for me; as I am declining, and decaying in my body, ſo my ſpirit, and my mind are as willing that my body ſhould decay: I am as ready for the grave as that is for me. A grave for me: So the words carry a reciprocation of readineſs between Job and the Grave, The grave gapes for me, and I gape for the grave: We may parallel this kind of ſpeaking with that in the Book of Canticles (Chap. 2.16.) where the Spouſe ſaith, My beloved is mine, and I am his: The Original is, My beloved to me, and I to him: There are no more words then needs muſt be. The largneſs of their affection, bred this conciſeneſs in language, My beloved to me, and I to him:

The expreſſion Notes two things.

Firſt, Propriety, My beloved to me, or, my beloved is mine; that is, I have a propriety in him.

Secondly, It Notes poſſeſſion, I have him, I have not only a right to him, but I enjoy him; I have not only a title, but a tenure; God hath given me Livery and Seiſin (as our Law ſpeaks) he hath put me into poſſeſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, and I have given Jeſus Chriſt full poſſeſſion of me, I am no longer my own, but his, and at his diſpoſe. So here, The grave for me, and I for the grave: The grave is my right; yea, the grave is my poſſeſſion. The grave is a houſe that every one hath right to, and ſome are ſo near it, that they ſeem poſſeſſed of it. The grave is mine, ſaith Job, or I am as a dead man, ready to be carried to my grave: The Grave is not made ready, till man is undreſſed by death, and ſo made ready for the grave. We ſay of very old men, though in health, and we may ſay of very ſick men, though young, They have one foot in the grave. Job ſpeaks as having both his feet in the grave: Yea, we may ſay, that Job ſpeaks as if he had not only his feet in the grave, but (which is far more) his heart in the grave. There are many who have their feet in the grave, whoſe hearts are at furtheſt diſtance from it, Job had both. Heman (Pſal. 88. 4, 5.) deſcribes his condition in ſuch a language, My ſoul is full of troubles, and my life draweth nigh to the grave, I am accounted with them that go down into the pit; I am as a man of no ſtrength, free among the dead; like the ſlain that lie in the grave, whom thou remembreſt no more, and that are cut off from thy ſight: That Scripture may be a Comment on this, My breath is corrupt, my dayes are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

Further, Job ſpeaks in the Plural number; he ſaith not the grave is ready for me, but, The graves are ready for me. Why, how many graves muſt Job have? Would not one grave hold him? Or, was Job covetous to have many graves? Many houſes will not ſerve ſome men when they live, but one houſe will ſerve any man when he dieth. A little room will hold thoſe dead, for whoſe covetous and ambitious minds the whole World was not roomthy enough while they lived. Ordinary men will have here their Winter-houſes, and their Summer-houſes, their City-houſe, and their Country-houſe, their houſes on the Plain, and their houſes on the Hill; men have variety of houſes while they live; but one is all when dead: Why then doth Job ſay, The [graves] are ready for me?

He ſaith it to ſhew that death abounded to his apprehenſion, or that he could not eſcape death: As if he had ſaid, Whereſoever I ſet my foot, I ſtep upon a grave. The Poet deſcribing a tragical ſtate, ſaith, There was much of death to be ſeen, or many appearances of death. Job ſaw deaths, and beheld graves every where gaping for him. Paul was in deaths often, and Job was in many deaths at once: The graves are ready, there are many Pits making, I am ſure to fall into one, there's no avoiding it.

Plurima mortis imago.

Learn from it, Firſt,

That, In times of ſickneſs and affliction, diſcourſes of the grave, are the moſt ſeaſonable diſcourſes.

Death ſhould be much in our thoughts, and much in our ſpeech at all times, but moſt of all in times of ſickneſs, or of danger. Some when they are ſick, cannot abide to hear a word ſpoken of the grave; others will forbid ſuch as come to viſit the ſick, to ſpeak a word of death. Lewis the eleventh King of France, was ſo exceſſively afraid of death, that he had given command to his Attendants not to give him any warning of the approach of this his laſt Enemy by Name. It was worſe then death to him to hear of death; and yet before he died, He was told of it, not only plainly, but rudely. The French Hiſtorian reports, that his very Barber, with ſome other inferiour Servants (as if they had rather come as Judges to pronounce the ſentence of death upon him, then as friends to be his remembrancers of death) told him bluntly and abruptly, without preface or preamble, or the leaſt word of comfort to ſweeten ſuch a bitter potion, That his fatal hour was come, that neither his Hermit nor his Phyſitian, could keep him alive a day longer. They who are unwilling to hear, or ſpeak of death, ſhall hear it ſpoken of whether they will or no. Death ſhould be much upon the tongue, and more in the thoughts of good men when they are in health, but when they are in their natural preparation for death (ſickneſs is a natural preparative for death) they ſhould be very often in their ſpiritual preparations, by thinking and diſcourſing of it.

Comines. lib. 10.

Obſerve, That, A godly man is ſometimes as ready for the grave, as the grave can be for him.

Let it come as ſoone as it will, it cannot come too ſoon; as the grave gapes for him, ſo doth he for the grave; as the grave hungers for him, ſo doth he for it, and nothing can ſatisfie him but a grave. I deſire (ſaith Paul) to be diſſolved: He was ready for the grave: And ready he was, not in a vain wiſh, O, I would die, and I deſire to die; but from a grounded hope that he ſhould be well in death. Saul (2 Sam. 1.9.) was ſorely wounded, the graves were ready for him, and he was ready for the grave too: But whence was it? It was not from his preparedneſs to die, but from his impatience to live; as appears both by the true Hiſtory of his death, and by the falſe report of it made by the Amalekite. The former ſaith (1 *Sam.*31 4.) Then ſaid Saul unto his Armour-bearer, Draw thy ſword and thruſt me through therewith, leſt theſe uncircumciſed come and thruſt me through and abuſe me: Saul, upon this account was ſo ready for the grave, that he begg'd to be thruſt into it, and when he could not obtain that miſerable favour; he thruſt himſelf into it; ſo the latter part of the Verſe informs us, But his Armour-bearer would not, for he was ſore afraid: therefore Saul took a Sword and fell upon it. The Amalekite reports Saul thus beſpeaking him (2 *Sam.*1.9.) Stand I pray thee upon me, and ſlay me; for anguiſh is upon me, becauſe my life is yet whole in me.

Man dies not by piece-meal, now a little, and then a little, nor is life diviſible, when it departs it departs together; but when Saul had no mind to live, it troubled him that he was no nearer death: A diſhonour was fallen upon him, the day was loſt, and he was wounded: Saul could eaſier die then out-live this diſgrace. Such a readineſs to die many have had, it vexeth them to live, die they will, becauſe they cannot live as they would: this is a readineſs of deſperation, not of preparation. Job was much troubled, pain and ſmart afflicted him, and they had ſome influence upon his deſire of death; but his chief motive was above: what old Simeon deſired, to depart in peace becauſe his eyes had ſeen his ſalvation, Job deſired, becauſe he knew by Faith, that God was his ſalvation.

Thirdly, Job ſpeakes chearfully of the Grave:

Hence learn, A believer in the greateſt afflictions of this life, ſees eaſe and refreſhing in death.

He knowes that he ſhall bury all his ſorrows when himſelf goes to the grave; yea, that then his ſins, as well as his afflictions go to their grave too, and ſhall never riſe again.

Fourthly, Job ſpeakes confidently, he ſhall die preſently, the grave was ready for him: But it was not ſo, Job's grave was not ready, and he out-lived this black day many a fair year.

Hence Obſerve, A good man may miſtake the times and ſeaſons of God's diſpenſations to him.

He thinks, yea concludes, he ſhall die, when he ſhall not die: Wicked worldly men, do not believe they ſhall die, when they muſt; they cannot be perſwaded that they ſhall die, when they are ready to drop into their graves. Job ſeemed to have an aſſurance that he ſhould die, yet he did not, God reprived him from death, and reſtored him from trouble. We are never the nearer the grave, becauſe we prepare for it, ſpeak and meditate on it, or reſolve to go into it: It is not our holding back from the grave, that will keep us out of it, nor our willingneſs to go to the grave, that will put us into it. It is good to miſtake upon the beſt ſide; God uſually recalls thoſe from death, who are moſt ready at his call to die.

Fifthly, In that he ſpeaks of Graves in the Plural number: Learn this, There are many wayes of going out of the World, though there be but one way of coming in.

Whitherſoever we are going, we are going to the grave; and when we have ſtept over, or ſcrambled out of one grave, we may quickly ſlip into another, and be locked in faſt enough.

Laſtly, Take this from the whole, by way of Corollary; It is our wiſdom to ſtand alwayes ready for death, and the grave, for they ſtand ready for us: Ours is a dying life, a decaying ſtrength, ours are conſuming dayes, our dayes cannot be many, poſſibly they will be but very few; for ought we know the grave is now ready for us, and we are ſure it is a digging and preparing for us: Therefore let us be digging in the Word of life, that we may be ready to meet and welcome death and the grave, which are ſo ready for us: The graves are ready for me.

Job proceeds to re-inforce the cauſe of his appeal.

Verſ. 2. Are there not mockers with me? And doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Maſter Broughton tranſlates by way of affirmation, Surely mockers are beſtowed on me. We by way of Queſtion, Are there not mockers with me? Yes, there are mockers with me: Some read it as the form of an Oath. It is familiar in the Hebrew to uſe ſuch forms of ſwearing and imprecating; ſo the words are rendred by a learned Interpreter, Let me periſh if my friends are not mockers, if they go not about to delude me. Job ſpake this a little before, *My friends ſcorn me (Chap.*16.20.) Here he is at it again, Are there not mockers with me? I find three words applyed by Job to his Friends, while he reproves this their unfriendly uſage.

Diſperiã niſi amici mei ſtudeant mihi imponere. Vatabl.

The firſt (*Chap.*12.4.) there he uſeth a word which ſignifieth to mock with deriſion. The word (*Chap.*16.19.) notes them ſuch as mocked, with wit and jeſting. The word here uſed ſignifies to mock by deceiving or deluding, as if his Friends had carried matters with him more like Sophiſters, then Comforters: So the word is applied (Gen. 31.7.) Jacob tells Leah, and Rachel, You know that with all my power, I have ſerved your Father Laban, and your Father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times: that is, He thought by changing my wages to deceive me, and get all the ſtronger Cattel to himſelf. When Moſes went out upon the requeſt of Pharaoh, to ſue unto the Lord for the removing of a preſent plague: Moſes ſaid, Behold I go out from thee, and I will intreat the Lord that the ſwarms of flies may depart from Pharaoh, from his Servants, and from his people to morrow; but let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more (*Exod.*8.29.) as if he had ſaid, You have mocked me two or three times, and ſaid you would let the people go, do not ſo any more, leſt your deceiving of my expectation, prove the greateſt deceit of your own.

The deluding Doctors which ſome delighted in, are expreſt by this word (*Iſa.*30.9.) This is a rebellious people, lying children, children that will not hear the Law of the Lord: They did not love the Law of the Lord; What then? which ſay to the Seers, ſee not, and to the Prophets, propheſie not unto us right things, ſpeak unto us ſmooth things, propheſie deceits. The wickedneſs of that people lay in two things; either they would have the Prophets ſilent, and not ſpeak at all, or if they did ſpeak, they muſt Propheſie deceits: They loved to to be cozoned: truth made them ſmart, and they could not abide it. A guilty conſcience cannot endure plain words, but it loves ſmooth words; as many as you will of theſe words (ſay they) or elſe not a word; either propheſie deceit, or ceaſe prophecying. Here Job complains, Are there not deceivers with me? As if he had ſaid, You tell me you bring the mind of God, but you bring falſe Doctrine, you preach deceit. Though we cannot ſay they preached ſmooth things to Job, they ſpake hardly enough of him, and harſhly enough to him, yet we may ſay they preached deceitful things to him; for though they did not ſpeak with an intention to deceive him, yet they were deceived in ſpeaking, and he had been deceived if he had yielded to what they ſpake. In which ſenſe Job calls them (which one would think he had little reaſon to do, conſidering how roughly they dealt with him, he, I ſay, calls them) Flatterers, at the ſixth Verſe of this Chapter: And what's the buſineſs or chief deſign of Flatterers, but to catch others with words, or to deceive them into a compliance with their own ends. And this is often (and was in this caſe) the end, or tendency of the action, when it is not the end, or intention of the Agent. From this notion of the word,

Finis operis & finis operantis diſtinguuntur.

Obſerve, Firſt, To be among Deceivers is a great miſery.

Secondly, To be a Deceiver is a great ſin.

Thirdly, To publiſh that which is falſe, though there be no intendment to deceive, is to be a Deceiver.

As moſt are ignorantly deceived, ſo there are ſome ignorant Deceivers: and as ſome think what they do to be very juſt, and that it is their duty to do it, when indeed it is very ſinful, ſo there are ſome who think what they teach to be very true, and that it is their duty to teach it, when indeed it is very erroneous. There are but few who know they are Deceivers, when they are: now as that Servant which knew his Lords will, but did not according to his will, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes; and yet, he who knew it not, and did commit things worthy of ſtripes (ſhall not eſcape a beating, he) ſhall be beaten with few ſtripes (*Luk.*12.47,48.) So he that knowes the truth of God, and yet deceives others with falſe Doctrine, ſhall be beaten with many ſtripes; and he who not knowing the truth, deceives others, ſhall not eſcape unbeaten, or unblamed, as Job's Friends did not.

There is another reading of this firſt clauſe, differing from ours, Are there not mockers with me? The Vulgar thus, I have not ſinned. A ſecond to the ſame ſenſe, thus, For as much as there are no mockings or deceivings with me, I am a man who deals plainly and ſimply. The word which we tranſlate Mockers, as noting a Perſon, is rendered by the act, and that negatively: There are no mockings with me; that is, I uſe no mockings or no falſe play, as I am accuſed; I have ſpoken my heart nakedly and clearly, And yet mine eye continueth in their provocation: therefore lay down now, put me in a ſurety with thee, &c. (*Verſ.*3.) This is a good reading, but I will not ſtay upon it; only take two brief Notes from it.

Non peccavi. Vulg. q.d. innocens heu morior. Quandoquidē non ſunt ludificationes apud me. Jun.

A good man is upright-hearted, and down-right in all his dealings and ſayings.

There are no mockings with me, I am what I appear, and I appear what I am: An Hypocrite is full of tricks and ſhifts, he diſguiſeth both his perſon and his actions: No man can tell where to have him, or what to make of him. When he ſpeaks, his words do not ſignifie what he means, if they ſignifie any thing; and when he acts, his works do not ſignifie what he is, they ſignifie any thing rather then that. All are mockings of others, though he will find in the end, that he hath mocked himſelf moſt all.

Secondly, As he joyns this with the next clauſe, There are no mockings with me, and yet mine eye continueth in their provocation. Note, that,

How plain-hearted ſoever a man is, yet it is very hard to perſwade thoſe who are once prejudiced againſt him that he is ſo.

Let Job ſay and profeſs what he would, yet he could not recover his credit, nor ſet himſelf right in the opinion of men till God did it for him (*Chap.*42.) But I paſs that, Are there not mockers with me? What the mocking and ſcorning of Job's Friends was, hath been opened (*Chap.*12.4. *Chap.*16.19.) And therefore I refer the Reader thither.

Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Should he not rather have ſaid, Doth not mine ear continue, &c. Mocking is the object of the ear, and not of the eye. There are ſome mockings indeed, by mimical fooliſh geſtures, and they are the object of the eye; but here Job ſpeaks of what he had from them in conference, which is properly the buſineſs of the ear; and yet he ſaith, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? By the eye we are to underſtand the eye of the mind. Doth not mine eye? that is, Have I not a repreſentation in my ſpirit, or upon my fancy of your mockings, and bitter provocations, even as if they were viſible before mine eyes? Have I not night viſions and apparitions upon my Bed, of what you ſpeak or act againſt me every day?

Again, We may expound the Text properly of his bodily eye, becauſe the trouble which they gave him in the day time, hindred his ſleep in the night. The letter of the Hebrew favours this ſenſe, Doth not mine eye lodge in their provocation? So we put in the Margin of our Bibles: Hence Mr. Broughton reads, In theſe mens vexing lodgeth mine eye; that is, When I go to Bed and hope to ſleep, then in ſtead of lodging in my Bed, I lodge in the thoughts of my Friends unkindneſs; and indeed, a man may ſleep better upon the bare boards, then upon hard words. Such words keep the eyes waking, and are as bad to ſleep upon, as a pillow of thorns; eſpecially when (which was Job's caſe) the eye continueth in them. Intentneſs of mind, or vehement cogitation about any thing, keep open the eyes, and forbid the approach of reſt; Doth not mine continue?

Aſſiduè in id oculos & mentis aciē intentā habeo quod me aſſiduè irritant, in eo defixæ ſunt omnes meæ cogitationes. Merc. Iſti dies noctéſq; nō ceſſant exacerbare animū meū. Jun. Intenta cogitatio ſomnū impedit.

In their [provocations.] He called them Mockers, and their mockings were provocations. The word (as ſome derive it) ſignifies that which is bitter. Provocation is a bitter thing. Others derive it from a root ſignifying to irritate and ſtir up the ſpirit of a man; which is provocation properly. Provocation is a high act of wrong: A man may do another wrong, on this ſide a provocation. As the provocation of God is a high act of ſin in man, ordinary acts of ſin do not amount to a provocation (*Pſal.*106.7.) They provoked him at the Sea (it is this word) even at the red Sea, that is, There they ſinned extreamly. So (Pſal. 95.8.) which the Apoſtle quotes (*Heb.*3.8.) The holy Ghoſt calls the whole time of that peoples froward walking, or ſinning againſt God in the Wilderneſs, The provocation: Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation: that is, In the time when ye ſinned, not only to the offending, but to the provoking of God againſt you, not to the breaking of his Laws, but to the vexing of his ſpirit. When ſin is compleat, and iniquity grown to a full ſtature, that day is juſtly marked in the Calendar of Scripture, with a red letter, implying wrath, and is therefore called, The provocation: So when any man deals very unkindly, frowardly, or unfaithfully, againſt his Brother, then 'tis a provocation, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Vel a מרר amarū eſſe. Sive à מרה quod eſt irritare ſive exacerbare.

Now for as much as the ſame word ſignifieth both bitterneſs and provocation, and that moſt provocations are given by uncharitable and unconſiderate ſpeeches;

Obſerve, Firſt, Unkind words are bitter to the hearer.

The Apoſtle gives the rule to Husbands (*Col.*3.19.) Husbands, love your Wives, and be not bitter to them: that is, Do not give them bitter words in ſtead of faithful counſels. Some Husbands ſpeak their Gall to their Wives, to whom they have given their hearts. Among the Heathens the Gall of the Sacrifice which they ſuperſtitiouſly offered at Marriages, was pull'd out and thrown away, before it was preſented at the Altar, ſignifying that Man and Wife ſhould be (as Naturaliſts ſay the Dove is) without Gall one towards another. Wholſome counſels and admonitions for the matter, are often adminiſtred with ſuch an undue mixture of heat and paſſion as renders them, not only diſtaſtful but hurtful to the receiver.

Secondly, Note, Harſh words carry much provocation in them.

ἵνα μὴ ἀθυμῶσιν, ἀθυμέω, animum deſpondeo.

The ſame Apoſtle in the ſame Chapter enlarging his Inſtitutes for the direction of Believers in all Relations, beſpeaks Parents (*Verſ.*21.) Fathers provoke not your Children to anger: The word ſignifies any kind of provocation, but that eſpecially which is cauſed by contumelious and upbraiding ſpeeches. A Father provokes his Child, when he ſpeaks haſtily, and threatningly, terrifying his Child, rather then inſtructing him: The reaſon why Fathers ſhould not thus provoke their Children, is added, Leſt they be diſcouraged, or (as the word imports) be as if they were without ſouls, moop't (as we ſay) and heartleſs. For as there is a provocation (in a good ſenſe) which heightens the ſpirit in well-doing, and enlivens it for action: The Apoſtle exhorts to that (*Heb.*10.24.) Let us conſider one another to provoke one another to love, and to good works. That is, let us ſet ſuch copies of holineſs that others may be ſtirred up, beyond their ordinary pitch, and elevation of ſpirit, to a zealous doing of good: Or ſpeak ſuch winning words, give ſuch preſſing exhortations, that the hearts of your Brethren, may be carried beyond their uſual courſe in holineſs. Thus he tells the Corinthians (2 Epiſt. 9.2.) That their zeal had provoked many: But to what had it provoked them? Not to anger and paſſion, towards any, but to charity, yea and liberality towards the poor. And though the Apoſtle uſeth another word in the Greek, yet he means the ſame thing, when he aſſures us (*Rom.*11.11.) that the Jews ſtumbled, not that they ſhould fall (but that they might riſe) for ſo it follows, But rather through their fall ſalvation is come to the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealouſie. The ſalvation of the Gentiles bred emulation in the Jews, What? Shall they go away with all the ſalvation? Shall the Gentiles poſſeſs Heaven alone, whom we thought the meaneſt people upon the Earth? Come, let us alſo put in at leaſt for a part, and get a ſhare in Goſpel-mercies and priviledges with them. Thus they were provoked to emulation, and this emulation was and ſhall be (through the power of God, who is wonderful in counſel, and excellent in working) a help to faith in Chriſt, and ſo to their riſing from their fall. And the Apoſtle was ſo intent upon the promoting of this deſign of God, that he profeſſeth (*Verſ.*13,14.) that he magnified his Office among the Gentiles, not only to ſave them, but (ſaith he) If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my fleſh, and might ſave ſome of them: He hoped the Jews would, at laſt, believe for anger, or for very ſhame, and go to Heaven in a holy chaſe.

Now (I ſay) as there is a provocation which heats and hightens the mind of man to an eager purſuite of the beſt things; ſo there is a provocation which abates and blunts his edge, which chils and flats his ſpirits to any thing that is good, which was the ground of the Apoſtles dehortation, Provoke not your Children, leſt they be diſcouraged: And as the effect of ſuch provocations is to ſome a diſcouragement in doing their duty, ſo the effect of it in others is a thruſting them on to do that which is moſt contrary, not only to their duty, but to their diſpoſition.

Railing ſpeeches, uncomely and uncivil language, have provoked many, both to ſpeak, and to do that which they never dreamt of, or which was moſt remote from their natural temper and inclination. For though ſuch diſtempers lie in the bottom of nature, yet unleſs they had been ſtirred and ſpurred up, thoſe diſtempers would not have appeared and broken out. Moſes was the meekeſt man upon the earth, yet when they provoked his ſpirit, he ſpake unadviſedly with his lips (*Pſal.*106.33.) There are three ill effects of provocations.

Firſt, Provoking ſpeeches raiſe up hard thoughts of the ſpeaker. It is a high work of grace to think well of them, who ſpeak ill of us, or to us.

Secondly, Provoking ſpeeches blow up hard words of the ſpeaker; many excuſe it, when they give ill language, You provoked me: And though they be not to be excuſed who do ſo when they are provoked, yet their ſin is the greater, who provoke them.

Thirdly, Provoking ſpeeches are ſometimes the cauſe of revengeful practices, and very often of licentious practices. Sober admonitions and grave reproofs, reclaim thoſe who go aſtray, but violent rebukes make them deſperate. Some care not what they do when they hear others ſay they care not what. Many Children have run ill courſes by over much indulgence, and neglect of diſcipline; and ſo have not a few, by the over-much ſeverity and ſharpneſs of thoſe that are over them. Patience is hard put to it, to keep either mind or tongue or hand in compaſs, when we are provoked: Great provocations are great temptations. When God is provoked he is tempted (*Heb.*3.8.) Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the Wilderneſs, when your Fathers tempted me, &c. We may expound it two wayes.

Firſt, That while they tempted God, by queſtioning his power for them, and preſence with them, they provoked him, he was greatly diſpleaſed with them for it.

Secondly, That while they provoked God they tempted him, they tempted him to deſtroy them, or to act that power againſt them which they did not believe (after ſo many experiences) able enough to deliver or protect them. If then God himſelf be ſo tempted, that (as he is pleaſed often to expreſs himſelf after the manner of men) he can ſcarce hold his hands, or forbear to do that which he had no mind to do when he is provoked, how much more is weak man tempted to do that which his corruptions are alwayes forward enough (and too too much) to do, when he is provoked.

Again, When he ſaith, Doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

Learn, thirdly, Hard words ſtick upon the ſpirit.

They hang about the mind, and are not eaſily gotten off. Good words dwell much upon the ſpirit, and ſo do ill words. When a man hath once got a word of promiſe from God, about any mercy ſet home upon his heart, the eye continues in that conſolation: O it is a ſweet word, the ſoul lies ſucking at it night and day. And when a man hath once got a word of command from God about any duty ſet home upon his ſpirit, his eye continues in the direction of it. O how I love thy Law (ſaith *David, Pſal.*119.97.) It is my meditation all the day; he could not beat his thoughts off from it, when love had faſtned on it. As theſe good words cleave to a gracious ſoul, and dwell with it; ſo it is hard even for a gracious ſoul to diſlodge hard words: O how doth the eye continue in thoſe provocations? And doth not experience teach us, that vain thoughts thrown into the mind by Satan will not eaſily be driven out? How often doth the eye continue in his provocations? The ſpirit of a man hath a ſtrong retentive faculty, it will hold the object cloſe, and as it were live and lodge in it. How many make their abode in provocations, and reſide upon bitter words, received from their Brethren? How many lie down with them at night, and riſe with them in the morning; yea, and walk with their eye upon them all the day long? And here it may be queſtioned,

Was not this a ſin in Job? That rule of love then was in being, which is now expreſſed (*Epheſ.*4.26.) Be ye angry and ſin not, let not the Sun go down upon your wrath. Then, how could Job ſuffer his eye to continue in theſe provocations?

I anſwer, There was an infirmity in this; 'tis our duty, as to forgive, ſo to forget, or lay aſide the thought of injuries and wrongs received: And it is the Character of wicked men, They ſleep not unleſs they have done miſchief (*Pro.*4.16.) Their eye continues in their own corruption, or in the temptation of Satan till they have brought it forth. For as when good men have ſtrong impreſſions unto good upon their ſpirits, they cannot ſleep till they have done good, their eye continues in that holy provocation (*Pſal.*132.4.) I will not (ſaith zealous David) give ſleep to my eyes, nor ſlumber to my eye-lids, until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob: So wicked men give no ſleep to their eyes till they have done that miſchief, or executed that revenge to which they conceive themſelves provoked. But the eye of Job did not continue in thoſe unfriendly provocations, to watch an opportunity for ſelf-revenge upon, or of doing miſchief to his Friends: He did not let the Sun go down upon wrath, that he might deviſe their ruine in the dark. He was not ſo wiſe as he ſhould have been, to hurt himſelf, and hinder his reſt, by ſuch a continual poring upon their unkindneſſes; but he was not wicked at all, much leſs ſo wicked (which ſome from this paſſage may conceive him) as to pore upon their unkindneſſes, with a purpoſe to hurt them: So, that act might have ſomewhat of ſin in it, becauſe he troubled his own peace more then he needed, but it had not this ſin in it, that he ſtudied how to trouble the peace of others.

Laſtly, We may rather interpret theſe words to the blame of his Friends, who continued to provoke him, then to his, whoſe eye (becauſe they did ſo) could ſee nothing but provocation, or at leaſt muſt ſee that, whatſoever it ſaw, and therefore could not but continue in it. How could the eye of Hannah chuſe but continue in the provocation of Peninnah, when it is ſaid (1 *Sam.*1.6,7.) That as her Husband Elkanah gave her ſpecial tokens of his love, year by year, ſo ſhe provoked her to make her fret year by year, therefore ſhe wept and did not eat. While a provocation is continued, our ſenſe of it can hardly be intermitted.

Job having complained of received provocations, renews his appeal to God.

Verſ. 3. Lay down now, put me in a ſurety with thee: who is he that will ſtrike hands with me?

The words are an Apoſtrophe to God. That Job ſpeaks to God, not to Eliphaz, is clearer then needs be proved. The word which we render lay down, ſignifies alſo to appoint, (*Exod.*1.11.) They did ſet (or appoint) over them Task-maſters. And again (*Exod.*21.13.) I will appoint thee a place whither he (the man-ſlayer) ſhall flee. In the preſent Text both rendrings of the word are uſed. We make uſe of the firſt, Put, or lay down: What would Job have God lay down?

Appone cor tuū, i.e. adverte quæſo animū meis verbis. Vatabl.

Some give it thus, Lay down, or apply thine heart to me, attend I pray thee to my words, and conſider my cauſe.

•Secondly, The words may be conceived as an alluſion to thoſe, who going before a Judge, or having a Cauſe to be tryed by Umpires, uſe to lay down an ingagement, or as we call it, an Aſſumpſit, that they will ſtand to the award, or arbitrement, which ſhall be made.

Eſt fidei jubere pro aliquo, ſeu aliquē in ſuam fidē recipere. Hinc arrabo ſpiritus. Pone pignus, vadē, aut fidejuſſorem mihi tecum. Pagn. Diſpone quæſo conſponſorē mihi tecum. Jun. Nū Arrabonem dabis?

Put me in a ſurety with thee.] The Original word properly ſignifying to undertake for, or to give credit and aſſurance in the behalf of another; and hence the Noun derived from it, ſignifies an earneſt, becauſe an earneſt laid down, is a real ſurety, that ſuch a thing ſhall be performed. In which ſenſe Thamar uſeth the word (*Gen.*38.17.) who when Judah promiſed to ſend a Kid of the Goats, ſaid, wilt thou give me a pledge till thou ſend it? and hence in the New Teſtament the word Arrabo is uſed in the Greek, as alſo in the Latine, for the earneſt of the Spirit, or for that aſſurance which the Spirit ſettles upon the hearts of Believers in this life that they ſhall inherit eternal life (2 *Cor.*1.22.) Who hath alſo ſealed us, and given the earneſt of the ſpirit in our hearts. And again (2 *Cor.*5.5.) Now he that hath wrought us for the ſelf ſame thing is God: God having prepared a place for us, prepares us for the place, and then gives us our evidences, that in due time we ſhall take poſſeſſion of it. Who alſo hath given us the earneſt of the ſpirit. The ſame Apoſtle tells the Epheſians, that, After they believed they were ſealed with the ſpirit of promiſe, which is the earneſt of our inheritance, till the redemption of the purchaſed poſſeſſion (*Epheſ.*1.14.) So that an earneſt is a real Surety, and a Surety is a perſonal earneſt. While Job ſaith, Put me in a Surety, his meaning is, he would have ſome perſon to be an undertaker for the ordering of his Cauſe, or an enſurer that all ſhould be performed according to the determination that ſhould be given about it, Put in a Surety with me.

Who is he that will ſtrike hands with me?] He proceeds in the ſame alluſion. Theſe words are diſpoſed two wayes: Some put the Interrogation after He; Give, or put me in a Surety: Who is he? I would gladly ſee the man, or know who it is; Who is he? let him come and ſtrike hands with me, whoſoever he is: As if he had ſaid, I ſhall eaſily agree that any man ſhould have the hearing and determining of this buſineſs, whom thou ſhalt appoint.

We put the Interrogation after the whole ſentence, Who is he that will ſtrike hands with me? And then the ſenſe appears thus, If God once put in a Surety to undertake for me, who is he that will contend with me, or engage in this Quarrel againſt me?

To ſtrike hands, is a phraſe of ſpeech grounded upon that ancient form of making bargains or entring contracts, by joyning, or ſtriking hands: And theſe contracts may be taken two wayes, or under a double notion.

Firſt, As they concerned Suretiſhip for Money, in which ſenſe Solomon ſpeaks of it more then once (*Prov.*6.1.) My Son, if thou be ſurety for thy Friend, if thou have ſtricken hands with a ſtranger; that is, if thou haſt entred into Bond for him, and haſt teſtified it by ſtriking hands, then, &c. (*Prov.*22.26.) Be not thou one of them that ſtrike hands; that is, Be not too forward to engage thy ſelf, or to undertake for others; as it is expounded in the next words, or of them that are Sureties for debts; ſuch haſty engagements may bring thee into more trouble, then thou wilt be able to get off in haſt: There are many who have ſtruck, yea wounded their own hearts incurably, by ſtriking hands for their Friends. Go to the Courts of Juſtice, and there is nothing more frequently heard of, then the ſighs of Sureties: He diſaſſures his own Eſtate, who aſſures for others.

Hæc eſt ſponſio quæ propriè ad nūmorū negotiū ſpectat. Aben Ezra: in Prov.6:

Secondly, As Contracts and Suretiſhip for Money were confirmed by ſtriking hands; ſo it is very probable that thoſe Suretiſhips which were given about Tryals, and for appearing to the Action of the Plantiff in Judgement, were alſo confirmed by that outward ceremony; in which ſenſe we are to underſtand it here.

Further, The word which we tranſlate to Strike, ſignifies alſo to Faſten, which ſhews another part of the Ceremony; for as ſtriking, ſo joyning and claſping of hands was uſed.

Once more, the word ſignifies, and oft is applied to the ſounding of a Trumpet, or the giving of any ſound: This alſo carries on the ſame alluſion, becauſe when two men ſtrike hands, they make a ſound; the interpretation of which is, that the bargain is made, or it ſpeaks the parties agreed; and hence that known expreſſion among us, Of ſtriking up a bargain, or a buſineſs.

Thus the whole Text is carried on in terms alluding to the ordinary proceeding, either in becoming Bound with another for Money, or in giving aſſurance to perform, and ſtand to the arbitrement, or award of thoſe who ſhall judge, and determine any matter in difference: But how are we to apply this to the preſent caſe?

Lay down now, put me in a ſurety with thee: who is he that will ſtrike hands with me?

There are three or four expoſitions given about it.

Firſt, That Job, in theſe words, deſires God to give ſurety that he would ſtand to the judgment which ſhould be given: or he would have God aſſure him, that he would not deal with him according to the ſeverity of his Juſtice, or the excellency of his Sovereignty as a Judge, but deſcend to ſuch a courſe as is uſual among men, while they are engaged in any controverſie between themſelves. Job hath ſpoken the ſame ſenſe clearly before, in ſome other paſſages of this Book, eſpecially (*Chap.*9.33,34.) But this ſenſe is not clear to the ſcope of the preſent place: And therefore as they who maintain it, confeſs, that Job was ſomewhat too bold with God, ſo we may ſay that they are ſomewhat too bold with the Text.

Da fide-juſſorē apud te, qui in hac contentione quæ mihi tecū intercidit ſpondeat te ſtaturum iis quæ judicata fuerint; ut te non tanquā judicē geras ſed tanquam litigatorē. Merc. Familiarius quā par erat cū Deo agit. Merc.

For the reaſon or ground upon which Job deſires that God would give him a ſurety, hath no correſpondence with this interpretation (*Verſ.*4.) For thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding. Now, what coherence is there between theſe two, that Job ſhould ſay, Thou haſt hid their heart (that is, the heart of theſe men) from underſtanding: therefore give me a ſurety that thou wilt proceed with me after the manner of men. Beſides the words of the fifth Verſe oppoſe it yet more, He that ſpeaks flattery to his Friend, the eyes of his Children ſhall fail. Now, for Job to deſire God to put him in a Surety that he would deal thus, or thus with him, becauſe the man who ſpeaks flattery to his Friend, his Childrens eyes ſhall fail, hath no argument at all in it; yet the abetters of this Interpretation mollifie all, by ſaying, that Job ſpake from a diſturbed ſpirit, being much moved with the ill-dealing of his Friends; and though there may be ſome inconſiſtence with the context, yet the Text conſidered in its own compaſs, bears it well enough; but I paſs from it.

Secondly, That Job deſires God to appoint a Surety between him and his Friends, who ſhould undertake both God's Cauſe and his againſt them three: As if he had ſaid, Lord, my Friends have wronged me, and they have wronged thee too, O that thou wouldeſt provide a man furniſhed with wiſdom, and a ſpirit of diſcerning, both to right thy honour, and to clear up my integrity. Such a one was Elihu, who appeared ſhortly after upon the Stage, and there acted ſuch a part as this.

Pertexe me. Jun.

Thirdly (ſay others) Job deſires that God himſelf would be his Surety, and take up the whole matter between him and his Friends; which he alſo did in the latter end of this Book, giving judgement for Job, and blaming the miſcarriage of his Friends. So the word is uſed (*Iſa.*38.14.) when Hezekiah lay ſick, even unto death, he prayed, Lord I am oppreſſed, undertake for me, It is this word, Be Surety for me. A learned Tranſlatour renders it, Weave me through, or weave me to the end; for the word ſignifies the Thred in weaving, called the Woof, which being put upon the Shuttle, is caſt through the Warp, in making Cloath, whither Linnen or Woollen; thus it is uſed (*Lev.*13.52.) and ſo theſe words of Hezekiah carry on the Allegory of the tenth Verſe, I ſaid in the cutting off of my dayes, &c. and of the twelfth Verſe, I have cut off like a Weaver my life, he will cut me off with pining ſickneſs. In both which Verſes, Hezekiah compares man's life to a piece of Cloath in the Loom, which is made ſometimes ſhorter, and ſometimes longer, and whereſoever it ends, the Woof, or running Thred is cut off: Hence Hezekiah prayeth, Lord, theſe ſickneſſes, like a ſharp Knife, threaten to cut the threed of my life, yet I beſeech thee, do thou weave on, weave me to the end of that Warp which is given to man, in the common courſe of nature, and let not this ſickneſs cut my thred in the mid-way: This is a good ſenſe of the Text.

But when our Tranſlators render the word, Undertake for me; the meaning is, I am ſore oppreſſed with the violence of this ſickneſs, which like one of the Sergeants of cruel death hath arreſted me, nor is there any way for me to eſcape, unleſs thou, O Lord, reſcue me out of its hands, or (as it were) give Bail, and become ſurety for me: I am oppreſt, O Lord, undertake for me.

David having done a great piece of Juſtice which contracted him much envy, and had drawn many Enemies upon him, thus beſpeaks God (*Pſal.*119.121,122.) I have done judgement and juſtice, leave me not to mine oppreſſours, be ſurety for thy Servant: that is, maintain me againſt thoſe who would wrong me becauſe I have done right; put thy ſelf, or interpoſe between me and mine Enemies, as if thou wert my pledge. Impartial juſtice upon oppreſſours, layes the Judges open to oppreſſion; but they who run greateſt hazzards, in zeal for God, ſhall find God ready to be their Surety, when they pray, Be ſurety for thy ſervants. And thus we may conceive Job entreating the Lord to be his Surety and Protectour againſt all thoſe oppoſitions and miſapprehenſions which were heaped upon him by man. David was aſſured that God would be his Surety (*Pſal.*27.5.) In the time of trouble he ſhall hide me in his pavilion; and he aſſures all that fear God, that he will be their Surety (*Pſal.*31.20.) Thou ſhalt hide them in the ſecret of thy preſence, from the pride of man: Thou ſhalt keep them ſecretly in a Pavilion, from the ſtrife of tongues. To this ſenſe the Vulgar Latine tranſlates the whole Verſe, Put me near thy ſelf, and then let whoſe will contend with me; that is, Do thou ſtand by me, and undertake for me, and then I fear not who oppoſeth me: Which anſwers that of the Apoſtle (Rom. 8.) If God be with us, who can be againſt us.

Pone me juxta te & cujuſvis manus pugnet contra me. Vulg.

This expoſition holds out a comfortable truth to us, yet The Text ſeems to aim at ſomewhat elſe; for the words are not barely, Put me in a ſurety, but, Put me in a ſurety with thee; which ſhewes that God and the Surety he deſired, were two, or diſtinct; his prayer was not that God would be his Surety, but that he might have a Surety with God. And therefore,

Fourthly, The whole Verſe is thus read word for word out of the Original; Appoint I pray thee, my Surety with thee, who is he then that will ſtrike upon my hand; that is, Appoint Chriſt, who is with thee in Heaven (and hath already agreed with thee, to be the Surety of diſtreſſed ſinners, appoint him I ſay) to plead my cauſe, and to ſtand up for me, and then no man will dare to contend with me. So the words are of the ſame meaning with (Chap. 16.21.) where Job having made his appeal to God, declares his confidence that Chriſt would plead for him, and appear his Advocate.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Jeſus Chriſt is not only an Advocate for his people, but their Surety.

He doth not only plead our cauſe, but pay our debts. Chriſt entered into Bond for us, and took all our debts and duties, whatſoever we owe to God, upon Himſelf, to ſee all performed, that we might go free, and be accepted (*Heb.*7.22.) By ſo much was Jeſus made the ſurety of a better Teſtament. Where the ſame word which is here uſed by Job, is (with the difference only of that Dialect) uſed alſo in the Syriack verſion of that Epiſtle. Jeſus Chriſt may be called the Surety of the Covenant two wayes.

Firſt, Becauſe he ratifies it on Gods part, making Faith of it unto us, or aſſuring us that all the mercies and good things therein granted and promiſed, ſhall be made good, and fulfilled to every Believer; as the Apoſtle concludes (2 Cor. 1. 20.) For all the promiſes of God in him are yea, and in him Amen: that is, He will give a being and an accompliſhment to them all. Whatſoever God hath ſpoken, he will ſee it done.

Secondly, Jeſus Chriſt is called the Surety of the Covenant becauſe he ratifies it on our part: For though (as Socinians object againſt this point) we ſent not Chriſt unto God in our name, but God ſent him to us in his name, yet Chriſt did undertake, as in our nature, ſo in our name, and did reſtipulate with God on our behalf, that whatſoever was owing to his juſtice and holineſs by man, either as a penalty for paſt defaults, or as a duty to preſent commands, ſhould all be ſatisfied and performed by himſelf: And as Chriſt (being our Surety) did both theſe in his own perſon, by active and paſſive obedience, ſo far as it was ſatisfactory; ſo (as a Surety) he helps us to perform the latter ſo far as it is gratulatory. For whatſoever duty God requires of us, and calls us to, in teſtimony of our thankfulneſs for his benefits, and of our ſubmiſſion to his will, this Chriſt undertakes to his Father that we ſhall do, and accordingly out of his fulneſs gives us grace and ſtrength to do it.

Secondly, Obſerve, If Chriſt be Surety for us, we need not fear any oppoſer.

Put me in a Surety with thee (ſaith Job) who will ſtrike hands with me: who will contend with me, or ſue me? When either the Money or duty which a man is bound to pay, is already paid by his Surety, or is undertaken for by a Surety, who is not only able but willing to pay; what needs he to fear? The Creditor cannot Arreſt the Debtor, if the Surety have diſcharged and cancel'd the Bond. Thus the Apoſtle teaches Faith to triumph (*Rom.*8.33,34.) Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods Elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth; it is Chriſt who died, yea rather who is riſen again? Job's challenge, Who is he that will ſtrike hands with me? is very parallel in words, and full to the ſenſe of Pauls, Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods Elect?

Thirdly, Obſerve, Our Surety is of Gods appointing, not of our own.

Appoint, I pray (ſaith Job) put me in a ſurety with thee. We ſinned of our ſelves, but we could not find a Surety of our ſelves. God ſent his Son, made of a Woman, made under the Law, to deliver thoſe that were under the Law (Gal. 4. 4.) God ſent his Son, man did not ſend for him, no nor ſue for him: The way of our deliverance was as much from the will and wiſdom of God as from his mercy (*Heb.*10.10.) By the which will we are ſanctified through the offering of the body of Jeſus Chriſt once for all. It was as impoſſible for man to contrive this way of his deliverance, as it was to deliver himſelf. Job did not direct God to this way of acquitting by a Surety, but God having revealed it to Job, he prays for the effect and comfort of it, to his own ſoul: when a Believer burdened with ſin, or diſtreſſed by temptation, ſpreads his condition, and makes his moan to God, he in effect begs of him (as Job here did) to appoint and put him in a Surety with him, by perſwading his heart, that Jeſus Chriſt became bound for him, and hath diſcharged all his engagements according to that eternal Decree and Ordination of ſaving lapſed man by his mediation.

To which Ordination Jeſus Chriſt moſt willingly conſented, as the Apoſtle expreſſeth it (*Heb.*10.9.) Then ſaid I, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God, &c. Which readineſs and freeneſs of Jeſus Chriſt to undertake for us, is alſo elegantly deſcribed by the Prophet Jeremiah (*Chap.*30.21.) by that very word which Job uſeth in this place, For who is this, that engageth his heart to approach unto me, ſaith the Lord? The Jews had been long under the Babylonian yoke, and their Governours were either ſtrangers, or appointed by ſtrangers. But the Lord promiſed in this Verſe, that their Nobles ſhould be of themſelves, and that their Governour ſhould proceed from the midſt of them: Which was verified, when God turned their Captivity as Rivers in the South, and raiſed up Zerubbabel, and others of the Jewiſh line, to reaſſume the Government of Judah. But this Propheſie was chiefly intended and verified in a ſpiritual ſenſe, when God ſent Jeſus Chriſt, a Governour, proceeding from the midſt of them (of whom Zerubbabel was but a type) for of him the Lord ſpeaks chiefly in this admiring Queſtion, Who is this, that engageth his heart to approach unto me? Or who is this that with his heart (that is, with ſo much chearfulneſs and willingneſs) hath put himſelf as a ſurety for this people with me, to approach to me in their cauſe, and to take upon him the diſpatch of all their affairs and concernments with me in the Court of Heaven? Who is this great, this forward Engager, but he who alſo ſaid, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God? What will came he to do? Even this, To be a Surety, and ſo a Sacrifice to God for ſinners (Heb. 10.) Thus the whole buſineſs of our deliverance, and the firſt motions to it, lay quite without us. God appointed and put in Chriſt our ſurety with him, and Chriſt freely condeſcended to be our ſurety, knowing that the whole debt muſt lie upon his diſcharge: Put me in a ſurety with thee.

But here it may be doubted, how this notion of a Surety, ſuites with this place, ſeeing Job's controverſie was with man, not with God; and himſelf alſo had profeſſed that all was clear for him in Heaven.

I anſwer, That although men accuſed Job, yet their accuſation reach'd not his peace with God: for had he been ſuch a one as they repreſented him, he muſt needs have fallen under the divine diſpleaſure, more then he did under theirs. And therefore while he pleaded Not-guilty to their charge, he begs further diſcoveries of the favour of God to him through the Mediatour, by the remembrance of whoſe Suretiſhip his heart was confirmed in the pardon of all his ſinful failings againſt God, whereof he was guilty, as well as his heart told him that he was not guilty of thoſe wilful ſins wherewith he was accuſed by men. When we lie under wrongful accuſations, of which we indeed need no ſurety to acquit us, it is good to view and renew our Intereſt in the Surety, who will acquit us where there is need.

Job proceeds to re-inforce the reaſon why he deſired God to undertake, or to provide a Surety for him.

Verſ. 4. Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them.

Or, Thou haſt hid underſtanding from their heart. As if he had ſaid, Thou haſt caſt ſuch a miſt before the eyes of theſe men, who mock me, and judge me wicked, that they are unfit to be truſted with the determination of my cauſe; for did they not want a due light of underſtanding, they might quickly diſcern my integrity, and clear me from their own ſuſpitions. God ſometimes (as it were) wraps, or folds up the hearts of the Children of men in ignorance, blindneſs, and darkneſs, and ſo hides not only underſtanding from their hearts, but their hearts from underſtanding. As God is ſaid to circumciſe the heart, to open the eyes, to take away the vail, when he gives the knowledge of his truth; ſo he is ſaid to blind the eyes, to cover the heart with fat, and to cloud the underſtanding, when he denies, or withholds the knowledge of the truth: Thou haſt hid their hearts from underſtanding.

שכל Eſt mens, ratio, intellectus, dexteritas in agendo.

The word which we tranſlate Underſtanding, ſignifies any of, or all the intellectual powers, together with a readineſs, or activity for diſpatch in any ſervice we are called unto, Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore they do but bungle at the buſineſs, and cannot judge aright; they cannot diſcern the manner of thy diſpenſations towards me, nor ſee the bottom of my condition. Job did not cenſure his Friends as fools, or ignorant, as if they were witleſs, or worthleſs men; they were wiſe and learned, yea honeſt and godly too. But when Job ſaith, Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, we are to reſtrain it to the matter in hand, or to his particular caſe: As if he had ſaid, Thou haſt hid the underſtanding of what thou haſt done to me from their hearts; thy providences are myſteries and riddles which they cannot unfold; and as they know not the meaning of what thou doſt, ſo they know not my meaning, when I ſaid (*Chap.*9.17.) He hath multiplyed my wounds without cauſe; Nor when I ſaid (*Verſ.*22.) He deſtroyeth the perfect and the wicked. Theſe ſayings are ſecrets to my Friends: Now, Lord, for as much as theſe men have no true inſight in this preſent controverſie, therefore I beg that thou wouldeſt undertake for me, or put me in a ſurety with thee.

Further, For the clearing of this Scripture, it may be queſtioned: Firſt, how God is ſaid to hide the heart from underſtanding? God doth this four wayes.

Firſt, By ſpeaking darkly, or in ſuch a manner, as the underſtanding cannot eaſily find a paſſage to the things that are ſpoken. A Parable is a dark ſaying: And when Chriſt Preached in Parables, His Diſciples came and ſaid unto him, Why ſpeakeſt thou to them in Parables? (*Mat.*13.10.) Now among other reaſons which Chriſt was pleaſed to give of that diſpenſation, this was one (*Verſ.*14.) In them is fulfilled the Propheſie of Iſaiah, which ſaith, By hearing ye ſhall hear, and ſhall not underſtand: and ſeeing ye ſhall ſee, and ſhall not perceive. As if Chriſt had ſaid, Theſe men have juſtly deſerved to be puniſhed with ſpiritual darkneſs (which is not Underſtanding) and therefore I have ſpoken to them in a dark way. They did not hear to obey what was plain and eaſie to be underſtood, and therefore now they ſhall hear what they cannot underſtand.

Secondly, God hides the heart from underſtanding, by denying, or not giving light; and that a twofold light.

Firſt, The outward light of his Word: Thus all thoſe people are ſaid to ſit in darkneſs, that is, to have no underſtanding in the things of God, where the Goſpel is not publiſhed.

Secondly, By denying, or not giving the inward light of his Spirit, though the light of the World abound. For as a man may have the Sun ſhining in his face, and yet be in the dark, if he wants eye-ſight: So (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, 2 *Cor.*4. 3, 4.) the Goſpel is hid in the moſt glorious ſhining of it to thoſe, whoſe minds the God of this World hath blinded. Now, every man is born ſpiritually blind, or he is blind by nature, and he is blinded by the God of this World, till the God of all Worlds ſends his ſpirit with the Word for the opening of his eyes.

Thirdly, God hides the heart from underſtanding, as by not giving, ſo by withdrawing the light which he hath given. Many have forfeited their eye-ſight and their light, and God hath taken the forfeiture of them: Which he doth firſt, when men are proud of the light, and puſt up with knowledge. Secondly, when men are unthankful for the light, and will not acknowledge God the giver of it. Thirdly, when men grow wanton or vain in the light, when they abuſe it, and having the light walk in darkneſs. All which reaſons of Gods withdrawing light, as many Scriptures teſtifie, ſo they are all teſtified in that one Scripture (Rom. 1. 21, 22.)

Fourthly, As God may be ſaid to hide the heart from underſtanding, by a total withdrawing of light, ſo by withholding it for a time, or in part, by clouding or eclipſing it. God hides the heart of ſome men from underſtanding, only in ſuch a point, or at ſuch a ſeaſon, giving them light in other things, yea and in that thing too at another ſeaſon. This fourth way I conceive moſt proper to this Text of Job; for his freinds were not under that terrible judgment of a total hiding their hearts from underſtanding; only the light was with-held from them in and about that tranſaction. As when Chriſt after his Reſurrection appeared to thoſe Diſciples (Luke 24.26.) the Text ſaith, Their eyes were held, that they ſhould not know him. And (Verſ. 31.) There eyes were opened, and they knew him: Thus God at one time holds the intellectual eye of ſome good men, that they cannot diſcern ſuch or ſuch a Truth, yet afterwards he opens their eyes and they diſcern it.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The wiſeſt men do not ſee all truths, nor are they able to judge of all matters.

Theſe were wiſe men, very wiſe men; they ſpake excellent things, and very underſtandingly about God, they gave Job very good counſel, but yet they failed here. Elihu (Chap. 32.9.) ſaith, Great men are not always wiſe; we may ſay wiſe men are not always wiſe: and as no man is wiſe at all times, ſo there is no man wiſe in all things. We cannot conclude, that becauſe a man hath given a right judgement in ſome one, or in many points, that therefore we may truſt his deciſions in all points. As God hides all wiſdom from ſome men, ſo he very rarely, if at all, truſts any one man or ſort of men at one time with all wiſdom. Job's Friends were well acquainted with, and they have acquainted us with many excellent notions about that great Doctrine of Providence; but they were much miſtaken about the Providence of God with Job, nor did they ſhew themſelves acquainted with that excellent Deſign of God in his afflicting Providences, thereby to try the ſtrength and manifeſt the graces which he hath beſtowed upon his people.

Secondly, Obſerve, The hiding of the heart from, and the opening of the heart to underſtanding, are the work of God.

We ſee no further then God gives us light, and ſo far as he leads us, we go right; if he withdraw, we turn aſide, and quickly wander from the way of truth and righteouſneſs. We have nothing of our own but ſin and ignorance, wiſdom is of God; Every good and perfect gift comes from above. As God hides all Goſpel-truths and myſteries from worldly wiſe men; ſo no Goſpel-myſtery is known to any man till God diſcover and make it known (Matth. 11.25.) At that time Jeſus anſwered and ſaid, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, becauſe thou haſt hid theſe things from the wiſe and prudent, but haſt revealed them unto babes. By wiſe and prudent, he means worldly wiſe men, meer Philoſophers and Politicians, or Hypocritical Profeſſors, ſuch as the Scribes and Phariſees were, from theſe God (in judgement) hides the things of the Kingdom of Heaven, and reveals them unto Babes; even to ſuch as are at the greateſt diſtance in natural conſiderations from the capacity of ſuch rich and heavenly manifeſtations. There is no greater argument, that God opens the heart to underſtand, then to ſee Babes underſtand: If true knowledge in ſpiritual myſteries were from man, they who have moſt of man in them would have moſt of that knowledge; but we are taught by experience, that ſuch men as the World calls Fools, do not err in the way of holineſs (Iſa. 35.8.) And that the courſe of all Worldly wiſe men, is a continual erring from that way, and that ſome godly men, who are higher by head and ſhoulders then ſome of their Brethren in natural wiſdom, have run into, and maintained errours; whither can we aſcribe all this, but to the power of God? Moſes ſpeaks of the many ſigns and miracles which God wrought in the midſt of that people, which they did not underſtand: Why, what was the reaſon? Moſes tells us expreſly, what, Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to conceive, nor eyes to ſee, nor ears to hear to this day (*Deut.*29.4.) They had ſenſitive eyes and ears, yea, they had a rational heart or mind, but they wanted a ſpiritual eye to ſee, a ſpiritual ear to hear, a ſpiritual heart or mind to apprehend and improve thoſe wonderful works of God: And theſe they had not, becauſe God had not given them ſuch eyes, ears, and hearts. Wonders without grace, cannot open the eyes fully, but grace without wonders can. And as man hath not an eye to ſee the wonderful works of God ſpiritually, until it is given; ſo, much leſs hath he an eye to ſee the wonders of the Word of God, till it be given him from above; and therefore David prays (*Pſal.*119.18.) Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wonderous things out of thy Law. And if the wondrous things of the Law, are not much ſeen till God give an eye, then much leſs are the wondrous things of the Goſpel. The light of nature ſhews us ſomewhat of the Law, but nothing of the Goſpel was ever ſeen by the light of nature: Many who have ſeen and admired ſome excellencies in the Law, could never ſee and therefore have derided that which is the excellency of the Goſpel, till God hath opened their heart to underſtanding.

Thirdly obſerve, It is a great judgement to have our hearts hidden from underſtanding in the things of God.

It is a ſore judgement not to have the light, but it is a ſorer judgement not to ſee by the light when we have it. To have a heart hid from underſtanding, is far worſe then to have a heart unable to underſtand. Our inability to underſtand, ariſeth two wayes.

Firſt, From a natural infirmity in the underſtanding.

Secondly, From the natural obſcurity of the matter preſented to the underſtanding.

Plain truths are not apprehended by a weak underſtanding, and the ſtrongeſt underſtanding cannot apprehend ſome obſcure truths, as the Apoſtle Peter ſaith of S. Paul's Epiſtles, that in them there are ſome things hard to be underſtood (2 *Pet.*3.16.) Now as there is an affliction in it, not to be able to underſtand any truth which God hath revealed for our uſe, ſo there is much wrath and judgment in it, when God hides underſtanding from the heart in any of thoſe things which he hath revealed for our uſe; but eſpecially in thoſe things which are neceſſary, either to our future, or our preſent peace. Thus the Prophet Iſaiah was ſent to preach that people blind, and deaf, and ignorant (Chap. 6.9, 10.) Go tell this people, Hear ye indeed, but underſtand not, and ſee ye indeed, but perceive not: Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears heavy, and ſhut their eyes, leſt they ſee with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and underſtand with their hearts, and convert and be healed: As if the Lord had ſaid, This people ſhall want neither means nor Miniſters, neither word nor light; but they ſhall reap no benefit neither by means nor Miniſters, neither by word nor light; yea, all theſe means ſhall produce contrary effects, they ſhall be hardned and not ſoftned, blinded and not enlightned, their ears ſhall be deafned, not bored by the Word. They would not hear, therefore they ſhall not; they would not underſtand, therefore they ſhall not be able to underſtand. They who refuſe the offers of mercy, ſhall be deſtroyed with the offers of mercy. And as God doth often take away the Goſpel in wrath, ſo he ſometimes ſends it in wrath. It is a great miſery to have the Goſpel hid from a people for want of revelation, but it is loweſt miſery to have it hid in the revelation. Jeruſalem ſignifies, The viſion or ſight of peace; and this was the glory of Jeruſalem; yet at laſt this glory was taken from Jeruſalem, though her name continued; Jeruſalem (the ſight of peace) could not ſee her peace (*Luk.*19.41,42,43.) When Chriſt came near to Jeruſalem, He beheld the City, and wept over it, ſaying, If thou hadſt known, even thou, at leaſt in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace: What then? Chriſt ſuppreſſes the happineſs which they ſhould have enjoyed by ſuch a ſight, with a ſilent admiration; and only tells them weeping, But now they are hid from thine eyes; How hid? Was there no more Preaching in Jeruſalem, no publick Miniſtry after that day? Yes, the whole Colledg of Apoſtles preached there, and they preached the things which belonged both to their temporal, and to their eternal peace; yet as the things which belonged to their eternal peace, were hidden from moſt of their eyes, ſo the things which concerned their temporal peace, were hidden from ſo many of their eyes, that their ruine was unavoidable. God hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore he did not exalt them; yea, therefore he caſt them down.

Thus Job deſcribes the ſequel of that ſad diſpenſation to his Friends, Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding: What follows?

Therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them.] Mr. Broughton renders it; Therefore thou ſhalt not give them Honour: And is this all, that they ſhall not be exalted or honoured? No, the Negative hath this Affirmative in it, Thou wilt therefore caſt them down, or humble them: As (*Prov.*17.21.) Solomon ſpeaks of the Father of a Fool, He that begets a Fool, doth it to his ſorrow, and the Father of a Fool hath no joy: Is that all, that he hath no joy? No, the meaning is that the Father of a Fool, hath much ſorrow; yea, the denial of all joy, affirms more then the feeling of much ſorrow, for it ſpeaks all ſorrow. So, to accept perſons in judgement is not good; that is extream ill: There is nothing worſe then that, which in this ſenſe is not good. Thus here, thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them: that is, Thou ſhalt humble and abaſe them; and though Non-exaltation, in this place, doth not carry all kind, or the extremity of abaſement, yet it carries a very great abaſement: Why? What was this abaſement, or Non-exaltation?

We may interpret it two ways. Thou ſhalt not exalt them, that is,

Firſt, Thou ſhalt not give them this honour to determine my cauſe; thou wilt take the matter out of their hands into thine own, or thou wilt put it into ſome other hand.

Secondly, Thou ſhalt not exalt them to the honour of a conqueſt over me, or to carry the cauſe againſt me; yea, they ſhall be overthrown, and the cauſe ſhall go againſt them: Both theſe ways anſwer the event. Job's three Friends had neither the honour to end this controverſie, nor did they at all prevail in the end; they went not away with victory, nor could they glory, that they had got the day of Job: Thou ſhalt not exalt them.

Hinc colligo te nolle ut de reportata ſuper me victoria glorientur. Bold.

Note hence, Firſt, Exaltation is from God.

Promotion comes neither from the Eaſt, nor from the Weſt, nor from the South; that is, it comes not by the power of any creature, in any coaſt or quarter of the earth. Whence comes it then? The next Verſe directs us, For God is the Judge, he putteth down one, and ſetteth up another (Pſal. 75.6,7.) We can no more make our ſelves great men, then, we can make our ſelves men: Our civil frame is as much from God as our natural; by what hand ſoever we are exalted, it is God that exalts us.

Secondly, Obſerve, God hides underſtanding from them, whom he is about to abaſe, or caſt down.

The fall of moſt men is from their own folly, and uſually God takes away their wiſdom, whoſe honour he takes away. They ſhall not ſee the way to their own preſervation, who are intended for deſtruction. All Ages have taught us this Doctrine in the downfal of the greateſt Princes; who have refuſed all counſels and overtures for their own good, till their evils have psoved paſt cure, and themſelves irrecoverably loſt. That which a Child might foreſee, they have had no eyes to ſee, nor hearts to conſider: becauſe God would either not exalt them, or not eſtabliſh them in their exaltations, therefore he hid their hearts from underſtanding the things of their own peace. Fools are not fit to be exalted to high places, and when once we ſee thoſe who are in high places, acting the fooliſh man, we ſhall ſoon ſee them tumbling down from their high places, and acting the miſerable man. Some who were never very wiſe, have been exalted to, and continued in high places; but there was ſcarce ever any man, who (in this ſenſe) loſt his wits, that hath either been exalted to a high place, or continued in his exaltation.

Quos perdere vult Jupiter hos dementat.

Thirdly, Conſidering thoſe particulars wherein the Non-exaltation here propheſied of, did conſiſt.

Obſerve, It is an honour to hear and judge the cauſe of another man.

God is the Judge of all the Earth, he will hear and determine the cauſes and caſes of all mankind. He that hath the hearing but of any one caſe, ſhares in this honour of God, and they who are ſet apart by office to do ſo, are called Gods (Pſal. 82.) God puts ſo much of his own work into the hand of a Judge, that he therefore puts his own name upon him.

Again, We may look upon Job's Friends, not as Judges of his caſe, but as Parties, putting in their accuſation, and pleading againſt him.

Hence obſerve, It is an honour, and an exaltation to win the day in any cauſe, or to get the better.

Whatſoever the contention be, or in what way ſoever managed, whether by the Sword, or by the Tongue, or by the Pen, to be victorious in it, is honourable; and he that loſes his cauſes, loſes much of his credit alſo. And though prevailing, or ſucceſs doth not at all juſtifie the matter (it is the matter which muſt juſtifie the ſucceſs) yet ſucceſs doth alwayes exalt the man. He that overcomes in a diſpute carries away the honour, though poſſibly he carry not away the truth.

Laſtly, From the connexion of this with the former part of the Verſe, Obſerve, They who maintain errour among men, ſhall not find favour with God.

A heart hid from underſtanding is hid from the truth; God loves his truth ſo well, that he will not exalt thoſe who depreſs his truth. Job's Friends being left in the dark (as to that point in queſtion) did not ſpeak of God the thing that was right (Chap. 42.7.) And therefore the Lord ſaid to Eliphaz, My wrath is kindled againſt thee, and againſt thy two Friends. Though an errour be held unknown and in zeal for God (as they did) yet the jealouſie of God waxeth hot againſt ſuch: Theſe repenting were, and ſuch as they, repenting, may be pardoned, but they ſhall nor be exalted. And if they who for want of light of knowledge, and in much heat of honeſt zeal, defend a leſſer errour (ſuch was theirs) ſhall not be exalted, how will the Lord caſt them down who broach, and ſpread blaſphemous errours, and damnable Doctrines, in a time of clear light, and againſt frequent admonitions, if not convictions? Whoſoever (ſaith Chriſt, Mat. 5. 19.) ſhall break one of theſe leaſt Commandments, and teach men ſo (joyning the errour of his practice with, or turning it into the errour of his opinion) he ſhall be called leaſt (that is, nothing at all, or No-body) in the Kingdom of Heaven: And he who is nothing in the Kingdom of Heaven, is not exalted, how high ſoever he may get in the Kingdoms of the earth. And if the teacher of errour againſt the leaſt Commandment of the Law ſhall have no place in Heaven, where will their place be who teach errours againſt the greateſt Commandments of the Law, yea againſt the moſt precious and abſolute neceſſary principles and foundations of the Goſpel?

Verſ. 5. He that ſpeaks flattery to his friends; even the eyes of his Children ſhall fail.

There is ſome variety in expounding theſe words; becauſe of the ſeveral notions into which the Original is rendred: As we read the Text, it is a plain affirmation of judgment upon the poſterity of Flatterers.

The word which we tranſlate Flattery ſignifies in the Verb to divide into parts, and hence in the Noun, a lot or portion, becauſe every lot or portion is divided from the whole; it ſignifies alſo a prey or booty, which men take in War, or which Thieves and Robbers take from Travellers upon the high way, and that upon the former reaſon, becauſe when a prey is taken, they divide, or caſt it into ſeveral portions, or parts: Hence alſo (ſay ſome) it ſignifies to flatter; becauſe the tongue of a flatterer is divided from his heart.

Further, It ſignifieth to ſmooth and poliſh, or (as we ſay) to make a thing very glib and neat. This comes neareſt our tranſlation; for a flatterer hath a ſmooth, poliſhed tongue, and his trade is to ſmooth, or ſooth both things and perſons. The flatterers tongue is like the Harlots tongue, to whom this word is applied (Prov. 7.21.) With much fair ſpeech, ſhe cauſed him to yield, with the flattering of her lips (with the ſmoothneſs, or as ſome tranſlate, with the lenity of her lips) ſhe forced him: Flattery ſeems to be far from force, yet nothing puts, or holds men under a greater force then flattery.

He that ſpeaks flattery to his friend.] Flattery is a ſpecial language, though it be ſpoken in all languages. Men learn to ſpeak flattery, even as we learn to ſpeak Latine, French, Italian, Spaniſh, or any other Language: Flattery is an Art, it hath rules of its own, and terms of its own; he that ſpeaks flattery: Mr. Broughton in this place calls it, Vain-goodly-ſpeech: And the Apoſtle Paul calls it, Good words, and fair ſpeeches (Rom. 16.18.) The expreſſions which the Apoſtle uſeth, are moſt proper to the deſcription of flattery; they are both Compounds, as the ſpirit of the Flatterer alſo is: He hates ſimplicity, or ſingleneſs of heart, making a ſhew of much goodneſs in word, but is void of deed and ſubſtance: He promiſeth fair, and when he ſpeaks, you would think he minded nothing, or were ſolicitous about nothing but the Honour and advantage of him to whom he ſpeaks, when indeed he minds nothing but himſelf, and ſelf-concernments, as the Apoſtle in that place deciphers him; He ſerves not our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but his own belly, and by his good words and fair ſpeeches, he deceives the hearts of the ſimple. The Greeks have another characteriſtical word for this διὰ τῆς χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας.

Hæc eſt blãdities quæ à Græcis vocatur ἀρεσκεία, & Ariſtoteles vulgò ἀρεσκοὺς, appellari docet eos, qui comiter cum omnibus cõverſantur, ſed veram amicitiam cũ nemine colunt. Ariſt. l. 8. ad Nico. Pertinax Imperator dictus χρηστολόγος quod blãdus eſſet magis quã benignus. Bez. in loc. ex Aurelio. Vict.

this ſort of men, by which they mean all ſuch as ſeem to carry it fair with all men, but maintain true friendſhip with no man; we may call them Men-pleaſers, but Self-ſeekers. As alſo one of the old Emperours had his Sur-name from that word uſed by the Apoſtle in the place laſt mentioned; becauſe he was obſerved very ready to give all men good words, but had no regard to do good, yea, he did very much evil; or as another gives the reaſon, becauſe he was a Fawning Prince, rather then a kind one. Job ſeems to charge his Friends, that they were men of ſuch a temperament, and had rather fawn'd upon him then been real friends to him.

But here it may be queſtioned, Why doth Job ſpeak his Friends ſpeakers of flattery? He had little reaſon to complain he was flattered; and we find him often complaining that he was roughly dealt with: Job heard few poliſhed, or buttered words, but bitter words great ſtore, why then doth he ſay, He that ſpeaks flattery to his friend?

We may underſtand it two wayes.

In reference to { Job. / God. }

Is eſt χρηστολόγος qui verbis multũ pollicetur re nihil præſtat. Bez. Blandiebantur dum externa bona illi pollicebantur. Merc.

Firſt, His Friends had ſpoken flattery to him; for though in ſome things they were very ſevere and harſh, yet in other things he might interpret their ſayings to be but ſoothings; they made him large promiſes of a reſtauration, that his eſtate ſhould be like the morning, that he ſhould out-ſhine the very Sun, and be a great man again. Thus they ſpake (Chap. 5. 19, 20. Chap. 8. 5. Chap. 11. 15, 16, &c.) he looked on all theſe fair promiſes as flatteries, becauſe in his own thoughts he was a dead man, and his calamities paſt all hope of recovery in this World. As if he had ſaid, Why do you feed me with ſuch vain hopes, and propheſie to me of Wine, and of ſtrong drink, of earthly honour and riches, of length of dayes, and of a multitude of years yet behind in the race of this preſent life; I cannot but call this flattery, and a departure from the laws of friendſhip: For alas! My dayes are extinct, my breath is corrupt, and yet you are telling me of long life, and good dayes in this World. And indeed this is at once the cuſtom and the fault of many who viſit their Friends upon the borders of death; they think they are not friendly, unleſs they labour to give them hopes of life, and deliver their opinion peremptorily, We doubt not but you will do well enough, you will recover from this ſickneſs, and getting over this brunt, ſee many dayes. This is flattery: it is our duty to ſpeak comfortably to our dying Friends, to ſet forth the love of God, and his readineſs to pardon, to prepare them for a better life, and to make their paſſage out of this more eaſie: But when we ſee them at the Graves mouth; when death is ready to ſieze on them, then to tell them of long life, is rather the office of a Flatterer then of a Friend. We ſhew more love to our dying Friends, by offering our counſels, and tendering up our prayers for their fitneſs to depart out of this life, then by ſhewing our deſire, that they ſhould live, and our loathneſs to part with them.

Secondly, Job's Friends may be ſaid to ſpeak flattery to God; and then the words are an Argument from the greater to the leſs; as if he had ſaid, If he who ſpeakes flattery to his friend, a man like himſelf, ſhall be puniſhed, then much more ſhall he, who ſpeaks flattery to God. But, you will ſay, How can God be flattered? There are two wayes of flattering men.

First, By promiſing them more then we intend.

Secondly, By applauding them more then they deſerve.

When we cry up thoſe for wiſe men who are little guilty of wiſdom; or commend thoſe as good, who are very guilty of evil; both theſe are ſtrains of flattery: It is impoſſible to flatter God in this latter ſenſe, for we cannot ſpeak of God higher then he is; his glory, wiſdom, and goodneſs, are above, not only our words, but our thoughts. But we may flatter God in the firſt ſenſe, by promiſing him more then we intend; they on their ſick beds do but flatter God, who tell him how good and holy they will be, when their hearts are not right with him: Yet neither is this flattery of God which Job may be ſuppoſed to ſuggeſt againſt his friends. The flattery here ſuggeſted, is their juſtifying the proceedings of God in afflicting Job, by condemning Job; as if there had been no way left to clear up the righteouſneſs of God, but by concluding that Job was unrighteous: This manner of arguing, Job calls, Speaking wickedly for God, and talking deceitfully for him: This he alſo calls, The accepting of his perſon (Chap. 13. 7, 8.) As if they had been the Patrons and Promoters of Gods cauſe and honour, while they thus pleaded againſt Job, and laid his honour and innocency in the duſt. That there is a ſinful flattery of God in ſuch a procedure againſt man, was ſhewed more largly in the place laſt mentioned, to which I refer the Reader for his further ſatisfaction.

He that ſpeaks flattery to his friend, What of him? The next words tell us what.

The eyes of his Children ſhall fail.] But ſhall he himſelf eſcape? Shall not he ſmart for it? Saith not the Scripture, Whatſoever a man ſowes, that ſhall he reap: the ſower ſhall be the reaper.

This is not ſpoken to free the Flatterer from puniſhment, but to ſhew that more then he ſhall be puniſhed for his flattery; as he himſelf ſhall not eſcape, ſo he may bring others alſo into danger with him: As ſin ſpreads it ſelf in the pollution of it, ſo in the puniſhments of it. When but one ſins, many may be defiled, and when but one acts a ſin, many may be endangered; a man knows not upon how many he may bring evil, when he doth ill himſelf.

The eyes of his Children ſhall fail. What is meant by the failing of the eyes, was ſhewed (Chap. 11. 20.) where Zophar ſaith, The eyes of the wicked ſhall fail, and their hope ſhall be as the giving up of the ghoſt. In general 'tis this, They ſhall be diſappointed of their hopes, or they ſhall expect ſo long and nothing come, that their eyes ſhall fail with expectation, The eyes of his Children ſhall fail.

Morũ atque vitæ imitatores. Aquin.

Some by Children, underſtand, not his natural Children, or the Children of his body, but his Children in a figure, ſuch as imitate and follow him, who take his courſe, and tread in his paths; for as they are called the Children of the Devil, who are like him, and do his works; and as we are called the Children of God, not only in reference to our new birth and ſpiritual generation, but alſo in reference to our new obedience and holy actions (Mat. 5. 44, 45.) So they may be called a mans Children, who reſemble him in his manners, as well as they who iſſued from his loins.

Hence Note, Firſt, The puniſhment of ſin doth not alway reſt or determine in him that committed the ſin.

The bitter fruits of ſin are often tranſmitted, and handed over to thoſe who had no preſent hand in them when they were committed. The whole Family and Poſterity of ſinners may ſmart many a day after, and inherit the ſins of their Progenitors, as well as their Lands; when the Father purchaſeth, or provides an Inheritance for his Child by flattery, or any other indirect way, the eyes of his children may fail for it. I have met with this point before (Chap. 15. 33, 34.) and elſwhere, therefore I only touch and paſs from it.

Secondly, Conſider the particular ſin againſt which this judgement is pronounced: It is the ſpeaking of flattery.

Hence Obſerve, The ſin of flattery is a very provoking ſin.

That ſin which ſhall be puniſhed in poſterity, is no ordinary ſin: Thoſe good actions which the Lord promiſeth to reward in poſterity, or in after-times, have a ſpecial excellency in them: It ſhewed that the deed of Jehu, in deſtroying Ahabs Houſe, and rooting out his Idolatry (though Jehu himſelf was a very bad man, and did it with a bad heart, yet I ſay, it ſhewed that the deed) was very good, becauſe the Lord promiſed to reward his Children for it, with the poſſeſſion of the Throne of Iſrael to the fourth generation (2 King. 10. 30.) Now as thoſe acts have a great deal of excellency in them, for which God rewards and bleſſeth to poſterity; ſo thoſe ſins have a ſpecial malignity in them, which are threatened and purſued with revenges to Poſterity: Such ſins have a touch of the firſt ſin in them. The puniſhment of Adams firſt ſin is hereditary to the laſt man; all have ſmarted for that ſin, and the eyes of his Children have failed, becauſe he looked upon, and eat the forbidden fruit. Now every ſin which is thus ſpoken of in Scripture, as Idolatry in the ſecond Commandment, and here flattery, hath a ſpecial ſtamp of the firſt ſin upon it; not only as being a ſin, and ſo a derivative from it, but as having much of the ſinfulneſs of that ſin in it: The evils of which did not dye with thoſe who gave it life.

And as all flattery is very ſinful, ſo ſpiritual flattery, or flattery about ſpiritual things, is moſt ſinful; both becauſe about them we ought to be moſt plain-hearted, and becauſe a deceit about them doth moſt hurt Any kind of flattery is bad enough, but this is worſt; ſuch was that of the falſe Prophets, Who daubed with untempered morter, and cryed, Peace, peace, when there was no peace: Who ſet themſelves to pleaſe, not to inſtruct the people, and were therefore buſie in ſewing pillows under every elbow. A flatterer would make all men lean ſoft, ſit eaſie, and be well perſwaded of themſelves, though their caſe be ſtark naught: He that thus ſpeaks flattery to his friend, doth indeed ſpeak miſery, yea, and death to his friend. The flatterer is the greateſt hater; and no man ſpeaks worſe of another then he who ſpeaks better of him then he deſerves, or then his ſtate will bear. It is dangerous to ſpeak all the good of a man that is true; but to ſpeak good of him which is not true, may be his utter undoing.

And though it hath been ſaid, and often experienced, that flattery gains friends, and truth-ſpeaking hatred; yet none have run into ſo much hatred as flatterers. For as it is ſaid of Treaſon, That many love the Treaſon, but all hate the Traytor; ſo many love to hear themſelves flattered, but all hate Flatterers. And though true reproofs are bitter Pills, and very diſtaſtful to moſt in the taking down, yet wiſe Solomon hath aſſured us, That, He that rebuketh a man, afterwards ſhall find more favour (even with that man) then he that flattereth with his lips (Prov. 28. 23.) There are many who, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks (Pſal. 36. 2.) Flatter themſelves, they are their own Paraſites. But as they who flatter others do moſt commonly fall under their diſpleaſure; ſo all they (ſooner or later) ſhall fall under their own diſpleaſure (and that's worſe then the diſpleaſure of any, yea, then of all men) who have flattered themſelves. It is our wiſdom and our peace, to be plain with our ſelves and with all men, how much preſent diſquiet ſoever we get by it. Paul ſpeaks it out to the Theſſalonians (Epiſt. 2. 3, 4, 5.) Our exhortation was not of deceit, neither at any time uſed we flattering words. But as we were allowed of God to be put in truſt with the Goſpel, even ſo we ſpeak; not as pleaſing men, but God.

Further, theſe words may be expounded, not as a threat againſt his Friends for their flattering of him, but as a threat againſt himſelf, in caſe he ſhould have flattered them. And ſo they carry alſo the weight of a reaſon, why he uſed ſo much freedom in reproving them, and ſhewing them the danger that hung over their heads: As if he had ſaid, You, my Friends, may perhaps wonder at my boldneſs and plainneſs of ſpeech, while I tell you that God hath hid your hearts from underſtanding, and that he will not exalt you: But you muſt pardon me, I had rather incur your frowns by my downright dealing with you, then Gods by flattering you; I had rather make your ears tingle by reproving you, then make the eyes of my Children ake by my applauding you; for this I have learned as a certain truth, that he who ſpeaks flattery to his friend, the eyes of his children ſhall fail.

Hence Obſerve, That even a godly man doth, and ought to ſtrengthen himſelf in doing his duty, by the remembrance of thoſe evils which are threatned againſt the neglect of it.

A Believer makes uſe of the threatnings, as well as of the promiſes, to keep his heart cloſe in obedience. That is the beſt obedience which ſprings from the fear of the Lord and his goodneſs; but that may be a good and pure act of obedience which ſprings from the fear of the Lord, and his wrath. Chriſt exhorts and forewarns his friends to fear him, who after he hath killed, hath power to caſt into Hell (Luke 12. 5.) 'Tis nobleſt and moſt ſpiritual, to obey God for himſelf, without reſpect either to Heaven or Hell; yet we may have reſpect both to Heaven and Hell, to reward and puniſhment in our obedience. Joſeph reſiſted temptation by the higheſt Argument, when he ſaid, How can I do this great evil, and ſin againſt God? (Gen. 39. 9.) He reſiſts temptation by a good Argument, who ſaith, How can I ſin againſt God, which will do ſo much evil to my ſelf, or draw many evils upon mine? And thus Job argued according to this interpretation, when he ſaid, He that ſpeaks flattery to his friend, the eyes of his Children ſhall fail: Or, as Mr. Broughton renders, The eyes of the given that way (that is to flattery) ſhall be conſumed.

There is another reading of the latter clauſe, and ſo of the whole Verſe, The eyes of thoſe that conſider, obſerve, or attend him, ſhall fail; and ſo they derive the word (Bamin) not from (Ben) a Son, or a Child, but from (Bin) which ſignifies to underſtand or conſider, The eyes of thoſe that conſider him ſhall fail: Then the meaning is, my friends are ſo exact, and acute in flattery, in compoſing and uttering fauning ſpeeches, that they who hear them are wrapt into an extaſie, and their very eyes do fail with their intentneſs in beholding them. They are ſuch powerful Orators, that they can draw the minds and eyes of their Auditors whither they pleaſe, and cauſe their eyes to ake with looking ſo wiſtly on them, having (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks in a like caſe) their perſons in admiration.

Vox Banim non filios ſed intelligentes vel conſiderantes ſignificat à Verbo בונ quod eſt intelligere, hinc ſic conficitur textus. Et oculi conſiderantium eum deficient. Bold.

Job having thus complained againſt, and taxed his Friends of flattery, goes on to aggravate the ſadneſs of his condition, and upon the whole, to move the Lord to haſten an end of his miſeries, or to haſten his end, either to determine them, or to determine him.

VERS. 6, 7.

He hath made me alſo a by-word of the people, and afore-time I was as a Tabret.

Mine eye alſo is dim by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

In theſe two Verſes Job repeats and aggravates his affliction; and he doth it (as he had done before) by ſhewing the effects of his affliction. We judge of cauſes by the effects; that which produceth a great effect, muſt needs have a greatneſs of caſuality in it. Two effects of his affliction are laid down in this context.

The firſt tells us what his affliction wrought in others.

The ſecond, what it wrought upon himſelf.

What his affliction wrought in others, is ſet forth (Verſ. 6.) He was become the talk of all, poſſibly, the ſport of not a few.

The Argument ſtands thus,

That it is a very great affliction, which every man ſpeaks of, or which makes a man a by-word.

But ſuch is my affliction, every one talks of it, and I am made a by-word of the people.

Therefore my affliction is very great.

What his affliction wrought upon himſelf, is expreſſed in the ſeventh Verſe: Dimneſs in his eye, and weakneſs in his whole body, Mine eye alſo is dim, by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

The Argument may be formed thus,

That is a great affliction, the ſorrows whereof dim the eyes, and macerate all the members of the body.

But ſuch is the ſorrow of my affliction, that my very eyes are dim, and all my members are macerated.

Therefore mine is a great affliction.

As if he had ſaid, Should I hold my peace and ſit down in ſilence, yet my dim eyes and dryed bones, my withered skin and crippled limbs, are as ſo many tongues, yea, trumpets, to ſpeak and ſpeak aloud the ſorrows of my heart, and the ſufferings of my outward man. This ſeems to be Job's ſcope in the words now under hand.

Verſe 6. He hath made me a by-word of the people.

He] Who is that? The Antecedent is inquired for: Our late Annotations fix it upon Eliphaz, who ſpake laſt, and at whom he pointed in the Verſe before, He hath talked ſo of me, that now I am a common talk: He hath ſpoken ſuch words by me, that now I am made a by-word. We had need take heed of what we ſay of any Brother, for if one man give out the word, enough will follow to make him a by-word.

Others reſolve it upon God himſelf, He, that is, God hath made me a by-word. Job at firſt acknowledged God the Author of his troubles, and ſo he hath done all along, as hath been toucht in divers paſſages of this diſpute: As no man man lifts up his hand, ſo no man lifts up his tongue without God. As afflicting actions, ſo afflicting ſpeeches are at his diſpoſe: He hath made me

A by-word.] The Hebrew word in the Verb, ſignifies properly, to rule, to govern, to have dominion, or ſupreme power, as a Prince or Potentate: And by a Metaphor it ſignifies any thing that excelleth, or is eminent in any kind: Upon this account it is oft employed to ſignifie thoſe rules of truth and holineſs, to which every mans reaſon muſt yield obeyſance; ſuch are called in a way of excellency by Moraliſts, Proverbs; by Orators, Sentences; by Logicians, Maxims, or Principles, which are not to be proved, but ſuppoſed: No man muſt deny them, or if any man do, he is not to be diſputed with; ſuch rules are Rulers; and they are thus expreſſed upon a twofold reaſon,

Firſt, Becauſe of the difficulty and myſteriouſneſs of their meaning; they are of few words, but of ſo large and multiplying a ſence, that they do as much maſter, as enlighten the underſtanding.

Secondly, They are ſo expreſſed becauſe of the extent or univerſality of their uſefulneſs, they being ſuch as bear ſway in, and have an influence upon all tranſactions. That one ſentence, or rule of Equity, What you would have others do to you, do ſo to them, runs through the whole courſe of mans life, and reacheth us in all acts of Juſtice, whether diſtributive, or commutative. And as thoſe proverbial ſentences, which direct juſtice and good manners, are of great command and authority among men; ſo likewiſe are thoſe which had their riſe from the reproof of any mans injuſtice, or evil manners. If once a man be made a by-word (whether the grounds of it be true or falſe, makes no matter as to this point) it will ſtick by him, and overcome his credit; let him do what he can, he ſhall hardly claw it off again as long as he lives. Thou haſt made me a by-word.

In parabolizare populorum.Nam eſt infinitum, q. d. *ut ſim illis proverbio & vulgi fabula, vel ut de me proverbium faciant.*Merc.

Further, to clear the Text, we may conſider that the word By-word in the Hebrew is of the Infinitive Mood, and ſo ſome render it, Thou haſt made me for the parabolizing of the people; or that the people make Parables and Proverbs of me; which we render fully to the ſence, Thou haſt made me (a Parable, a Proverb, or) a by-word among the people. Two things are uſually implyed when a man is ſaid to be a by-word.

Firſt, That he is in a very low condition. Some men are ſo high, that the tongues of the common people dare not climb over them; but where the Hedge is low, every man goes over.

Secondly, That he is in a deſpiſed condition: To be a by-word carries a reflexion of diſgrace. He that is much ſpoken of, in this ſence, is ill ſpoken of; and he is quite loſt in the opinion of men, who is thus found in their diſcourſe. It is poſſible (though rare) for a man to be in a low, or bad condition, and yet to be well ſpoken of, yea, to be highly honoured; ſome are had in precious eſteem, while they lye upon the dunghil: But uſually a man greatly afflicted is little valued, and he whoſe ſtate is laid low in the World, his perſon is alſo low in the opinion of the World. Job was at that time a By-word in both theſe Notions; he was low in ſtate, and he was lower in eſteem.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Great ſufferers in the things of this World, are the common ſubject of diſcourſe, and often the ſubject of diſgrace.

Fieri ſolet ut inſignes virorum illuſtrium calamitates in proverbium abeant deque iis fiant cantiones. Merl.

Such evils as few men have felt or ſeen, all men will be ſpeaking of. Great ſorrows, eſpecially if they be the ſorrows of great men, are turned into Songs, and Poetry playes its part with the ſaddeſt diſaſters. When Sihon King of the Amorites had taken many ſtrong Cities from the King of Moab, the miſery which fell upon the Moabites by that War was put into Verſe, and paſſed into a Proverb (*Numb.*21.27,28,29,30.) Wherefore they that ſpeak in Proverbs ſay, Come into Heſhbon, let the City of Sihon be built and prepared: For there is a fire gone out of Heſhbon, a flame from the City of Sihon, &c. That is, A fierce hot War is made, which hath conſumed Ar of Moab, and the Lords of the high places of Arnon. Holy David met with this meaſure from men in the day of his ſorrows (Pſal. 69. 10, 11.) When I wept and chaſtened my ſoul with faſting, that was to my reproach, I made ſack-cloath my Garment, I became a Proverb (or a By-word, 'tis Job's language) to them: In the next Verſe he tells us who did this, by way of diſtribution, They that ſit in the Gate (that is, Great ones) ſpeak againſt me, and I was the ſong of the Drunkard: That is, Of the common ſort. When thoſe falſe Prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah (who to put the Jews into a hope of a ſpeedy return from their captivity in Babylon, propheſied the ſpeedy ruine of Babylon it ſelf, when, I ſay, thoſe falſe Prophets) ſhould be cruelly put to death by the command of the King of Babylon, according to the the Prediction of the Prophet Jeremiah, then the ſame Prophet foretels alſo, that this judgment of God upon them for their lyes, ſhould be made a By-word, and their names a curſe (Jer. 29. 21, 22.) And of them ſhall be taken up a curſe, by all the Captivity of Judah, which are in Babylon, ſaying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab, whom the King of Babylon roſted in the fire. That ſignal Victory of Gideon over the Midianites became a Proverb in Iſrael (Iſa. 9. 4.) As in the day of Midian. And the Lord promiſes his people, that the fall of the King of Babylon ſhall be ſo notorious, that they ſhall take up this Proverb, and ſay, How hath the oppreſſor ceaſed? The golden City ceaſed? (Iſa. 14. 4.) The Prophet Habakkuk aſſured them that this ſhould be, while he ſaid (Chap. 2. 6.) Shall not all theſe (certainly they ſhall) take up a Parable againſt him, and ſay, Woe to him that encreaſeth that which is not his? How long? And to him that ladeth himſelf with thick clay.

Plagæ Zedekiæ tangant te, ſit frater & ſervus Zedekiæ. Vatabl.

Secondly, Obſerve, It is a great burden to be made a diſgraceful by-word.

Thus God threatened his own people, and numbred it among the ſoreſt puniſhments of their diſobedience (Deut. 28. 37.) The Lord ſhall bring thee and thy King whom thou haſt ſet over thee, to a Nation whom thou nor thy Fathers have known, and there thou ſhalt ſerve other Gods, wood and ſtone, and thou ſhalt become an aſtoniſhment, and a Proverb, and a by-word, among all the Nations whither the Lord ſhall lead thee. This threat was renewed (1 Kings 9. 7.) And the Pſalmiſt bewails it, that God had brought his people into ſuch a condition, Thou haſt made us a by-word among the Heathen, a ſhaking of the head among the people: Thou haſt made us a reproach to our neighbours, a ſcorn and deriſion to them that are round about us (Pſal. 44. 13.) The Prophet Jeremiah ſpeaks terror from the Lord (Jer. 24. 9.) I will deliver them to be removed to all the Kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, to be a reproach, and a proverb, and a taunt, and a curſe in all the places whither I ſhall drive them: The Hypocrite, who putteth the ſtumbling block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to a Prophet to enquire of the Lord, hath his doom denounced in this tenor (Ezek. 14. 8.) I will ſet my face againſt that man, and make him a ſign and a proverb, and cut him off from amidſt my people. Again (Ezek. 16. 44.) They that ſpeak in proverbs ſhall ſay, Such as the Mother is, ſuch is the Daughter: The Hittites and the Iſraelites were both alike in ſin, and they ſhould not be unlike in puniſhment: Such ſhort ſentences are an advantage to memory, and ſerve in ſtead of larger Hiſtories of eminent providences, whether mercies or judgments.

Thirdly, Obſerve, God often turns that to the honour of his Servants, which men intended to their diſgrace.

Job was a by-word, in diſgrace; God made him a by-word too, but for his honour. Job is famous to a Proverb at this day; for as when we would ſet forth the greatneſs of any mans ſuffering, we ſay, He is as poor as Job; ſo when we would ſet forth the greatneſs of any mans patience, we ſay, He is as patient as Job, or, He is another Job: All the vertues and graces which the Saints have manifeſted under ſufferings, are proverbially expreſt under the ſufferings and patience of Job. Never did Ceſar, nor Alexander, nor any of the great Hero's of the World, obtain ſuch a name and glory, by victories over men, as Job did by patient ſuffering under the hand of God.

In proverbium abiit, Jobi patientia.

And as he is proverbially ſpoken of for his ſuffering, ſo likewiſe for his holineſs, God made his piety a Proverb too, though his Friends ſuſpected him for an Hypocrite. When the Lord would ſhew himſelf ſo unalterably reſolved, ved, that nothing ſhould take him off from bringing judgment upon a ſinful people, he ſaith, I will not do it, though Noah, Daniel, and Job ſtood before me (Ezek. 14. 14.) As if he had ſaid, I will not do it, though the moſt eminent men in holineſs, or the greateſt favourites that ever I had in the World ſue that they might be ſpared. If any in the World could obtain this of God, Noah, Daniel, and Job could: but they ſhould not, therefore none ſhall. See with what honourable names he is liſted, Noah and Daniel, men remembred, yea crowned with honour by God and all good men, are but company good enough for Job. Thou haſt made me a by-word.

And aforetime I was as a Tabret.

Aforetime.] The word may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, As ſignifying what was or hath been done in former times, in which ſence we tranſlate, Aforetime, or formerly, I was as a Tabret.

Secondly, As ſignifying what is or hath been done in the preſence of others, Before them I was as a Tabret: We put in the Margin, Before their face, or in their ſight: That is, They being witneſſes of it. I was as a [Tabret.]

The Vulgar Latine tranſlates the word which we render Tabret, an Example, I am a by-word, and an example before them; which is a good ſence; and then the word Tophet (of which more by and by) is uſed for Mophet, which ſignifies a wonder, or ſome ſtrange unuſual thing which appears, or is reported to the admiration of all beholders and hearers. I am a Proverb, and a ſtrange example: Strange examples grow often into a Proverb. So the Greek expreſſeth it; and we in Engliſh ſay to a man who hath offended greatly, You ſhall be made an example: That is, You ſhall be ſeverely puniſhed (Math. 1. 19.) Joſeph being very tender of the honour of Mary his eſpouſed Wife, perceiving that ſhe was with Child before they came together, he was loth to make her a Paradigm, or an example, of diſhoneſty and diſloyalty; he was unwilling to make her a publick example, and therefore was minded to put her away privily, till the Lord gave him warning in a dream about it: So ſaith Job here, according to this rendring, I am a by-word among the people, and as it were a Paradigm, a publick example. Great afflictions have theſe three things in them, in reference to others.

Firſt, they are a wonder to others.

Secondly, They are a terror to others.

Thirdly, They are an inſtruction unto others.

We find all theſe and more in one Verſe (Ezek. 5. 15.) So it ſhall be a reproach and a taunt, an inſtruction, and an aſtoniſhment unto the Nations round about thee, when I ſhall execute judgments in thee in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebuke: I the Lord have ſpoken it.

The Apoſtle Peter deſcribing the judgments of God, firſt upon Sodom and Gomorah, ſaith, That, God turning the Cities of Sodom and Gomorah into aſhes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an enſample to thoſe that after ſhould live ungodly (2 Pet. 2. 6.) The burning of thoſe five Cities by immediate fire from Heaven, made them examples, or inſtructions to all ſucceeding Generations; we may read the odiouſneſs of thoſe ſins, and the ſeverity of God againſt them, by the light of that fire to this very day. Great afflictions are teaching afflictions; Thoſe calamities which deſtroy ſome, ſhould inſtruct all: We are not only to admire and wonder at them, to be amazed and terrified at them, but to be taught and admoniſhed by them. So the Apoſtle concludes concerning the ſeveral judgments which God brought upon the Jews, while they murmured and diſobeyed him in the Wilderneſs: All theſe things happened to them for examples (or types) and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the World are come (1 Cor. 10. 11.) There are two ſorts of examples written in the Word.

Firſt, There are examples for our imitation.

Secondly, There are examples for our caution.

Some are examples by the good which they have done, theſe muſt be imitated; others are examples by the evils which they have ſuffered, by theſe we muſt be warned: This tranſlation of the Text intends Job an example of Caution.

Again, Aforetime I was as a Tabret: That is, Aforetime I was in good repute, or I was pleaſant company: As if he had ſaid, I am now derided, mocked at, and toſſed upon the tongues of men, yea, I am now voted an Hypocrite, though heretofore in my proſperity, report gave a very pleaſant ſound of me, though abſent, and my perſon was as welcome to them as a Tabret. To ſpeak of me whereſoever I came not was muſick, and I was muſick whereſoever I came; but now what am I? A by-word, muſick ſtill if you will, but in ſcorn, a ſong of diſgrace. That's the firſt ſence.

Hence take one Obſervation, before I proceed to further explication.

The affections and opinions of men are very variable.

I am now a By-word, before time I was as a Tabret. As the eſtates of men change, ſo uſually do our opinions of them. Job's heart was the ſame as before, he was as holy as ever he was, only he was not ſo wealthy as he was; his ſpirit was as full of Grace as before, only his Purſe was not ſo full of Gold as before; he had not ſo many thouſand Sheep, nor ſo many hundred Oxen, he had not ſuch a Family and Retinue, ſuch worldly riches and honour, and becauſe he endured ſuch a change in his condition, ſee what a change he ſuffered in mens affections, he that before was as a Tabret, all were glad of him, is now a by-word, the ſcorn of all.

Chriſt giveth teſtimony of John Baptiſt (John 5. 35.) He was a burning and a ſhining light; and what followes? And you rejoyced in him for a ſeaſon. Though John did burn and ſhine all the while which God continued him in the Candleſtick of the Church with equal heat and luſtre, yet they rejoyced in him but for a while, or for a ſeaſon. The Jewes changed their thoughts of John, and their eſteem of him was weakened, though John continued in the ſame ſtrength of parts and gifts: Then, how would they have changed if John had changed. The peoples hearts were flatted towards him, though his abilities were not; John had not that repute and honour after a few years which he had at the firſt. And the word in the Goſpel which we tranſlate to rejoyce, comes neer the word which we have in this Text, a Tabret; for it ſignifies to leap and dance; and the Tabret is a muſical Inſtrument, at the ſound of which men dance and leap; for a time they leaped about John; he was a burning and ſhining light, and they danced and ſkipped about him, as Children do about a blazing Fire in the Streets, but this was only for a ſeaſon: John himſelf found the World a changling, his followers kept no conſtant tenour towards him, how conſtant ſoever his tenour was. How great a change did Chriſt himſelf find; He is yeſterday, to day, and the ſame for ever; yet one day the Jewes cry Hoſanna, they will needs make him a King, he had much ado to keep himſelf from a Crown; the Air eccoes with Bleſſed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: yet preſently after, the cry was, Crucifie him, crucifie him, he is not worthy to live, he could not keep himſelf (by all his power as man) from a Croſs; a Murtherer is preferred before him, Not this man, but Barrabas. We read (Acts 14.) how ſuddenly the tide and ſtream of affections turned, and how opinions varied about Paul; when he and Barnabas had wrought a great cure, the people came and would needs adore them and offer Sacrifice, and ſaid, The Gods are come down in the likeneſs of men: They brought Oxen and Garlands, and would needs worſhip them, there was much ado to ſtave them off from Deifying, or making Gods of them; and yet before that Chapter is at an end, their acceptation of him was at an end; and Paul was ſtoned as unworthy the ſociety of men, by the ſame men, and in the ſame place where he was ſaluted as a God. It is no new thing in the World, to ſee thoſe a by-word of the people, who even now were their Tabret: To adore one while, and to deſpiſe another, to applaud to day, and to diſlike to morrow, now to ſmile, and anon to frown, is the conſtant inconſtancy of the creature.

Therefore, Live not upon the breath of men, upon popular air, or the ſpeech of people: Though to have credit with men be a bleſſing, yet let us live upon the credit which we have with God, and rejoyce only in his eſteem. Moſt men are full of change, and are apt to vary their aſpects every moment, their affections are as moveable as their outward condition is. Only God never alters his opinion of any man, he never rejects where he hath accepted, nor caſts off where he hath embraced; once a friend, and alwayes a friend; freind, once pleaſed with us and always pleaſed with us; yea God is pleaſed with his while he manifeſts a fatherly diſpleaſure againſt them; and they are as a Tabret to him while he makes them a By-word among the people. Job was a Tabret in the ears of God, when he was a By-word among the people.

Thirdly, Becauſe a Tabret or Drum is empty of all but Air, and giveth nothing but a ſound; ſome interpret thus, I am before them as an empty Veſſel, or as one who hath nothing in him but wind, and from whom nothing comes but a ſound of words; that is, They look upon me as a man of no real worth. Paul ſaith of himſelf, that though he ſpake with the tongues of men and Angels, that is, with the moſt excellent tongues. Angels have no tongues, nor have they any faces as men have, yet in Scripture, the face of an Angel is put for the moſt beautiful face, and the tongue of an Angel for the moſt eloquent tongue among all the children of men: Now ſaith Paul, though I had the tongue of Angels, or men, and were the beſt ſpeaker that ever was, yet (being void of true charity) I ſhould become as a ſounding braſs and a tinckling Cimbal (1 Cor. 13. 1.) Such a tinckling Cimbal was Job eſteemed, a Drum full of Air, or any empty Veſſel, as Jeruſalem was left by the King of Babylon (Jer. 51. 34.)

Fourthly, Some both of the Rabbins and latter Writers tell us, that Tophet is a Chaldee word, ſignifying Lord, or a Prince: And they refer us for a confirmation to (Dan. 3. 2.) Where we find the word put into the Summons which Nebuchadnezzar ſent to his Nobles and great Officers, for their attendance at the Dedication of the Image which he had ſet up: We render it, Sheriffs, whether our word hits that, is doubtful, but without doubt it ſignifies ſuch as were in high Authority, being there marſhall'd before the Rulers of the Provinces.

Exiſtimant eſſe vocem Chaldaicam quæ ſignificat Dominum vel principem q. d. qui princeps eram factus ſum in proverbium & fabulam. Rab. Lev. Vatabl.

Taking this interpretation of the word, Jobs meaning is, I am now a Proverb, or a man of no credit, though heretofore I was as a Prince, or a Ruler in their preſence. Some reject this becauſe the mixture of the Chaldee with the Hebrew, was long after Jobs time, which yet may eaſily be reconciled. And the ſenſe is good, being indeed the ſame in ſubſtance with the ſecond Expoſition.

Fifthly, This word Tophet which ſignifies a Drum, or (as we) a Tabret, which is a ſmaller Drum (for there is the Martial Drum, or the Drum of War, and the Tabret, which is a Mirth Drum, a Drum uſed at ſports, and dancing; this word I ſay) gives denomination to a place very famous or infamous rather in the Scripture of the Old Teſtament: A part of good Joſiah his reformation is thus deſcribed (2 Kings 23. 10.) And he defiled (in the opinion of Idol-Worſhippers, though indeed the pureſt worſhip uſed there, was more filthy then any filth which Joſiah threw into it: He, ſaith the Text, defiled) Tophet, which is in the Valley of the Children of Hinnon, that no man might make his Sons and Daughters paſs through the fire to Moloch. The Prophet Jeremiah complained of, and threatned that place (Chap. 7. 31, 32.) They have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the Valley of the Son of Hinnon, to burn their Sons and Daughters in the fire, &c.

Now, the reaſon why that place was called Tophet, from the word in the Text, aroſe thus, becauſe when the Jews in thoſe abominable Idolatries offered their own Children, the fruit of their bodies, in Sacrifice to Moloch, the reputed God of the Moabites and Ammonites, who was ſo called from Malac, ſignifying to Rule or Reign (for as all Idols would rule as Kings, ſo this was a chief, a King Idol; hence ſome conceive Moloch to be the ſame with Baal, which is alſo a name of Supremacy, ſignifying Lord, or Maſter) This Moloch was an hollow Image of Braſs, into which they put much Fire, having the face of a Bullock, and hands ſpread abroad like a Man; He had ſeven Chappels, and whoſoever offered his Son to him entred into the ſeventh; which when any did, they uſed to beat upon Drums and Tabrets, that the ſhreeks and cries of the poor Child might not be heard by the Father: Hence the place was called Tophet from Toph, a Drum, which comes from a radical word ſignifying to beat, or ſtrike with the hand, becauſe Drums are artificially beaten, and we ordinarily ſay, Beat the Drum, or, At the beat of Drum.

Barathrum quod ſupplicii locus erat apud Athenienſes, pro inferno uſurpatur. Becm. de Orig. Ling. Lat.

A nomine Gehinnon, i. e. Vallis Hinnon. infernus dictus eſt Gehenna. Hieron. in 10. Cap. Math. גיא Vallis & נהם rugiit, gemuit.

And hence this place Tophet, where thoſe Children were ſuperſtitiouſly tormented by fire and burnt to aſhes, grew to a Proverb; ſo that any place of extream torment was called Tophet. As Hell is called Barathrum, becauſe Barathrum was a place ſo called among the Athenians, into which they caſt notorious Malefactors. Hence alſo Hell is called Gehenna, from the Valley of the Son of Hinnon, where thoſe Children were Sacrificed, or from Ge, ſignifying a Valley, and Naham, roaring or crying: So that it was called Gehinnon, from the cry of the Children, and Tophet from the beating of Drums to drown the cry of the Children. And upon this account ſome learned Tranſlators render the ſenſe thus, He hath made me a by-word, and I am as Hell: that is, They judge me worthy of Hell and Damnation; yea, that I am a very Hell, I am as Tophet before them; or they look upon me, as a man in Hell already: But I think this Interpretation diſcharged from this Text upon good reaſon, eſpecially by a demonſtration of the invalidity of that reaſon upon which it is grounded, either by the firſt diſcoverers or maintainers of it. For the Idolatry of Sacrificing Children to Moloch in Tophet, and the fire in the Valley of Hinnon were not heard of in the time of Job. The firſt mention of the Valley of Hinnon is (Joſh. 18. 16.) at the diſtribution of the Land of Canaan among the Tribes of Iſrael; and the name Tophet was not given it till ſome Ages after that, not till the Idolatry of the Jews was grown to its height (which was not preſently, but by certain degrees) for that act of theirs in offering their Children to that Idol ſeems to be the higheſt growth and top-branch of it. And therefore I paſs this expoſition.

Et ignis gehennæ prius ero. Rab. Da. Pagn. Sum velut Gehennæ. q. d. Etiam me vivum adjudicant Gehenna. vel miſerandæ alicujus mortis generi. Sed res hæc quadrare non poteſt, nã ignis illius vallis Gehennæ multo poſterior fuit quam Job. Pined. Merc.

Sixthly, The word Tophet is conceived to ſet forth the manner of a puniſhment or torture uſed in thoſe times. Some Malefactors were adjudged to have their bodies ſtretched out by the four quarters upon an Engin, and then to be beaten upon their bellies to ſuch a number of ſtrokes as the Law, or ſentence of the Judge appointed. Which manner of torture was called by the Greeks Tympanization, or as we expreſs in our language, Drumming, and the perſon adjudged to that puniſhment was ſaid to be drummed, when it was inflicted upon him, becauſe he was beaten upon his body like a Drum, and beaten alſo like a Drum in meaſure, or to a certain number of ſtroaks, the greateſt number not exceeding forty, as the judicial Law of Moſes appointed (Deut. 25. 2, 3.) which may be a confirmation of this Notion upon Jobs Text. To which alſo we may add the preſent cuſtom of the Eaſtern countries, eſpecially among the Turks, who commonly puniſh their Captives and Gally-ſlaves ſtretching them naked upon a broad Plank or Board, and giving them many cruel ſtroaks upon their Bellies: But above all, the Author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews gives a cleer light to this (Heb. 11. 35.) where deſcribing the ſeveral torments which the Saints of the old Church among the Jews endured, he ſaith, Women received their dead raiſed to life again, and others were tortured. So we tranſlate: The Greek is, Others were drummed, that is, they endured the torture of Tympanization, or Drumming; which word is alſo uſed by the Compiler of the Hiſtory of the Maccabees (2 Maccab. 6. 19. 28.) who tells us that Eleazer, and other Martyrs were Tympanized or Drummed; he offered himſelf willing to the Torment or Drum; the manner of which may be eaſily collected from the thirteenth Verſe of that Chapter in the Maccabees, where the Author ſaith, As he was ready to give up the Ghoſt, becauſe of the ſtroaks, &c. which ſhews two things.

Exiſtimo Toph ſignificare Tympanizatum, i. e. hominẽ qui paſſus eſt illud ſupplicium, quod Græci vocant τύμπανον, Latini quoque Tympanum. Bold. Tympanizatio illa videtur eſſe qua erus per quatuor mẽbra diſtentus bacillis ad numerũ in ventre tanquã tympanum percutiebatur. Id.

ἄλλοι δὲ ἐτυμπανίσθησαν·

αὐθαιρέτως ἐπὶ τὸν τύμπανον προσῆγε.

First, That the torture was by beating with Staves, or Cudgels.

Secondly, That it was not uſual for men to die under ſuch beatings, that puniſhment not being to death, but to paine and diſgrace; as appears alſo from that of Pilate concerning Chriſt, who when he found nothing in him worthy of Death, ſaid, I will chaſtiſe (or beat) him, and releaſe him (Luke 23. 15, 16.) And Paul received forty ſtripes ſave one, five times of the Jews (which ſeems to have been a torture ſomwhat like this we are now upon) and was thrice beaten with Rods, and yet ſurvived them all (2 Cor. 11. 24, 25.)

The Prophet Nahum alſo may be thought to allude to this cuſtom (Na. 2. 7.) And Huzzab (which ſome take for the proper name of the Queen of Ninevie) ſhall be led away Captive, ſhe ſhall be brought up, and her Maids ſhall lead her as with the voice of Doves, tabring (or Drumming) upon their breſts, it is this word in the Text; that is, They ſhall inflict that puniſhment upon themſelves, which others uſe to inflict on evil doers; as if he had ſaid, They ſhall torture

themſelves, or be their own Tormentors for very grieſe and vexation at thoſe miſeries which their enemies ſhall bring upon them. As the poor Publican filled with godly ſorrow and remorſe for his ſin, Smote upon his breaſt (Luke 18.13.) So it is uſual for ſuch as are overburdened with worldly ſorrow, to ſmite upon their breaſts, and add a voluntary pain to that which is inflicted.

Job is conceived to aim at this form of puniſhment; and then (taking the former part of the Verſe, not as we render it, I am a by-word, but as the word properly ſignifies, to Govern, or bear Rule, and then I ſay) the ſenſe appears thus, I who have been a Ruler, or in place of Authority heretofore, am now looked upon as a man who either had been, or deſerves to be tortured, drummed, or cudgelled; as if I were at once an ordinary man, and an extraordinary Malefactor: We may alſo keep to our Tranſlation of the former part of the Verſe, and ſuite this Expoſition of the latter part very well unto it; Thus, He hath made me a by-word of the people, and before them I am in no better repute then a man who for his faults hath undergone publique ſhame; as if we ſhould ſay (according to our cuſtomes) then a man that hath been whipt about the Streets, or hath ſtood upon the Pillory, or that hath been branded with a hot Iron in the hand or face; both which Applications of this Expoſition center in that Obſervation lately given, about the changeableneſs and inconſtancy of mans opinion concerning and of his affections towrads man: And therefore I ſhall not inſiſt further upon the uſe of it, but onely add, that,

A learned Interpreter takes much pains to make out a proof of this expoſition from that paſſage of the Prophet Iſaiah (Chap. 30. Verſ. 30, 31, 32, 33.) where the Lord having made gracious promiſes to his own people of their deliverance from the Aſſyrian Bondage, thus threatens the Aſſyrian, the Rod of his anger, and the Staffe of his indignation (Verſ. 30.) The Lord ſhall cauſe his glorious voice to be heard, and ſhall ſhew the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire, with ſcattering Tempeſt and Hailſtones. For through the voyce of the Lord ſhall the Aſſyrian be beaten down, which ſmote with a Rod. And in every place where the grounded ſtaffe ſhall paſs, which the Lord ſhall lay upon him, it ſhall be with Tabrets and Harps, and in Battels of ſhaking will he fight with it. For Tophet (which is the word of the Text) is ordained of old, yea for the King it is prepared, he hath made it deep and large: the pile thereof is fire, and much wood, the breath of the Lord like a ſtream of Brimſtone doth kindle it. In theſe words (ſaith my Author) there is a cleer deſcription of that kind of torture, called Tympanization, or Drumming, with which the King of Aſſyria is either threatned (in ſpecie) particularly, and properly, or by a Synechdoche, to ſhew that God would lay ſevere puniſhments upon him. For (ſaith the Prophet) Through the voice of the Lord ſhall the Aſſyrian be beaten down, which ſmote with a Rod: He ſmote with a Rod, but he ſhall be beaten down with a Staffe; for in every place where the grounded Staffe ſhall paſs, or, every paſſing of the Rod founded; that is, Of the Rod founded in the Decree of God, which ſo eſtabliſheth it, that no power nor policy of the Aſſyrian ſhall avoid, or remove it: For though God will not let the Rod of the Wicked reſt upon the lot of the Righteous (Pſal. 125. 3.) yet the Rod of God ſhall reſt upon the lot of the Wicked, There ſhall be the reſt thereof (Zech. 9. 1.) The Rod of God, by the lighting down of his arm (Verſ. 30.) ſhall ſtrike home to, yea into the fleſh of his Enemies, and there make deep gaſhes or cuts, running like ſo many rivulets with blood; and (ſaith he) The Lord ſhall lay it upon him, or, as our Margin hath it, Shall cauſe it to reſt upon him; when the Lord layes it on, let who ſo will, or rather who ſo can (and indeed none can) take it off, The Lord ſhall lay it upon him; and (as it follows) it ſhall be with Tabrets and Harps; which, as moſt Interpret of the joy which the Jews ſhould have at the downfall of the Aſſyrian, ſo my Author expounds it ſuitably to his Notion, of the manner of Gods ſmiting the Aſſyrian; which ſhould be as a Drum or Tabret is ſmitten, with many repeated ſtroaks, which in ſome exerciſings of that Art, paſs ſo thick, and ſo unceſſantly, that the Sticks ſeem to reſt upon the Drum, as alſo the finger upon the Harp, and not to move at all off from either; even thus ſhall God lay his Staffe upon the Aſſyrian: and in Battels of ſhaking will he fight with it, or with them; that is, by the ſhaking of Battels, or by frequent renewed Battels, will he fight with and deſtroy them. For (as it follows) Tophet is prepared of old; that is, The Engin upon which he ſhall be tortured: the form and manner of which is in many particulars deſcribed out of ancient Writers, by the Author of this Expoſition, but I ſhall not ſtay upon them. This Tophet is prepared of old, or, from yeſterday; that is, God hath prepared it aforehand, and made it ready, He hath made it deep and large; that is, proportionable in all its dimenſions for that uſe and purpoſe; yea for the King it is prepared (the great King of Aſſyria) which is added, becauſe this was a puniſhment for common men, yet the King (ſaith he) ſhall be thus tortured, he ſhall no more eſcape the hand of God, then the meaneſt of his Subjects, and he ſhall be handled in the ſame manner as the meaneſt among them ſhall. The diſhonour of ſuch a ſuffering is a greater puniſhment to a great King, then the pain of it, yet he cannot be diſpenſed with, yea for the King it is prepared. The pile of it is fire, and much wood: What's the meaning of that? My Author anſwers, This puniſhment of drumming was ſometimes but preparatory to another: firſt they were beaten, and then they were burned; and therefore (ſaith he) before the Engin a great fire was made, into which when they were tortured by beating, offenders were caſt and conſumed to aſhes. Our Martyrologies tell us of ſome, who have been firſt hanged, and then burned; and ordinarily among us, when Traytors are put to death, a fire is made at the place of Execution, into which their bowels are caſt, when their bodies are cut up and quartered. Thus here, The pile thereof is fire and much wood: And the breath of the Lord as a ſtream of Brimſtone doth kindle it; that is, The Lord being extreamly angry with, and incenſed againſt the King of Aſſyria, will therefore kindle this fire of his wrath totally to conſume him.

Jubet amoveri noxialem ſtipitem plebeia clarum pœna me damnet virum. Prud. in Rom. Martyr.

But here it may be demanded, Did any of the Kings of Aſſyria, who captivated and afflicted the Jews, ſuffer ſuch a kind of death as this? I ſuppoſe none of them did: Some tell us that the Army of Sennacherib which invaded Judea, was overthrown and deſtroyed by the Angel in that place called Tophet, or in the Valley of Hinnon, which is alſo given as a reaſon why that word is uſed in the Prophet; but Sennacharib himſelf was ſlain in the Temple of this Idol (2 Kings 19. 37.) Nor is it (as I conceive) the mind of our Expoſitor, to conclude from hence that the King of Babylon was put to death by ſuch a torture; but only to ſhew under the deſcription of that kind of death, that the death and deſtruction of the King of Babylon ſhould be very terrible, and that God would judge him, even as notorious offenders are, both to a painful and a ſhameful end.

As this Interpretation of the Prophet gives much light to that of Job, ſo it is an ingenious conjecture upon that place, and carries a fair correſpondence both to truth and reaſon. Nor is there (that I have met with) any Interpreter who doth not underſtand that Text of Iſaiah in its firſt and literal ſenſe, of the temporary judgements which God threatned to powre upon the State and King of Babylon; as moſt in a Tropological and Alluſive ſenſe, interpret it of eternal judgment in Hell, which is indeed a fiery Tophet, and is prepared of old, yea for the King it is prepared, for the great King of Aſſyria, as well as for the meaneſt perſon.

There is a ſeventh Tranſlation and Expoſition of theſe words which takes the former part of the Verſe as was toucht upon the laſt, and reads the whole thus; For he will make me a Governour among the people, though I have thus been made as matter for the Fiddlers or Taberer's Song. So that, as the former Expoſition renders the Text as a complaint, proceeding from Jobs grief, that he who had been a great Man, a Governour of the people, ſhould be now puniſht as a Slave, or as a Malefactor; ſo this renders it as a Propheſie, proceeding from his Faith, That God would reſtore and raiſe him again to be a Governour among the people, though now he was the ſcorn and deriſion of the people.

Nam fore ut inſtituat me ad præſidendum populis, quamvis tympanotribarum materia ante fuerim. Jun. Reſtituet me Deus in dignitatem meã & altius provehet. Jun.

This reading riſes cleerly enough from the words of the Text, yet I have one exception againſt it, as to the conſtant tenour of Jobs profeſſion; who though he were full of Faith in God, that it ſhould go well with him for eternity, yet he conſtantly diſclaims a hope of reſtauration to a temporal greatneſs; and having ſaid at the beginning of this Chapter, My days are extinct, the Graves are ready for me, it ſeems unſuitable to ſay here (which is the ſenſe of this tranſlation) My Worldly joyes are bloſſoming, the Thrones are ready for me; And therefore (with much reverence to the learned Author) I lay by this Interpretation.

Laſtly, Maſter Broughton tranſlates thus, That maketh me a by-word to the people, and I am openly a Taber: He applies it not (as we) to the former time, but to that time, I am a Tabret, and that openly, or in open view, in the ſight of all. We ſay of a man that is abuſed and jeered, He is played upon; ſo ſaith Job (according to this rendering) They play upon me as a Tabret, they rejoyce in my ſufferings, they make themſelves merry with my ſorrows, and rejoyce at my calamity. So the Lords of the Philiſtims dealt with Sampſon, having put out his eyes and impriſoned him, they ſent for him, to make them ſport (Judg. 16. 25.) Thus (as the ſenſe of this Tranſlation leads us) Job aggravates his ſorrows, by the joy which others diſcovered at it; which is alſo the meaning of the Septuagint, whoſe reading is, Thou haſt made me a talk among the people, and I became a Laughing-ſtock to them.

Poſuiſt autem me fabulam ingentibus & riſus eis deveni. Sept.

Hence Obſerve, Greif is moſt greivous when others rejoyce at it.

Thoſe afflictions which make others laugh, make us moſt mournful. When Nero had ſet Rome on fire, he made himſelf Muſick at it; and that calamity upon the City, was as a Tabret to him; while they were ſorrowing, he was ſinging. As to rejoyce at the evil which others ſuffer, is baſe joy, the worſt of joyes in it ſelf, ſo it makes the evils which we ſuffer worſe to our apprehenſion. The Prophet laments over Jeruſalem, becauſe of this (Lament. 2. 15.) All that paſs by, clap their hands at thee, they hiſs and wag their head at the Daughter of Jeruſalem, ſaying, Is this the City that men call the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth? All thine enemies have opened their mouth againſt thee, they hiſs and gnaſh the teeth, they ſay, We have ſwallowed her up certainly, this is the day that we looked for, we have found, we have ſeen it. Jeruſalem was as much burdened with her Enemies joy, as with her own ſorrows. If when we mourn, we have ſome to mourn with us, we are comforted in our mournings; but when God leaves us to the ſcorn and contempt of men, when they make themſelves merry with our troubles, and exult at our calamities, when our tears are as Wine to them, and the Bread of our affliction becomes the Bread of their deſire, this renders our ſorrows out of meaſure ſorrowfull. Hence David (Pſal. 25. 2.) prays ſo hard, Lord let not mine Enemy tryumph over me: It is eaſier to loſe a Battel, yea to die in Battel, then to be led in Triumph, or to be Triumphed over after the Battle: David being freed from that fear, gathers a ſtrong argument that God had reſpect to him (Pſal. 41. 11.) By this I know that thou favoureſt me, becauſe mine Enemy doth not triumph over me. It is greateſt mercy when we triumph over our Enemies, but it is great mercy when God delivers us from being triumphed over by our Enemies; for as the mercies of the Wicked, ſo the joyes of the mercileſs are cruel. The Apoſtle reports it as a great part of his affliction, that he was made a gazing ſtock, or a ſpectacle to the World, to Angels and men (1 Cor. 4. 9.) The word which the Apoſtle uſeth is an Alluſion to the Roman Theaters, whither all the people reſorted to ſport themſelves; and their ſpecial ſport was, to behold the combates of Men with Men, or of Men with Beaſts; ſuch a ſporting ſpectacle were the Apoſtles made (in their combates with the World) to the World, and to Angels, and to Men: They had Spectators enow, they were a Spectacle to the World, that is, to the Inhabitants of the World, who are diſtributed into their firſt and grateſt diviſion in the next word, Angels and men: Heaven and Earth are the Fabrick of the whole World, Angels and men are all the Inhabitants of both: yet ſome reſtrain Pauls Text, to evil Angels only, or Devils, becauſe it ſounds harſh to the ear, that the good Angels ſhould delight themſelves in beholding the ſufferings of good men; but it is not Pauls ſcope to ſhew that every beholder of their ſufferings took delight in their ſufferings, but that all did, or might behold them, for thoſe things were not done in a corner. The Apoſtles were ſet forth by their Adverſaries as if they had invited all the World, Angels and Men, good and bad, to laugh at them; yet as good men could not behold them without weeping, ſo the good Angels could not behold them with rejoycing, unleſs it were at their conſtancy and courage for God, or at that Crown which they ſaw ready prepared for thoſe who overcome: And in this ſenſe good men alſo rejoyced at their ſufferings. But when any mans ſufferings are rejoyced at, becauſe he ſuffers, and is in pain; this is very painful.

ὅτι θέατρον ἐγενήθημεν.

This was Moabs burden (Jer. 48. 39.) They ſhall howle, ſaying, How is it broken down? How hath Moab turned the back with ſhame? So ſhall Moab be a deriſion, and a diſmaying to all them about him. And when the Pſalmiſt would expreſs how highly God was offended at the counſels and plottings of wicked ones, he tells us, He that ſitteth in Heaven ſhall laugh, he ſhall have them in deriſion (Pſal. 2.)

Job having aggravated his ſorrows, by their effects upon others; now ſhews what effect they had upon himſelf.

Verſ. 7. My eye alſo is dim by reaſon of ſorrow, and all my members are as a ſhadow.

Mine eye.] The eye is taken two wayes, either properly for the corporal eye, or tropically for the underſtanding: Some interpret Job of the eye of the minde; and that hath compliance with the tranſlation which is alſo given of the latter clauſe, as I ſhall ſhew when I come thither. But I rather take it literally for the eye of the body. Mine eye, that is, That Organ of ſight which is as the Glaſs or light of the whole body, even that is dim by reaſon of.

Sorrow.] The word ſignifies more then ordinary ſorrow, it ſignifies ſorrow with indignation, or from provocation: Job's ſorrow had a touch of indignation, and it ſtirred him up to ſome undue provocations: Sorrow is taken two wayes.

Sorrow is the affliction it ſelf, or ſorrow is that paſſion which moves in us when we are afflicted, By reaſon of ſorrow mine eye is dim: Sorrow is a waſt both to the vital and viſive powers (Pſal. 6. 7.) Mine eye is conſumed becauſe of grief: Again (Pſal. 39. 9, 10.) Have mercy on me O Lord, for I am in trouble; mine eye is conſumed with grief, yea my ſoul, and my belly. This effect of grief hath been toucht before (Chap. 16. 16.) Mine eye is dim by reaſon of ſorrow.

Members.] That is, Firſt, all the members of my body: Secondly (the Hebrew bears it) all the creatures, and imaginations of my mind are as a ſhadow.

The ſame word is uſed (Gen. 6. 5.) The thoughts of the imaginations of mans heart (that is, the figments, or features of things which are formed up there) are evil, and only evil continually: We put, All my thoughts, in the Margin of our Tranſlation: As if he had ſaid, My minde is ſo enfeebled that I can ſcarce think or frame any ſolid notion; my mind is ſo unſetled that I know not how to make up my thoughts, or bring them to a rational iſſue about any point. Sorrow weakens the intellective part, as well as the ſenſitive: As if he had ſaid, My minde, which heretofore was apt to conceive, and to bring forth the exacteſt Ideas and platformes of truth; I, who could ſhape and faſhion excellent meditations, am now ſo weak-headed, that I can ſcarce put two thoughts together, and all I do is but a ſhadow to what I have been able to do.

This is a fair ſenſe, yet conſidering the context, I rather underſtand it of the members of his body, which were ſo decayed and poor, that he look'd like a Skeleton, or (as we ſay of ſuch) Anatomy, nothing being left but skin and bone, nothing but a pack of bones; ſo that he was rather the ſhadow and appearance of a man, then a man.

Hence Obſerve, The ſorrows of the mind break the body, as well as the mind.

This effect of ſorrow hath been met with in other places, and particularly (Chap. 16.16.) I ſhall only add, that although godly ſorrow (as was there ſhewed) may work deeply to the expence of bodily ſtrength, yet there is a very gracious promiſe (Iſa. 58.11.) that God will make the bones of ſuch fat, that is, Fill them with marrow, which is the ſtrength of the whole outward man. And they who are weakned by the continual exerciſes of godly ſorrow, here, are in preparation to an eſtate, where they ſhall ſorrow no more: There will be no dim eyes in Heaven, nor members like a ſhadow: Our vile body ſhall be faſhioned like unto his glorious body, and all tears and mourning ſhall flee away. Perfect happineſs is inconſiſtent with a blubbered eye. And though in Heaven a Saint may be called Adam (becauſe his body, for the ſubſtance of it, ſhall be the ſame that it was here on earth, though extreamly refined and ſublimated, yea, ſpiritualiz'd, yet earth ſtill, now I ſay, though a Saint in Heaven after the reſurrection, may (in this ſenſe) be called Adam, made of Earth) yet no Saint can be there called Enoſh, that ſtate being incapable of the leaſt mixture of ſorrow.

VERS. 8, 9.

Upright men ſhall be aſtonied at this, and the innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite.

The righteous alſo ſhall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands ſhall be ſtronger and ſtronger.

IN the two former Verſes Job ſhewed the greatneſs of his affliction from a twofold effect.

In theſe two Verſes he ſhews two reaſons why his afflictions were ſo great; not as Eliphaz and his Aſſociates had ſuggeſted, becauſe he was a great ſinner, or had ſinned beyond the common line of man; but,

Firſt, That men, even upright men might be aſtonied, at the ſtrangeneſs of this diſpenſation of God, and of his ſtrength, ſupporting a weak creature under it, and carrying him through it: God will do ſome things which ſhall at once teach and aſtoniſh his people, and gives them not only matter of inſtruction, but cauſe of wonder.

Secondly, That the innocent and righteous might be encouraged by my example to proceed vigorouſly in the ways of holineſs, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition they find from men, and the afflictions laid upon them by the hand of God; for as much as the favour of God ſhines in upon me through all theſe Clouds, and I have no doubt of his love, though I feel all this ſmart.

Verſ. 8. Upright men ſhall be aſtonied at this.

Who is an upright man hath been opened before; yet here the upright man is a man free from paſſion and prejudice, as well as from hypocriſie and falſe-heartedneſs.

Naki nõ tam in conſcientia purum à peccato, quã ab omni paſſione, humanoq; reſpectu immunẽ virũ hic ſignificat. Bold.

שמם Tacitus miratus eſt, præ admiratione ſtupuit.

The word which we tranſlate [Aſtonied] ſignifies aſtoniſhment with admiration, or ſuch an admiration, as leaves a man aſtonied and ſenſleſs, or puts him quite beſide himſelf. When natural reaſon is much overpowered, we act as if we had had no reaſon.

Upright men ſhall be aſtonied. Maſter Broughton reads it in the Imperative Mood, Let upright men be aſtonied at this: He carries the ſame form to the end of the context, Let upright men be aſtoniſhed at this, and let the innocent ſtir up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite: Let the righteous hold on his way, and let him that hath clean hands be ſtronger, and ſtronger: As if the words contained a uſe of exhortation or direction to ſeveral duties which Job's ſtate calls us unto.

We ſay, Upright men may be aſtonied, as importing the event, or what was intended in the act: As if he had ſaid, Men of a right temper will not be tranſported with ungrounded jealouſies and uncertain conjectures concerning me, when they ſee all this upon me, but will refer my ſtrange diſaſters to the unconceiveable wiſdom of God, who thus orders the afflictions of his people, and ſeems to reward their holy ſervices with ſharpeſt ſufferings.

Upright men ſhall be aſtonied, at what? At this, or upon the conſideration of this thing: but what is this thing, the conſideration whereof, ſhall raiſe up ſuch aſtoniſhment? When the Buſh burned and was not conſumed, Moſes reſolved, I will turn aſide now, and ſee this great thing: Strange ſights call us to conſideration. We have in this Text, A buſh burning and not conſuming, upright men may well be aſtoniſhed, and turn aſide to ſee it.

More particularly, there are four things upon which the occaſion of this aſtoniſhment is pitcht.

Upright men ſhall be aſtonied at, or upon this.] Firſt, At your hard dealing with me, at your rigid cenſures of me: your bitter by-words and taunting Proverbs againſt me, will certainly cauſe upright men, men of a clear judgment and conſcience, to ſtand aſtonied: As if he had ſaid, It is not my ſingle opinion that you have wronged me, but all men of integrity will not only ſay the ſame, but be amazed at your dealings with me.

Secondly, At this, that is, at the deliverance which God will give me out of theſe troubles. Thus the ſenſe is made out by thoſe who render the ſixth Verſe as the Propheſie of Job's Faith, that he ſhould be reſtored and ſet up to govern among the people: This turn of things ſhall worke aſtoniſhment in the beſt and moſt ſober ſpirited men, upright men ſhall be aſtonied, to ſee me tranſlated from the dung-hill to the Throne, from a ſtate of greateſt contempt to a ſtate of higheſt honour. Good men ſhall glorifie God in me, and ſhall rejoyce at the downfal of Hypocrites; but though the event did verifie this, Job was at the laſt reſtored, and was made as a Prince among the people, and his reſtauration was ſuch as might juſtly aſtoniſh and draw all that either ſaw or heard of it into admiration, yet I much doubt whether Job had any ſuch ſcope in theſe words, which rather continue and heighten the aggravations of his then preſent troubles, then hold out any intimations of his hope, much leſs of his aſſurance of a raiſing to a future worldly proſperity.

Animis, dictis, factis viri boni glorientur in Deo & de hypocritarũ confuſione exultent. Jun.

Thirdly, Some conceive this matter of aſtoniſhment to be the patience of Job under his ſufferings, that he ſhould endure and hold out in ſuch extremities, till his eye was dim by reaſon of ſorrow, and his members were like a ſhadow: Upright men ſhall be aſtonied at this. Is it not marvellous that a man ſhould act a life of grace, when it could ſcarce be perceived that he acted the life of nature? As God doth often work miraculouſly for the deliverance of his people out of trouble, ſo they ſometimes (by his power) work miraculouſly under troubles, before deliverance comes. Such patience, ſuch humility, ſuch meekneſs, and faith, are recorded in Scripture, as have cauſed upright men to ſtand aſtonied. This is a good ſenſe, but I rather pitch upon a fourth, as moſt proper to this place.

Fourthly, I conceive when Job ſaith, Upright men ſhall be aſtonied at this, He points at the greatneſs of his affliction: As if he had thus expreſſed it, My being made a byword among the people, my dim'd eyes and leane body will make ſuch a report, and be ſuch a ſight, as will ſet all honeſt men a wondring, upright men ſhall be aſtonied at this. What! Hath the Lord dealt thus with Job, a holy man, concerning whoſe integrity he hath given ſuch ample teſtimony? This is indeed the Lords doing, but it is marvellous in our eyes.

Cladis hæc mea univerſis eſt ſtupenda ſed juſtis præſertim. Pined. Quod ita atrociter affligar cũ ſim innocens, &c. Merc.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That the beſt of men, upright men are ſometimes at a loſs how to interpret the outward dealings of God.

Some providences of God put the wiſeſt to a ſtand; not only are Fools and wicked men, but men of the greateſt experience and underſtanding in the ways of God, ſo puzzled that they know not what to ſay, or how to anſwer? The Lord is pleaſed to give as hard Texts and Chapters in his works as he doth in his Word; many outward adminiſtrations lie ſo cloſe, yea ſo croſs to his ordinary proceedings, that we know not what to make of them: If we ſee a wicked man afflicted, we ſhall ſee a godly man afflicted much more: If we ſee a godly man proſper, we ſhall ſee a wicked man proſper double to it; theſe are ſtrange things, at which not a few are amazed, and at their wits end; ſhould we judge of all the dealings of God by humane reaſon, we ſhould conclude ſome of them without, or againſt reaſon, though indeed they are only above our reaſon, or have a height of reaſon in them, which we cannot reach, and therefore muſt admire.

No man wonders at that for which he can give a reaſon, and therefore we ſay it altogether unbecomes a Philoſopher (who would be thought knowing about the reaſon of every thing) to wonder: There are depths in the providences of God which no man is able to reach or ſadom, the upright men need not be aſtonied at them. The Preacher gives a caution, that we ſhould not be over curious in prying into ſuch ſecrets (as ſome make the connexion of thoſe two Verſes, *Eccleſ.*7.15,16.) All things have I ſeen in the dayes of my vanity: Solomon was a man of vaſt obſervation, and though he had not ſeen all things in their particular exiſtence, yet he had ſeen all things in their general nature; and he gives inſtance in two ſorts of things which he had ſeen, There is a juſt man that periſheth in his righteouſneſs (Job was a righteous man, and he periſhed outwardly) and there is a wicked man that prolongs his life in wickedneſs. Among all his obſervations, he thought none of greater moment then theſe two: Now when God puts the righteous into a periſhing condition, and ſets up the wicked in worldly glory; this is matter of much admiration and inquiſition, therefore he ſubjoyns (according to this interpretation) his caution (*Verſ.*16.) Be not righteous overmuch, neither make thy ſelf over-wiſe; that is, Be not anxious in ſearching out every particular, or every little little about this adminiſtration of God; make not thy ſelf over-wiſe, do not think that thou canſt reach the reaſon of all that God hath done in cauſing a righteous man to periſh, and a wicked man to flouriſh, there is more in it then thou canſt comprehend, Why ſhouldeſt thou deſtroy thy ſelf? that is, Thou maiſt amaze and bewilder, yea undo and deſtroy thy ſelf, if thou ventureſt too far upon thoſe ſecrets of providence, but thou wilt not be able to extricate or reſolve thy ſelf by all thy venturing.

Dum plus ſcire vis quā oportet, præ admiratione rei humanum captum vincentis ad mentis ſtuporem devenias. Pined.

Now, If the providences of God be ſuch a deep, that upright wiſe men are aſtonied at them, then what a deep are the counſels and decrees of God? Providences are the diſpenſations of God to the eye, they are the objects of ſenſe; if we cannot ſee to the end of that which is before us, as providences are, how ſhall we ſee the end of that which is ſo far off from us, as the Counſels and Decrees of God are? The Apoſtle ſtood as a man aſtonied at both (*Rom.*11.33.) when he had ſpoken of that amazing diſpenſation of God in caſting off the Jews, and receiving the Gentiles, he cries out, O the depth of the riches, both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God! How unſearchable are his judgements! and among them, this ſpecial judgement, in taking the Goſpel from the Jews, and breaking them off, who were the natural branches, that the Gentiles who were the wild Olive might be graffed in: How unſearchable is this judgement, and this way of God paſt finding out! Upright men are aſtonied at this.

Secondly, Obſerve, How ſtrange ſoever the dealings of God are with his, yet righteous men are only aſtonied at them.

They are not ſcandalized, they are not offended at God for them, they do not blaſpheme the name, or apoſtatize from the ways of God, nor do they quarrel at his diſpenſations. For as when they are aſtoniſhed at the proſperity of the wicked, they preſerve high and holy thoughts of God, and only ſeek reſolution at the mouth of God: as the Prophet Jeremiah did (Chap. 12.1.) Lord, thou art righteous, yet let me reaſon with thee: Why doth the way of the wicked proſper? Or as Habakkuk (*Chap.*2.2.) propounds his queſtion to find out the knot in the ways and dealings of God: Now I ſay, as it is thus with the righteous, when they ſee the great proſperity of the wicked, ſo when they ſee the greateſt adverſities of the godly, they are only amazed at the dealings of God, they do not deſpond, much leſs blaſpheme becauſe of his dealings. But when carnal men ſee thoſe who have gone for righteous or upright, under afflictions, they run into deſperate extreams.

Firſt, They deſpiſe and ſlight them.

Secondly, They look upon them as the moſt miſerable men in the World: Afflicted grace and innocence hath no beauty in a carnal eye.

Fourthly, They judge hardly of God, who deals thus ſeverely with men: what? Are theſe the ſervants of God, and doth he uſe them thus? Doth he recompenſe them thus for the pains which they have taken, and for the work which they have done him?

Fifthly, They grow into an abhorrence of holineſs, and into a diſtaſt of Religion it ſelf. If God pay his Servants wages in ſuch coyn as this (ſay they) let whoſo will ſerve him, we are not ambitious of his Livery. If this be the portion of Profeſſors (as you call them) let who will profeſs; thus they are ſcandalled and offended.

It is ſtoried, that when Aygoland a King of the Moors (who had long maintained War againſt Charles the Great, hoping to make a fairer agreement with him) and promiſed to receive the Chriſtian Faith, and be Baptized, he coming with a Gallant retinue to the French Court, ſaw there a number of poor men fed and cloathed by the Emperours charity, and enquiring who they were, it was anſwered, That they were the Servants of God: What, ſaid he, Are the Emperours Servants ſo rich and brave, and are the Servants of God ſo poor and ſqualid? I had a purpoſe to be baptized, but now I am reſolved never to ſerve that God, who keeps and rewards his Servants no better. What this King ſpake out, many ſpeak in their hearts; they will not ſerve Chriſt upon ſelf-denying and ſuffering terms.

Aygolandus abjecto ſervorum Dei ſtatu & viſu à Chriſtianæ fidei profeſſione abſtinuit. Lampad. in Sleyd. part. 3.

As when the Croſs falls upon Hypocrites, they depart from the Faith, and (with Demas) imbrace this preſent World, they will not endure a ſtorm for Chriſt, nor hazzard their worldly poſſeſſions for all the promiſes in the Goſpel; ſo when the godly fall under croſſes and afflictions for the Goſpel, evil and prophane men reject it, they will none of it: The righteous may be aſtonied and wonder, but the wicked blaſpheme at this.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Good men are apt to have ſtrange thoughts about afflictions and croſſes.

They who are well acquainted with the Theory of ſufferings, yet when they come to ſuffer indeed, find much loathneſs and averſeneſs to it. The Apoſtle Peter ſaw this, and laboured to remove it (1 *Pet.*4.12.) My brethren, think it not ſtrange concerning the fiery tryal, as if ſome ſtrange thing had hapned to you, but rejoyce, &c. They looked ſtrange on tryals, as if they had never ſeen nor heard of them before: They knew not how to digeſt ſuch hard meat as ſufferings are, under the profeſſion of the Goſpel; their hearts were ſomewhat cold to thoſe fires, and they had no mind to come near leſt they ſhould burn their fingers, and were therefore warned, Think it not ſtrange concerning the fiery tryal. Jeſus Chriſt (as the Prophet deſcribes him, Iſa. 53.3.) was a man of ſorrow, and acquainted with grief. Chriſt and grief were no ſtrangers, why then ſhould a Chriſtian think ſtrange of it? The Apoſtle uſeth that argument (Verſ. 13.) But rejoyce in as much as ye are partakers of Chriſts ſufferings: Ours are the ſufferings of Chriſt, not only becauſe we ſuffer for him, and he ſuffers with us, but becauſe he ſuffered the ſame things, yea far greater both before us and for us: Chriſt took our ſufferings upon him, when he took our nature upon him, yet our nature thinks ſtrange to partake in the ſufferings of Chriſt.

The Apoſtle Paul (1 Epiſt. 3.3,4.) tells the Theſſalonians, that he ſent Timotheus to eſtabliſh them, and to comfort them concerning their Faith, That no man ſhould be moved by theſe afflictions: Intimating that the beſt of men, the beſt of Saints, are apt to be moved by afflictions; he means it of an inward motion, that is, to have their ſpirits diſturbed and troubled, as Davids was when he put thoſe queſtions to his ſoul (*Pſal.*42.11.) Why art thou caſt down, O my ſoul, and why art thou diſquieted within me? But why ſhould no man be moved by thoſe afflictions? The Apoſtle ſhews why, For your ſelves know that we were alſo appointed thereto: for verily, when I was with you I told you before that we muſt ſuffer tribulations, as it came to paſs, and ye know it. Paul gave them notice before affliction came, leſt they ſhould be moved when they were come. Thus Chriſt warned his Diſciples, and he warned them for this end (John 16.1.) Theſe things have I ſpoken to you that you be not offended: What things were theſe? They (ſaith he) ſhall put you out of the Synagogues; yea, the time cometh, that whoſoever killeth you, will think that he doth God ſervice: Chriſt foreſaw that when theſe things came, they would find work enough to quiet their ſpirits in, and to quit themſelves from troubleſome motions: And as Chriſt, to keep or make their hearts quiet, tells them of their ſufferings aforehand, ſo he therefore tells them that he himſelf had ſuffered before-hand (John 15.18.) If the World hate you, you know it hated me before it hated you; you know it, and knowing it, you ought not be troubled when

when you meet with hatred in the World: The Servant muſt not expect better uſage then his Maſter. When we ſee ſo much laid in to fortifie our ſpirits againſt outward croſſes, in, or for the profeſſion of the Goſpel, it is an abundant argument that our hearts are apt to ſtartle, and we to be aſtonied at them.

And the innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite.

עיר Evigitavit, excitavit.

The innocent.] Here is a different Character, or cloathing of words, but the perſon is the ſame. The innocent ſhall [ſtir] up himſelf: The word ſignifies to ſtir up from ſleep, and to ſtir up from ſloath; it ſignifies alſo ſuch a ſtirring as the Eagle uſeth to provoke her young ones to fly (Deut. 32. 11.) Thus the innocent ſhall awake and ſtir up himſelf.

חנף Sunt qui reddunt improbum quomodo ea vox exprimitur apud Hebræos. Druſ.

Againſt the Hypocrite.] The Hypocrite is taken two wayes: Either ſtrictly, as oppoſed to the upright in the former part; and under that notion I have heretofore ſpoken of the Hypocrite (Chap. 8, &c.)

Secondly, The Hypocrite may be taken largely, and ſo every wicked man is he, except he who openly profeſſeth wickedneſs, and yet even he may go for an Hypocrite, for he is more wicked (when he hath profeſſed his utmoſt) then he doth profeſs himſelf to be.

Reddunt iniquum. Sept. Delatorem. Targ. Juſtus ſuper inimicum conſurget. Olymp.

The Septuagint render him, Unjuſt, and the Chaldee Paraphraſe, The backbiter or defamer: And another of the Greek Interpreters calls him the enemy; The innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt his enemy, or againſt his oppoſite: And who is that, but the wicked man, under what notion ſoever we put him? The ſingle terms thus cleared, fall yet under a different ſence, as joyned together.

Suam orationem paulo incitatiorē excuſat. q.d. quid mirum me ita loqui cum res ipſa tam indigna ſit? Pined.

Firſt, Some conceive that Job makes an apology, or an excuſe for himſelf in theſe words, why he expreſt ſo much paſſion, and uſed ſuch ſharpneſs of ſpeech toward his Friends: As if he had ſaid, Blame me not for doing it, things are carried ſo, as upright men may be aſtonied, it would make a wiſe man mad, and a meek man furious; a very poſt would be awakened and ſtirred, at what my Friends have again and again preſſed upon me; therefore pardon my paſſion, and (if you will needs call it ſo) my impatience.

Non me latet ad rem tantam ſapientes percelli, atque adeo in ejuſmodi caſu interdum inſontes adverſus eos qui ſic affliguntur, tanquam adverſus hypocritas commoveri. Bez.

Secondly, Maſter Beza expounds Job aiming at a good man in great troubles miſtaken for an Hypocrite, by thoſe who are good: He repreſents him ſpeaking thus, I am not ignorant, that not only ordinary and common men, but even the wiſe and the upright will be troubled and aſtonied at my ſufferings, and that ſometimes (in ſuch a caſe as mine is) innocent men will ſtir up, or ſet themſelves againſt him that is afflicted, as if he were an Hypocrite. When God puts a diſguiſe of great troubles upon his faithful Servants, they who are faithful will ſcarce own them; they are ready to number them among enemies, at leaſt to doubt very much (as they did about Paul upon another account, Acts 9. 26.) whether he be a Friend or a Diſciple. Afflictions have made the ſincere appear as Hypocrites in the opinion of thoſe who are ſincere.

Indignabitur contra hypocritam quod ille calamitates tribuit peccatis. Cajet.

A third makes this the ground of the innocent mans quarrel againſt the Hypocrite; why doth he ſtir up himſelf, and engage againſt him? Why is he ſo angry with the Hypocrite? Even becauſe he ſees the Hypocrite fooliſhly condemning the godly as wicked, becauſe they are afflicted, or aſcribing their calamities meerly to their ſins.

Excitabit ſe contra impium florentem & fælicem, quod videat illū non recipere digna peccati.

Fourthly, Thus, The innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf; That is, His ſpirit ſhall be troubled at the Hypocrite, or wicked man, whom he ſees in a flouriſhing condition: ſo we may expound it by that caution which David gives (Pſal. 37. 1.) Fret not thy ſelf becauſe of evil doers, neither be thou envious againſt the workers of iniquity. Good men have been much moved and fretted at the proſperity of the ungodly: But ſurely Job is not here declaring the infirmities of the innocent, but their graces. And therefore,

Laſtly, The innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite, carries in it the commendation of the innocent perſons perſeverance and conſtancy in the faith and ſincerity of his profeſſion, what changes ſoever are upon him: As if he had ſaid, Though a godly man be afflicted and brought low, though he be ſcorned and trampled upon when he is brought low, yet he will not forſake his principles, or diſclaim his profeſſion; nay he will be ſo far from ſlacking in, or turning away from his profeſſion, that he will manifeſt more holy zeal for God and his wayes, together with more holy oppoſition againſt wicked men, and all their wayes, then ever he did before: The upright ſhall be aſtonied at this, but they ſhall not be diſheartened, their wiſdom and courage ſhall ſtill appear in maintaining their quarrel againſt the generation of evil doers, whereſoever they meet with them. The innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite.

Quamvis ab eo videatur quod affligatur, haud tamen propterea deſiderio ducetur ejus ſequendi aut ei ſe adjungendi ſed excitabit ſe, &c. Merc.

Hence Note, Firſt, There is an everlaſting oppoſition between the godly and the wicked.

The innocent ſtirs up himſelf (like a Lyon) againſt the Hypocrite; His heart riſeth againſt him, not as a man, not as his enemy, but as a wicked man, and as an enemy to God. The foundation of this holy War was laid in that word of God (Gen. 3. 15.) I will put enmity between thee and the Woman, between her ſeed, and thy ſeed. As there is an enmity, de facto, in wicked men againſt the righteous, they will ever be oppoſing them: So there is an enmity, de jure, of right and duty, in the righteous againſt the wicked, they ought ever to oppoſe them; that quarrel, thoſe feuds muſt not be laid down: And therefore the Apoſtle John, who though he was the beloved Diſciple, and was moſt preſſing and perſwaſive to love among Saints and Brethren, yet he forbids the love of wicked men, Love not the World (1 Epiſt. 2. 15.) which refers as well to worldly perſons, as worldly things. And the Apoſtle James is direct (Chap. 4. 4.) The friendſhip of the World is enmity againſt God. Our piecing in, or making peace with the World, is a proclaimed War againſt God himſelf. It is our duty, and it is our ſpiritual ſafety, to ſtir up our ſelves ſpiritually againſt the wicked. As we deny not civil peace with Hypocrites, and the worſt of men; ſo there is a ſpiritual warfare which we are bound to continue (how chargeable ſoever it may prove to us) againſt all Hypocrites and wicked men. And if they ſay (of this Sword) as (Jer. 47. 6.) O thou Sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? We muſt anſwer as the Sword doth there, How can I be quiet, ſeeing the Lord hath given me a charge againſt Askelon? The Sword of that War receives its Commiſſion from God, and is deſigned now to one Coaſt, anon to another: The Sword of this War hath long ſince received its Commiſſion from God, againſt all the coaſts of ſin, and powers of darkneſs; nor can it be quiet, or put it ſelf up in its Scabboard, while there is an Hypocrite appearing upon the face of the Earth.

Gods quarrel muſt be perpetuated, it can never be taken up. Let them return to thee, but return not thou to them, was the Prophets charge (Jer. 15. 19.) There's no compounding of this difference; they muſt return and give themſelves up to God, and his wayes, elſe we cannot give them an inch of ground, or make truce with them for an hour, much leſs may we make peace with them, or give them the right hand of fellowſhip.

Secondly, Here we have the Hypocrite in his flouriſh, and the innocent in his affliction; the Hypocrite aloft, and the innocent below; yet when it is thus, even then the innocent is deſcribed ſtirring up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite.

Hence Obſerve, A godly man afflicted, doth not at all approve or applaud the Hypocrite, but oppoſeth him in his greateſt pomp and worldly ſplendour.

When the wicked are at the higheſt, even as happy as the World can make them, yet a godly man will not change ſtates with them, or (as we ſay) turn Tables with them; he would not have his outward proſperity, with his heart, if it were worth ten thouſand Worlds: He ſees and knows there is more excellency and worth in afflicted grace, then in the moſt proſperous wickedneſs: The love of God is better then life, and if ſo, what are all the things of this life compared to it? Hence a godly man hath no better opinion of the wicked in riches, then in poverty, and he hath no worſe opinion of himſelf when he is poor, then when he was rich: He doth not account grace the leſs glorious, becauſe it hath ſo little of outward glory upon it.

And ſeeing he will not change ſtates with him, he cannot envy him: We envy thoſe only whom we judge in a better condition then our ſelves. David under a temptation, was envious at the fooliſh, when he ſaw the proſperity of the wicked (Pſal. 73. 2, 3.) and his feet were almoſt gone, his ſteps had well-nigh ſlipt, but when he recollected himſelf, and went to the Sanctuary, ſuch thoughts were quickly down, and envy was extinct, he ſaw much matter enough to pity wicked men, but none to envy them, they ſtand in ſlippery places, and are ſuddenly caſt down. How are they brought into deſolation, as in a moment they are utterly conſumed with terrors.

And as he doth not envy them, ſo thirdly, much leſs doth he imitate them; he is ſo far from imitating them, that he ſets himſelf to oppoſe them, and he oppoſeth them all thoſe wayes, and with all thoſe weapons that God hath put into his hand: He oppoſeth ever him by counſel and conviction, by reproofs and prayers. And as he fights againſt the Hypocrite by prayer; ſo by prayer he fortifies himſelf againſt all ſinful compliances with him.

Thus David prayed (Pſal. 141. 4.) Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practice wicked works with men that work iniquity, and let me not eat of their dainties: As if he had ſaid, Though wicked men be fine fed, and dyet upon dainties every day, though they devour the fat, and drink the ſweet, and have all things that their hearts can deſire, yet, Lord, ever keep me from the practice of wicked works with men that work iniquity, and let me not eat of their dainties, who find a ſweetneſs in ſin, and take pleaſure in unrighteouſneſs.

It is the counſel of the Wiſe man (Prov. 1. 10, 11.) My Son, if ſinners entice thee, conſent thou not: Do not aſſociate with them, they will tell thee of great matters; they will ſay, Come let us lay wait for blood, we ſhall fill our houſes with ſpoil; caſt in thy lot among us, let us all have one purſe. My Son, walk not thou in the way with them, refrain thy foot from their paths; for their feet run to evil, &c. He that would refrain his foot from walking in, muſt firſt refrain his heart from approving of, the paths of wickedneſs.

This the innocent doth and more, while he ſtirreth up himſelf againſt the Hypocrite. And as he ſets himſelf againſt the way of the Hypocrites, ſo he labours to ſet forward with all his might in the way of holineſs, for that's his way, as appears in the next Verſe.

Ex tanti viri exemplo atque memoria incrementũ accipient ſingulare. Verſe 9. The righteous ſhall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands ſhall wax ſtronger and ſtronger.

The righteous.] It is the ſame man ſtill, who ſhould be encouraged by Job's example to a vigorous progreſs; He, the righteous man,

Shall hold on.] The word ſignifies to hold with ſtrength, to hold toughly, to hold as with the teeth, reſolving never to let go, but ever to go on

In his way.] What way? It may be taken either particularly for that way of oppoſition which he maintained againſt the Hypocrite; or ſecondly, for the way of righteouſneſs, and that twofold.

First, The way of his heart, or his inward way.

Secondly, The way of his hand, or his outward way.

The righteous man holds on in both theſe wayes; he continues his courſe both in the holy motions of his ſpirit towards God, and in the holy actings of his life towards man: In this way he is full of motion, but he will not move a ſtep, nor willingly decline to the right hand or to the left, out of this way: Here he walks as to induſtry; and here he ſtands as to conſtancy. The righteous ſhall hold on his way.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The righteous ſhall perſevere; perſeverance is at once the duty and the priviledge of the Saints.

As they are in a good ſtate, ſo they ſhall go on in a good way, The path of the juſt is as the ſhining light, that ſhineth more and more unto the perfect day (Prov. 4. 18.) The goodneſs of Hypocrites is as the morning cloud, and goeth away as the early dew (Hoſ. 6. 4.) The wind ſcatters the morning Cloud, and the riſing Sun exhales the early Dew; thus the goodneſs of the Hypocrite is gone; but the goodneſs of the righteous (like the goodneſs of God, of and from whom it is) endureth (in its proportion) continually (Pſal. 52. 1.) As they who joyn works to grace, make grace to be no grace; ſo do they who ſay, the work of grace may be loſt; or that grace may for ever loſe its working: The work of grace may be clouded, but grace is no cloud; the working of grace may decline, but grace cannot dye.

The righteous ſhall hold on his way.] Further, This Scripture tells us, that he ſhall hold on, not only in fair way, and in good weather, but in ſtormy weather, and rugged wayes, when his way lyes among ſharp Stones, and ragged Rocks, through Bryars and Thorns; yea, I may ſay, when his way lyes among Bears and Lyons, he will on.

Hence Obſerve, A godly man perſeveres, notwithſtanding all ſeeming diſcouragements from God, and all real oppoſitions from men.

Though God ſeem to caſt cold water on him, yet his fire never goes out, and often (by a holy Antiperiſtaſis) he is inflamed the more: While the evil World thinks to daſh him out of countenance, and damp his ſpirit, he is the more emboldened: As the Apoſtles approved themſelves the Miniſters of Chriſt, ſo doth every Believer (in his Sphere) In much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes, in ſtripes, in impriſonments, by honour, and diſhonour, by good report, and evil report, &c. (2 Cor. 6. 4, 8.) Let the way be what it will, foul or fair, a green Carpet way, or a deep pochy way, let it be what it will, he goes through thick and thin. Paul puts the queſtion, and reſolves it (Rom. 8. 35.) Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? He puts it of a perſon, Who ſhall? And he anſwers about things, Shall tribulation, or diſtreſs, ſhall theſe ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? That is, Either from that love which we bear to Chriſt, or from that love that Chriſt bears to us; what ſhall make Chriſt out of love with us? Or what ſhall make us out of love with Chriſt? Shall any thing? Nothing ſhall, for thoſe things ſhall not which might ſeem moſt able to make us out of love with Chriſt, or to tell us that Chriſt doth not love us. Shall tribulation, or diſtreſs, or perſecution, or famine, or nakedneſs, or peril, or ſword? Nay in all theſe things we are more then conquerours through him that loved us: He loved us, therefore he will love us, and we ſhall go on to love him: for through him we ſhall not only conquer, but over conquer, or more then conquer, whatſoever ſtands in the way to divert us from his love, or to render him unlovely. Nothing can ſeparate Believers from the love which Chriſt bears to them; if any thing can do it, ſin can; but ſin cannot, becauſe he hath more then conquered it by his own power: Nothing can ſeparate Believers from the love which they bear to Chriſt, if any thing can, tribulation can, but that cannot, becauſe we ſhall more then conquer it through his power. The righteous ſhall hold on his way; he neither turns back, nor ſtands ſtill. David was ſorely ſhaken, and tempted (Pſal. 73.) yet his feet were (but) almoſt gone, and his ſteps were (but) well-nigh ſlipt. As Hypocrites at the moſt are but almoſt Chriſtians they are not Chriſtians altogether; and as they ſtep at their neareſt but well-nigh Heaven, they ſhall not enter in; ſo the feet of true Believers may almoſt be gone out of the good way, but they ſhall not go out altogether, and their ſteps may well-nigh ſlip from God, but they ſhall be upheld; and hence it is, that though they have many, not only ſlips, but falls in the way, yet they ſhall neither ſlip nor fall quite out of the way; this David's experience taught him, at the twenty third Verſe of that Pſalm: Neverthleſs (ſaith he) I am continually with thee, and thou haſt held me by my right hand: That is, Though I have many troubles in thy way, yet I depart not out of thy way: I have temptations to leave thee, but I will not leave thee; I am ſtill with thee, I am where I was, yet not by any power of my own, but by thy power, for thou holdeſt me by my right hand: It is not the hold which we have of God, but that which he hath of us that makes us hold on our way: We ſhould quickly let go our hold of God, if God had not infinite faſter hold of us; Thou holdeſt me by my right hand. There is a (manutenentia Dei)

Dei) an inviſible Hand-holding of God, by which the whole viſible Creation is ſupported, without which no Creature could hold on in the way of Nature; much more is there an inviſible Hand-holding of God, by which the ſpiritual Creation is ſupported, and without which the new Creature cannot hold on in the wayes of Grace. 'Tis the hold which Chriſt hath of us, and the rooting which we have in him, by which we are confirmed. Iſrael the people of God, is ſaid, to grow as the Lilly, and to caſt forth his roots like Lebanon (Hoſ. 14. 5.) The Trees of Lebanon are high, and ſpread out their branches, but they are alſo deeply rooted, they have as much under ground as above, they have as much hold in the earth as they have ſhew in the air. As the Saints grow up and ſpread forth their branches, ſo they grow down and caſt out their roots like Lebanon; ſo that the winds and ſtorms which ſhake them, do indeed but ſettle them. 'Tis the goodneſs of the root which at once makes them fruitful, and makes them firm: He that ſtands by this ſtrength ſhall ſtand; and he that is fruitful by theſe roots ſhall be fruitful ſtill, and bring forth more fruit in age. The righteous ſhall hold on his way. As Chriſt ſpeaks terribly to the wicked, that they ſhall hold on their way (Revel. 22. 11.) He that is unjuſt, let him be unjuſt ſtill; he that is filthy, let him be filthy ſtill: Theſe are not permiſſions to wicked men to be wicked ſtill, much leſs are they perſwaſions unto wickedneſs, but they are dreadful comminations; wicked men are threatned with this plague, to be given up to the wickedneſs of their own hearts: Now as Chriſt ſpeaks terribly there to his Enemies, ſo he ſpeaks comfortably and encouragingly to his Friends, He that is righteous let him be righteous ſtill; and he that is holy let him be holy ſtill: which carries not only the force of a command upon them, or the direction of a rule to them, but alſo the ſweetneſs of a gracious promiſe, or of a ſpecial priviledge, that they ſhall be maintained in righteouſneſs and holneſs unto the end, or that they ſhall hold on their way. Hypocrites may make a fair flouriſh, and ſtand ſome brunts, they may endure for a ſeaſon, but they endure not long, much leſs to the end. They went out from us, ſaith the Apoſtle John (1 Epiſt. 2. 19.) they had once an appearance, and a preſence with us, but they were not of us: That is, They had no real communion and fellowſhip with us; their bodies were with us, but not their hearts; and when we loſt them, we loſt no more then the Corn doth when the Chaff is winnowed away; or then the Body doth, when hurtful humours are purged away. Who were theſe? He means the Apoſtate profeſſors of that Age, Ebion, Cerinthus, &c. Theſe were not of us: How did the Apoſtle know that? He tells us how in the next words, For if they had been of us, they would, no doubt, have continued with us; but they went out, that they might be made manifeſt that they were not all of us. Saint John puts it beyond all diſpute, and himſelf had not the leaſt doubt of it, that they who are once in Church, ſhall continue in it; and that they who depart, do not depart from grace, but from a ſhadow of grace: They do not fall from what they were; but manifeſt what they were not: They went out from us, that they might be made manifeſt that they were not all of us. But why doth the Apoſtle ſay they were not all of us? Were any of thoſe Apoſtates of them? Not all, is a known Hebraiſm for none (Pſal. 143. 2.) In thy ſight (not all men, that is) no man living ſhall be juſtified. So (1 John 3. 15.) Ye know that every murderer hath not; that is (as we tranſlate) No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. So here, They were not all, that is, None of them were of us: Many have forſaken a profeſſion of Faith; but he that hath Faith will not forſake the profeſſion of it. The righteous ſhall hold on his way: And not only ſo, but,

Cum creverimus in Domino mittemus radices noſtras ſicut arbores Libani, quæ quantum in auras conſurgunt vertice, tantum radice in ima demergunt, ut nulla tempeſtate quatiantur, ſed ſtabili motu conſiſtant. Hieron.

He that hath clean hands ſhall wax ſtronger and ſtronger.

To continue in the right way is very good; but to encreaſe in it is far better; he that holds his own in ſad times, is to be commended; but he that thrives and gains in godlineſs in ſad times, is to be admired: And who is that? Job tells us,

He that hath clean hands.] The words are a Circumlocution, deſcribing the ſame perſon, who was before called, upright, innocent, and righteous. And yet ſurely it is not a bare repetition of the ſame perſon, under another title; for though we muſt take this cleanneſs of hands in conjunction with cleanneſs and uprightneſs of heart: And though it be not ſo hard a matter to ſhew a pair of white clean hands, as it is to have an upright, or a clean white heart; yea, though it be true, that clean hands will not wax ſtronger and ſtronger in a day of affliction, unleſs joyned with an upright heart, yet (I ſay) theſe clean hands imply ſomewhat elſe, not only beſides that uprightneſs, but alſo beſides that innocency and righteouſneſs ſpoken of before.

The Hand is the inſtrument of action, and clean hands are an emblem of holy actings: So that Job ſeems to intimate, that he, who beſides the uprightneſs of his heart, and the general innocency and righteouſneſs of his way, is alſo careful to keep himſelf free from every ſpot which might foul his hands. He (I ſay) who is thus compleat and ſpotleſs, is fulleſt of courage when troubles and ſorrows are upon him. 'Tis true, a mans general uprightneſs and innocency will mightily uphold him in the main; yet if he have got a viſible blot or defilement upon the face or hand of his converſation or dealings with men, this will be a damp upon his ſpirit, and a deadning to his heart, though the bent of his heart ſtands fair towards God.

Again, this may be added in anſwer to a Plea which ſome make when they are taxed with the uncleanneſs of their hands (ſay they) O we have good hearts, we are upright towards God; we confeſs we fail many times, but we have good meanings, and we would both do and be better: Is thy hand unclean? Thy heart is a thouſand times more unclean: Is thy way evil? Thy ſpirit is worſe: How can any man have a good meaning, or a good heart, when himſelf is evil? No man can. There is no excuſe for the uncleanneſs of the hands, by ſaying the heart is clean? For where there is a clean heart there will be clean hands. Many have clean hands, that have unclean hearts; but no man hath a clean heart whoſe hands continne unclean; much leſs will ſuch a one plead the cleanneſs of his heart in excuſe for the uncleanneſs of his hand; nor is there any ground for ſuch a Plea. Should a man ſay, here is a Tree that bears ill fruit, but it hath an excellent root, I am ſure it is of a right kind, but (I confeſs) the fruit is naught; would not any man of reaſon condemn ſuch reaſoning? Would he not ſay, This is to bely Nature? For every good Tree brings forth good fruit: Is it not alſo a belying of the Spirit of grace, to ſay, The heart is upright, but the hands are unclean: For an upright heart makes a clean hand, as clean hands are a probable evidence of an upright heart.

He that hath not both theſe, hath neither of them to purpoſe; which (we may conceive) was Job's ſcope while he puts them here together.

Further, while Job ſpeaks in the third perſon, He that hath clean hands; he anſwers Eliphaz for himſelf, who in a third perſon charged him with the uncleanneſs both of his heart and hands (Chap. 15. 14.) from which he alſo vindicates himſelf (Chap. 16. 17.) As if he had ſaid, Ton have often charged me with the uncleanneſs of my hands; but though I will not boaſt of my ſelf, yet this I feel and ſpeak by experience, He that hath clean hands ſhall wax Stronger and ſtronger.] The Hebrew is, He ſhall add ſtrength; that is, He ſhall go on from one degree of ſtrength to another. But what ſtrength ſhall he add? He means not bodily ſtrength: The beſt of Saints may looſe that in the battels of affliction, and grow every day weaker and weaker: But he ſhall add ſpiritual ſtrength, ſo the Apoſtle ſtates it (2. Cor. 4. 16.) Though our outward man periſh, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. The more evil a Believer ſuffers, the ſtronger he is in goodneſs, and to do good; while his fleſh wears off and waſtes, he gets new ſpirits; he takes heart, and is more courageous, as the Septuagint render Job's Text.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Grace is of an increaſing nature, it grows ſtronger and ſtronger.

True grace lives, and therefore it muſt needs grow. The grain of Muſtard-ſeed proves a great tree (Pſal. 84.)

They go from ſtrength to ſtrength, or from company to company; that is, from one good company to another, ſtill gathering up goodneſs as they go. As the Bee goes from Flower to Flower, to gather Honey; ſo Believers go from Duty to Duty, from Ordinance to Ordinance, from Praying to Hearing, to gather Grace and Strength; every Grace hath ſtrength; and the more Grace the more ſtrength, till we come to that, which is ſtrictly called, Strength of Grace.

Secondly, Obſerve, A through godly man doth not only not fall from Grace in time of trouble, but he increaſeth and groweth in Grace; he addeth Strength.

As affliction gives a proof of Grace, whether it be true or no; ſo where it is true, it is improved by affliction. Naturaliſts tell us, that the reaſon of Thunder and Lightening is, becauſe the Heat being pent in, and impriſoned by the Cold of the middle Region, breaks out (by an Antiperiſtaſis) with terrible noiſe and flaſhings: And thus when Grace is pent in by oppoſition, perſecution, and affliction, it enlargeth it ſelf, and breaks out with greater ſtrength, yea, with a kind of heavenly violence; and not only maintains its own, but is a gainer.

Tanto magis integritati ſtudebit. Bez.

It is ſaid of the Lacedemonian Republick, That when all other Kingdoms were undone by War, that only grew rich, was bettered by it. We may ſay, that whereas all prophane perſons, and Hypocrites, are undone by affliction (all their Paint is waſhed off, their Varniſh diſcovered) only true Believers thrive, and are advantaged by it: He that hath an upright heart, and clean hands, grows ſtronger and ſtronger: His inward man increaſeth in outward decayes. It is ſaid of the Iſraelites (Exod. 1. 12.) that the more the Egyptians afflicted them, The more they multiplied and grew: They multiplied in number, they grew in ſtrength and ſtature; their oppreſſion was their addition in temporals: It is ſo with all true Iſraelites in ſpirituals, the more they are afflicted and troubled, the more they increaſe: And whereas the Lord ſpeaks in reference to wicked men (Iſai. 1. 5.) Why ſhould you be ſmitten any more? Ye will revolt more and more. (The more evil men are ſmitten for their good, the worſe they are.) We may ſay on the contrary, that the righteous, the more they are ſmitten with evil, the better they are; yea, they ſometimes put wicked men to ſuch a ſtopping expoſtulation, as God makes there concerning wicked men; Why ſhould we trouble them any more? They will hold faſt more and more; they will not be beaten off with ſowre looks and hard words, no nor with our hardeſt blows: We may trouble and weary out our ſelves, yea, and break our own hearts, but we ſhall never diſhearten them. All Ages have given experiments of this: The Apoſtles in the Acts rejoyced when they were threatened, and were emboldened with ſcourging. 'Tis ſaid of the ſuffering Saints (Heb. 10. 34.) They took joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods: They were glad of an opportunity to put off their worldly goods at ſo great a rate, as a proof of the ſincerity of their graces: Our goods never go off at ſo high a price, nor come to ſo good a Market, as when they are ſpoiled in a good cauſe. Paul tells us, That many waxed confident by his bonds (Phil. 1. 14.) They were ſo far from withdrawing from the profeſſion of the Goſpel, becauſe Paul was clapt up in Priſon, and laid by the heels, that they were more bold to avouch it. As ſome have been weakened and terrified by the ſufferings of others; ſo many have been confirmed and heartened; they have not only kept from diſcouragement, but they have waxed confident by bonds, and their Spirits have been at greater liberty by ſeeing others in Priſon, though they had reaſon enough to expect their turn would be next.

One of the Ancient tells us, The more cunning and exact Perſecuters are, the more conſtant and exact Believers are. The Chriſtians of thoſe times grew into a kind of artificialneſs in Grace, while the Heathens grew ſo artificial in cruelty; and the oftner they were mowed down by the bloody Sword, the more were begotten and quickened by the Word: The oppoſition which truth and holineſs found, was a provocation to own the truth, and to them a ſweet temptation unto holineſs.

Thirdly, Note, When God gives new tryals, he will give new ſtrength.

The righteous grow ſtronger as their afflictions grow ſtronger: Never fear greater tryals, when you are promiſed greater ſtrength: If you have more burdens, you ſhall have more ſhoulders. Whether the Lord calls us to paſſive obedience, or to active, he is wiſe and faithful to proportion, and gives out ſutable ability. It is not from the improvements of Free-will, but from the freſh anointings of the Spirit, That we are ſtrengthened with might in the inner man (Epheſ. 3. 16.) And again, (Col. 1. 12.) We are ſtrengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience, and long-ſuffering with joyfulneſs. Affliction it ſelf cannot ſtrengthen us in Grace, it rather weakens us; the increaſe of ſtrength flows from the ſame Fountain, whence we had the firſt ſtrength: All is from God. In the Lord have we righteouſneſs and ſtrength (Iſa. 45. 24.) And He is an everlaſting ſtrength, the Rock of Ages (Iſa. 26. 4.) As he is an everlaſting ſtrength in himſelf, ſo he is to his people: And the reaſon why his people are everlaſting ſtrong, is, becauſe he is ſo. Even the youths ſhall faint and be weary, and the young men ſhall utterly fall; but they that wait upon the Lord ſhall renew their ſtrength, they ſhall mount up with wings as Eagles, they ſhall run and not be weary, and they ſhall walk and not faint (Iſa. 40. 30, 31.) But why ſhall the youths faint, and the young men utterly fall? Are not beginners in grace as ſure to be upheld as the ancient, or men of dayes? And why is fainting and falling the lot of youths and young men, who are ſuppoſed in their ſpiritual capacity, or in their natural, to have the greateſt ſtrength? The Apoſtle John's experience of the young men ſeems to differ very much from this Propheſie of them, I write unto you young men (ſaith he, 1 Epiſt. 2. 14.) becauſe ye are ſtrong, and the Word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. How doth Iſaiah ſay, the young men ſhall utterly fall, and yet John ſaith, They have overcome the wicked one? That is, The Devil. Every Victory is an argument of ſtrength, eſpecially a Victory over him who is very ſtrong.

I anſwer, The Prophet and the Apoſtle do not ſpeak of the ſame young men: The Prophets young men are any men that boaſt of their own ſtrength in ſpirituals, and truſt upon it; theſe, of what age ſoever they be, he calls young men, not becauſe like young men they have a real great ſtrength, but becauſe (which young men are very apt to do in the ſtrength they have) they truſt in a ſtrength which indeed they have not; ſo that theſe are called young men, becauſe they boaſt of, and truſt in their ſuppoſed ſtrength, not becauſe they are really very ſtrong; and therefore theſe young men ſhall not only faint, but utterly fall. But the Apoſtle John's young men are ſuch as have much ſtrength in them, and yet live, and walk, and fight in the ſtrength of Jeſus Chriſt; theſe young men are ſo far from falling utterly, that they ſhall ſtand for ever, and all their enemies ſhall either flee or fall before them, becauſe as the battel reneweth, ſo Chriſt will renew their ſtrength, and recruit their hearts with further aid at every further charge.

Only by going out of our own ſtrength we get ſtrength, that was Paul's experience of himſelf (2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.) When I am weak, then I am ſtrong: That is, When I am weak in my ſelf, and have low thoughts of my own ſtock, then ſtrength is ſent me in; and I am ſupported by an Almighty power, when I ſee that I have no might: Therefore (ſaith he) moſt gladly will I rejoyce in my infirmities, that the ſtrength of Chriſt may reſt on me: Paul was no ſooner convinced that the ſtrength he had was not ſufficient, but he heard that comfortable word from Heaven, My Grace is ſufficient for thee: We are ſtronger by the Grace in Chriſt, then by the Grace we receive from Chriſt. He that lives upon the Grace received from Chriſt, and not upon the Grace in Chriſt, ſhall quickly feel a want of Grace, and a decay of ſpiritual life.

Now, if Grace received from Chriſt be not ſtock enough to live and continue upon, what is Nature for any man to begin upon? Peter had received Grace, and he made an honeſt real profeſſion to Chriſt, not a flattering verbal complement, when he ſaid (Math. 26. 33, 35.) Though all men ſhall be offended becauſe of thee, yet will I not be offended; and though I ſhould die with thee, yet will I not deny thee: yet becauſe he did not enough (if at all) renounce his own ſtrength, inſtead of waxing ſtronger and ſtronger, he was weaker and weaker, and did not only deny his Maſter, but forſwore him. Not only they who go out in the ſtrength of nature, but they alſo who go out in the ſtrength of inherent grace, may quickly (notwithſtanding a ſincerity of profeſſion) diſhonour their profeſſion, and fall from their own ſtedfaſtneſs: Therefore truſt in the Lord, and ye ſhall not only hold on, but grow ſtronger and ſtronger in your way.

And if ſuch be the ſtate of a godly man, that he holds on, and waxeth ſtronger in times of trouble, what ſhall we ſay of them, who turn out of the way, or languiſh in it, when nothing troubles them? What ſhall we ſay of them who run out of the way, though there be no Lyon in the way, when we hear that Saints will not out though there be a Lyon in the way? What ſhall we ſay of them that depart from God, when (as Job ſpeaks in another place) they waſh their footſteps with Butter, and the rock powers out Oyl to them (that is, when God loadeth them with his benefits daily) when we hear that the righteous, and he that hath clean hands will not out of the way, though every ſtep be up to the knees in Mire, though he be daſhed againſt the Rocks, and killed all the day long? Was there ever truth of grace in thoſe who finding nothing but comfort and outward bleſſings in the way, do yet go out of the way, grow cold and ſink in their profeſſion? When Chriſt gives outward pleaſure to his followers, and they forſake him, may they not juſtly be ſuſpected to take pleaſure in forſaking him? And that they never took any pleaſure in following him, but only followed him for their pleaſure? What would theſe do if they were aſſaulted with ſtrong temptations or troubles, who turn aſide being freed from all ſuch temptations? What would they do if their ways were full of briers and thorns, who go back and Apoſtatize while their wayes are ſtrewed with flowers, and they tread upon Roſes? 'Tis true indeed, that the warm Sun (as we ſay) cauſeth ſome to caſt off their Cloaks, which the cold wind moved them to keep cloſer on; but, though it be a truth, that proſperity makes many forſake God, yet it cannot be denied but that adverſity is a greater temptation to deny him. A ſound heart may (poſſibly) give in a little in boiſtrous times and Winterly dayes, but it is almoſt an infallible diſcovery of a rotten heart, to flinch in fair weather, or in a Summers day. As they who keep cloſe to, and hold in the wayes of God in dark and doubtful diſpenſations, ſhew a pure love to his wayes; ſo they who warp and recede, under clear and comfortable diſpenſations, ſhew a pure diſlike of them.

Laſtly, Note the various expreſſions uſed in theſe two verſes, we have here the deſcription of a godly man under four Titles.

First, The upright.
Secondly, The innocent.
Thirdly, The righteous.
Fourthly, He that hath clean hands.

Theſe meet in one perſon, yet they have diſtinct ſignifications: Uprightneſs is ſtrictly oppoſed to hypocriſie: innocency, to guilt; righteouſneſs to oppreſſion; and cleanneſs of hands to all the pollutions of converſation. Every kind of goodneſs, and all the graces concenter in him that is truly godly.

He that is godly, is any thing that is good; and he that is wicked is any thing that is evil. You cannot call a wicked man out of his name, how ill ſoever you call him. And you cannot call a compleat godly man out of his name, how good ſoever you call him, he is upright, and innocent, and righteous; his hands are clean, and his heart is clean, he is clean all over, and holy all over, while we call him all this we do not call him beyond what God hath made him.

VERS. 10, 11, 12.

But as for you all, do you return, and come now; for I cannot find one wiſe man among you.

My dayes are paſt, my purpoſes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

They change the night into day, the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

THough Job's Friends had ſeverely reproved and threatned him; reproved him for his ſuppoſed ſin, and threatned him with further ſufferings, in caſe he continued in ſin; yet did they as often counſel, and encourage him; counſel him to repent, and return to God, encourage him with promiſes that God would repent and return to him, yea turn his captivity and afflictions, as the Rivers in the South; and that though he then was in a night of ſorrow, yet a morning of joy, or joy in the morning ſhould ſurely break out and ſhine upon him.

Now, as Job had before often (and alſo in the former part of this Chapter) ſupported himſelf under the weight of all their reproofs and threatnings, by the power of God, and the conſcience of his own integrity; ſo he had as often before, and he doth it here again in the latter part of this Chapter, caſt off their promiſes and incouragements, together with all hopes of any reſtauration in this life, to ſuch a flouriſhing outward condition as he once enjoyed.

And becauſe his Friends diſcerning this in him by ſome of his precedent anſwers, had judged it as a ſymptome of ſecret guilt, and ſelf condemnation, which would not let him ſo much as expect any good: So Eliphaz had perſtringed and ſmitten him (Chap. 15. 22.) He believes not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs: Therefore Job wonders to ſee them perſiſt in that opinion, and concludes them under a great defect of underſtanding, who did not perceive that a man ſo miſerably pined, and worn with ſickneſs and pain, as he was, had nothing to look after, or prepare for, but only a Grave. And this he doth with much rhetorical elegancy, and paſſionateneſs of ſpeech, to the end of this Chapter.

His ſenſe may be drawn together into this brief way of reaſoning.

He who is as a dead man already, ſhould not feed himſelf, or be fed by others, with hopes of life, or of worldly proſperity in this life.

But I (for my part) am as a dead man, or but the ſhadow of a man:

Therefore I will neither feed my ſelf, neither ought you to feed me with hopes of life, or of proſperity in this life.

Yet before he layes down, and illuſtrates this Argument, he invites over his Friends to his opinion, and profeſſeth that they had not yet ſpoken any reaſon, nor argued like wiſe men in all that they had argued to the contrary.

Verſ. 10. But as for you all, do you return, and come now, for I cannot find one wiſe man among you.

Though ſome wiſe men go out of the way, yet it is for want of wiſdom that any man goes out of the way; while Job calls upon his Friends to return, he implies that they going out of the way were not wiſe, and that it would be their wiſdom to return into it.

But as for you all.] Job puts all his Friends into one predicament, and indeed they were much alike to him, having all troden in the ſame path, and met in the ſame judgement of, and reſolutions againſt him. But what would he have them do? As he ſuppoſed them all in one way, and that out of the way: So he ſets them all to the ſame work, that they might come right again.

Do you return, and come now.] Yet, there are three opinions about his meaning, while he ſaith, Return and come.

Firſt, Some conceive, that Job's Friends, being netled (as we ſay) and provoked with what he had ſpoken before, began to renew the diſpute, and to rally themſelves with conjoyned Forces, for a freſh encounter; which Job perceiving, he (according to this Interpretation) dares them in theſe words, and ſends them a Challenge: As if he had ſaid, I ſee you are providing your ſelves, and conſulting for a rejoynder with me; I, do, do if you think good, return, and come, put your ſelves into what poſture you pleaſe, joyn your forces together, I am ready to receive your charge, and make my defence, I am not afraid of you all; you are three, and I have not ſo much as a Second, yet I will not turn my back from you all, therefore, as for you all, do ye return and come now, come, when, or as ſoon as you will.

Veruntamen omnes incumbite & venite quaſo. Sept. Convertendi verbum cum quocunq; alio verbo junctū, idem ſignificat quod rurſus, aut altera vice aliquid facere.

Thus, He challengeth them to a further diſpute. Return, and come, is (as the propriety of the phraſe in the Original imports) come again if you will, come a ſecond time, come a third. The word that we tranſlate Return, when it is joyned with another Verb (ſay Grammarians) ſignifies as much as Again, or, to do a thing the ſecond time. Take two places of Scripture for it (Joſ. 5.2.) At that time the Lord ſaid unto Joſhua, Make thee ſharp Knives, and circumciſe again the Children of Iſrael the ſecond time: So we tranſlate: The Hebrew is, Return (which is the word of the Text) and circumciſe them a ſecond time: Not that they who had been once circumciſed, muſt have a ſecond circumciſion: But for as much as circumciſion, which was firſt commanded to Abraham, had been long diſ-uſed, while the people of Iſrael were moving and unſetled in the Wilderneſs, therefore the Lord gives circumciſion a kind of ſecond Inſtitution, by requiring Joſhua to reſtore it ſolemnly a ſecond time, as it was ſet up at firſt. Return and circumciſe them; that is, renew that ancient Ordinance of Circumciſion.

The like way of ſpeaking, read (Pſal. 85.6.) where David (in behalf of the Church) pleads with God thus, Wilt thou not revive us again? The Hebrew is, Wilt thou not return, and revive us? We tranſlate the Verb Return, by the Adverb, Again. Wilt thou not revive us again? Thou haſt given us many revives: when we were as dead men, and like carkaſſes rotting in the Grave, thou didſt revive us; wilt thou not revive us once more, and act over thoſe powerfully merciful works, and ſtrong ſalvations once more, or again? So here, Return, and come; that is, Come again.

The words thus expounded, are an argument of Job's magnanimity and holy courage in maintaining his right, and ſtanding up in the defence of his own integrity againſt all comers. As it is our duty to contend earneſtly for the Faith once delivered to the Saints; ſo for our own faithfulneſs.

Secondly, Others expound the words as an adviſe, not as a challenge; not as a profeſſion of his fixed purpoſe to oppoſe what his Friends ſhould ſay in maintenance of their opinion, but only as a deſire of their attention to what he had yet to ſay for his. Come return now, as if he had thus expreſſed himſelf, Ye are not right, let me ſet you right, and inſtruct you better; learn of me; you have need enough to be taught, for I have not found a wiſe man among you. Thus David calls his Scholars about him (Pſal. 34.11.) Come ye Children, hearken unto me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord. The former gloſs ſhewed the ſtrength and courage of Job's ſpirit, this the piety and holineſs of his ſpirit: 'Tis our duty, in meekneſs to inſtruct thoſe who oppoſe themſelves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth (2 Tim. 2.25.)

Thirdly, The words are more generally taken for an invitation to repentance, Come now, return. Some tranſlate the word Return in this Text, by Repent, which is the ſenſe of it in a hundred Texts of the Old Teſtament. Repentance is a turning and returning; all returning ſuppoſeth, either our being out of the way, or that we have gone as far as our buſineſs lies in that way; The returning of repentance, ſuppoſeth only the former, for, every ſtep in ſin is quite out of our way; what have we to do in the way of ſin, but only to come out of it, our buſineſs lies not there; all that we do there muſt be undone again, or elſe we are undone for ever.

Invitat amicos ad mutandam ſententiam. Pined. Reſcipiſcite. Jun.

In this returning of repentance, we may conſider, firſt, the term from which, and ſecondly the term to which we are called to return. The term from which is twofold.

Firſt, Sinful practices.
Secondly, Falſe and erroneous opinions.

Job doth not deal with his Friends about the former; he did about the latter; they were under a grand miſtake concerning the Doctrine of providence, and from that he invites them to a ſpeedy return.

The term to which we are to return in the actings of repentance, is threefold.

Firſt, To our ſelves.
Secondly, To God.
Thirdly, To him whom we have wronged, or from whom we ſinfully diſſent.

Job may be interpreted as calling his Friends to a return, in this threefold reference.

Firſt, As repentance is a returning to our ſelves: a man that is carried away, either to falſe opinions, or into wicked courſes, is gone from his neareſt home: 'Tis a duty to deny our ſelves, but 'tis a ſin to depart from our ſelves: And as it is a ſin to depart from our ſelves, ſo every ſin is a departure from our ſelves; therefore repentance which is a turning from ſin, muſt needs be a returning to our ſelves. The Goſpel repreſents the repentance of the Prodigal Son, under this notion (Luke 15.17.) And when he came to himſelf, he ſaid, &c. He had not been with himſelf a long time before, yet at laſt he came to himſelf, this was his firſt ſtep to repentance. An impenitent perſon is not only out of his way, but out of his wits; he is gone, not only from Divine truth and holineſs, but from his own natural reaſon and prudence; if ſo, whenſoever he repents, he returns to himſelf.

Ad ſe redire etiā Latinis dicitur qui ad bonam mentē redit. Grot.

Secondly, Repentance is a returning to God; If thou wilt return O Iſrael (ſaith the Lord) return unto me (Jer. 4.1.) The grace of repentance is moſt frequently and moſt ſuitably expreſſed by this act of returning to God; and they who do not repent are every where ſaid not to return to God (Amos 4.&c.) Yet have ye not returned unto me.

Thirdly, Repentance is a returning to man: We muſt not be aſhamed to acknowledge our failings one to another, or to return to them in duty from whom we have departed, either by not giving them their due, or by accuſing them unduly. We muſt not be aſhamed of returning to them, by ſubmitting to the truth, from whom we have departed by following or holding any errour. Thus Job may be conceived counſelling and calling his Friends to a return in theſe three ſenſes given: Firſt, to themſelves: Secondly, to God; Thirdly, to him, whom they had ſo long oppoſed. But though all three may be included, yet the ſcope and deſign of Job ſeems to intend the third: Return, and come now; that is, Return to me, let not truth fare the worſe for my ſake, do not you caſt it off, becauſe I hold it. It is not enough to turn from any evil, whether of opinion or practice, and return to the obedience of God, but we muſt alſo return to the love of good men, and unite with them in the truth.

But why muſt they return? Job gives the reaſon expreſly in the latter part of the Verſe.

For I cannot find one wiſe man among you.

All the wayes of ſin and errour are wayes of folly; they ſtamp a man for a Fool and unwiſe, whoſoever walkes in them; I cannot find one wiſe man among you: When he ſaith, I cannot find, It ſhews that he had endeavoured to find, he had been ſeeking for a wiſe man among them, but he found none. The Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 14.2.) looked down from heaven upon the Children of men, to ſee if there were any that did underſtand and ſeek after God (but he found none) They are all gone aſide (*Verſ.*3.) Job ſeems to have been upon ſuch an inquiry: He had looked over his Friends, and weighed them one by one, but he found not one wiſe man among them. The Preacher (*Eccleſ.*7.27,28.) counting one by one to find out the account, found but one man (that is, one wiſe or good man) among a thouſand: No marvel then if Job found not one among three, yet conſidering what three theſe were, men numbred among the Worthies, poſſibly, the firſt three of that age and place, it may juſtly be marvelled why Job ſhould ſpeak at ſo low a rate, or ſo ſlightly of them: Was he not too cenſorious and rigid, too bold and adventurous, to ſpeak thus concerning men of ſuch gravity, authority, and reputation, for wiſdom, and learning, yea, and for holineſs too, as theſe three were? Shall we ſay that this cenſure proceeded from Job's wiſdom, or from his paſſion? Was he wiſe in ſaying ſo, or ſo much as charitable?

I anſwer, Job did not ſpeak this from any ill will to his Friends, or from contempt of them; it had been not only unfriendly, but very ſinful to have done it. That word of Chriſt had its truth in thoſe times, He that is angry with his brother unadviſedly, ſhall be in danger of judgement; and he that ſaith to his Brother, Racha (which ſignifies an empty fellow, or a man that hath nothing in him) ſhall be in danger of a Councel: but he that ſaith, thou Fool, ſhall be in danger of Hell fire (Matth. 5.23.) Job did not call his Friends Fools, when he ſaid, I find not one wiſe man among you; So much may be ſaid without paſſion or reviling: Nor did he queſtion their wiſdom in general, but (as hath been anſwered for him upon a like paſſage) only to the point in hand: As if he had ſaid, after all this arguing, You are ſtill beſides the matter, you have not hit the joynt of my caſe; come to me, I will ſhew you your miſtake, and make it plain that you are all out.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, It is no fault to ſpeak of men as we find them.

Venite ad me andiendū & oſtendam vos omnes decipere. Druſ.

The rule of Chriſt (Mat. 7.1.) Judge not that ye be not judged, forbids, firſt, raſh judgement of men; ſecondly, wrong judgment of men; thirdly, final judgment of men (that's peculiar to God) but it doth not forbid all judgment of men. We may call a Spade, a Spade, and him unwiſe who is ſo: All reproving is taken away, if all judging be, for we muſt reprove no man but whom we judg faulty, Let the righteous ſmite me (ſaith David, Pſal. 141. 5.) He means it not of ſmiting with the Sword, but of ſmiting with a deſerved cenſure; as if he had ſaid, If I have done amiſs, let me hear of it, yea let me ſmart for it, by a faithful reproof.

Secondly, Obſerve, A wiſe man may do or ſpeak that which is a juſt forfeiture of his preſent reputation for wiſdom.

This proceeds ſometimes from a ſpecial judgment of God upon men, who in anger blaſts their abilities, and commands a decay upon their greateſt treaſures of wiſdom (Iſa. 29.14.) The wiſdom of their wiſe men ſhall periſh, and the underſtanding of their prudent men ſhall be hid: It ſhall be ſo, ſaith God; the underſtanding of man is as much at Gods diſpoſe, as his riches or honours are. Now as this proceeds ſometimes from the ſpecial judgement of God upon man; ſo it may proceed at any time from the natural frame of man, who at the beſt is a creature compoſed of light and darkneſs, of wiſdom and folly, of knowledge and ignorance, of grace and corruption, of an old man, as well as of a new. The over actings of the worſer part, may ſoon leave a good and a wiſe man (in the main) under an eclipſe, both of his goodneſs and wiſdom. David ſaid in his haſt (and as he ſaid it, he ſinned in ſaying ſo) All men are lyars: But we may ſay it with fulleſt deliberation (and not ſin at all in ſaying ſo) that All men are lyars. The Apoſtle ſaith it (Rom. 3.4.) while he ſaith, Yea let God be true, and every man a lyar; that is, Let this be acknowledged and confeſſed by all, That God cannot lie, ſuch is his power that he can neither deceive, nor be deceived; but let it be as much acknowledged that every man is under a poſſibility to be deceived, yea and to deceive in the worſt ſenſe, and that in ſome ſenſe every man is actually deceived, or a Deceiver: which proves this to be a truth, Every man is a lyliar: The lie, is that, which no man will bear at the hand of man, yet all muſt bear it from the hand of God; it is indeed a diſhonour, but it is no ſlander to ſay, that every man is a liar: and becauſe he is ſo, he may ſoon diſ-intitle himſelf of wiſdom. We muſt not lay too much upon men, for when they ſpeak and do moſt unwiſely, they ſpeak and do moſt like men.

The Prophet (Hoſea 6.7.) ſaith, They like men have tranſgreſſed the Covenant: The Hebrew is, They have tranſgreſſed like Adam. The Apoſtle ſpeaks of ſome, over whom death reigned, who yet had not ſinned after the ſimilitude of Adams tranſgreſſion (Rom. 5.14.) Infants die, and they die in that ſin which Adam committed, though they never come to commit ſin actually as Adam did; but all who ſin actually, ſin after the ſimilitude of Adams tranſgreſſion: He ſet the firſt Copy, and all his Poſterity have written after him. We do but ſhew what we are, and whence we are, when we ſin, even a company of men, the Sons of Adam. To be a man is alſo to be a ſinner. Now, as it may be ſaid, we like men have tranſgreſſed, ſo we like men are unwiſe. It is very eaſie for the wiſeſt man to do unwiſely; we have but ſhewed our ſelves men when we have ſhewed our ſelves unwiſe. That hath obtained us an Axiome, It is humane for man to erre: One of the wiſeſt ſentences among men, is, That man may do unwiſely: He that doth all things wiſely is more like God then a Man, nor can we do any thing wiſely, but as God is pleaſed to teach and guide us. As we have need to aſk our daily bread from God for the ſupport of our bodies, ſo our daily wiſdom from God for the management of our affairs. As God takes the wiſe in their own craftineſs (1 Cor. 3.19.) So he can take wiſdom from the crafty; and unleſs he ſupply wiſdom to the wiſe, they will ſoon be ſo overtaken by their own folly, that of a whole throng of them, it may be ſaid, by him that engageth with them, I have not found one wiſe man among you.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Wiſe men are rarely to be found.

There are ſtore of ſubtle men, and crafty men there are but too many; but the wiſe man is a rare Jewel: It was for a wiſe man that the Prophet commands a ſearch to be made, when he ſaid (Jer. 5.1.) Run ye to and fro, through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem, and ſee now and know, and ſeek in the broad places thereof, if you can find a man. Jeruſalem was full of men, and yet a man could not be found, when diligently ſought for: What man was this? The next words deſcribe him for a wiſe man indeed, if there be any that executeth judgment, and ſeeketh the truth. I cannot ſay that ſuch wiſe men are thick ſown, but I am very ſure, they are thin come up. Paul found ſo great a ſcarcity and dearth of them, even among the Saints in the Church of Corinth, that though he doth not ſay it poſitively (with Job here) I have not found a wiſe man among you; yet he ſpeaks it Interrogatively, and chidingly (1 Cor. 6.5.) I ſpeak to your ſhame. Is it ſo, that there is not a wiſe man among you? No not one that ſhall be able to judge between his Brethren? There are not many knowing wiſe men, among all men, but judging wiſe men are feweſt of all.

Fourthly, Obſerve, Wiſe men are apt to ſhew themſelves unwiſe in expounding and judging the providences and dealings of God toward man.

The works of the moſt wiſe God are all right, but few men are wiſe enough to pick out the right meaning of them. Providence is carried about the world in a Chariot of light, and yet there is much darkneſs in the minds of moſt men about it. This ariſes chiefly two wayes.

Firſt, From the ſeeming confuſions which are in the world. God doth not keep a method, nor govern himſelf by preſidents, no man can tell certainly which way he will go, by looking into the way which he hath gone; for though he uſeth no liberty in the iſſue of his dealings, but rewardeth every man according to his works, yet he uſeth much liberty in the means which lead unto it.

Secondly, This ariſeth from the narrowneſs of mans heart, who meaſuring God by his own line, and comparing what God hath done, by what he would do, cannot (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks in another caſe) attain unto the righteouſneſs of God in what he doth.

'Tis excellent wiſdom to know how to interpret and improve the dealings of God with our ſelves or others. The groſſeſt miſ-interpretation of his dealings, is, to conclude the guilt or innocency of man, the love or hatred of God from them. Job's Friends upon ſuch miſtakes, incurred this cenſure, I have not found one wiſe man among you.

Job having by way of introduction, ſpoken to the men, or to the perſons of his Friends, proceeds to ſpeak his own caſe.

Verſ. 11. My dayes are paſt, my purpoſes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

What do you tell me of comfortable dayes? My dayes are paſt, they are gone by: as we ſay, The Shew is gone by, or, the Company is gone by; ſo ſaith Job, My dayes are gone by: There's no looking after them any more: they are out of ſight, why would you bring them into my mind again? Dayes may be taken here in a twofold ſenſe.

Firſt, For the term of his life.

Secondly, For the ſtate of his life.

As taken for the term of his life, My dayes are paſt, is, I am a near neighbour to death, death and I am ready to meet and imbrace. The life of man is meaſured by dayes; when our dayes are paſt, there's nothing left to meaſure, nothing to meaſure by.

Morti vicinus ſum.

My dayes are paſt.] But how could Job affirm, The term, or dayes of my life are paſt, when, as he was alive that day to ſay this, ſo he lived many a fair day after he had ſaid it. Can we call that paſt, which is ſtill preſent with us? or which is yet to come?

He affirms this, Firſt, becauſe he conceived that the greateſt part of his dayes were actually paſt, and that it was not worth while to reckon upon the few dayes behind, he did not think that remnant ſo conſiderable as to meaſure it, but threw it by, as a piece of uſeleſs nothing: Our dayes are ſo paſſing, that (with a little Rhetorick) we may ſay they are paſt, as ſoon as they begin; how much more may we ſay ſo, when we are ſure they muſt ſhortly end, and are really almoſt, yea, only not, paſt.

Secondly, Job might ſay, My dayes are paſt, becauſe doubtleſs it had ſiezed on his ſpirit, that his Glaſs was run, that he ſhould die preſently, he never looked to out-live that ſtorm: So that his dayes were paſt in his account, though not in Gods account. Job could ſay of himſelf (as we uſe to ſay of thoſe Women, who have gone out their full time of Child-bearing) that, He had not a day more to reckon. As Job had a full aſſurance that he ſhould live eternally, ſo he had a kind of aſſurance that he ſhould die very ſhortly: And therefore as to his own apprehenſions, and the calculation which he had made of his dayes, their date was out, and he might ſay, My dayes are paſt.

Again, As taken for the ſtate of his life, ſo My dayes are paſt, is, My good dayes, my proſperous dayes, are paſt. You tell me of a day of deliverance, what a morning I ſhall have, but I look on all my dayes here, as dayes of darkneſs. We ſay of a man who is not only in an evil, but in a deſperate, or irrecoverably evil condition, He hath ſeen all his beſt dayes, or all his good dayes are gone. Job was full of truſt for a good eternity, but he had no hope of good dayes. The term of a mans dayes may continue long, when the comfort of his dayes, is, or when his comfortable dayes are quite paſt: Though Job's dayes continued, as to the term of his life, yet his dayes (as he judged) were paſt, as to any comfortable ſtate of life, in which ſenſe he might alſo ſay, My dayes are paſt.

Nor did Job ſpeak this complainingly, or with a low ſpirit, My dayes are paſt; he did not whine it out as they do, who are loath to die, and would fain live ſtill in the delights of life; but he ſpake boldly and cheerfully, he ſpake of his Dying-day, as of his Marriage-day, My dayes are paſt. As a young man ſaith, My marriage day is at hand, I ſhall be married ſhortly; with ſuch a holy alacrity Job ſpake, I ſhall die ſhortly, my dayes are paſt: He looked upon his comfortable dayes in the World as paſt, and yet he was comforted: Job was full of pain, yet uſually in the cloſe of his ſpeeches he gathered up himſelf, and ſpake in a height and heat of ſpirit. As the Cock towards morning flutters his Wins before he Crowes, and gives warning of the approaching day; or as the Lyon ſtrikes his ſides with his Tail, to rouze up his ſpirits before he attempts his prey; ſo Job ſtirr'd up himſelf towards the cloſe of his anſwers, and reſumed new ſpirits, acting That dying man to the life, who having nothing in this World, either to fear or hope, dies without fear, yet with abundance, yea in aſſurance of hope: My dayes are paſt.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, As the words are taken in the former ſenſe: A gracious heart hath peace in the approaches of death.

His contentments are not done, when the term of his life is done: He can ſay, My dayes are paſt, as cheerfully, as Agag ſaid, Surely, the bitterneſs of death is paſt. Some godly men have died far more pleaſantly then ever any wicked man lived.

Secondly, From the latter ſenſe, Obſerve,

A gracious heart can take preſent comfort, and rejoyce in this World, while he knowes that all his worldly comforts and joyes are paſt.

Faith overlooks, or looks through and beyond all the evils of this life, to a good which ſhall never die; yea Faith ſees and enjoys a preſent good, while ſenſe ſees nothing, and indeed hath nothing elſe to ſee, but evil. A carnal man parts with his good dayes, or with the good of his dayes, as Phaltiel went to deliver up Michal, Sauls Daughter, and David's Wife by right, weeping all along as he went (2 Sam. 3.16.) There's a ſad parting between a worldly heart and worldly things; but he that is ſpiritually minded, though he doth not deſpiſe the meaneſt of worldly good things, as made by God for the uſe and comfort of man, ſo when God calls him from them, or them from him, he can part with the uſe of them, and yet not be diſpoſſeſſed of comfort; he knows that he hath a preſent good, and that he hath greater good to come, while he ſaith, My dayes are paſt.

My purpoſes are broken off.] The word which we tranſlate Purpoſes, ſignifies moſt uſually an evil purpoſe, or wicked deſignments; yet it is uſed alſo, as among the Rabbins, ſo by the Penmen of Scripture in a good ſenſe, for a warrantable, yea for a holy purpoſe: In the Book of Proverbs (*Chap.*1.4. *Chap.*2.11.) it is tranſlated Diſcretion or Adviſement, proceeding from the teachings of wiſdom, which ſtirs up gracious purpoſes in the ſoul towards God, and every good.

My purpoſes are broken off: The Septuagint render, My heart ſtrings are broken: The heart-ſtrings by a metaphor, may be taken for purpoſes, becauſe purpoſes are as Bands or ſtrings upon the heart; and therefore when purpoſes are broken, we may ſay, the bands or ſtrings of the heart are broken.

Rupti ſunt articuli cordis mei. Sept.

Another reads, The bindings or faſtnings of my body are looſned, or torn aſunder; which tranſlation (as alſo the former) taken literally, notes only his nearneſs to death; for when a man dieth, we ſay, his heart-ſtrings break, and his whole body is in a fit of Convulſion.

Convulſæ ſunt compages corporis mei. Aug.

My purpoſes are broken.] The word ſignifies a violent forcible breaking, as if a Giant had broken them.

But what was it which broke his purpoſes? The violence and continuance of his afflictions was this Breaker; or his purpoſes were broken by the confuſed motions and troubleſome repreſentations of his own fanſie, to which ſick men are very ſubject.

Again, what were thoſe purpoſes of his which were broken? If they were evil purpoſes, he had reaſon to rejoyce, not to complain; if they were good purpoſes, was it not his ſin as well as his affliction that they were broken off.

I anſwer to that, Purpoſes may be good, and yet broken without the ſin of the purpoſer, if himſelf be not the cauſe of that breach, and the impediment of their performance: If our holieſt purpoſes are broken off by the inevitable providence of God, the holineſs of man receives no blemiſh by it. The purpoſes of Job were good doubtleſs, either ſpiritually good, or civilly good; and they may be taken either for thoſe purpoſes of doing good, which he had, before he fell into trouble, or for thoſe which he had laid up in his breſt, to do, when he ſhould be again reſtored and delivered out of trouble. As if he had ſaid, I once had an expectation of life, and I purpoſed with my ſelf what to do with, or in my new life, but now thoſe purpoſes are all broken off, for I ſee my life is ready to be broken off. The next clauſe ſeems to explain this, and in that we ſhall ſee more fully what he means by theſe purpoſes.

Even the thoughts of my heart.] Every thought of the heart is not a purpoſe; yet every purpoſe is a thought of the heart: our thoughts are made up into purpoſes, either what to do, or not to do: Hence it is uſual to ſay, I thought to have done ſuch or ſuch a thing; that is, I purpoſed to do it. Therefore Job might well ſay, My purpoſes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart, becauſe purpoſes are nothing elſe but a frame, or pack of thoughts: There is an elegancy in that word which we tranſlate Thoughts. The Hebrew is, The poſſeſſions of my heart; ſo we put it in the Margin of our Bibles: A learned Tranſlator renders it thus, The thoughts which my mind was wont to poſſeſs are pull'd or ſnatch'd away: He means it not of all his thoughts, as if his power of thinking had been loſt; but of thoſe ſpecial thoughts which he had, or hopes, which he nouriſhed about his reſtoring to happy dayes; theſe once poſſeſſed his heart, but they were gone. Thoughts are called the poſſeſſions of the heart two wayes.

First, In a paſſive } ſence.
Secondly, In an active }

Paſſively, Becauſe they are poſſeſſed by the heart; the heart doth encloſe and hold our thoughts: The heart is the naturally proper veſſel or receptacle of thoughts, therefore they are called the poſſeſſions of the heart: The heart is the ſoyl and ſeat of thoughts; there they are planted, and there they dwell.

Actively, For as thoughts are poſſeſſed by the heart, ſo thoughts poſſeſs the heart; thoughts are full of activity; they trouble and they comfort the heart; look what our thoughts are, ſuch is the ſtate of our hearts; if our thoughts be quiet, our hearts are quiet; if our thoughts be unquiet, our hearts are unquiet; if our thoughts be joyful, our hearts rejoyce; if our thoughts be ſad, our hearts are ſorrowful. 'Tis ſaid in the Goſpel (Luke 24. 38.) Why are ye troubled? why do thoughts riſe in your hearts? That is, Why do troubleſome and diſconſolate thoughts riſe in your hearts? 'Tis as natural for thoughts to riſe in the heart, as it is for water to riſe in a Spring; therefore Chriſt did not chide them becauſe thoughts, but becauſe ſuch thoughts did riſe in their hearts: We cannot hinder our hearts from thinking, no more then we can hinder the fire from burning, or water from wetting; but 'tis our duty to hinder our hearts from undue or diſcouraging thoughts, and to check them for thinking ſo. Thoughts rule the heart and put it into ſeveral frames and forms according to their own likeneſs; and therefore it is both our wiſdom and our holineſs to put and keep our thoughts in the beſt likeneſs. The heart (in a figurative ſence) is nothing elſe but the frame of our thoughts; and our thoughts in a proper ſence, are nothing elſe but the poſſeſſions of the heart.

Tabulæ cordis. Chald.

Further, The Chaldee Paraphraſe ſaith, The Tables of my heart are broken; ſo it is an alluſion to writing: The Law was written at firſt in Tables of Stone, and now a heart of fleſh (not a fleſhly heart) is the Tables of the Law; our hearts are Tables both for our own writing and for Gods. Job had written many purpoſes upon thoſe Tables; therefore he might well ſay as in this caſe, My purpoſes, or all that was written upon the Tables of my heart, are broken. In my thoughts I had written and ſet down many particulars which I purpoſed to have done, but now thoſe lines are croſſed, or quite blotted out. God writes many of his own thoughts in our hearts, and our thoughts are the writings of our hearts; when our purpoſes and thoughts are broken, the Tables of our hearts are broken.

Scriptura cordis nunc litura eſt. Pined.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Right purpoſes are good, but it is not good to live upon purpoſes.

Action muſt preſently follow reſolution, and performance muſt be ſpeeded after purpoſes, elſe they are to little purpoſe. When David had ſaid, I will confeſs my tranſgreſſions unto the Lord (Pſal. 32. 5.) he inſtantly confeſſed them: And when he ſaid, I will take heed to my wayes (Pſal. 39. 1.) he inſtantly took heed to them. His purpoſe was in nature, before his practice, but in time they went together: There is a double danger in delaying purpoſes.

Firſt, That the mind of the purpoſer may change, and his ſpirit grow flat towards them.

Secondly, That the ſeaſons may change, and though he have a mind, yet he may want means and opportunity to perform them.

There is danger in both wayes, and much ſin in the former way of breaking purpoſes: The danger of both will be more diſcovered in the ſecond Obſervation.

Secondly, Obſerve, When great afflictions come, eſpecially when death comes, all our purpoſes are broken off.

As man is apt to buſie himſelf about many things, which he cannot know, ſo about many things, which (though they are poſſible to be done, yet) he ſhall never do. It is in man to purpoſe, but we muſt ask leave of God, before we can perform: Croſs providences break many purpoſes, but death breaks all. All our purpoſes concerning the World, and the things of the World dye with us. When the breath of great Princes goeth forth (Pſal. 146. 4.) In that very day all their thoughts periſh. Great Princes are full of great thoughts; but they who cannot keep themſelves from periſhing, ſhall never keep their thoughts from periſhing. The imaginary frames which they ſet up, the contrivances, plots, and projects of their hearts are all ſwept away like the Spiders Web, or broken like the Cockatrices Egg, when themſelves are ſwept away from the face of the Earth, and broken by the power of death. The thoughts of many Princes and Polititians dye while themſelves live: Ahitophel's purpoſes were broken and diſappointed, while himſelf looked on, and he was ſo vexed to ſee it, that he executed himſelf becauſe his purpoſes were not executed. In theſe times of publick ſhaking, how many purpoſes have we ſeen go to wrack? They who have been long laying their deſigns, and brooding upon their counſels, have had their eggs broken in a moment, and their thoughts blown away like chaff before the wind, or the lighter duſt before the whirlwind: Now as the purpoſes of many about gathering riches, about taking their pleaſure, about advancing themſelves to, or eſtabliſhing themſelves in honour and high places, have periſhed before they dyed; ſo when ſuch dye, all their purpoſes ſhall certainly periſh: And as the purpoſes of all about worldly things periſh in the approaches of death; ſo do the purpoſes of ſome about ſpiritual and heavenly things. How many have had purpoſes to repent, to amend their lives and turn to God, which have been prevented, and totally broken off, by the extremity of pain and ſickneſs, but chiefly by the ſtroke of death; when they have (as they thought) been about to repent, and (as we ſay) turn over a new leafe in their lives; they have been turned into the Grave by death; and into Hell by the juſt wrath of God.

Some interpret this Text, as Job's complaint of the unſettlement of his thoughts about heavenly things, and the breaking of his purpoſes in the purſuit of eternity: He could not make his thoughts about Heaven hold or hang together, even thoſe thoughts were full of gaps and empty ſpaces, or rather like Ropes of Sand. Many honeſt and gracious ſouls have found work enough upon a death-bed, or a ſick-bed to attend the pain and infirmity of their bodies. When they have purpoſely ſet themſelves (the habitual bent of their hearts being alwayes ſet that way) actually to ſeek God, to meditate upon the precious Promiſes, to put forth freſh lively workings of Faith upon the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, they have been ſuddenly recalled, yea, even forcibly fetcht back by ſome violent aſſault of pain, or a previous charge of death: So that thoſe thoughts which ſhould be (and they deſired that they might be) like their objects, moſt durable and ſteady, were yet more like ſome odd ends or broken pot-ſheards, more like vaniſhing flaſhes, or wandring fancies, then that beautiful frame of heart, or thoſe well combined and faſtened meditations which they intended. For though all the troubles of this life, and the approaches of death it ſelf cannot break, diſappoint or ſcatter thoſe fixed purpoſes, and thoughts which a Believer hath had, or thoſe reſults and reſolves which he hath often made in his own ſoul about the hopes and concernments of eternal life; yet he may be pitifully puzzled, amuzed, and interrupted in his preſent motions and meditations about them.

Non poterat jugi contēplatio in rerum divinarum ut quōdam ſolebat intendere propter vim doloris. Phil.

Propter multiplices animi motus & perturbationes jā dolebat, jam timebat, nūc ſe erigebat in ſpem meliorem, nunc iterum concidebat.

Hence take this Caution.

Seeing not only our worldly thoughts periſh, but our ſpiritual thoughts may be much broken by ſtrong temptations and variety of bodily diſtempers, in times of trouble and ſickneſs, let us haſten to ſettle our purpoſes and thoughts about eternal life, yea, to ſee our ſouls paſſed from death to life, before we ſee ſickneſs and ſorrow, much more before we ſee our ſelves ready to paſs from life to death. Purpoſes to repent, or to mind heavenly things, not only may, but for the moſt part are broken off, and loſt when ſickneſs and ſorrow find us. Beware of this deceit of the Devil, who tells us we ſhall have leiſure to ſeek God when we are ſick, and that we ſhall have a fair opportunity to ſettle all the affairs of our ſouls, when we are going out of the body: Then (he tells us) we ſhall have nothing elſe to do, and therefore we ſhall ſurely do it then. Let not Satan deceive us with theſe vain words, for then he intends us moſt blows; then is his ſeaſon to break our thoughts into a thouſand pieces, and to vex us with the ſplinters, even when we lye upon our ſick-beds, or are bewildred with affliction. There is ſcarce one of twenty, but finds breakings, and convulſions upon his thoughts, at the ſame time when he feels them upon his body: How often have ſick men been heard to ſay, We cannot ſet our ſelves to think ſeriouſly of Heaven, or to act Faith, &c. To ſuffer and be ſick, is work enough for any man at one time: He had not need to have his greateſt work to do when he hath ſuch work to do.

They who have had brave ſpirits, and fixed holy purpoſes upon their death-beds, were ſuch as had been long exerciſed in them before. Woe to thoſe who put off their beginnings in Grace, till they are ready to finiſh in Nature: A dying man is unfit for any buſineſs; how much more for this? He is extreamly indiſpoſed for worldly purpoſes, much more for heavenly: And therefore as ſoon as a man that hath any Eſtate, begins to be ſick, Friends will move him, Pray Sir, ſettle your Eſtate, make your Will, you know not how God may deal with you, if your diſeaſe ſhould encreaſe a little more, you may be totally diſabled to do it; therefore pray haſten: Yea, we find that moſt men of valuable Eſtates in the World, make their Wills in their health, when they are free from ſickneſs and furtheſt from death, when they have the greateſt activity of mind and body: They wiſely remember how ſome, who had a full purpoſe to make their Wills in ſickneſs, have been ſuddenly overpowered by the malignity of a diſeaſe, and could never do it, but have left all at ſix and ſevens. If ſo, ſhall any man leave his ſoul undiſpoſed of, or at ſix and ſevens, till ſuch a time? A ſick man being minded of any worldly buſineſs (unleſs he have a great mind to it) thinks it excuſe enough to wave it, becauſe he is ſick; I pray do not trouble me with it (ſaith he) I cannot think of it now, you and I will ſpeak about it hereafter when I am recovered. Do ſick men think it reaſon they ſhould be excuſed from worldly buſineſs becauſe they are ſick? And ſhall any man reſolve that it is beſt to deal about ſpiritual buſineſſes when he is ſick? If Job, who had a holy and a ſound mind under a diſeaſed body, ſaid, My purpoſes are broken off, and the thoughts or poſſeſſions of my heart: How much more will they feel theſe breaches, whoſe minds are ſick and more diſeaſed then their bodies?

Further, Obſerve, The difference between God and man, what a vain creature man is, and how excellent God is.

God never had one of his purpoſes broken; whatever he purpoſed he hath carried to perfection; he never loſt a thought, nor any of the poſſeſſions of his heart. The counſel of the Lord ſtandeth for ever, and the thoughts of his heart to all Generations (Pſal. 33. 11.) 'Tis the glory of God that his purpoſes ſtand; he is able to make them ſtand, though all the world ſhould combine as one man to caſt them down. 'Tis the diſhonour of man that he ſo often falls from his own purpoſes, and eats up his own reſolves; and 'tis the puniſhment of ſome men, that their purpoſes receive a fall, that their moſt ſolemn debates and ſetled reſolves are ſcattered and confounded; The Lord (in judgment) bringeth the counſel of the Heathen to nought, he maketh the devices of the people of none effect (Pſal. 33. 10.) All the thoughts of man are loſeable, and moſt men loſe their thoughts.

It is the comfort of Believers that they are not bottom'd upon their own purpoſes or thoughts, but upon the thoughts and purpoſes of God (that's their baſis) and that ſhall never be broken; God is unchangeable, and therefore his purpoſes cannot break: When mans purpoſes are broken, he either changeth, or ſuffers a change; of which Job complains in the next Verſe.

Verſe 12. They change the night into day, and the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

Here are two things to be opened.

First, What is meant by changing the night into day.

Secondly, Who it is that changeth the night into day.

They change the night into day.] Hath not the Lord made a Promiſe, yea, a Covenant (which is more then a Promiſe) and annexed a ſign to it, which is the ratification of a Covenant (Gen. 8. 22.) that to the end of the world, while the earth remaineth, Seed-time, and harveſt, and Summer, and Winter, and cold and heat, and day and night, ſhall not ceaſe; that is, they ſhall not ceaſe in their turns and ſeaſons? How is it here ſaid, They change the night into day; as if the night and day were out of courſe, when as the Lord hath covenanted, that they ſhall continue in their courſe?

I anſwer, There is a twofold change of times, of day and night.

First, A Natural } Change.
Secondly, A Metaphorical }

The united power of all Creatures in Heaven and Earth, cannot make a natural change of day into night, and God the Creator hath promiſed that he will not make that change; he will not break the ſucceſſion of night and day, while the Earth remaineth.

But a Metaphorical change of night into day, and of day into night, hath been often made; for when the night is ſo full of trouble to us that we cannot ſleep, the night is changed into day; and when the day is ſo full of trouble to us, that we can neither do our work, nor take our comforts, then the day is changed into night: The night is the time appointed for natural reſt, therefore the night may be ſaid to be changed into day, when we cannot reſt, and this is a great affliction; for though in ſome ſence, and in Scripture-ſence too, to have the night changed into day, is a mercy, and notes a change from a troubled eſtate into a comfortable eſtate; yet to have the night changed by our reſtleſneſs, or want of ſleep, is both an affliction it ſelf, and an argument that we are burdened and over-preſſed with other manifold afflictions.

Hoc tormentum cordis, nec nox interrumpebat quæ eſt tempus deputatum humanæ quieti, gravius eſt pati ſomni defectum in nocte quam in die. Aquin.

In this ſence Job complains of the change of his night into day; and thus God often changeth times and ſeaſons, both to particular perſons and whole Nations (Dan. 2. 21.) Daniel anſwered and ſaid, Bleſſed be the Name of God for ever and ever, for wiſdom and might are his, and he changeth the times, and the ſeaſons, he removeth Kings, and he ſets up Kings: He changeth the times and ſeaſons; that is, He makes ſeaſons comfortable, or troubleſome; peaceable, or unquiet; he changeth the night into day, or the day into night, as himſelf pleaſeth.

Meæ cogitationes moleſtæ animum rodentes, noctem mihi convertunt in diem; efficiunt ut noctes ducam inſomnes. Merc.

And the light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.] That is, The day is to me as no day, becauſe of my calamity and miſery; my day is ſhort, becauſe darkneſs ſuddenly overtakes it. Artificial dayes are long or ſhort, according to the diſtance which the darkneſs of the night keeps from them. Our Metaphorical dayes are long or ſhort, according to the diſtance which the darkneſs of trouble keeps from them. Thus the change of day into night, and of night into day, is to be reckoned by the condition we are in: When we cannot ſleep in the night, our night is changed into day; and when ſorrow ſeizeth on us in the day, our day is changed into night; or, The light is ſhort to us by reaſon of darkneſs.

Propter calamitates.

But who was it that made this change? They change the night into day, and the day into night: Who? Some aſcribe it

Hæ meæ cogitationes noctem mihi in diem convertunt. Merc.

it to his troubled thoughts, of which he had ſpoken before; his thoughts were ſo torn and diſtracted, that their confuſions turned the night into day, and the day into night; that is a plain ſence: As if he had ſaid, By reaſon of my continual cares and diſtractions, I take no comfort neither night nor day.

Præſentium malarum cogitationes efficiunt ut dies quamvis lucidus mihi ſit nox. Jun.

Others refer it his Friends, They, that is, my Friends, turn the night into day, and the day into night; and if his Friends be the Antecedent, it comes much to one, for his Friends did it by filling him with troubleſome thoughts, and unquiet reaſonings; his Friends did it by filling his heart and head (as we ſay) with their Proclamations.

Hence Note, When the mind is unſetled the man cannot reſt.

Waking nights and weariſome dayes are the portion of a troubled ſpirit.

Propinquum pro brevi exponit. Rab. Sol.

There is a further elegancy conſiderable in the latter branch of this Verſe, The light is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs. The Original is, The light is near becauſe of darkneſs. The word ſignifies nearneſs, whether in time or place, and it is uſually put in Scripture for ſhort, for that which is of ſhort continuance (Job 20. 5.) The triumphing of the wicked is ſhort. The Margin is, The triumphing of the wicked is from near: That is, It is hard by, it began but lately, and it will ſoon be over, or at an end. In this elegancy the holy Ghoſt ſpeaks of falſe Gods (Deut. 32. 17.) They ſacrificed to Devils, and not to God; to Gods whom they knew not, to new Gods that were come newly up: The Hebrew is, to near Gods (it is this word) to ſhort Gods; Gods that are near: That is, Gods ſhort or near in their original, they have been but a little while, they are newly come up, as we tranſlate, Whom your Fathers knew not, nor feared: Idols are new Gods, near Gods; we need not travel far to find out their deſcent and pedigree, the oldeſt of them are but of a late date, or of a new edition, upſtart Gods, as they are compared with Jehovah the true God, who is from everlaſting: And as they are called near Gods, in regard of their original, and riſe; ſo likewiſe in regard of their continuance, they are not for eternity, we ſhall ſee an end of thoſe Gods ſhortly, they are not long-lived, much leſs are they to everlaſting. The true God is the ſame for ever; falſe Gods are nothing; Idols are nothing in the World, and they ſhall in ſhort time be thruſt out of the World; and all the near Gods ſhall be put far away. What the Lord ſpeaks of theſe night-Gods, the Gods of the darkneſs of this World, Job ſpeaks of the comforts or light which he once received from God. The light is ſhort, becauſe of darkneſs: That is, It is ready to end and expire.

Idola dicuntur dii ex propinquo, i.e. qui diu non duraverunt, vel qui de novo pro diis haberi cœperint. Merc.

We may ſay of all the light which we have in this World, that it is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs: Spiritual light, or the light of Gods countenance ſhining in, or upon his people, hath a darkneſs attending upon it in this World. The experiences of moſt Chriſtians anſwer that of one of the Ancients about this heavenly light, It comes but ſeldom, and it is ſoon gone: We have but ſome glimpſes and glances of Divine favour here, not a ſteady ſence of it; that (except to a very few) is reſerved for Heaven: 'Tis ſo alſo about temporal light; the light of Gods providence towards us hath a darkneſs attending upon it, yea, a darkneſs mixed with it: When our comforts have ſcarce ſaluted us, or ſpoken with us, they are interrupted and taken off by approaching ſorrows. Thoſe creature enjoyments and relations which have moſt light in them, have alſo much darkneſs hanging about them, and hovering over them. Man at the beſt eſtate is altogether vanity: And his longeſt light here is ſhort becauſe of darkneſs.

Rara hora brevis mora. Bern.

But Job ſpeaks not this in reference to the general ſtate of man, much leſs to the beſt eſtate of man in this life; he applyes it ſpecially to an afflicted eſtate, and particularly to his own: How ſhort is the light of an afflicted ſoul? How quickly do Clouds come over him, and Eclipſes ſhut the ſhining from him, when the light of a man in proſperity is but ſhort, and his day in danger of a night every moment? All our light on earth dwells upon the borders of darkneſs; the light of Heaven hath no neighbourhood with it, and therefore is not only long, but everlaſting.

Illæ tenebroſæ cogitationes à mente mea diſcedentes, pro nocte jucundum quietis diem, & pro tenebris lucem matutinam, i.e. optatam pacē conſtituunt. Bold.

Yet I find a learned Interpreter making this Verſe ſpeak the return of Job's light; The changing of night into day, is to be underſtood (ſaith he) in a good ſence: And the breaking of his thoughts and purpoſes is (according to this Interpretation) nothing elſe but the ſcattering of his dark and melancholy thoughts and purpoſes, which being removed and gone, the night of ſorrow was turned into a day of joy, and the morning light (here called the near light, becauſe it immediately ſucceeds the darkneſs, which the noon-light doth not) this morning light (ſaith he) came before the face of darkneſs.

Et rurſum poſt tenebras ſpero lucem. Vulg.

To which ſence the Vulgar Latine tranſlates the laſt clauſe, After darkneſs I hope for light; or, though I be now in darkneſs, I hope for light: As if Job had ſaid, After this dark night and dreadful ſtorm, God hath ſpoken to the angry Sea of my tempeſtuous thoughts, and behold there is a great calm. But though the Author of this Expoſition be ſo much in love with it, that he counts all other ſpurious; yet I rather perſiſt in, and ſtick to the former; ſeeing the whole context runs upon the aggravation of Job's preſent troubles, with which this Interpretation holds no agreement. Nor is there any neceſſity (as the Author ſuppoſeth) to take it up, for the avoiding of that imputation of a low, weak, and ſinking ſpirit, which the former Expoſition, in his apprehenſion, ſubjects Job unto; for though we ſay that Job doth, as often elſewhere, ſo here again, make report of his ſorrows in higheſt ſtrains of holy Rhetorick; yet we are ſo far from ſaying that he deſponded, or ſunk under them, that we doubt not to ſay (which is all that this Author would ſay, or have others take notice of in his ſingular Interpretation) that he was more then a Conqueror over them all. 'Tis not only granted, that Job did hope for a day of joy after his night of ſorrow, but affirmed, that he had a day of joy in his night of ſorrow (for he could ſay, in a true ſence, what the Apoſtle Paul after did, as ſorrowful, yet alwayes rejoycing) yet his night (by reaſon of his outward troubles, and many aſſaults of inward terror) was changed into a laborious toyling day, and his outward light of comfort was ſhort and quickly ended, when he had it, By reaſon of the faces (as the Original hath it) or ſudden appearances of darkneſs.

VERS. 13, 14, 15, 16.

If I wait, the Grave is mine houſe: I have my bed in the darkneſs.

I have ſaid to corruption, Thou art my Father; to the Worm, thou art my Mother, and my Siſter.

And where is now my hope? As for my hope, who ſhall ſee it?

They ſhall go down to the bars of the pit, when our reſt together is in the duſt.

JOB proſecutes the former Argument, and ſhews yet more fully the vanity of thoſe hopes which his Friends would nouriſh in him about a temporal reſtauration. He ſhews alſo, that though himſelf ſhould nouriſh them, and even ſtrive to hope, yet he could no more keep ſuch hopes from languiſhing, then himſelf from dying, If I wait, the Grave is mine houſe.

Verbum קוה affinitatem habet cum קו perpendiculū, lineā.

If I wait.] Waiting is an act of the mind, in expectation of ſome future good: The Original word ſignifies an earneſt waiting, or waiting joyned with much intention of ſpirit, and ſtrong deſires, as if the mind did let out a cord, or line, to take hold of the thing, for which we wait. Waiting is nothing elſe but patience lengthened out upon a promiſe. There are three acts of the ſoul upon the promiſes.

First, Believing.
Secondly, Hoping.
Thirdly, Waiting.

We believe the truth of the promiſe; we hope for the good laid up in the promiſe; we wait till that good be given out unto us. If I wait (ſaith Job) God waits

Dicitis (amici) ſi me humiliem, manere meā expectationem: atqui cernitis vires meas & vitam meam veniſſe ad ultimam lineam quippe mala mea curam reſpuunt. Coc.

upon us; and we wait upon God: God waits in mercy; we wait in duty: God waits to be gracious (Iſa. 30. 18.) and man waits to be refreſhed with the Grace of God. Job, in this place, ſeems to make light or little of this duty of waiting: If I wait, or, although I wait, or, what if I wait, what ſhall I get by it? Where's the profit? Or what are my comings in? He tells us what; If I wait, all that I ſhall get by it will be a Grave, or a bed in darkneſs: And all my preferment will be, to call corruption my Father; and to ſay of the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and my Siſter: Here's all I am like to have for all my waiting.

But was this all he looked for by waiting?

Yes, it was all he looked for, and all he thought himſelf in a capacity to receive in this World (though in that he was deceived) he had no expectation but to dye, and go down to the duſt; he had no hope to rejoyce in any Kindred or Alliance, but Worms and corruption, theſe were his Mother, and his Siſters, and Brethren: If I wait, here's all I ſhall have. Thus (as I intimated before) the words carry a ſtrong confutation of thoſe hopes which his Friends endeavoured to raiſe up in him, that God would raiſe him up, and make him as a Prince among the people, if he repented and turned to God. No, ſaith he, what do you tell me of a great Houſe, and of a great Name, of a riſing Sun, and of the Morning light? why am I ſo often told of theſe things? I tell you once for all, the Grave is my houſe, Darkneſs is my bed, and the Worms are my kindred and companions; let me hear no more of theſe groundleſs prophecyings, and unſavory flatteries, for my wound is incurable, and I am at the laſt caſt, If I wait, the Grave is my houſe.

Docet præciſam eſſe ſibi his malis omnem vitæ ſpem vel ſi eam maximè animo fovere velit. Si expectē i. e. ſi expectare ſtudeā. Merl.

Again, The word which we tranſlate to wait, coming, as was toucht before, from a Root which ſignifies a Carpenters Line, by which he meaſures his buildings: Some render the Text thus, If I build, the Grave is my houſe: As if he had ſaid, I have no other houſe to build but a Grave; or when I have builded my beſt, I ſhall have no other houſe but a Grave.

Si ædificavero, infernus domus mea. Rab. Dan.

The Grave.] The ſame word ſignifieth Hell, as was ſhewed (Chap. 11. 8.) and therefore I will not ſtay here upon it: If I wait, the Grave

Is my houſe.] He calls the Grave a houſe, becauſe there we reſt as in a houſe: Man goeth forth of his houſe to labour, and comes home to his houſe for reſt: Some tell us Job calls the Grave his houſe, in alluſion to thoſe forms of making Graves, or Sepulchres, uſed in ancient (which are alſo continued in theſe) times, with arches, and contrivances like a houſe.

Ægyptii defunctorū ſepulchra, domos æternas appellant. Diodor. lib. 1.

And I have made my bed in the darkneſs.

He ſpeaks ſtill in proſecution of the alluſion: In a houſe there are Dining-rooms, and there are ſleeping Rooms; there is the Bed-chamber, and the Bed in the Chamber. The Grave is my houſe (ſaith Job) and there I have a Bed, I have made it,

In the darkneſs.] The Grave is a dark place; and the Grave is called Darkneſs in a double reſpect.

Firſt, Becauſe there is no light of the body there.

Secondly, Becauſe there is no light of the Sun there.

The light of the body is the eye, and the light of the Air is the Sun; but in the Grave the Sun ſhines not, or if it did, yet there the eye ſees not, therefore the Grave is darkneſs: I have made my bed in the darkneſs: And darkneſs is moſt fit for a bed; ſleep loves darkneſs: A working Room muſt be light; but 'tis no matter how dark a ſleeping Room be: When we go to ſleep, if it be not dark, we make it dark, that ſo we may ſleep the better. The Apoſtle gives that as an argument why the Saints ſhould not ſleep as do others, becauſe they were once darkneſs; but now light in the Lord. He that is in aerial light can hardly get his body to ſleep; And will you who are in ſpiritual light compoſe your ſouls to ſleep? All ſorts of ſleepers covet the dark, and therefore they who ſleep in death, are elegantly deſcribed making their bed in darkneſs, that ſo they may have (as it were) all accommodations for their reſt, I have made my bed in the darkneſs.

Intelligi poteſt de lecto bene ornato ſuper quem reponi ſolebant principum cadavera Mauſoleis, quod juxta Hebræum in plurali dicitur, ſtravi ſtrata mea, magnificum quid ſonat & Pompaticum. Bold.

It may be queſtioned (towards the clearing of this Verſe) Did not Job wait? Why doth he ſay, If I wait? Was he upon Iffs or Ands about that great and neceſſary duty? He reſolved peremptorily (Chap. 14. 14.) All the dayes of my appointed time will I wait till my change come: And is he ſo much changed already into an unreſolvedneſs about his waiting?

I anſwer, This ſuppoſition about waiting, is not a negation, nor is it a note of his irreſolution to wait for any thing, but only for that particular, about which his Friends were ſo buſie to awaken and heighten his expectations. Job waited upon God for all things which he deſired to have; only he did not wait upon God for that which the viſible diſpenſations of God ſeemed to tell him aloud, that he ſhould not have, a temporal deliverance: yea, when he ſaith, If I wait, namely, for this thing, it is an Argument that he acknowledged it a duty to wait upon God for all thoſe things, for the receiving of which he had any rule or ground of hope from God: Every exception confirms the rule. He that ſaith he doth not wait upon God about that for which he hath no warrant, ſaith ſtrongly, that he ought to wait upon God where he hath a warrant.

From which conſequence we may obſerve this unqueſtionable truth.

That it is the duty of man to wait upon God.

Waiting upon God is a duty of the firſt Commandment; it is a part of natural worſhip: It is not in mans liberty, whether he will wait or no, he is commanded to wait: David ſpeaks it double, and no doubt he laboured to act it double (Pſal. 40. 1.) Waiting, I waited; or, I waited patiently upon God. The Apoſtle gives that advice to the Saints (Heb. 10. 36.) Ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promiſe: There is doing the will of God, and then there is receiving the promiſe; yet we muſt do ſomewhat after we have done the will of God, before we can receive the promiſe; and that is, we muſt wait upon him: You have need of patience, ſaith the Apoſtle: What kind of patience? There are three ſorts of patience.

Firſt, The patience of labouring, that he puts in the former part of the Verſe, it is our doing the will of God.

Secondly, There is the patience of ſuffering.

Thirdly, There is the patience of waiting after we have both done and ſuffered the will of God.

We have need of this patience, the patience of waiting, that we may receive the promiſe, that is, the mercy promiſed. God hath preventing mercies, and they come to us before we wait for them; but his rewarding mercies muſt be waited for: He will exerciſe the grace of patience in us, by cauſing us to wait for our reward, as he exerciſeth the graces of love and zeal, in commanding us to do his will; and uſually without waiting after we have done his will, there is no receiving of the reward for doing his will. And for the Promiſes and Propheſies in general, Though God never fail his own time, yet he ſeldom comes at ours. That great Promiſe about the deliverance of the people of Iſrael out of Egypt, was performed punctually to an hour (Exod. 12. 41, 42.) It came to paſs at the end of four hundred and thirty years, even that very night, it came to paſs, that God brought out all the Hoſt of Iſrael. The time being out in the night, God did not ſtay till morning, but brought them out that very night: We count it a very venial ſin to break our word for a day, or to let a man wait a day beyond the time promiſed; we commonly ſay, A day breaks no ſquare: It is not ſo with God, he keeps his time punctually, he will not break his word one day. We read of the ſhortening of evil times, but not of their lengthening: God never makes his people wait for good longer then he hath promiſed. But though God keep his time exactly, and come juſt at the moment he hath prefixed and foreſhewed, yet we are apt to antedate the promiſe of God, and to ſet it a time before Gods time: We are ſhort-ſighted, and ſhort-breathed; that which is but a moment in the Kalendar of Heaven, ſeems more then an Age to us. Now in this regard there is much need of patience, of waiting patience, to tarry, not only our time, but Gods time; which is the meaning of the Prophet Habakkuk (Chap. 2. 3.) The viſion is for an appointed time, but at the end it will ſpeak and not lye: though it tarry, wait for it, becauſe it will ſurely come, and will not tarry: The Prophet adviſes, Though it tarry, wait for it; there's our duty, yet he preſently affirms, It will not tarry: So then it may tarry, and yet it tarrieth not; it may tarry beyond our time, but it tarryeth not beyond Gods time; It will come, and will not tarry; that is, not beyond the time which God hath prefixed, though it may ſoon tarry beyond the time which we have prefixed; therefore if it it tarry, wait; there is no remedy but patience.

The Apoſtle James gives the Rule (Chap. 1.4.) Let Patience have her perfect work: That is, Let all manner of patience work in you to the end, and let it work to all thoſe ends or purpoſes to which it is appointed. Patience hath her perfect work.

Firſt, When it puts forth perfect acts.

Secondly, When it perſeveres in acting.

Patience aſcends by three ſteps to the perfection of her work.

The firſt is a ſilent (not a ſullen) ſubmiſſion or reſignation of our ſelves to the diſpoſe of God (Pſal. 39.9.) I was dumb (ſaith David) and opened not my mouth, becauſe thou didſt it.

Secondly, A kind of thankful acceptation, or kiſſing of the Rod which ſmites us: If their uncircumciſed hearts be humbled (ſaith the Lord, Levit. 26.41.) and they accept the puniſhment of their iniquity: The phraſe imports a welcome receiving of it, as of a love-token from the hand of a Friend, or that the Rod is not only juſtly, but mercifully and graciouſly inflicted: This is a great perfection of patience; and to this Job's patience attained the very firſt day of his ſorrows, while he bleſſed the Name of the Lord, not only for giving him ſo many good things, but alſo for taking them away (Chap. 1. 21.)

The third ſtep, is, ſpiritual joy, and ſerious chearfulneſs under ſorrowful diſpenſations: This the Apoſtle exhorts the Brethren to (Verſ. 2.) Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations: And preſently adds (intimating that the higheſt perfection of patience conſiſts in joy) Let Patience have her perfect work: As if he had ſaid, I have told you what the perfect work of patience is, do not give check to your patience till it be got up this ſtep, and hath ſet your ſouls a rejoycing, or (as we ſpeak) a crowing over all your temptations.

Every Grace ſhould have its perfect work in us, and ſo they have, when patience hath its perfect work; and then patience hath done that perfect work there commanded, when we wait quietly, thankfully, and rejoycingly, till God hath done the work which he hath promiſed. This waiting patience is alſo called (by Chriſt himſelf) The poſſeſſion of the ſoul (Luke 21. 19.) Poſſeſs ye your ſouls in patience. What title ſoever we have to our own ſouls, we have no poſſeſſion of them without patience: As Faith gives us the poſſeſſion of Chriſt, ſo patience gives us the poſſeſſion of our ſelves: An impatient man is not in his own hand. And as waiting patience gives us the preſent poſſeſſion of our ſelves; ſo it will bring us to the poſſeſſion of all good things elſe that we ſtand in need of to make us happy. The Prophet pronounceth them bleſſed, who wait; every bleſſing is a good thing; but to be bleſſed is all good things; not only is a bleſſing but bleſſedneſs the reward of a waiter. The Lord is a God of judgment, bleſſed are all they that wait for him (Iſa. 30. 18.) Waiting is not only a duty, but a benefit, yea, our bleſſedneſs. And if any object, How is it bleſſedneſs, or ſo much as a ſingle bleſſing, to wait upon God under this notion, as a God of judgment? To have ſaid, God is a God of mercy, bleſſed are they that wait for him, might have taken upon the heart; but to ſay, God is a God of judgment, bleſſed are they that wait for him: How can that be? Is there any deſireableneſs in judgment?

I anſwer, Judgment is not there oppoſed to mercy (there's no bleſſedneſs in being near ſuch judgment.) We may conſider judgment in a threefold oppoſition.

Firſt, Judgment is oppoſed to anger and ſeverity (Jer. 10. 24.) Correct me, O Lord, in judgment, not in thine anger: It is a bleſſed thing to wait upon a God of judgment, in oppoſition to anger, or as judgment imports the golden bridle of moderation upon the paſſions and affections.

Secondly, Judgment is oppoſed to injuſtice: it is a bleſſed thing to wait upon a juſt God, who will certainly do us right; it is a miſery, one of the greateſt miſeries under the Sun, to wait upon unjuſt and unrighteous men; but how great a mercy is it to wait upon a juſt and a righteous God?

Thirdly, Judgment is oppoſed to folly, ignorance, and unadviſedneſs; thus God is a God of judgment, or wiſdom, and bleſſed are they that wait upon the wiſe; it is a vexation to wait upon raſh, fooliſh, heady men, who do they care not what, or know not what they do; but to wait upon a man, much more upon the God of judgment, who knows how to order and do all things, who hath the full compaſs of every cauſe within him, and will time every circumſtance to our beſt advantage (to wait upon this God, I ſay) is a high piece of happineſs: God being ſuch a God of judgment, Bleſſed are they that wait for him; and ſo bleſſed are they, that however he may put them to wait long, yet he at his coming will more then recompence all their waiting; as we find in the exultation of the Church (Iſa. 25.9.) And it ſhall be ſaid in that day, Loe this is our God, we have waited for him, he will ſave us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad, and rejoyce in his ſalvation. Poſſibly ſome had ſaid then to the Church (as was ſaid continually to David, Pſal. 42. 3.) Where is your God? Ye have long looked for him, but he doth not yet appear. The Church having born thoſe reproaches long, ſees God coming at laſt, and then ſhe breaks forth in triumph, as if ſhe had held God forth in her hand, and cryes him up, Loe this is our God, we have waited for him: The words have a ſound of victory, yea, of many victories in them. They ſhall in the end overcome all difficulties, who can but overcome their own hearts to a patient waiting upon God: As true repentance for the evil we have done, ſo holy patience for the good we would receive, ſhall never be repented of.

And (to add that further) though, when (as it appeared here to Job) God in his providential actings, determines negatively, and ſpeaks it out by the manner of his workings, that his will is not to give, or do for us ſuch a thing, it ceaſes to be a Duty to wait for it; yet to lay down the Duty of waiting, or to throw it up at any time upon ſuch grounds as theſe four (which are the uſual grounds upon which it is laid down or thrown up) is extreamly ſinful, and a high contempt of God.

Firſt, It is extreamly ſinful to give over waiting upon God, as being unwilling to tarry his leiſure. 'Tis the prerogative of God, to date all times, as much as to do all things for us; our times are in his hand as well as our affairs; and he is the diſpoſer of all things, as in regard of the means, ſo alſo of their ſeaſons. Hence 'tis our duty to wait as a time, ſo all the dayes of our appointed time (how many ſoever they are, they are all of Gods appointment) till our change ſhall come, as Job profeſſed his reſolution to do (Chap. 14. 14.) The Iſraelites are charged (Pſal. 78. 41.) For limiting the holy One of Iſrael: How did they limit him? There is a twofold limiting of God: Firſt, To means, when we think we cannot be ſaved unleſs we are ſaved our own way. Secondly, There is a limiting of God to times, he muſt ſave us by ſuch a day, or elſe we cannot be ſaved: Thus the Iſraelites limited the holy One of Iſrael, and ſet bounds to him, whoſe Power and Wiſdom are immeaſurable. God may juſtly limit man; and man never doth juſtly, till he keeps within the limits of God: but it is not only a ſin, but a high preſumption, for man to limit God: Nor is it poſſible for man to break his own bounds more by any thing he doth, then by ſetting bounds to God, what, or when he ſhall do.

Secondly, It is exceeding ſinful to give over waiting on God for deliverance out of an affliction, becauſe we are either diſpleaſed with God who ſends it, or are angry at the affliction ſent. When God throws a ſtone at us, we ſhould ſtoop humbly, and taking it up, put it into our boſome (if we do ſo, though it look like a worthleſs Pebble, it will quickly change into a precious Pearl; however, we muſt) not like the Dog rage at it and bite it, which yet many do. Now they who are vexed at the affliction which God ſends, or at God himſelf, for ſending the affliction, theſe will never wait upon God for the removing of it. Such was the frame of that wretched King (2 Kings 6. 33.) who ſaid, This evil is of the Lord, wherefore ſhould I wait on the Lord any longer? As if he had ſaid, I will never wait for any kindneſs at his hand, who hath already uſed me thus unkindly: He that takes an affliction in ill part at the hand of God, will never expect good from him; or if he do, it muſt come very ſpeedily, or elſe his waiting is over. 'Tis not unlikely that this King, by the advice of the Prophet Eliſha, had waited a little, but he was ſoon weary; Why ſhould I wait any longer? There was reaſon enough why he ſhould, but his unbelief would not let him ſee what he ſaw, nor underſtand what himſelf had ſpoken: For the reaſon which he gave, why he would wait no longer, is the ſtrongeſt reaſon that can be given why he ſhould have waited longer, This evil is of the Lord. 'Tis true, that among men, they, from or of whom evils are, are uſually the unfitteſt to remove them: Men who wound are ſeldom skill'd at curing; but the Lord brings no evil, but what he can remove, nor doth he make any wound but what he can heal; yea, no Power nor Art in the World, can heal the wounds that he makes, or remove the evils which he brings, but his own. Hence the patient Believer cryes out with the Church (Hoſ. 6. 1.) Let us return to the Lord, yea, let us wait upon the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal: But the impatient unbeliever ſaith, Let us turn away from the Lord, let us wait upon the Lord no longer, for 'tis he that hath torn us, therefore ſurely he will not heal us. Grace and corruption may take up the ſame principles, but they draw concluſions from them as contrary as themſelves are.

Thirdly, It is exceeding ſinful to give over waiting, as thinking that God cannot help. Some ſhorten their patience by ſhortening the hand of God. That ſuch were the apprehenſions of the Jews, is more then probable by the Prophets Negative aſſertion (Iſa. 59. 1.) Behold the Lords hand is not ſhortened that it cannot ſave.

Fourthly, It is exceeding ſinful to give over waiting upon God, by turning aſide to ſinful wayes: Some find out (as they ſuppoſe) nearer wayes ro help themſelves, then by attending upon God; they like not (as ſuch have prophanely called them) thoſe pious delayes; and ſo over Hedge and Ditch they will, to the overtaking of their own ends. The Prophet Jeremiah deſcribes ſuch (Chap. 18. 12.) And they ſaid, there is no hope; or, our caſe is deſperate, all's loſt. What then? But we will walk after our own devices, and every one do after the imagination of his evil heart: The Lord had told them (Verſ. 11.) Behold I frame evil againſt you, and deviſe a device againſt you. But did the Lord deviſe a device, meerly to enſnare them, or did he frame evil againſt them only to undo them? No, his aim was their repentance, not their ruine, and therefore he adds in the ſame Verſe, Return ye now every one from his evil wayes, and make your wayes and your doings good: As if the Lord had ſaid, Though I am about to frame evil againſt you, yet do ye return to me, and all ſhall be well. How do they reſent this threatening and this Counſel? They grow deſperate upon it: And ſeeing God had brought them into ſuch ſtraits, they would get out as well as they could: And as he was deviſing devices againſt them, ſo they had devices of their own, and them they would follow. Thus they would not wait upon God for a remedy in the way of repentance for their old ſins, but they would provide themſelves a remedy by running into new ſins: They had a device in their heads which ſhould match the device of God.

Now what the Prophet ſubjoyns (Verſ. 13, 14, 15.) as a ſtrong redargution of that people who refuſed to wait upon God in that way, the ſame we may ſay to all thoſe who refuſe to wait upon God in any way. The Virgin of Iſrael (he calls her ſo, to mind her what ſhe ſhould be, not to commend her what ſhe was) hath done a very horrible thing; will a man leave the Snow of Lebanon, which cometh from the rock of the field? Or, Will a man (as our Margin hath it) leave my fields for a rock, or for the Snow of Lebanon? That is, Will any Traveller be ſo fooliſh, as to leave the plain fields, where he may paſs with eaſe and pleaſure, without let or hinderance, to climb over craggy Rocks, and precipitious Hills? Will he leave a beaten path, to go through vaſt Woods and deſolate Forreſts covered with Snow, where no track or footſteps are to be ſeen? Or (as it follows in that Verſe) Shall the cold flowing waters which come from another place be forſaken? Or, Shall the cool running waters be forſaken for ſtrange waters? That is, Will any man who hath freſh Fountain-water of his own at home, go to ſeek water in a ſtinking Ditch, in ſtanding Pools, and miery Puddles, when he is athirſt? Such is the choice or exchange which they make, who ceaſe waiting upon God in his wayes, and turn aſide for help to their own crooked wayes, Stumbling (as the Prophet ſpeaks at the fifteenth Verſe of the ſame Chapter) in their wayes from the ancient paths, to walk in paths, in a way not caſt up, or, where no Cauſey is. Though the hand or providence of God doth ſometimes bring his people (as the Prophet ſpeaks, Iſa. 42. 16.) By a way which they knew not, and leads them in paths that they have not known: That is, into a way which they knew not, by any former teachings of men, or experiences of their own; yet his hand never leads them into any way, which is not caſt up, or which may not be made out, by ſome rule or example in the Word: To leave waiting upon God in his ordinary wayes, and to go in any extraordinary way which hath no ground in the Word, is purely to follow our own wayes, and to go after the imaginations of our evil hearts.

Job in this place apprehended it unſeaſonable for him to wait for thoſe worldly attainments and enjoyments which his Friends promiſed him; but he was not unwilling to tarry the Lords leiſure, nor was he diſpleaſed with God for afflicting him, nor did he ſay, God could not help him, much leſs did he turn from God to any wicked way to help himſelf, when he ſaid, If I wait, the Grave is mine houſe.

Secondly, Obſerve from it, A good man may give up all worldly expectations.

A Believer may in this ſence be an unbeliever, and lay down all his hopes in this life, of long life and of good dayes, of riches and temporal greatneſs: When Friends bid ſuch on their ſick Beds, Be of good chear, we hope to ſee you abroad ſhortly; we hope God will raiſe you up again, they will even forbid thoſe comforts, and ſay, Do not intice us back into the World with theſe hopes, the Graves are ready for us, and we have made our bed in the darkneſs; it is not for us to look for life here, indeed to live to us is Chriſt, but to dye is gain. A Believer can willingly part with all his earthly poſſeſſions for heavenly hopes, much more can he joyfully part with all his earthly hopes for the poſſeſſion of Heaven.

Thirdly, From theſe expreſſions, The Grave is my houſe, I have made my bed in the darkneſs.

Note, A Believer looks upon death as a ſtate of reſt.

As the whole houſe is a place of reſt compared with the World abroad; ſo the Bed is the ſpecial place of reſt (Rev. 14. 14.) Bleſſed are the dead which dye in the Lord, from henceforth they reſt from their labours, and their works follow them: They ſhall follow their work no more, who are followed by their works. The Grave is the houſe and bed of the body to all who dye: Heaven is the houſe and reſt of the ſoul to all thoſe who dye in the Lord. Saints have here a reſt in their labours, they ſhall hereafter have a reſt from their labours.

Laſtly, Whereas the bed of death is made in darkneſs.

Obſerve, There is nothing deſireable in death, as conſidered in it ſelf.

A dark condition is the worſt condition: Darkneſs, which in Scripture ſignifies all evil, is a word good enough to expreſs the ſtate of death by: What deſireableneſs there is in Death, what pleaſures in the Grave, will appear further in thoſe Arguments which Death uſeth to invite us home to its houſe, the Grave, in the next Verſe, which tells us, our moſt lovely Companions, yea, our ſweeteſt and moſt endeared Relations there, are, Corruption and Worms.

Verſe 14. I have ſaid to Corruption, Thou art my Father; and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and my Siſter.

Hyperbolæ ſunt quibus ſignificat ſe omnem jam vitæ cogitationem abdicaſſe. Jun.

This Verſe is of the ſame ſence with the former; only here, Job breaks into an elegant variation of new metaphors, and hyperbolical expreſſions.

I have ſaid.] That is, I have (as it were) called to, and ſaluted the retinue and attendants of Death, as my friends and kindred: As I have made my bed in the Grave, and as that is my houſe, ſo now I am finding out my houſhold relations; I ſay to this, Thou art my Father; and to that, Thou art my Mother and Siſter.

קרא Eſt clamare vocare appellare, & per electionem nominare: elegans proſopopœia, per quam Job tumulū alloquitur. Bold.

The word which we render, I have ſaid, &c. ſignifies not barely to ſay, but to cry, or call out: I have called out to corruption: So Maſter Broughton, To the pit I cry, O Father; O Siſter, O Mother, to the Worm: Not barely, I have ſaid, but I cry; and not barely, I cry Father to the pit, but he adds alſo a note of exclamation, O Father.

Secondly, The word imports not generally a calling, or crying out, to any one that comes next, but to ſome ſpecial perſon, by way of election and choice, or to ſuch as we know well, and are acquainted with, as the terms of Father, Mother, and Siſter, imply.

Verbum קרא ſignificat etiam occurrere alicui, nam occurrentem ſolemus ſalutatione vel interrogatione aliqua proprio nomine appellare.

Further, The word ſignifies, not only to call aloud, and to call with election, but to go forth on purpoſe to call a Friend, or to invite him in: As when we ſee an acquaintance coming towards us, or our dwellings, we ſtep out to meet and welcome him, ſo the word may bear in this place: As if Job ſeeing death drawing toward him, had gone out, and ſaid, O corruption my Father, O Worms my Mother, my Siſter, welcome, welcome; ſuch an elegancy the word yields us.

I ſhall not here ſtay upon any anxious diſquiſition about the propriety of theſe relations, how Job calls corruption his Father, and the Worm his Mother and Siſter, or in drawing out compariſons about them; we are to look only to a general proportion, not to an exact propriety in theſe words; there's no need to make out parallels between corruption and a Father, or between Worms and a Mother, or a Siſter.

Only thus much may be aſſerted particularly.

Firſt, He ſpeaks thus to ſhew that he looked on death, not only not as an enemy, but not as a ſtranger. Death and he were well acquainted.

Secondly, He ſpeaks thus to ſhew, that death was not only not a ſtranger to him, but as one of his kindred: He was upon as fair terms with death, as with Father and Mother.

Vt oſtendat mortem ſibi in votis eſſe, cunctis illum amicitiæ & neceſſitudinis nominis compellat: Pined.

Thirdly, Job ſpeaks thus to ſhew, that he did not only look upon death as in a near relation to him, but as having a kind of delight and contentment in death: What is more ſweet to a man, who hath been a long journey, and is returning home, then to think that he is coming to his Father and Mother, his Brethren and Siſters? As Nature gives us Kindred by blood, ſo it is a cuſtom to adopt and ſtamp to our ſelves Kindred by kindneſs; one we call Father, and another we call Mother; one is our Brother, a ſecond is our Siſter, a third our Cozen, by the mutual tyes, or by the receits and returns of courteſie. Thus we are to take theſe compellations, as intimating with what ſpirit Job entertained the thoughts of death, even with no other then if he had been to fall into the embraces of Father, and Mother, and Siſter: He ſaid to corruption, as we ſhould ſay to Wiſdom (Prov. 7. 4.) Say unto Wiſdom, thou art my Siſter, and call Underſtanding thy Kinſwoman, That is, Acquaint thy ſelf with, and be familiar with Wiſdom, ſo ſhalt thou keep thy ſelf (which is both thy wiſdom and thy happineſs) a ſtranger, from the ſtrange woman, Verſ. 5.

Further, it may yet be enquired, what it is which Job calls Corruption and the Worm, I have ſaid [to Corruption] &c. What is this corruption? There are two opinions about it.

Firſt, Some interpret him ſpeaking to the corruption, and Worms, which had already ſeized upon his body; for his diſeaſes and ulcerous ſores had bred corruption and worms: As if he had ſaid, I may well call corruption my Father, for I am already full of corruption, I may well call the Worm my Mother, my Siſter, for the Worms creep in and out at my ſores continually; my body is as if it had lain already in the Grave, full of corruption and Worms.

שחת Fovea, corruptio, quod in fovea corpus corrumpitur.

Secondly, Others expound him ſpeaking to, and of, the corruption and Worms, which waited his coming into the Grave. The word in the Text, which we tranſlate Corruption, ſignifies alſo the Grave; becauſe bodies do not only corrupt in the Grave, but quickly turn to corruption. As ſoon as a body is dead, it is a carkaſs; and after it hath been a while a carkaſs, 'tis nothing but corruption: Hence ſome render it, not, I have ſaid to corruption, but to the pit, or grave: So Maſter Broughton, To the pit I cry, O Father; to the worm, O Mother, O Siſter. The Grave is ſo proper a place for corruption, that 'tis proper enough to expreſs corruption by the Grave.

And beſides thoſe Worms which are generated out of the putrefaction of mans body, there are Worms ready generated in the Grave to entertain us. Worms are the proper Inhabitants of the Grave; there they keep houſe, as Father, and Mother, and Siſter, to welcome and embrace ſuch as deſcend into it.

Maſter Fox reports of Doctor Taylor, a famous Martyr of Chriſt in Queen Maries time, who was burned at Hadley in Suffolk, that when he knew he ſhould ſuffer death by fire, he ſaid, I have been deceived my ſelf, and I ſhall deceive many at Hadley; when ſome hearing this, began to hope he would recant, and ſhrink from that profeſſion of the Goſpel which he had made: At laſt he explained himſelf, I am a man of a very full fat body, which I had hoped, ſhould have been buried in Hadley Church-yard, but I ſee I am deceived; and there are a great number of Worms there, which might have had good chear upon my carkaſs, but I ſhall deceive them all, my body being to be burned. The Earth breeds Worms in its own bowels; and our body, which at the beſt and alive are but refined earth, being once dead yield another race of Worms. Job may be ſuppoſed ſpeaking unto both, or either, I have ſaid to the Worm, Thou art my Mother and my Siſter.

We may hence Obſerve, That ſome Believers are ſo far from fearing, that they are familiar with death.

Other Texts in the former paſſages of this Book, have occaſioned like Obſervations; yet as often as this occaſion is renewed it will not be unprofitable to renew this Obſervation: To write the ſame things where we read the ſame things (yet the Reader will not find them the ſame) is not unprofitable.

I ſay, ſome Believers are familiar with death, I am far from ſaying, that he who is not, is no Believer: There are not in all the ſame degree of holineſs; though holineſs be the ſame in all; but a Believer may arrive at ſuch a compoſure of ſpirit, at ſuch a ſtature of holineſs, as not to fear death. There are ſome Believers, (and it is their ſin) who are but little acquainted with death, they ſeldom go out to the Grave, or look into the Pit they are going to; he that hath often converſed with death in the meditation (which is a Believers way) of the death of Chriſt, cannot be afraid to dye, if he know what the death of Chriſt means which he hath meditated upon. He that knows it throughly, may (as the Prophet ſpeaks in another caſe, Iſa. 11. 8.) Play on the hole of this Aſp, and put his hand upon the den of the Cockatrice; yea, ſuch a Believer may not only play and put his hand upon the Grave, which is the hole of this Aſp, and the den of this Cockatrice, but he can play with the Aſp it ſelf, and take up the Cockatrice in his hand; with this Aſp or Cockatrice he can ſport himſelf as with a Brother or a Siſter.

O how different are the thoughts of carnal men, and their words of death? How dreadfully do they ſpeak and think of the Grave? An unbeliever ſaith of the Grave, It is a priſon, not a houſe; he finds no bed in darkneſs, 'tis to him a Dungeon; he ſaith to corruption, Thou art my foe, and to the Worms, ye are to me as Feinds and Furies: He cannot bear the thought of them, much leſs their ſight and preſence. Saints ſpeak courtingly of death; there is a kind of holy courtſhip in the language of Job: Agag (1 Sam. 15. 32.) came out to Samuel delicately; for ſaid he, Surely the bitterneſs of death is paſt: But he was deceived, for Samuel hewed him in pieces; and when he ſaid, the bitterneſs of death is paſt, he meant death was paſt. He did not believe, but that death would be bitter whenever it ſhould come; but he thought death was paſt for that time however, and ſo he came out delicately, he ſtood as a Courtier, yea, as a King before Samuel, becauſe he had eſcaped (as he ſuppoſed) that King of terrors. Thus the Saints come out delicately indeed, and court it, in the very face of the King of terrors, for they know the bitterneſs of death is paſt, though they were aſſured they muſt dye preſently: They do not ſay, Death is paſt, they know death will come, and they muſt dye, but the bitterneſs is paſt, the Gall and Wormwood is taken out; and upon this account they can ſay to corruption, Thou art my Father, and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and Siſter.

Thirdly, Note, Corruption and Worms are the portion and companions of the dead.

Only Jeſus Chriſt was exempt from this portion, who though he ſubmitted himſelf to death for ſinners, yet having no ſin in himſelf, he was not at all ſubject to death, nor was it poſſible that he ſhould be holden of it: He was the holy one, he had no corruption in his ſpirit, and therefore his fleſh ſaw no corruption (Acts 2. 31.) But as for all fleſh, they having corrupted all their wayes, their fleſh ſhall ſee corruption in the end.

Take two Corolaries from this.

Firſt, Let no man glory in bodily beauty, in honours, or alliances. Corruption will ſhortly ſeize upon the moſt beautiful body, Worms will crawl upon the ſmootheſt cheeks, upon the faireſt face, and into that mouth which now boaſteth great things, and ſpeaks ſo proudly; this earth muſt turn to earth, and then the greateſt Kindreds, and nobleſt Pedigrees, will be loſt or ſwallowed up in this, Corruption is my Father, and the Worm my Mother, and my Siſter: Man is corruptible while he lives, and when he dyes he is corruption. Every man living is but a Worm; Jeſus Chriſt, who abaſed himſelf to the loweſt condition of man, ſaith, I am a worm and no man (Pſal. 22. 6.) When man dyes, as he goes to the Worms, ſo he makes Worms; who would be proud of his fleſh, did he know that 'tis but corruption and worms once removed, and that it muſt ſuddenly move back again to corruption and worms.

Secondly, Seeing death hath nothing of its own but darkneſs, corruption, and worms, which are all unpleaſing, and a regret to fleſh and blood, therefore live much in Chriſt, who only gives a remedy againſt all theſe evils: If we live in the Grave of Chriſt, that will make the darkneſs of our Grave light, and the corruption of it ſweet unto us. He that upon good intereſt can ſay to Chriſt, Thou art my Father, thou art my Brother, thou art my All, can ſay rejoycingly to corruption, Thou art my Father; and to the Worm, Thou art my Mother, and Siſter. Relation to Chriſt is ſo comfortable, that it overcomes the diſcomfort of our moſt unpleaſant relations. That which raiſed the ſpirit of holy Job to theſe free complyances with death, was the light which he had (even in thoſe darker times) about the Redeemer, of which, as the nineteeth Chapter gives us a clear and an illuſtrious proof, ſo the next Verſe gives us more then an intimation.

Verſe 15. And where is now my hope? And as for my hope who ſhall ſee it?

He that chearfully queſtions, Where is my hope? puts it almoſt out of queſtion where his hope is.

Where is now my hope?] Had Job loſt his hope, or was it to ſeek? David's enemies interrogate him (and that interrogatory was as a Sword in his bones, or as a Dagger at his heart) Where is now thy God (Pſal. 42. 10.) Their meaning was, Thy God is no where, he is not to be found, thou haſt none to help, none to deliver thee: Job puts the queſtion himſelf, and he puts it to himſelf, Where is now my hope? His meaning is not, that it was no where, but that it was not there where ſome would have it.

Hope may be conſidered two wayes, either as taken for a grace acting in us, or as taken for ſome good upon which that grace acts: Job's queſtion concerns not hope as it is a grace acting in us; he that hath that hope knows where it is, and where it is once it abides for ever; Hope is no remover, it is an abiding grace (1 Cor. 13. 13.) Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, theſe three: Theſe are abiding graces; theſe muſt and ſhall keep houſe, not only in the Church militant in general, but in the ſoul of every true member of the Church: And if in reference to this hope, Job had queſtioned, Where is now my hope? He might have anſwered, It is in thy heart; the grace of hope dwells there. This grace of hope is no fading quality, but a ſetled power: Hope doth not alwayes act, but it alwayes is, where it ever was: It is not alwayes a lively hope, but it is alwayes a living hope. As Eliphaz checks Job (Chap. 4. 4.) Is this thy hope? So many a Believer deſerves to be checkt and chidden, becauſe his hope is not more ſtrong and ſtirring, becauſe his hope is ſo unlike hope, eſpecially ſo unlike that hope, which he ought to have, after ſo much experience. What? Is this thy hope? Is this all? You have talked of hope all this while; is this all you have to ſhew for it? This is a poor piece of hope, a hope unworthy of thee. Some good men may juſtly fall under this check; and whereas hope maketh not aſhamed, they may for a time be aſhamed of their hope; yet it is with them as with thoſe Trees of which the Prophet ſpeaks (Iſa. 6. 13.) Whoſe ſubſtance is in them, when they have caſt their leaves: So the holy ſeed ſhall be, and is the ſubſtance of it; and though for a time it appear not, and ſo may bear this queſtion, Where is it? yet it will appear again, and by bearing fruit, anſwer for it ſelf, Here I am.

Secondly, Take hope for that good upon which our hope is ſet, or for the object of hope. There is a twofold object of hope.

Firſt, Eternal, and heavenly.

Secondly, Temporal, and earthly.

Spiritual things are the hope laid hold upon (Heb. 6. 18.) That by two immutable things in which it is impoſſible for God to lye, we might have a ſtrong conſolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope ſet before us: This Scripture teacheth us, that as there is a hope by which we lay hold, that's the grace of hope; ſo there is a hope upon which we lay hold, that's the good for which we hope. God himſelf, and all the good things of eternal life, which God hath promiſed, are this hope. This hope alſo Job had, and he knew where it was: As he knew he had the grace of hope in his heart, ſo that he had the choiceſt good of hope in Heaven; nor would he have parted with this hope for all the poſſeſſions in the World.

But as hope (whether in the object or in the actings of it) reſpects temporal, or earthly things; Job ſaith, And now where is my hope? That is, If I wait and hope about theſe things, my labour is loſt, my hopes are vain and vaniſhing, yea, already vaniſhed, as the next clauſe (which is of the ſame ſence with this, and therefore needs no explication) further ſheweth.

And for my hope, who ſhall ſee it?] That is, Who ſhall ſee that which you would have me hope for? You would perſwade me that I ſhall be a great man; if I ſhould take up ſuch a hope, who ſhall ever ſee it made good, who ſhall ſee it fulfilled? No man ſhall.

And becauſe the word which we tranſlate Hope in both parts of this Verſe, ſignifies alſo a Congregation, or the meeting of many things or perſons together: That firſt and great congregation of waters, or rather the congregating of thoſe waters is expreſſed by it (Gen. 1. 9.) and in a like ſence 'tis uſed concerning perſons (Jer. 3. 17.) Hence the whole Verſe is thus rendred, And where now is my congregation? And as for my congregation, who ſhall ſee it? As if he had ſaid, If ye ask after my congregation, or family, 'tis in the Grave; there's all that I look for, there's my Father and Mother, there's my Siſters, and will any man go down with me into thoſe chambers of darkneſs to viſit my congregation, to ſee my family: This is all the family which I have in my eye, and whoſe eye elſe is greedy to ſee this?

Ecquis me talem intuebitur, qualem me futurum dicitis? Bez.

קוה Significat congregare & congregationem. Et ubi nunc congregatio mea, & congregationẽ meam quis intuebitur? Bold.

I might from this Verſe turn back to that Obſervation lately given; That a true Believer is ſometimes able to make triumphant reports about the wrack of his worldly hope; he can ſay, Where is it? And who ſhall ſee it?

with dry eyes, when the will of God removes it out of his ſight.

David treating of the vanity of worldly things (Pſal. 39. 7.) concludes in the midſt of all his outward enjoyments, And now Lord, what wait I for? Where is my hope? Or, What do I hope for? ('Tis all one) my hope is in thee; not in the World, not after worldly things; he eaſily gave up his hope there: The more hope we have in God, the leſs we have in and about the creature. Job had much hope in God; but he had none, not only in, but none for the creature. All thoſe hopes were in his ſight, as himſelf was, dead or dying, and therefore fit only to be buried out of his ſight, as he ſpeaks in the next Verſe.

Verſe 16. They ſhall go down to the bars of the pit, when our reſt together is in the duſt.

Spes meæ, omnia mea; recte in plurali dicit, ſignificans non ſpem tantum ſibi ab illis propoſitam ſed & omnes alias ſpes hujus vitæ. Merc.

They ſhall go down.] Who? or what ſhall go down? There is no expreſs Relative in the Hebrew: They, that is (ſay ſome) theſe hopes: He ſpeaks in the Plural number, as if he had ſaid, All my hopes about this life are going down to the pit. The beſt of worldly hopes, and worldly things, are dying and periſhing; mine are to me as dead and periſhed.

Secondly, Others underſtand it of Job himſelf; for the word which we tranſlate Barrs, ſignifies alſo the members of the body: As if he had ſaid, I my ſelf ſhall go down to the Pit, or Grave.

בד Vectes ſignificat, & ea omnia quæ velut vectes aliquid ſuſtentant.

A third thus, They ſhall deſcend upon the bars of the Grave: The meaning is, Ye ſhall quickly ſee me and all my worldly hopes, which ye ſo much ſpeak of, put together in a Coffin, and carryed out upon a Beir to the Grave for burial.

Aliqui Rabbini ad ipſum Jobum referunt, quod ipſius fulcbra, i. e. membra, brachia, vires, robur deſcendent. Vectibus ſepulchralibus deſcendent. Jun. Mox videbitis iſtas expectationes quas prædicatis, una cum corpore ferretro efferri in ſepulchrum. Jun.

This going down to the bars of the Pit, according to our reading, imports, that he and his hopes ſhould deſcend to the lower parts of the earth, the Grave, and be buried there; the Pit would ſhut him in, and make him faſt enough. The Grave is a Priſon, and there are bars or bolts belonging to that Priſon which ſhut the Priſoners in; there's no breaking of that Priſon: The Decree of God is the bar of the Grave, and his purpoſe locks it up till the day which himſelf hath appointed for the reſurrection from the dead, and the judgment which is to follow. As the evil Angels are reſerved in chains of darkneſs to the Judgment of the great day; ſo are the bodies of men chained and barred down in the darkneſs of the Grave, till God ſends out the Arch-angel with the ſound of a Trumpet to ſummon them to his Bar.

Per irriſionem hæc dicta ſunt. Cajet.

Yet further, theſe words are interpreted as ſpoken in deriſion of thoſe overtures which his Friends made to him about worldly happineſs: As if he had ſaid, You perſwade me that I ſhall have much good in the World: Very well, let it be ſo; but do you think that I can carry my Goods, my Houſes and Lands, my Silver and Gold, my Corn and my Wine, to make merry with in the Grave? Shall I, and the greatneſs you promiſe me, live together in the Grave, and make our abode in darkneſs? The Septuagint ſeem to favour that ſence, rendring it, Shall my Goods go with me to the Grave? Or, Shall we deſcend into the duſt hand in hand? When I ſurrender this battered Fort into the hands of death, ſhall I march out with bag and baggage to theſe Subterranean dwellings? The Apoſtle affirms, That we brought nothing with us into this World; and (he doth more then affirm) It is certain (ſaith he) we can carry nothing out (1 Tim. 6. 7.) And therefore what doth it avail a dying man to tell him of riches, ſeeing when he dyes he muſt leave all his riches.

An bona mea mecum ad infernos deſcendent, aut pariter ſuper pulverem deſcendemus.

Mr. Broughton tranſlates plainly thus, To the midſt of the Grave all ſhall deſcend, when we ſhall go down together in the duſt. From which our reading of the latter clauſe varies but a little.

When we ſhall reſt together in the duſt.] The word which we expreſs by reſt, is derived by ſome, from a root ſignifying to deſcend, or go down; hence the difference of tranſlation. The Hebrew particle (im) which we render When, ſignifies alſo For, or Foraſmuch: Further, it is ſometimes taken conditionally, for If, as alſo interrogatively for (utrum) whether; according to all which acceptions, this clauſe hath undergone a variety of reading.

But I paſs them by, and keep to our own, When our reſt together is in the duſt, or, for as much as we ſhall reſt together in the duſt. Of this reſt I have ſpoken before (Chap. 3. 17.) There the weary be at reſt, thither I refer the Reader: We may alſo take Job's ſence in this place, by that which he ſpeaks ſo clearly out to this point (Chap. 30. Verſ. 23.) For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the houſe appointed for all living. I ſhall not ſtay here to draw out Obſervations; matter of this purport, about the certainty of, and about our reſt in death, having occurred heretofore: All that I ſhall add for the cloſe of this Verſe and Chapter, ſhall only be an offer towards the reſolution of a doubt, which may ariſe upon the whole matter of Job's continued reſolves for death, and his refuſals of any entertainment of the hopes of life.

Hence it may be queſtioned, Did not Job ſin in giving up his hope, and in refuſing to be comforted when his Friends, wiſe and godly men, laboured to aſſure him of deliverance?

I anſwer, Firſt, Job was willing to be comforted, but he did not like their way of comforting, which was indeed a wounding; for the promiſes which they made him, did all along carry an implication of his guilt; they never promiſing him any deliverance, but upon the ſuppoſition of his repentance from thoſe wickedneſſes, with which they charged him; whereas he utterly denyed their charge in the ſence which they laid againſt him.

Secondly, I anſwer, We cannot altogether acquit Job from blame, in judging his ſtate ſo deplorable and remedileſs. For though with an eye to the creature, and all ſecond cauſes, there was no probability, or poſſibility for his recovery, yet Job ſhould have raiſed his hopes upon the Power and All-ſufficiency of God; he might have remembred, that as his affliction was extraordinary, and the hand of God very viſible in it; ſo his deliverance alſo might have been as extraordinary, and that God could have put forth as ſtrong, and as viſible a hand to reſtore him, as he did to caſt him down: 'Tis ſaid of Abraham (Rom. 4. 18, 19.) that he againſt hope, believed in hope; nothing appeared for the ſupport of his hopes, yet Abraham did not ſay, Where is my hope? Or why ſhould I wait for Children? He conſidered not his own body now dead, when he was about an hundred years old; neither yet the deadneſs of Sarah*'s womb*: Theſe natural impediments came not to his mind, while he had a word from the Lord of nature, He ſtaggered not at the promiſe of God through unbelief, but was ſtrong in Faith, giving glory to God. But we may ſay of Job (from the continual tenour of his own anſwers) that he conſidered his own body as dead too much, and ſo attained not to Abraham's ſtrength of Faith.

Yet we have three things to ſay for him: Firſt, There was a great difference between his caſe and Abraham's; Job had no ſuch ground of Faith as Abraham had; Abraham received a ſpecial, yea, an abſolute promiſe from God, that he ſhould have a Son; but Job received only a conditional promiſe from man, grounded upon the general promiſes of God, that he ſhould be reſtored: This conſideration abates much from the Objection of his unbelief; though it cannot be denyed, but his Faith might and ſhould have riſen higher upon the power of God, who as he was all-ſufficiently able, ſo he did afterwards actually raiſe him up.

Secondly, The deſign of God being in Job's example to ſet forth a pattern of Patience; as his deſign was in Abraham's example to ſet forth a pattern of Faith; he was pleaſed to let Job's Faith run it ſelf out about ſpirituals and eternals, not minding temporals, that ſo his patience might have a perfect work in bearing the full weight of his affliction to the end, while his Faith did not ſo much as put under a little finger to eaſe him with the leaſt belief, that it ſhould (as to this life) be taken off, or have an end.

Laſtly, (As 'twas hinted) Job had much Faith to ſome purpoſes, though none to this; he had a full truſt in God, though he ſhould kill him; but he had no truſt that God would not kill him: he believed God loved him while he did afflict him, though he did not believe that God would deliver him from his afflictions. As no mans Faith works alike at all times; ſo 'tis rare that any mans Faith works alike to all things: Some who believe and hope mightily for the things of Heaven, have but little, either Faith or Hope for earthly things: Not becauſe a Faith which ſerves for Heaven, is not enough ('tis rather more then enough) to ſerve for Earth: But becauſe moſt of thoſe whoſe Faith is ſtrong and much enlarged for Heaven, take ſo much ſatisfaction there, and are there ſo much at home, that they account themſelves Pilgrims and Strangers here, and are not much mindful (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Heb. 11. 15.) or deſirous of their earthly Countrey and concernments, What we do not much deſire to have, we do not much believe (though we believe) that we ſhall have it. A full ſoul, ſaith Solomon, loatheth the Honey-comb: Thoſe ſouls which are full of Heaven (though they do not loath, yet they) are not hungry after (though they can thankfully receive and enjoy) any Honey-comb of this World. No man having drunk old Wine, ſtraightway deſireth new, for he ſaith the old is better (Luke 5. 39.) Doubtleſs Job had drunk the old Wine of Gods favour and love in the Redeemer, and ſo his thirſt was much ſlacked, if not totally quenched towards the new Wine of a temporal reſtauration. And hence we may not only charitably, but more then probably conclude, That it was not for want of Faith, that Job did not believe or hope for what his Friends promiſed him, but becauſe he had employed his Faith upon better and more pleaſing promiſes.

Thus Job hath finiſht his anſwer to the ſecond charge of Eliphaz: And (through the help of Chriſt) ſomewhat is here tendered for the illuſtration and expoſition of it. His other two Friends, Bildad, and Zophar, ſtand ready to enter the Liſts with him, and to renew their charge; what they ſaid, and what anſwer they received, ſhall (if God continue life and ſtrength, with theſe peaceable opportunities) in convenient time be preſented to publick view.

Of the Book of JOB.

TO THE

CHRISTIAN READER:

To thoſe eſpecially of this CITY, who have been the Movers, and continue the Promoters of this WORK.

G*OD only wiſe, who cauſed his holy Word to be written aforetime for our learning and inſtruction, hath in all times appointed the Miniſtry of expounding and Preaching his Word, that it might be the better fitted for inſtruction: The buſineſs of the Expoſitor (or of the Preacher expounding) is to collect and give out the ſence and meaning of the Word aright: The buſineſs of the Preacher (or of the Expoſitor preaching) is to divide the ſence and meaning of the Word aright, giving to every one that portion which is proper to him; his proper* Doctrine (of Truth) his proper Reproof (of Error) his proper Correction (of evil Manners) his proper Inſtruction (about holineſs of Converſation) and all in Righteouſneſs. While Jeſus Chriſt himſelf was fulfilling his Miniſtry here on earth, he performed not only the office of a Preacher (Luke 4. 18, 19, 20, &c.) but of an Expoſitor alſo (Luke 24. 27.) Beginning at Moſes and all the Prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himſelf. The Scripture is indeed its own Expoſitor; dark Texts receive light from clearer, and thoſe which are ſo plain that they need no Comment, are a Comment to thoſe that need. But though the Word of God (as to truth and light) be (as God himſelf is) ſelf-ſufficient, and carrieth in ſome one or other part of it, the interpretation of other parts; yet as to man, there is much need of an Interpreter, for the due accommodation of any one part to the interpretation of another: For the Scripture is ſuch an Expoſitor of its own hard Places, as it is a Judge of all hard Queſtions and Controverſies, ariſing from, or grounded upon it: That is to ſay, A Normal, not a Perſonal Expoſitor. And therefore as the Father of Lights, from whom cometh every good gift, and every perfect gift, hath beſtowed This very good and perfect gift, His holy Word upon us; ſo he hath furniſhed ſome with gifts, and ſent them forth as Interpreters of it; yea, he hath ſent forth his Holy Spirit, who is not only (as Elihu ſpeaks (in this Book) of ſome choice-ſpirited man) An Interpreter, one among a thouſand, but the only un-erring Interpreter. For as the Word of God is the only un-erring Normal Expoſitor of it ſelf, ſo the Holy Spirit of God, whom Jeſus Chriſt hath promiſed to ſend, and of whom Chriſt hath ſaid, He ſhall take of mine, and ſhew it unto you, is the only un-erring perſonal Expoſitor of the Word; yet the Holy Spirit (as I may ſay) in perſon ſeldom doth it; but uſually conveyeth the light of the Word unto man, by ſuch men as himſelf hath firſt enlightned.

There want not ſome who would have the Word ſet nakedly before all, that ſo every man waiting for the light of the Holy Spirit, may make his own apprehenſion the interpretation of it; and 'tis true, that nothing is an interpretation to any man beyond or beſides what himſelf apprehends; yet the apprehenſions of this or that man, may be very ſerviceable unto many others, and are often the means which God uſeth and bleſſeth for the leading of their underſtandings into the way both of truth and holineſs. Nor can they who are thus led, be therefore juſtly charged to ſee, ſpiritually, with other mens eyes, becauſe others have been inſtrumental for the opening of their eyes; or that they ſee by other mens light, becauſe others have been helpful in bringing them from darkneſs unto light; no more then they can be charged to ſee, corporally, with other mens eyes, whoſe eye-ſight hath been cured (as a ſecond cauſe) by the ſkill of man; or, that they ſee by other mens light, who ſaw nothing till a window was opened to them. For the light which any man brings and holds forth, becomes every mans proper light, who is enabled to receive it and ſee by it. The Goſpel is held forth to thouſands to whom yet it is hid; the God of this world having blinded the eyes of their mind, leſt the light of the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt, who is the image of God, ſhould ſhine unto (or irradiate) them, that is, ſhine into them. So that every ſoul muſt have an internal eye or light given him, before he can ſavingly receive that light which is externally offered him; and whoſoever thus receives the light offered, makes that as much his own (in his own capacity) as it was the offerers. And foraſmuch as there are many unſtable and unlearned ones (ſo the Apoſtle Peter expreſſeth them, 2 Pet. 3. 16.) who (at leaſt preſuming to ſee without, if not ſcorning to ſee by the light which others offer) wreſt not only the Epiſtles of Paul, in which (as the Apoſtle Peter there affirmeth) are many things hard to be underſtood, but all other Scriptures to their own deſtruction, it cannot be reaſonably judged a diſſervice either to God or to his people, to endeavour (in the utmoſt improvement of gifts and light received) a right interpretation of them. And though we dare not offer our interpretations under the title of Infallible, and ſo challenge a dominion over the faith of others, yet we may be helpers both of their joy and knowledge. We are commanded to try the Spirits whether they be of God (1 John 4.1.) We muſt not reject all Spirits, becauſe poſſibly many are not of God. The Spirit of God is above all trial; but there are Spirits (even the Spirits or ſpiritual gifts of all men) which muſt be ſubmitted to trial, and ſtand Probationers. And becauſe they are to be tried, therefore it followeth that they are to be uſed; for to what purpoſe ſhould that be tried which is not to be uſed? To try a thing or perſon, doth indeed ſuppoſe that there may be a failing in either; but it doth not at all infer, that there is no uſe of either, but rather that both are uſeful: And if upon trial much be found which is unſound, and ſo to be refuſed, yet that which is ſound muſt be retained. Thus the Apoſtle directs (1 Theſ. 5. 21.) Prove all things, hold faſt that which is good.

What is preſented in the following Expoſitions, is not the impoſing of a ſence either upon the Word of God, or upon the underſtandings of men, but an humble tender of what the Expoſitor underſtands as the ſence of it, to the trial of all.

Some, I know, begin to ſay, that there is, or at leaſt, that ſhortly there will be little or no need at all of ſuch poor helps as theſe: Surely it will be the rejoycing of all who honour Jeſus Chriſt, and love his appearing, to ſee that day, not ſo much becauſe they may then take their eaſe, and reſt from theſe labours (for though the ſervants of Chriſt, through the infirmity of their fleſh, are often wearied at their work, yet through the ſtrength of his Grace, they ſhall not be weary of it) but becauſe when that which is imperfect, or (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, 1 Cor. 13. 10.) in part ſhall be done away, then that will be come which is perfect. Only my fear is that ſome are ſo buſie in decrying theſe things (which we readily acknowledge to have many imperfections in them) that for haſte they would do them away (in their own and others wrong) before that which is perfect be come unto us. Propheſie ſhall ceaſe, and knowledge (of this ſize, and as now attained) ſhall be done away; but when theſe ceaſe, in order to God's appointment, thoſe weakneſſes and wants in the ſons of men ſhall ceaſe alſo, to cure and ſupply which, they were appointed by God. How happy and glorious a thing were it, if we could ſee this Age approve it ſelf ſuch as had no need to be taught? or that the ſymptomes of the ſame ſickneſſes and impotencies both of Judgment and Practice did not now diſcover themſelves as formerly? How many are there who ſpeak much of the holy and bleſſed Spirit (concerning whom we can neither ſpeak nor boaſt too much) who yet walk after the fleſh? How many diſcourſe high (concerning which all our diſcourſes fall too low) of thoſe new Heavens and of that new Earth wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs, who yet defile and pollute the old with their unrighteouſneſs? Where almoſt can we behold the Image of that Glory which we ſhould continually wait for, ſtampt upon the wayes of men? And while the actings of men are every where thus low and earthly, doth the age look like that which is either actually above, or hath near out-grown teaching? As for my ſelf, I deſire (ſhould I live to that day) when my Lord and Maſter cometh, to be found thus doing. It is dangerous to lay down or depart from the practice of known duties, upon the expectation of further priviledges; Or to ſay, we need not now do that which ſhortly (poſſibly very ſhortly) we ſhall need do no more. Each ſtate hath its proper rules and helps, and to them we muſt ſubmit, till we are removed out of ſuch a ſtate. 'Tis no wiſdom for a dim-ſighted man preſently to throw away his Spectacles, though he be aſſured that within a while his eye-ſight ſhall be cleared.

Chriſtian Reader, let you and I be not only contented, but thankful that we may behold the Glory of the Lord in theſe Glaſſes, till himſelf lead us into his Glory, and give us the Top-ſtone of all Perfections, to ſee face to face. The furtherance of ſouls in the way to this Glory, is the deſign of this Work, which now by the aſſiſtance of God, is advanced half way; as for the other half (ſeeing no man can boaſt of to morrow, or knoweth what a day may bring forth) I can only ſay, that it is in my heart, if the Lord continue life and ſtrength with the Call hitherto afforded, to advance with what ſpeed I can (though I confeſs the beſt of my ſpeed is but ſlowneſs) towards the finiſhing of that alſo. The travel of this ſixth Stage, I leave with you, and both you and it to the bleſſing, and under the ſhadow of the Almighty, in whom I am,

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations

UPON THE EIGHTEENTH, NINETEENTH, TWENTIETH
AND TWENTY FIRST CHAPTERS
Of the Book of

JOB.

CHAP. XVIII. Verſ. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid;

How long will it be, ere you make an end of words? Mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak.

Wherefore are we counted as Beaſts; and reputed vile in your ſight?

He teareth himſelf in his anger: ſhall the earth be forſaken for thee? and ſhall the rock be removed out of his place?

E*LIPHAZ* having finiſhed, Bildad begins a ſecond diſpute with Job; Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid. Yet he rather reproves then anſwers; and returns invectives more then reaſons. Bildad ſtrikes here again upon the ſame ſtone, at which himſelf and his friends had ſtumbled before. His whole diſcourſe falls into three parts.

First, We have his Preface.
Secondly, The body of his Speech.
Thirdly, He winds up, and draws all together into a brief Concluſion.

His Preface is laid down in the four former verſes of this Chapter.

The body of his diſcourſe extends it ſelf from the fifth verſe incluſively to the end of the twentieth, in which his general ſcope is to deſcribe the miſerable condition of a wicked man: and he doth it under a threefold conſideration, as a threefold gradation of his miſery.

Firſt, In his life.
Secondly, In his death.
Thirdly, After death.

So that living, dying, and dead, he is miſerable, and therefore altogether miſerable.

The concluſion of his diſcourſe is contained in the laſt verſe, in which he gives us the ſtrength of what he had ſaid, and re-affirms it; Surely ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

His general deſign and ſcope is to convince Job that he was a wicked man, becauſe he ſuffered thoſe things which none but a wicked man (according to his opinion) ever did, or ſhould ſuffer. For the proof of this he proceeds in his former method, bringing nothing new for the matter, no new argument, no new medium, either to confirm his own poſition, or to infirm the opinion of Job; but cloathing his former reaſons in a new dreſs, he gives us a very lively and pathetical deſcription of the eſtate of a wicked man; upon which ſubject he had treated in the eighth Chapter. Only two differences appear between this and his firſt diſcourſe.

Nova hic nulla: eſt tamen oratio Allegoriis & Metaphoris illuſtribus improborũ clades oculis ſubjiciens. Merl.

Firſt, At the eighth Chapter he ſets out the happineſs of a godly man in oppoſition to the miſerable eſtate of the wicked; here he leaves out that part.

Secondly, At the eighth Chapter he uſeth many arguments to move Job to repent, and turn to God. He leaves out that work alſo here, not ſo much as once mentioning repentance, or exhorting him to return to God; as if he either thought it too late, or that Job's obſtinacy was remedileſs, and the wound both of his outward and inward ſtate incurable.

The firſt part or preface is ſpent in reproof, and we may obſerve five things for which Bildad reproveth Job.

Firſt, He reproveth him for wording it, or for talkativeneſs, at the beginning of the ſecond verſe; How long will it be ere you make an end of words.

Secondly, He reproveth him of inadvertency, and careleſneſs, in the middle of the ſecond verſe; Mark, &c. As if he had ſaid; You have been heedleſs all this while, you have not well attended what we have been about; Mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak.

Thirdly, He chargeth him with contemptuous thoughts, and an irreverent eſtimation of his friends: (verſ. 3.) Wherefore are we counted as beaſts, and reputed vile in your ſight? Thou haſt not only numbred us with, but below the loweſt of the people; Thou either lookeſt upon us as if we had forfeited our reaſon and were not men, or had loſt our integrity, and ſo were the worſt of men.

Fourthly, He chargeth him with fury and impatience in the beginning of the fourth verſe; He teareth himſelf in his anger; As if he had ſaid; As thou haſt torn our reputation, ſo thy own peace; thou art uncivil to us, and a torture to thy ſelf.

Fifthly, He chargeth him with inſolency and boldneſs towards God himſelf in the latter part of the fourth verſe; Shall the earth be forſaken for thee, and ſhall the rock be removed out of his place? What! muſt God work wonders, and turn the world upſide down for your ſake? Doſt thou think thy ſelf a man ſo extraordinary, that the ordinary providences and diſpenſations of God, will not ſerve thy turn? Shall the earth be forſaken for thee? &c. Theſe are the ſteps of Bildad's angry addreſs to Job; Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid.

Verſ. 2. How long will it be ere you make an end of words? &c.

There is ſome variety of conjecture who is here intended, or to whom Bildad directs his ſpeech.

For the original is plural, as if he were not ſpeaking to a ſingle perſon, but to a multitude, How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? And it is queſtioned upon that ground, whether Bildad ſpake to Job alone or no.

Firſt, Some conceive, that Bildad's diſcourſe aims at Job, in comfort with Eliphaz, who ſpake before, as if Bildad had been angry with them both; becauſe Eliphaz and he holding out ſo long a diſpute, had hindred him from unburdening his mind, and offering his opinion; How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? As if he had ſaid, Will you two have all the talk, ſhall not I and my brother be ſuffered to ſpeak our judgments? How long will it be? Thus he is ſuppoſed to grow angry, not only with Job, but with his friend.

Secondly, Others think that Bildad ſpake only to his friends and companions in that diſpute, and not to Job at all; as if he had altogether diſliked the courſe which they had taken for Job's conviction; How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? As if he had ſaid; Ye have not hit the point, nor ſtated the queſtion right, ye do but ſpeak words all this while, ye are not yet upon the matter. Others make it out thus; Why do you wrong your ſelves ſo much, and diſparage your wiſdom to talk with ſuch a man as this Job is? A man of ſo little reaſon, and of ſo much paſſion; a man ſo obdurate in and addicted to his own way; a man ſo high in and ſtiff to his own conceit: do ye not perceive that ye labor in vain, that your words periſh into air; and leave no impreſſion upon this hardned man? doth he not caſt your counſels behind his back, and refuſe all your advices? therefore be ye adviſed, give over, make an end of words. Which way ſoever we take it, whether Bildad ſpeak to Job in conſort with Eliphaz, or only to his friends, the heat of his ſpirit breaks out at his lips. And his own words proclaim, if not his pride, yet his impatience, while he ſaith, How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?

Miror de veſtra imprudentia, quod cũ perſpicuum ſit, vos inventũ verba proferre & laterem lavare, huic homini duræ cervicis ſatisfacere conamini. Bold.

Hence Note, Long diſputes kindle paſſions.

In thoſe acts wherein reaſon ſhould do all, paſſion would do moſt, and comonly doth too much; hence, inſtead of arguing we fall to inveighing, and for real convictions give perſonal provocations. Moſt are ſo immoderate in diſputation, that they need a moderatour, as much to quiet their ſpirits, as to ſtate their queſtions and opinions. Solomon tells us (*Prov.*27.17.) that, As Iron ſharpeneth Iron, ſo a man ſharpeneth the countenance of his friend. When we whet one Iron upon another, the edge grows keen; thus a man ſharpeneth the countenance of his friend. The word that we tranſlate countenance, ſignifies alſo anger, or paſſion, becauſe anger quickly appears in the face or countenance. Hence ſome render the Proverb, As Iron ſharpeneth Iron, ſo a man ſharpeneth the anger of his friend. He ſtirs up his paſſion, till he grows as keen as a knife, yea as a razor: oppoſition ſharpeneth the ſpirit, and ſome have been ſo ſharpened by it, that they come to ſharps indeed, and when they have long contended by words, have fallen to blows.

This carries a fair ſence, yet I conceive that cleareſt, which reſtrains theſe words to the perſon of Job alone. But then the query will be why he ſpeaks in the plural number, How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?

Some anſwer, Bildad ſpeaks to Job in the plural number, for honours ſake, and in reverence to his perſon. I find very little reaſon for that, conſidering he ſpeaks of him at ſo low a rate all the Chapter over.

Honoris gratia. Cajet.

Secondly, One of the Ancients tells us, Bildad ſpake in the plural number, becauſe he thought Job was poſſeſt with an evil ſpirit; That evil ſpirit in the Goſpel, being asked his name, anſwered, It is Legion, for we are many. Had Job been poſſeſſed with an evil Spirit, he might well have been ſpoken to as many: I am ſure, as more then a Good many. But I paſs that.

Pravo ſpiritu comitatus. Bed.

Thirdly, It is conceived that Bildad ſpeaks plurally, becauſe Job had his aſſiſtants, ſeconds, and abettors in that diſpute, who did ſometimes put in a word, and help him at a dead lift.

Fourthly, I conclude, that he ſpeaks to Job alone, in a word of the plural number, according to the common and familiar uſage or idiom of the Jewiſh Language, rather then from any ſpecial reſpect intended to his perſon, or the plurality of his Aſſiſtants; How long will it be ere you make an end of words?

Quod cum ſolo Jobo diſputans illum appellet numero multitudinis potius ad familiarem linguæ Hebrææ conſuetudinem, quã ad illius honoris grave aliquod momentum referendum eſt. Pined.

The matter of this firſt clauſe, hath been opened upon thoſe words of Zophar (Chap. 11.2, 3.) Should not the multitude of words be anſwered? and ſhould a man full of talk be juſtified? Where 'twas ſhewed, that words without matter, ayery, empty diſcourſes are very burdenſom to an underſtanding ear: How long will it be ere you make an end of words? There is the firſt charge, talkativeneſs or unprofitableneſs in his ſpeech.

His ſecond charge is careleſneſs, and neglect of what his friends were about to ſpeak, or had formerly ſpoken.

Mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak.

Some interpret it ironically, as calling for his direction, not as deſiring his attention; Inſtruct us, and then we will ſpeak. As if he ſhould ſay, Yes, do, preſcribe to us what we ſhall ſay, put matter into our heads, and words into our mouthes; you were beſt take upon you to be our Teacher, and Maſter, as if nothing could be right, but that which you direct. But the word which we tranſlate to mark, doth not intend direction to others, but attention in our ſelves; and not ſo much the attention of the ear, as of the mind, and heart, when the ſoul as it were ſits upon a buſineſs, with its whole ſtrength, and puts out all its powers, to what it is about: Underſtand, or mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak. Now as the former clauſe was interpreted, either in reference to the friends of Job, or to Job himſelf, ſo is this alſo.

Inſtruite ut poſtea loquamur quod an tu nobis loquendi formulas præſcribis? nec quicquam recte dictum cenſebitur niſi tu id probaveris.

בין ſignificat propriè intrinſecus mente conſiderare, & animū certa diſpoſitione intendere. Merc.

They who expound Bildad in the former part reproving his friends, give the ſence thus: Mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak. As if he had ſaid; O my friends, ceaſe to utter your thoughts inconſiderately, ſpeak no longer what comes next, but mark, ſit down, and conſider what you have to ſay, let us mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak. Thus he reproves their raſhneſs, as not having attended their own deſign, nor the intendment of Job in his foregoing anſwers. Elihu's zeal breaks out into ſuch Language both againſt Job and his three friends (Chap. 32. 3.) Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the ſon of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: againſt Job was his wrath kindled, becauſe he juſtified himſelf rather then God. Alſo againſt his three friends was his wrath kindled; becauſe they had found no anſwer, and yet had condemned Job. Job's friends found many anſwers, yet Elihu ſaith, they had found no anſwer; their anſwers were not judicious, or convincing (as he conceived) they did not hit the hing of the controverſie: Such anſwers are no anſwers, unleſs we anſwer to purpoſe, we anſwer not at all.

Quis ſit diſputationis cardo nō ſatis attenditis. Bold.

In which ſenſe Caiphas reproves the aſſembly of the Phariſees (Joh. 11. 49.) when they ſate in counſel againſt Chriſt; and took into conſideration what was beſt to do with him, who had done ſo miracles; You know nothing at all, nor conſider that it is expedient that one man ſhould die, &c.

From this expoſition (taking the Text as referring to all his friends,) Obſerve

Deliberate conſideration muſt go before ſpeaking.

We ſhould firſt mark, and afterward ſpeak. Every word ſhould ſtay a while in the heart before it come at the tongue. So, nature ſeems to dictate; who (as we ſee in the fabrick of the body,) hath ſeated the tongue, and the heart at a great diſtance, that ſo we might take time to mould our words in our thoughts, and meditate our ſelves before we adviſe others. And leaſt the tongue, (as Naturaliſts alſo obſerve) ſhould be too nimble at its work, it hath a double hedge, or wall, one of teeth, another of lips to keep it in. The Apoſtle James (*Chap.*1.19.) gives this counſel; Be ſwift to hear, and ſlow to ſpeak. Some ſlowneſs of ſpeaking is no impediment, but the ornament of ſpeech. There is an uncomely ſlowneſs of ſpeech, ſuch as Moſes complained of (*Exod.*4.10.) Some have hearts and heads full of rich and rare commodities, who yet want utterance. But it is not only a duty, but our commendation to have a copie of our words, fairly written in our hearts, before we utter them at our tongues.

Non intelligis O Job; hinc tuis reſponſionibus ſaltas extra chorum, aliud namq; nos agimus, aliud tu reſpondet. Pined. Surdo fabulā narrare.

Again, As theſe words are applied to Job, Mark, and then we will ſpeak: As if he had ſaid; O Job, we are not at all underſtood, no, nor well attended by thee; now do thy part, and we will do ours.

Obſerve, It is in vain to ſpeak till men hear and compoſe themſelves to underſtand.

Who would ſpeak to him that hath no ears, or to him that hath not an attentive ear? while we ſpeak to ſuch, we do but tell Stories to a deaf man. He that hath an ear, muſt have a heart in his ear, elſe he heareth not. Some ſleep at the Word with their eyes open, they ſleep with a kind of attention; though they hear all, yet they mark little, and do nothing of that which they have heard: Such, when the Sermon is ended, may tell you ſomewhat of their own waking dream, but they cannot tell you a word, to purpoſe, of the moſt working doctrine. The Apoſtle exhorts to attend after we have heard (*Heb.*2.1.) which ſhews a double attention: Firſt, An attention while we hear; Secondly, an attention to what we have heard. It is in vain to ſpeak, if there be not both theſe attentions. Therefore we ought to give the more earneſt heed, or to mark the things that we have heard. Now, if we muſt mark the things that we have heard, ſurely we muſt mark things as we hear them: if we miſs the firſt, we can never reach the latter; if we do not mark as we hear, we cannot mark the things that we have heard, that is, conſider, and enter into a due meditation of them. Marking is properly a work within; hearing is a work without. The Pſalmiſt (*Pſal.*48.13.) calls us to mark the Bulwarks of Zion: Tell the Towers thereof, mark ye well her Bulwarks. The phraſe is very ſignificant, put your hearts upon her bulwarks; ſo the Hebrew. Now as you are to mark the Towers, and Bulwarks of Zion, by putting your hearts upon her Bulwarks, that is, by conſidering how many defences God hath for Zion, and Jeruſalem, how many wayes of protection he hath for his people; This is the putting of our hearts upon Zions Bulwarks. Thus we ought to put our hearts upon the word of God, the voice that ſounds in Zion. This is our marking it. Every Miniſter may ſay to his hearers, as Bildad to Job, Mark, and then we will ſpeak. Words exciting attention, are as profitable, as words giving inſtruction and exhortation. This is the ſecond fault he chargeth Job with, An un-attentive ſpirit, to what was ſpoken.

The third is,

Verſ. 3. Wherefore are we accounted as beaſts, and reputed vile in your ſight?

Vulgari dicterio beſtiā vocamus hominē ſtupidum. Druſ.

Wherefore are we accounted as beaſts?] Here Bildad chargeth him with evil ſpeaking, and with pride, as if he had looked upon them as beaſts, and that he only was the man. We proverbially call a man that is either very ſtupid, or very wicked, a beaſt. (*Pſal.*49.21.) Man that is in honour, and underſtandeth not, is like the beaſts that periſh. He that wants underſtanding, is (as a beaſt) ruled only by affections, and paſſions: Wherefore are we accounted as beaſts?

The Hebrew is ſingular, Wherefore are we accounted a beaſt before thee? The word Behemah is here uſed, Why are we accounted a Behemah, or beaſt before thee? As if all we did make but one beaſt; or had neither reaſon in us to judge, nor abilty to ſpeak, which two diſtinguiſh man from a beaſt.

But why doth Bildad tax Job with ſuch uncomely language as this? did he ever call them beaſt? Job never ſpake thus directly, but he did oblickly and equivalently, while he bids them (*Chap.*12.7.) Ask now the beaſts, and they ſhall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they ſhall tell thee; The Maſter is above the Scholar, and he that teacheth, above him that is taught. Hence, while Job ſends his friends to School to the beaſts, he ſecretly taketh them as more ignorant then beaſts. He ſeems to ſpeak this out (*Chap.*17.4.) Thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding. And again (*verſ.*10.) But as for you all, do ye return, and come, for I have not found one wiſe man among you. A company which hath not a wiſe man among them, may go for beaſts, and will hardly be kept from doing like beaſts. From theſe or the like ſpeeches, Bildad raiſeth this charge, Wherefore are we accounted beaſts before thee?

But though Job ſpake thus, yet he did it not with a reproaching ſpirit, but only (in heat of diſpute) to ſhew how they were miſtaken; And as for Bildad, who makes this harſh conſtruction, he ſhould have conſidered what words he had given, as well as what he had received; he ſhould have been patient in taking juſt reprehenſions, who had given thoſe which were unjuſt.

Now in that Bildad is netled at this, and takes it ſo hainouſly, Wherefore are we accounted as beaſts?

Obſerve, There is nothing that men can hardlier part with then their eſteem; and that which ſticks moſt with them is to be undervalued in the eſteem of their parts and gifts.

Some account it a kind of happineſs, and are well contented to be undervalued in their outward eſtates, they make ſome advantage of that undervaluing; They had rather be, then be accounted rich; but few love to be undervalued in their inward ſtate; and ſome had rather be accounted wiſe and learned, then take pains to be ſo. He eſpecially that bears himſelf up upon the reputation of his parts, cannot bear it, to be reckoned for leſs then he caſts up himſelf; he cannot endure to be low in the eyes of others, who is high in his own. And indeed to be undervalued is a very great tryal. Hence we ſee the infinite ſelf-denial of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who made himſelf of no reputation; who did not regard for how litttle he was reckoned; Though he was in the form of God, and thought it no robbery to be equal with God, yet he emptied himſelf, and appeared in the form of a ſervant.

Again, Had Job ſpoken with an intent to vilifie his friends, this charge had come juſtly againſt him.

Hence Obſerve, To undervalue others, and to put upon them terms of contempt, is not only uncomely but ſinful.

Chriſt takes notice of this (Mat. 5.22.) as a great breach of the law of love; Whoſoever ſhall ſay to his brother Racha, (that is, witleſs, brainleſs, empty-head; ſuch a one Racha ſignifieth) he that thus vilifies his brother, ſhall be in danger of a Council; but he that ſaith thou fool, ſhall be in danger of hell fire.

It is a great folly to affect the name of wiſe, and underſtanding; as Chriſt chargeth the Phariſees (Mat. 23. 8.) Be not called Rabbi, for one is your Maſter, even Chriſt, and ye are brethren. The Phariſees were ambitious of titles, and loved to be applauded and pointed at, as the only wiſe men, as the Oracles of the times. Now as it is a vanity to affect ſuch an opinion of our ſelves: ſo it is ſinful to aſperſe any man, or to blot him (undeſervedly) out of the good opinion of others. And becauſe we are apt to run into extreams, ſometimes to account men as beaſts, and ſometimes to account them more then men, therefore Chriſt corrects that humour alſo (*verſ.*9.) Call no man father on earth: for one is your father in heaven. But muſt we eſteem all men alike? Is it not under a command; Honour thy father, and thy mother. And is not this true, as of natural parents, ſo of civil? How then doth Chriſt ſay, Call no man father; ſeeing to call any man father, is but to give him honour, and we are obliged by the letter of the Law, to honour every man who is our father? The meaning then of this prohibition, Call no man father, is, give no man power over your judgments or conſciences, ſuch as the father hath over the perſon of his child. The Apoſtle dehorts Saints (Epheſ. 4.) Be not as children carried about with every wind of doctrine. A child is apt to receive every impreſſion, or to think this or that ſo, becauſe his father ſaith it: the reaſon and Authority of a father, will carry and ſway a child which way he pleaſeth. In that ſence, Call no man father, honour no man ſo much, be not ſlaves to the opinions of others. As among the Papiſts, Friers are to their ſuperiours or fathers; to queſtion whoſe commands is a high preſumption, to ask a reaſon, curioſity, to diſobey breach of vow: their words muſt ſtand for a law, their opinions for Oracles; thus call no man father. Now as we muſt take heed of that extream, not to call men fathers, as if we were to live upon their authority: ſo take heed (on the other ſide) of ſlighting men, of accounting men beaſts, of undervaluing them, and trampling them underfeet, both are equally to be avoided; give every man his due; neither have the perſons of men (as Jude ſpeaks, *verſ.*16.) in admiration, by reaſon of advantage; neither have the perſon of any man in contempt, that may be, both to your own, and to his diſadvantage. Wherefore are we accounted as beaſts before thee?

And reputed vile in your ſight.

The word which we tranſlate vile, hath a double ſignification, according to a twofold root, whence it may be derived. Some derive it from a root which ſignifieth to ſhut up, to cloſe, to hide, to obſcure a thing. And hence ſome of the ancient Rabbins, as alſo late Hebricians, render this part of the verſe, not why are we reputed vile in your ſight? but, why are we ſhut up in your ſight? The meaning is, why are we reputed as men whoſe underſtandings are locked up, and whoſe minds are cloſed; as if a cover were put upon them, or as if we were hood-winckt? So it ſuites well with the former clauſe; Why are we accounted as beaſts? and, why are we reputed as men whoſe underſtandings are ſhut up? They whoſe underſtandings are either ſhut up, or departed from them, may without any great diſparagement be numbred among beaſts. This alſo anſwers what Job ſpake of his friends (*Chap.*17.4.) Thou haſt hid their hearts from underſtanding, therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them.

A radice טמה obturatus, concluſus, abſconditus fuit. R. Moyſes & R. David. Quare clauſi ſumus in oculis veſtris: dicitur autē corde clauſus qui mentem habet clauſam ne poſſit clare res intueri.

There is a ſtate, or ſort of men, whoſe hearts are looked up, and hid. The Apoſtle affirms it of the Jews in general, When Moſes is read, to this day there is a vail before their eyes. That is, upon their hearts, their hearts are ſhut up. And ſo Chriſt (*Mat.*13.15.) deſcribes them, from the Prophet Iſaiah; This peoples heart is waxen groſs, and their ears dull of hearing, and their eyes (that is, the eyes of their underſtanding) have they cloſed. The character of a natural man is thus given by the Apoſtle (*Epheſ.*4.18.) Having their underſtanding darkned, or blinded. This is a good ſenſe here; Wherefore are we reputed as men, whoſe underſtandings are darkned, and whoſe minds are blocked up?

But rather ſecondly, the word Tama, ſignifies defiled, unclean, or impure; Grammarians tell us, that from this Hebrew word Tama, the Latines have the word Tamino, which is uſed only in compoſition contamino, to defile, or pollute. And the word ſignifies, not any kind of defilement, or filthineſs, but that which is moſt ſordid, and excrementitious, moſt vile, and foul; as appears from the ceremonial Law, Levit. 15.2.

טמא contaminatus, pollutus, hinc latini acceperunt tamino, quod tantum in compoſitione utuntur contamino. Avenar. Excrementoſam ſpuritiem præ ſe fert à cujus tactu tanqā à re abominabili abſtinere lex præcipit. Levit.15.2.

Some conceive that Job carries on the ſenſe of this with the former clauſe; We are accounted as beaſts, and reputed unclean before thee: That is, as unclean beaſts, and that under a twofold notion. Either firſt, as beaſts that lie in their dung, and filth, as Swine, and ſtalled Oxen, &c. Or Secondly, as beaſts legally unclean; in the Ceremonial Law, beaſts are divided into clean and unclean: ſome were clean, and they were for ſacrifice; others were unclean, and they might not be offered in ſacrifice. Taking the text under this interpretation, it carries the greateſt diminution, of the credit, and goodneſs of his friends, as if he had reckoned them, not only among, but below many beaſts. But I ſuppoſe we need not tie up the ſence to the exactneſs of that alluſion, Bildad's ſcope being only to complain of Job's unfriendly cenſure of him, and his friends, as if they had been not only ignorant in matters of doctrine, as beaſts, but alſo ſinful and unholy in matters of practiſe, as the worſt of men; Wherefore are we reputed vile in your ſight?

Now ſeeing the ſame word ſignifies polluted and vile too.

Obſerve, Every thing and perſon, which is defiled and polluted with ſin, is alſo vile.

Baſeneſs hath pollution in it, either moral or natural: He is not vile, who is low in birth, or low in eſtate; but in Scripture-ſtile, the vile perſon is the wicked perſon, the perſon polluted with ſin. (*Pſal.*15.4.) In whoſe eyes a vile perſon is contemned. This vile perſon is not the poor man, but the wicked man. In which ſenſe the Prophet Daniel foretels (*Dan.*11.21.) That there ſhall ſtand up in his ſtate a vile perſon. This vile perſon was a man in honour, a great King, who is there called vile, becauſe he was a wicked King, a perſecutor of the people of God: wickedneſs obſcures all our greatneſs; nothing makes us truly honourable but grace; and nothing makes us truly vile but ſin: what ſin doth, that it is; if ſin make a perſon vile, then ſin in it ſelf is moſt vile. We are uſually more troubled at the effects, then at the nature of ſin: but we ſhould chiefly look to the nature of things. Sin it ſelf is ſo vile, that whatſoever is vile, is but enough to be the ſhadow of it; it doth not reallize the vileneſs of it.

As grace is ſo excellent that all the excellencies in the creature are gathered together to ſhadow out what that is, (*Ezek.*16.) I cloathed thee with broidered work, and ſhod thee with badgers skins, and decked thee with fine linnen, and I covered thee with ſilk, I decked thee alſo with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thine hands, and a chain on thy neck. And I put a Jewel on thy forehead, and earings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head. Here's a collection of the moſt excellent, and precious things in the world. And what are theſe? the ſhadows only of that grace which the Lord puts upon his people, when he hath taken them into covenant with himſelf: (*verſ.*8.) Then was the time of love, and I ſware to thee, and entred into covenant with thee, ſaith the Lord, and thou becameſt mine. Gold, and precious ſtones, ſhadow the ſtate of the Church of Chriſt in the pureſt times, when abundance of grace and ſpirit ſhall be powred out, *Rev.*21. On the other ſide, when the holy Ghoſt would ſhew what ſin is, all the filthineſs in the world is ſcraped and thrown together to do it: while the Prophet deſcribes the ſtate of a man in nature, he is compared to an infant in blood, and pollution, unwaſhed, unbound up. (*Ezek.*16.4.) The Apoſtle gives us a like character of a natural man, (*Rom.*3.13.) His throat is an open ſepulchre: That which ſtreams out of his heart by his tongue and voice, is nothing but rottenneſs, and an unſavoury ſtench, even as out of a ſepulchre. The Prophet Ezekiel (*Chap.*22.18.) compares that people in their wickedneſs to droſs; Son of Man, the houſe of Iſrael is become to me droſs; all they are Braſs, and Tin, and Iron, and Lead in the midſt of the furnace; they are even the droſs of ſilver, or reprobate ſilver, Jer. 6.28. And which is worſe then this, the ſame Prophet (*Ezek.*24.10,11.) compares their corruptions to the ſcum of a pot; Heap up wood, and ſet it empty upon the coals thereof, that the braſs of it may be hot, and may burn, and the filthineſs of it may be molten in it, and the ſcum of it may be conſumed. Scum is the filthineſs of the pot; ſin is the filthineſs of the heart and life.

Verſ. 4. He teareth himſelf in his anger, &c.

O rapiens animam tuã. Heb.

O tu, heus tu, qui teipſum præ ira dilanias feræ more. Merc.

Jobum accuſat nõ tãtum iracundiæ, ſed etiã rabidi furoris.

Tenetur à proximis & rogatur ut ipſe ſibi placetur, nã ſua labia mordet, caput quaſſat, veſtimẽta ſcindit & ſe in columnas impingit. Sen.

The Hebrew may be rendred by an exclamation, O thou who teareſt thy ſelf, or, O thou tearer of thy ſelf in anger, ſhall the earth be forſaken for thee? So Pſal. 113.7. He raiſeth up the poor out of the duſt, or, O thou that raiſeſt up the poor out of the duſt! Read a like conſtruction in the Propheſie of Obad. verſ. 3. We render, He teareth himſelf. The word ſignifieth to tear after the manner of wild beaſts, to tear as a Lyon tears. Thus Bildad conceived Job enraged againſt himſelf, as a beaſt; anger having maſtered his underſtanding, and paſſion over-ſet his reaſon. He teareth himſelf. The Moraliſt deſcribes an angry man forcibly held by his friends, and they begging of him to be kind to himſelf; he bites his own lips, he rends his cloaths, and daſheth himſelf againſt the pillars; yet all anger is not thus angry: There are divers ſorts of anger.

Firſt, There is an anger with our ſelves, which is good and commendable; here Bildad rebukes Job for ſelf-anger; and therefore he ſuppoſed Job's ſelf-anger was not good. We are ofteneſt out, while we are angry with others, but we may ſoon be out while we are angry with our ſelves. Self-anger is good, when we are angry with our ſelves, either becauſe we have done that which is ill, or have not done ſo much good, or good not ſo well as we might. The Apoſtle numbers this among the effects of that Godly ſorrow which works repentance unto ſalvation, not to be repented of: Indignation and revenge are both the births of anger; both theſe are numbred among the effects of Godly ſorrow, 2 *Cor.*7.11. Indignation againſt others is ſeldom without ſin; and revenge, in our own cauſe upon others, is ever ſinful; Theſe are to be repented of, and therefore they cannot be the effects of true repentance. 'Twas then indignation and revenge upon themſelves, becauſe they had done evil, which the Apoſtle obſerved and commended as good in thoſe Corinthïans.

Secondly, There is an anger with others, which is alſo good. It is a duty to be angry, when we ſee others act againſt or depart from their duty; He hath no zeal for God, who, on this ground, cannot be angry with man. And while the anger of man waxes hot, purely, upon this account, the Spirit of God is the fire which boils it up. We are angry for Gods ſake, when we are angry becauſe God is diſhonoured. This is a grave, ſerious, a vertuous, and a holy anger; while the Apoſtle gives a reſtriction to ſome anger (*Epheſ.*4.26.) he gives not only a permiſſion, but a command for this.

Thirdly, There is a pettiſh, or fooliſh anger; when we are angry with we know not what, and angry we know not why, angry with thoſe things which cannot intend us hurt; ſome are angry with the ſtone they ſtumble at, with the rain that wets them, with the wind that blows upon them; if they be not humor'd, they are angred. Jonas was angry when he ſaw a gourd withered, and a great City not deſtroyed.

Fourthly, There is a ridiculous cowardly anger, like that of a whelp, or cur, who barks, but runs away. As ſome are more afraid then hurt, ſo others are ſo much afraid, that you need not fear they will do you any hurt. Their anger is but a bluſter, and evaporates into words.

Fifthly, There is a ſlow, wrathful, revengeful anger; an anger which is ſteeped in malice; a ſevere tough anger; an anger, the coals whereof are raked up in the aſhes of a ſeeming forgetfulneſs, but with an intendment to break out into a conſuming flame. Such was that of Eſau againſt his brother Jacob, when he ſaid, The dayes of mourning for my father will come ſhortly, and then will I ſlay my brother. Father and brother ſhould have had but one funeral, if the reſolves of his revengeful ſpirit had not lain croſs to the counſel of God.

Sixthly, There is a vehement paſſionate furious anger, a raging anger, both towards others and our ſelves; with which Bildad here chargeth Job, He teareth himſelf in his anger.

Zanch. in Eph. 4.

Ira furor brevis.

This anger, though in a reaſonable creature, yet is unreaſonable; it knows no bounds, nor doth it keep any. Grammarians ſay, that ira the Latine word for anger, comes from ire, which ſignifies to go, and they give the reaſon, becauſe a man in anger goes out of himſelf, out of his wits, off from his reaſon; and when a man is pacified, and the ſtorm down, he doth redire ad ſe, return again to himſelf. Such anger is a ſhort madneſs, and madneſs is but a long anger. They who are fulleſt of reaſon, are furtheſt from this anger, and moſt diſpleaſed with themſelves for it, if at any time it appear upon them. Yet anger may be improved to excellent ſervices, not only as it warms the ſpirit to reſiſt that which is evil, but as it carries us on to good againſt reſiſtance; in which ſenſe one of the Ancients tells us, that as reaſon ought to be the Chariot-driver in man, and hold the reins; ſo the two horſes, that ſhould draw on the Chariot of man in all his actions, are the concupiſcible, and the iraſcible appetites; Theſe two as they are qualified, modified, and kept under the reins of reaſon, are of continual uſe, otherwiſe they break all, and our ſelves too; as here it is ſaid of Job, He teareth himſelf in his anger. Of this anger Note;

Plutarchus.

> Furious anger may hurt others, but it hurts our ſelves moſt.

None are more their own enemies then angry perſons are; Doſt thou well to be angry? ſaid God to Jonah; ſaith he, I do well to be angry even unto death, Jonah 4.9. He means it not only of being angry till he dyed, but of dying for anger. That muſt needs be hurtful, yea mortal to man, which carries in it a reſiſtance againſt the immortal God. Some anger is not only a grief for what is upon us, but a kind of ſtomacking at him who lays it upon us; if we do not confeſs it to be ſo, the Spirit of God knows it to be ſo, and tells us plainly it is ſo; and therefore ſuch anger cannot but hurt and tear our ſelves.

For the avoiding of this tearing, vexing anger, take theſe brief counſels.

Firſt, In provocations, have an eye upward; This will balaſt the ſpirit, and make it ſteady; Heaven is above all ſtorms and tempeſts, and the more we converſe there, the leſs ſtormy are our hearts. David had provocation enough to make him angry, and boil up his paſſion to the height (2 Sam. 16.5.) Shimei curſed him, but he looked up, God hath ſaid to him curſe David; and then how calm, and meek was his ſpirit? As that is a good anger which is for Gods ſake, ſo, looking up to God will keep us from evil anger.

Secondly, Turn anger upon your ſelves; not to tear your ſelves (as Job is ſuppoſed here) but to conſider and reprove your ſelves: The more any man is acquainted with himſelf, the leſs angry will he be with others. A true ſight of our ſelves, ſhews us ſo much cauſe to be diſpleaſed with our ſelves, that we ſhall have little leiſure and leſs cauſe to be angry with our brethren. He that looks much into himſelf, will ſee ſo much to do, and to blame at home, that he will not find much to blame abroad, eſpecially he will not do it with paſſionate anger. Anger alwayes riſeth from ſome over-valuing of our ſelves; we think our ſelves ill dealt with, or dealt with below our worth when we are angry. Now he that knows himſelf fully, can ſcarcely think himſelf undervalued by any; he hath lower thoughts of himſelf, then other can have of him: There are not many receits for the cure of anger, better or more approved then this.

Dr. Reyn. Treat. of the Paſſ. Chap. 31.

Thirdly, Correct your anger before you imploy your anger; do with this paſſion as Phyſitians do with their drugs; ſome drugs which are healthful for the body, excellent to purge and diſpel noxious humours; muſt yet before they are uſed, be corrected and receive ſome allay; you may poiſon the body with them elſe, and deſtroy it rather then repair its decayes: So in this caſe, your anger will tear, and undo you, unleſs you correct it, and take off the ſharpneſs and virulency of it. And as you do with your horſes, eſpecially with ſtomackful horſes; we firſt bridle and ſaddle them, and then ride them, elſe we cannot have them under command: Thus we muſt deal with anger; it is neceſſary to be angry ſometimes; and he is a fool that cannot be angry at all; only get this wiſdom, to bridle and ſaddle anger before you uſe it; leſt it carry you away, and hurry you without any command.

Fourthly, Let not your anger hang upon your ſpirits, or continue with you: That's the Apoſtles advice, Epheſ. 4.27. Let not the Sun go down upon your wrath. It is ill being in the dark with ſo bad a companion; Anger may paſs through the heart of a wiſe man, but, Solomon ſaith, It reſts in the boſom of fools. It is lawful to do ſome things, which to continue doing is unlawful; we cannot continue the actings of faith and love too long; But that Spirit which ſaith, Be ſtedfaſt in faith, let brotherly love continue; never ſaid, be ſtedfaſt in anger, or let contendings among brethren continue. Anger againſt ſin and enmity againſt the ſeed of the Serpent muſt continue, but the continuance of anger againſt any other, whether things or perſons is ſinful.

Fifthly, If you will avoid this anger, avoid the occaſions of it. They that are ſubject to paſſion, ſhould keep out of the way of paſſion. That King did wiſely who when curious glaſſes were preſented to him, broke them himſelf: And gave this reaſon, leſt another breaking them it ſhould provoke him to anger. 'Tis alſo very memorable, That when Cæſar had gotten the Cabinet of Pompey his implacable enemy into his poſſeſſion, he would not look over his papers, becauſe he would not diſcover that which might ſtir his paſſion, chuſing rather to burn them, then to be burnt by them. 'Tis wiſdom not to ſearch into that which being found may over-ballance our wiſdom.

Sixthly, Give a candid interpretation, both of words and actions; The glaſs through which we look, gives its colour to the object. Anger is uſually blown up by miſconſtructions. What we judge ill meant, is alwayes ill taken; Love thinks no ill, and therefore believes and hopes that all is well. Give that which troubles thee another name; if there be a miſtake in it, yet ſay, it is thy friends infirmity, or that he did it out of ignorance; if what he ſpake pincheth, ſay it proceeded from familiarity, or freeneſs of ſpirit.

Seventhly, Give not an eaſie ear to reports; do not alwaysh hear what others ſay of thee, or what 'tis ſaid they do. Many tear themſelves with anger, when they hear themſelves torn with ſlander; and while they have a curioſity to hear what others ſay of them, they want patience to bear what they hear. 'Tis better we ſhould be in the dark concerning our own wrongs, then that we ſhould wrong our ſelves by that paſſion which the light we get about them ſtirs up in us.

He teareth himſelf in his anger.

But was this juſtly charged on Job?

I conceive that his friend, (as in other paſſages, ſo here) ſinned againſt the Law of Love, while he charged Job with ſo much anger. It is hard to diſtinguiſh trouble of ſpirit, from paſſion and diſtemper of ſpirit. Yet the teſtimony of God himſelf concerning Job, aſſures us that he was a meek man, a very mirrour of patience; which will not conſiſt with this accuſation in the hight and heat of it. And though it cannot be denied, that Job diſcovered ſome paſſion and impatience, in theſe conflicts, yet all put together, did not amount to this total ſum; He teareth himſelf in his anger; much leſs to that unquietneſs and diſſatiſfaction, with which Bildad preſſeth him further in the latter part of the verſe;

Shall the earth be forſaken for thee? and ſhall the rock be removed out of his place?

Hic loquendi modus hyperbolicus pro re impoſſibili uſitatus eſt in in omni lingua: qui talia expectat, in cœlo quærit piſces, in mari ſtellas; in Italia Tanaim, in Sythia Tyberim. Sanct.

Here Bildad taxeth Job with pride, as before with anger, or rather with an angry pride; Shall the earth be forſaken for thee?

The words are proverbial, and in their general ſence are appliable to any thing which is very hard, or to man impoſſible to be done. Such expreſſions are uſual in all Languages. As when 'tis ſaid, you may as well look for fiſh in the air, or for ſtars in the Sea, as to ſee this thing done. So here, this which thou deſireſt, is as likely to come to paſs, as that all men will ſhortly remove from off the face of the earth, and that the rocks will move.

More particularly, ſome underſtand it thus; Doeſt thou think thy ſelf ſuch, or ſo great a man, that if thou die, and be taken out of the world, mankind ſhall die with thee, or that the earth ſhall be forſaken when thou leaveſt it? The Septuagint renders; What, if thou die, ſhall all under heaven want Inhabitants? Art thou the Atlas of the world? doeſt thou bear up the fabrick of it? muſt all things run to deſolation, unleſs thou doeſt order and uphold them? why makeſt thou ſuch a ſtir about thy afflictions, and thy death? Is there no man fit to dwell in this houſe, when once thou art turned out of doors? Job gave his friend ſuch a ſarcaſtical check (Chap. 12.2.) No doubt but ye are the people, and wiſdom ſhall die with you. Here Bildad payes him in his own coyn, Shall the earth be forſaken for thee? &c. Thus he rebukes his pride, as if (according to this interpretation) Job had thought that the ſafety of the whole world were wrapped up in his: Or as if ſome prodigious changes muſt needs follow his change. Bildad was grown ſomewhat warm, and checks Job's ſuppoſed hight of ſpirit, with too much of his own. Shall the earth be forſaken?

Quid enim ſi tu mortuus fueris inhabitabilis erit quæ ſub cœlo. Sept. Ita de tua morte & vita loqueris ac ſi mortalium omniũ ſalus & interitus ex te penderet. Pined. Nõ ſine faſtu videtur Bildad Jobi faſtum velle proculcare, at excandu erat. Parap.

And ſhall the rock be removed?] No ſuch matter; how high ſo ever thy thoughts of thy ſelf are, or how neceſſary ſo ever thou conceiveſt thy ſelf to be, to the ſtanding and continuance of the world. Yet know, the world ſhall continue when thou falleſt, yea there ſhall not be the leaſt ſtop obſervable in the whole courſe of nature, when thou haſt paid thy debt to nature. Not only ſhall not the rocks be removed, but not a hillock, not a pebble-ſtone ſhall be taken out of its place, though thou be took and hurled out of thine. Indeed the world is indebted to Jeſus Chriſt for its conſiſtence, the earth had been forſaken, had it not been for him, and the rock had been removed out of his place. But the beſt and wiſeſt of men may be ſpared, and no great hurt done.

Exponitur per Lyptotẽ, ubi minus dicitur quã intelligitur. Millies moriaris, num propter hoc mũdi curſus turbabitur? imo nec aut monticulus à vel calculus loco ſuo dimovebitur. Eo'd.

Secondly, For the clearing of this obſcure paſſage, we are to recal to mind, that the ſtate of the controverſie between Job and his friends, was about the providence of God, and the diſpenſations of Juſtice; his friends ſaid that good men receive good at the hand of God, and evil men evil. Hence they had all along charged Job for a wicked man, for an hypocrite; becauſe he ſuffered ſuch things. Now for as much as they aſſerted, that God laid evil upon evil men, and withal obſerved that Job was ſo impatient under his ſufferings, tearing himſelf in anger, as if he had ſuffered unjuſtly; therefore Bildad ſpeaks thus; Shall the earth be forſaken for thee? or, ſhall the rock be removed out of his place. That is, doſt thou expect that God for thy ſake ſhould change that courſe which he hath ſetled as firmly as the rocks, or as the earth? Doſt thou think to make God alter the method, either of his juſtice, or of his providence? thou mayeſt as well hope to turn the motion of the Sun, that the earth ſhall be forſaken, and the rocks removed out of their place, as to expect this. Friend! do not you think either to juſtle or diſpute God out of his way. Hence Hæc ſententia, quod adverſitates accidant pro peccatis, firma eſt, ſicut terra & rupes, nũquid ergo poterit removari propter tuas diſputationes. Aquin.

Thirdly, Some interpret the laſt clauſe of God himſelf, who had determined to chaſtiſe the ſinfulneſs of Job; Shall the rock be removed out of his place? i. e. Shall God? God is often called a rock in Scripture, a rock is the Emblem of ſtedfaſtneſs. Doſt thou think to remove God who is ſtedfaſt as a rock? or to put him beſides his purpoſe by thy crying out of oppreſſion, or crying up thine own innocencie. For ſhame give over.

Per rupem deus eſt intelligendus quẽ immutabilem dicit inſtar immoti Saxi neque cõmovendum à loco judicii. Rab. Dav. Vatab.

Fourthly, Others, by the rock interpret Job's friends, or the opinion which his friends held. As if he had ſaid; The opinion which we hold concerning the puniſhment of wicked men, is as ſtrong upon our ſpirits, and as much ſetled there, as the rock is in his place, and therefore thou ſhalt move us from our opinion, when thou haſt removed a rock, which is numbred among things impoſſible, or extreamly difficult. All theſe interpretations center in one common ſence: implying that the Lord having appointed wicked men to puniſhment, will no more change this appointment, then he will remove the rocks, or alter the whole ſtate of things here upon earth. And Bildad ſeems to intimate that it is more unreaſonable to divert the courſe of Juſtice, or to let the wicked go unpuniſhed, then it is miraculous to overthrow the whole courſe of nature. Shall the earth be forſaken

Num deus propter tuũ clamorẽ, quod te innocentẽ dicis & præter modum affligi, deſinat ſuam ſolitã exercere juſtitiã. Merc. Bildad ſe ſuoſq; amicos rupes nominat, firmitur perſtantes in ſua opinione.

ken for thee? or ſhall the rock be removed out of his place? Hence we may learn this general truth, that God will not alter his counſels, nor the courſe of his providence for any mans ſake whatſoever.

You may as ſoon ſay, he will alter the whole frame of heaven and earth, or that he will remove the rocks out of their place, as he will do it: the courſe of juſtice is as firmly ſetled as the courſe of nature is. It was indeed a miſtake in Job's friends, to think becauſe God hath ſetled a courſe of juſtice, that therefore he would never change the form of juſtice; for though all the ways of God are juſt, and he will do juſtice unto all; though we may (as the Prophet is charged peremptorily) ſay to the righteous, it ſhall be well with him, and wo to the wicked; yet he varies the manner, the means, the times, and ſeaſons of executing juſtice, as ſeemeth beſt unto himſelf. The juſtice of God ſhall ſtand though the rocks remove, and the earth be totally forſaken; yet take heed of ſaying that juſtice hath forſaken the earth, or is removed, becauſe we ſee it not acting in its wonted ſtate and outward equipage. That which the Lord ſpeaks to ſhew the unmovable ſetledneſs of his mercy, is as true in reference to the ſetledneſs of his juſtice, (Jer. 31. 35, 36.) Thus ſaith the Lord, which giveth the Sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the Moon, and of the Stars, for a light by night; which divideth the Sea when the waves thereof roar; The Lord of hoſts is his name. What follows? If thoſe ordinances depart from before me, then the ſeed of Iſrael alſo ſhall ceaſe from being a Nation before me for ever. As if he had ſaid, when I change the ordinances of heaven, of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, then will I take my mercy from Iſrael; I will never do the one, therefore I will not do the other. The Lord promiſed at the renewing of the Covenant with man, Gen. 8. ult. That day and night, ſummer and winter, ſhould not ceaſe while the earth remained. Now ſaith the Lord, if you can make me to alter the courſe of the heavens, of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, then I may do this againſt my people. We have the like aſſurance given, Jer. 33. 25. Where the Lord from that conſideration of the frame of nature, argueth the ſetledneſs of his own Covenant of grace, and promiſe of mercy to his people. Thus alſo we may argue, in reference to his juſtice, that you ſhall as ſoon get the ſtars blotted out of heaven, the rocks removed, the earth forſaken, as God will forſake the right diſtributions of juſtice towards man. It was ſaid of a man, and he but a Heathen; That the Sun might as eaſily be ſtayed, or turned aſide, as he from doing right. How much more is this true of the righteous God, with whom there is no ſhadow of turning? And though we cannot ſay to any man, as Job's friends to him; If God puniſh you not ſooner or later here in this world, he muſt alter the whole courſe of his judiciary adminiſtrations; yet we may ſay to many, if God ſave you eternally, he muſt alter the whole courſe of his merciful adminiſtrations; he muſt make a new Goſpel, yea a new Chriſt, if you attain eternal Salvation. For by the rules of the preſent Goſpel, and by the way which Chriſt hath already manifeſted to ſave ſinners, you cannot be ſaved, how much ſoever you preſume of ſalvation: Shall the Goſpel be forſaken for you, or ſhall the promiſe be removed out of its place, which as it is more immovable then a rock in helping thoſe that turn to God and believe, (Iſa. 54. 10.) So it will move no more then a rock towards the help of thoſe who ſtill turn from God, and continue in unbelief. Shall the rock be removed out of his place? Thus much of the preface. Bildad hath ſpoken to the perſon, and reproved him; he now ſpeaks to his cauſe.

VERS. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

Yea, the light of the wicked ſhall be put out, and the ſpark of his fire ſhall not ſhine.

The light ſhall be dark in his Tabernacle, and his candle ſhall be put out with him.

The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitned, and his own counſel ſhall caſt him down.

For he is caſt into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a ſnare.

The grin ſhall take him by the heel, and the robber ſhall prevail againſt him.

The ſnare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

THE miſerable condition of a wicked man is laid forth in this Chapter.

Firſt, Allegorically.

Secondly, Plainly.

By way of Allegory to the ſeventh verſe; and in plain expreſſions to the end of the Chapter. Here are four Allegories.

The firſt from light, verſ. 5, 6.

The ſecond from hunting and fowling, verſ. 7, 8, 9, 10.

The third from Law-proceedings, or the manner of Proceſs in Courts of Juſtice, verſ. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

The laſt Allegory is taken from Huſbandry, verſ. 16.

The fifth and ſixth verſes contain the firſt Allegory; Yea, the light of the wicked ſhall be put out. The Vulgar reads it interrogatively; Shall not the light of the wicked be put out? But the Original is abſolute; The light of the wicked ſhall be put out.

Nonne lux impii aufetur? Vulg.

The firſt word hath an Emphaſis in it; Yea, the light of the wicked ſhall be put out. Yea, imports a vehement affirmation, carrying what is affirmed againſt all oppoſition, (Gam) yea, it ſhall be thus (ſaith he) which ſpecially reacheth two things.

גם Gam, particula firmitèr corroborat prius dicta.

Firſt, How much ſoever thou art angry with us for ſaying it, yet it ſhall be thus. Be thou as angry as thou wilt, thou ſhalt not help thy ſelf: thou mayeſt entangle thy ſelf more, but thou ſhalt not at all looſen thy ſelf. A man that hath a burthen upon his back, cannot eaſe himſelf by ſtriving and ſtrugling with it; but the more he ſtruggles, the more he is troubled.

Secondly, This yea, may bear reſpect to the exaltation of wicked men, to the height of their proſperity: yea, let them have gotten as high as they will, down they ſhall, as the Prophet Iſaiah ſpeaks of Lucifer, (Chap. 14. 13.) Thou haſt ſaid in thine heart, I will aſcend into heaven, I will exalt my Throne above the ſtars of God, yet thou ſhalt be brought down to hell, to the ſides of the pit. The higher we build in our own thoughts without God, the lower is our fall, and the more unavoidable. Thou ſhalt be brought down. Or take the Allegory in the Text, how much light ſoever the wicked man hath, though he ſeem to have as much as the Sun, though he ſeem a fountain of light, yet out he ſhall, he ſhall be put out like a candle. Yea, the light of the wicked ſhall be put out.

Here are four expreſſions about one thing; Firſt, The light of the wicked ſhall be put out; Secondly, The ſpark of his fire ſhall not ſhine: Thirdly, The light ſhall be dark in his Tabernacle: Fourthly, His candle ſhall be put out with him: We are not curiouſly to inſiſt upon diſtinctions, to find out the difference between light and a ſpark, between light and a candle, &c. Though a difference there be; yet I conceive the ſpeaker did not ſo much intend that, but heaps up a great many words of a near alliance, or of one ſignification, the more to ratifie his aſſertion, that the thing ſhould certainly be done. A wicked man ſhall be extinct, put him under what notion you will; let him have light, or ſpark, or candle, he ſhall go out in darkneſs.

But what is this light?

There are three ſorts of light; Firſt, Moral; Secondly, Spiritual; Thirdly, Civil Light.

Moral Light, is the light of wiſdom, prudence, and underſtanding. And thus ſome of the elder learned Rabbins, and later Hebricians too interpret this Text. As if he had ſaid, the wicked man ſhall be made a very fool, deſtitute of wit, reaſon, underſtanding, and ability to judge, or know what evil is upon him, or what is good for him: The ſpirit of counſel ſhall be taken from him. That's a ſore judgment.

Secondly, There is ſpiritual light; and that is double. The light of the knowledge of God; and the light of comfort from God. The knowledge we receive from God is light. And the joy we receive from God is light. Some interpret the place of this ſpiritual light; Though a wicked man, an hypocrite hath a great meaſure of this light, yet his light ſhall be put out; as Chriſt threatens Mat. 13. 12. & 25. 29. To him that hath ſhall be given, and he ſhall have abundance, abundance, but from him that hath not, ſhall be taken away, even that which he ſeemed to have. That light of knowledge, with which hypocrites ſeemed to ſhine, ſhall be taken away from them. Many hypocrites are irradiated with much light, and have great flaſhes or fluſhes of joy and comfort; theſe ſhall be taken away, their light ſhall be put out; yea their ſparks ſhall die, they ſhall be left in utter darkneſs: though they compaſs themſelves about with ſparks of their own kindling, as the Prophet ſpeaks, Iſa. 50.10,11. Though this be a truth, yet (I conceive) it is not the thing that Bildad intended. But we are rather to take it for,

Lucis nominibus ſignificatur quicquid lucet in oculis quicquid ſplendet in fortuna, &c. Merc.

Thirdly, A Civil-light, that is, the light of outward proſperity. And ſo theſe words are a gradation, teaching us, that not only whatſoever a carnal man reckons his greateſt ſplendor, but what he calls his ſmalleſt ray of temporal bleſſedneſs, ſhall be wrapt up in darkneſs and obſcurity. Outward proſperity, may be called light upon a threefold conſideration.

Firſt, Becauſe as light refreſheth and cheareth the ſpirits, (there is a terrour in darkneſs, and when light comes, we are freed from that terrour;) So doth outward proſperity, and the preſence of worldly accommodations.

Secondly, Light helps us on in our work; no man can work, till he have either the natural light of the Sun, and fire, or ſome artificial light. Proſperity and peace carry us on in our worldly affairs. A man who hath much light of knowledge about him how to work, may yet have ſo much darkneſs of affliction about him, that he cannot work or move in the moſt proſper ſphere of his Activity.

Thirdly, Light makes us conſpicuous; we are ſeen what we are in the light. Thus outward proſperity makes men appear. Poverty is joyned with obſcurity. What parts, or gifts, or abilities, or worth ſoever is in a man, he is ſcarce ever ſeen above-board, if he be under the ſtraights of poverty and affliction. The light of the wicked ſhall be put out. I have heretofore ſpoken of the proſperity, and alſo of the decay of wicked men; therefore I ſhall not inſiſt upon it here. Note, only firſt, That,

> The glory of wicked men, their excellency, their light ſhall certainly come to nothing.

They ſhall be quenched as a fire of thorns (Pſal. 118. 12.) which any man may ſuddenly quench, and if no man will, it will ſuddenly quench it ſelf. Yet further. The word which we tranſlate to put out, is active, or intranſitive; ſo ſome render it here; The light of the wicked ſhall put it ſelf out.

cum רעך ſit activum & quodamodo intranſitivum, rectè dicere poſſis, lux impii extinguet ſe.

> Hence Note, A wicked man is uſually the cauſe of his own ruine.

He puts himſelf out; ſometimes he makes his own tongue to fall upon himſelf (Pſal. 64 8.) his tongue undoes him, and he is buried under a heap, or preſſed to death under the weight of his own words. Sometimes his own ſtrength undoes him; ſometimes his wit and parts undo him; His great learning and abilities, prove his ruine; He dies as a fool dies, becauſe he thought himſelf wiſer then any living. The proſperity of the wicked is not like the light of the Sun, but like that of a candle, which conſumes it ſelf; and that, not only naturally, as all worldly things do, which will periſh with the uſing, how warily ſoever we uſe them; but violently by their vain and unwary uſing of it. In this the juſtice of God is eminent upon wicked men: There was ſcarce a wicked man in the world ever extinguiſhed, but he hath contributed, not only meritoriouſly (for ſo all wicked men are wholly the cauſe of it) but inſtrumentally to his own extinction. The wicked man is (felo de ſe) a murtherer, a deſtroyer, an extinguiſher of himſelf: If all men ſhould forbear him, or reſolve to let him ſtand, yet he would work out his own downfal here, as well as he doth his own damnation for ever.

Again, The ſpark of his fire ſhall not ſhine.

שביב vel flammā vel ſcintillā ſignificat.

'Tis the ſame thing; yet here is a progreſs in the ſence: Beſides Sun-light, there is fire-light, and candle-light. But if a man hath neither Sun-light, nor fire-light, nor candle light, then he is in darkneſs indeed. If he have no fire burning, yet poſſibly he may have a few coals, or ſparks of fire: Wherefore to note the utter extinction of a wicked man, he ſhall not have ſo much as a ſpark of fire; The ſpark of his fire ſhall not ſhine.

Ex illo igne] fœlicitatis nō relinquetur ſcintilla, neq; mica ſplendoris; extinguetur omnino.

It is a great abatement to be brought from Sun-light, to fire-light; For as the Apoſtle ſpeaks in another caſe, (1 Cor. 15.) There is one Glory of the Sun, another of the Moon, and another of the Stars; and one Star differeth from another in glory. So we may ſay, there is one light of the Sun, another of the fire, another of the candle, and one candle differs from another in glory. Here is the Sun-light put out, and the fire-light, and the very ſpark of fire. So that the threatned deſtruction, or extinction of a wicked man ſhall be total, every ſpark of it ſhall expire. The rich man (Luke 16.) was deſtitute of all good, when he had not ſo much as a drop of water to cool his tongue. He that begged a drop, had not a drop. Now, as he that hath not a drop of water, is under the greateſt drought: ſo he that hath not a ſpark of fire, is under the greateſt cold or darkneſs: And as the Prophet ſpeaks (Iſa. 30.14.) to ſhew an utter deſtruction, under another notion about breaking a veſſel; Becauſe you have truſted in oppreſſion and perverſneſs, therefore this iniquity ſhall be to you as a breach ready to fall, ſwelling out in a high wall, whoſe breaking cometh ſuddenly at an inſtant. And he ſhall break it like the breaking of the Potters veſſel that is broken in pieces, he ſhall not ſpare; ſo that there ſhall not be found in the burſting of it, a ſheard to take fire from the hearth, or to take water withal out of the pit. I note it for that, He ſhall break the veſſel; and ſo break it, that there ſhall not be ſo much as a ſheard to take fire from the hearth, or a little water from the pit. When a veſſel is ſo broken, that there remains not a ſheard for any uſe, it is totally broken. What the ſheard is to the veſſel, that is a ſpark to the fire; the veſſel is totally broken, when there is not a ſheard left; and the fire is totally extinct, when there is not a ſpark left. So this carries not only ſome extinction of the wicked mans light, but the utter extinction of the leaſt light of a wicked man.

Again, Conſider the difference between theſe two, light and fire. Fire is proper to the houſe and family: lights ſhines abroad every where; which imports, that as the renown, fame, and glory, with which the wicked man ſhines to the world, ſhall be extinguiſhed: So his fire, and his ſpark, that is, his family-glory and luſtre ſhall be taken away; he ſhall be deſtroyed in his publick capacity, and in his private capacity; his glory abroad, and his glory at home; the Sun, with which he ſhines in the ſphere of this publick employment, and the fire, with which he is warmed in the hearth of his private relations and enjoyments, ſhall be utterly extinguiſhed.

He hath not yet done.

The light ſhall be dark in his Tabernacle.

Tum ipſe, tū ipſius domus ex illo ſplendore in denſiſſimas miſeriarū tenebras incidet. Bez.

He had ſaid before, His light ſhall be put out; why doth he ſay here, His light ſhall be dark? This ſeems leſs then he ſpake before.

I anſwer, no; here is ſtill an increaſe of the ſence. To ſay, his light ſhall be dark, is more then to ſay, his light ſhall be put out; As was ſhewed Chap. 10. 22. upon thoſe words; where Job deſcribes the darkneſs of the grave in pureſt ſtrains of Eloquence, and having ſaid, verſ. 21. It is the land of darkneſs, and the ſhadow of death, a land of darkneſs, as darkneſs it ſelf, and of the ſhadow of death, without any order: He concludes, and where the light is as darkneſs. But ſome may ſay; If it be a place of darkneſs, as darkneſs it ſelf, how can there be any light there? Why doth he ſay, the light there is as darkneſs, when he had ſaid, there is nothing but darkneſs there? It is to ſhew, (as that place to which I refer was opened) that the grave is ſo dark, that even that which hath an appearance of light is darkneſs. Not only is the darkneſs dark; but the very light is darkneſs. Thus here, not only is the light of a wicked man put out, but the light of his Tabernacle (if there be any thing left there, that bears any imaginable likeneſs to it) ſhall be dark, or more like to darkneſs. Hence we may Note; That,

> God will make the very proſperity of a wicked man an affliction to him.

His light ſhall go out, even to a ſpark; and if a ſpark of light remain, that ſhall be but darkneſs. He ſhall never enjoy good, if any good remain for him to enjoy. Though after great ſufferings he may have ſome eaſe, yet that ſhall be a pain to him. As it is the priviledge of the Saints, that their darkneſs is light, their ſorrows joyful, their wants a fulneſs; ſo it is the curſe of the wicked, that their light is darkneſs, their joyes ſorrowful, and their ſinfulneſs a want. We may here remember that Argument of our Saviour, which I have formerly made uſe of (Matth. 6. 23.) If that which is appointed to comfort a man turn to his ſorrow, how great is his ſorrow? So that here is a peremptory excluſion of all that is, or can be refreſhing to a wicked man; his light is darkneſs to him; and his very bleſſings a curſe to him.

Laſtly, His Candle ſhall be put out with him.

Illuſt· ẽ cum tota meis convivia flammis Totque gerã mixos una lucerna vocor. Mart. l.14.Ep.41.

The Candle gives an inferiour light; the Candle is a family, a houſhold light: When the Sun goes down, Candles go up; but when this mans Sun goes down, he ſhall not have the help of a Candle, as not the help of fire. Now he that hath neither the Sun to ſhine on him, nor the Fire to warm him, nor a Candle to ſtand by him, what a condition is he in? Which ſtill aggravates the affliction of a wicked man. Some refer it to that cuſtom of the Ancients, who ſet up many Candles, or Lights, when they made Banquets in the night. So, His Candle ſhall go out, is, he ſhall never make Feaſt more, nor have merry meeting with Friends more. But I rather take it in general, for all the uſes of Candles, not for that ſpecial uſe of Candles, Torches, or Lamps in great night Feaſts, when their multitude of blazes ſeemed to turn night into day, and to make darkneſs light. Taking Candle in the loweſt ſence, His Candle ſhall be put out with him, is, he ſhall not have ſo much as a ſingle Candle, not the ſmalleſt Candle, not ſo much as a Ruſh-light left him. And this we find once and again in Scripture to expreſs the ſaddeſt calamity of a people (Jer. 25. 10.) when the Prophet deſcribes the deſtruction that ſhould come upon Jeruſalem; Moreover (ſaith he) I will take from them the voice of mirth, and gladneſs. And what more? The voice of the Bridegroom, and of the Bride; the ſound of a Milſtone, and the light of a Candle: That is, I will remove all their comforts; when the loweſt means of comfort (bread and candle-light) are removed, then all comfort is removed. So (Revel. 18. 23.) the deſtruction of Babylon is deſcribed; The voice of Harpers, and Muſitians, and Pipers, and Trumpetters, ſhall be heard no more at all in thee, and no Craftſman, of whatſoever Craft he be, ſhall be found any more in thee; and the ſound of a Milſtone ſhall be heard no more at all in thee, and the light of a Candle ſhall ſhine no more at all in thee: That is, Thou ſhalt be utterly overthrown, and ruined; where there is not ſo much as the light of a Candle found, what of mercy can be found? (Revel. 22. 5.) When the holy Ghoſt would expreſs a ſtate which ſhall need no creature-comfort, he ſaith, There ſhall be no night there, and they need no Candle, neither the light of the Sun: The Sun is the light of the day; and the Candle is the light of the night. Now as the full proſperity of a people is ſet out, when they ſhall have ſo much light, ſo much ſpiritual or glorious light, that they ſhall not need the Sun, nor the Candle: So the total ruine of Nations, or perſons, is ſet forth when they have neither Sun-light, nor Candle-light. Prov. 30. 13. The light of the righteous rejoyceth; but the lamp of the wicked ſhall be put out.

Antiquitus ante novas nuptas, lampades & tadæ accenſæ præferri ſolebant.

Some interpret Candle and Light by Children or Poſterity; ſo they ſignifie (1 Kings 11. 36.) where God being about at once to puniſh, and to ſpare, ſaith to Jeroboam, I will take the Kingdom out of his Sons hand, and I will give it unto thee, even ten Tribes. And unto his Son will I give one Tribe, that David my Servant may have a light alway before me in Jeruſalem. We put in the Margin according to the letter of the Hebrew, That David my Servant may have a Lamp, or a Candle: That is, ſome of his Poſterity remaining and ruling in Jeruſalem; his line ſhall not be extinct. The Woman of Tekoa calls her Son, her Coal (2 Sam. 14. 7.) So they ſhould quench my Coal which is left, and ſhall not leave to my Huſband neither name nor remainder upon the earth.

If we take in this Scriptural ſence of the Light and Candle in the Text, it enforms us yet more fully; that when a wicked man is extinguiſhed, all that is his, ſhall be extinguiſhed; he, and his Wealth; he, and his Honour; he, and his Children; he ſhall periſh, and his Candle with him; his name ſhall be blotted out, and there ſhall be no memorial of him.

Laſtly, A Candle goes out two wayes, either when the matter is ſpent, and the fuel which it works upon conſumed. Thus every mans Candle goes out, his Candle waſtes; waſtes it ſelf while it ſhines on him. Secondly, A Candle goes out by violence, when it is blown out: So we muſt underſtand the Text; The wicked mans Candle ſhall not be left to conſume, and wear it ſelf out; he, and his; he, and his publick light; he, and his family-light; he, and his poſterity light ſhall be put out before they are waſted out. This Bildad reckoned as the portion of Job; and it is the portion of every wicked man; 'tis that which is due to him, that which he deſerves, though he doth not alwayes receive preſent pay according to his deſerts.

So much of the firſt Allegory, by which Bildad illuſtrates the dark condition of a wicked man, his light, the ſpark of his fire, and his candle are put out.

The Context of the four Verſes following, ſhew the miſery of wicked men, under a ſecond Allegory, of hunting and fowling; where we have to do with nets and ſnares, with a grin, and with a trap; all which are implements and engines belonging to Fowlers and Hunters, with which beaſts and birds are enſnared and taken.

The miſery of the wicked man is here ſet down two wayes.

Firſt, In general; The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

Secondly, We have the ſpecial wayes how this ſhall be brought to paſs.

Firſt, He ſhall bring himſelf into a ſnare, as is ſhewed in the latter end of the ſeventh Verſe, and in the eighth; His own counſel ſhall caſt him down; he ſhall be caſt into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a ſnare. The man runs into it alone; if there be none to drive him into the net, he will haſten into it; if no man ſet ſnares for him, he will ſet a ſnare for himſelf; he muſt be catcht. That's the firſt way, how his ſteps come to be ſtraitened, he himſelf ſtraitens them by his own counſels.

Secondly, If this wicked man ſhould not go into the ſnare, yet he ſhall ſoon be brought into it (Verſ. 9. & 10) The grin ſhall take him by the heel, and the robbers ſhall prevail againſt him. The ſnare is laid for him by others, many are contriving the methods of his deſtruction; there are traps ſet in his way, and he cannot eſcape. So that either he ſhall do it himſelf, or if he do not, others ſhall. That's the ſum of this Context.

Verſe 7. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened, &c.

Impii greſſus ſunt actiones opera deſideria & omnia quibus ad optatum finem contendebat.

This ſhews the judgment in general; all Beaſts and Birds taken in nets, or ſnares, are brought into a ſtrait; The ſteps of his ſtrength. By [ſteps] we are to underſtand his motions, his actions, his undertakings; whatſoever helps him towards his deſired end.

And theſe are not ordinary ſteps, but the ſteps of his ſtrength; that is, his ſtrongeſt ſteps. Mr Broughton reads, His violent paſſages ſhall be ſtraitened: Steps of ſtrength, for ſtrong ſteps, is an Hebraiſm very frequent. And theſe ſteps of ſtrength may be,

Firſt, The ſtrength of his mind, and wit, there lyes much ſtrength within; man orders and layes his deſigns by the ſtrength of his underſtanding.

Secondly, The ſtrength of his authority; for therein a mans ſtrength lyes too; let ſuch a man have never ſo much civil power, he ſhall yet be ſtraitened.

Thirdly, The ſtrength of his body, or of his hand; the ſteps of his outward ſtrength as well as of his inward, and authoritative ſtrength, ſhall be ſtraitened.

Fourthly, A man ſets ſteps of ſtrength, or adds ſtrength to his ſteps, by his friends and relations, by his alliance and confederates, by the helps and aids, by the ſeconds and aſſiſtants which he hath abroad in the World. Every ſtep which ſome men ſet, is upheld from without, they go not alone. We may underſtand the Text in any of, or in all theſe wayes. The ſteps of ſtrength, or the ſtrongeſt ſteps which he ſets by the ſtrength of his underſtanding, or by the ſtrength of his authority, or by the ſtrength of his body, or by the ſtrength of his friends, and relations, the ſteps of all theſe ſtrengths ſhall be ſtraitened.

און Significat potentiam illam quæ conjuncta eſſe ſolet cum dolore, quem quis peccando ſibi vel aliis infert. Bold.

Further, The original word ſignifies not ordinary ſtrength, or ſtrength in general; but that ſtrength which is uſually accompanied with trouble, and with that trouble which flows from, or is the iſſue of ſin; a painful ſtrength. For as many have painful weakneſſes upon them; ſo ſome have painful ſtrength. And hence alſo the Hebrew word ſignifies riches, or power, which are unjuſtly gotten, and as unjuſtly kept. This kind of ſtrength, is ſtrength with a pain; when a man gets and maintains what he hath gotten by ſin. And there are none who have had ſo much pain with weakneſſes, as ſome in all Ages have had with ſtrength. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

Straitened] To be ſtraitened in common Scripture-phraſe, ſignifies only to be afflicted; Mr. Broughton renders it by the word diſtreſſed; His violent paſſages are diſtreſſed. And hence Chriſt (Luke 12. 50.) ſpeaks of his ſufferings, or of the pre-apprehenſions of his ſufferings, what effects they had upon him; I have a Baptiſm to be baptized with, and how am I ſtraitened, till it be accompliſhed. Did not John baptize Chriſt in Jordan ſome years before? What was this Baptiſm?

There is a threefold Baptiſm: Firſt, The Baptiſm of water: Secondly, The Baptiſm of the Spirit: Both theſe Baptiſms Chriſt had been baptized with: He was plentifully baptized with the Spirit, and he had been baptized with water in Jordan. But there is a third Baptiſm, that is, the Baptiſm of Blood, or the Baptiſm of ſuffering, and that is it which Chriſt ſpake of there; he had not yet been ſo baptized; drenched, or waſhed in blood, in his own blood, as he was ſoon after in the Garden, and upon the Croſs. This was the Baptiſm that he was to be baptized with: And, ſaith he, How am I ſtraitened? That is, How is my ſoul afflicted at the approaches and appearances of it? How am I beſieged with it? For to that the metaphor may allude. The ſame word is uſed (Luke 19. 43.) where Chriſt foretells the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; Thine enemies ſhall caſt a trench about thee, and compaſs thee round, and keep thee (they who are thus kept in are ſtraitened) in on every ſide. It may refer alſo to the ſhutting up of a beaſt in a pound, or to a woman in travel, who when her pains take hold upon her, how ſore are her ſtraits? All ſhews how great a ſtreſs, and diſtreſs was upon the ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt, becauſe he had then ſuch a baptiſm to be baptized with.

So then, to be ſtraitened is to be afflicted. Outward afflictions are ſtraits, either upon the body, or eſtate; and the very foreſight of theſe put many to inward ſtraits.

And hence (on the other ſide) to be enlarged, ſignifies proſperity, or a good eſtate. We have David ſo expreſſing himſelf (Pſal. 31. 8.) Thou haſt ſet my feet in a large room. Again (Pſal. 66. 12.) We have gone through fire and water; but thou haſt brought us forth into a wealthy place; which ſome tranſlate, into a roomthy place: That is, into much proſperity. Solomon (Prov. 4. 11, 12.) gives us a negative to this in Job, When thou goeſt thy ſteps ſhall not be ſtraitened: That is, Thou ſhalt not be afflicted, or thou ſhalt not come into any trouble. When Iſaac's ſervants had digged a firſt and a ſecond Well, the Herdſmen of Gerar contended about it, ſaying, The water is ours. Then his ſervants digged a third Well, and for that they ſtrove not; therefore he called the name of it Rehoboth, that is, room; for now, ſaid he, the Lord hath made room for us (Gen. 26. 22.) We may ſay of all our comforts, and mercies, Rehoboth, here is room; but of all our afflictions they are ſtraits. So that, The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened, is neither more nor leſs then this; he ſhall be brought into trouble.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Who is it that is threatened with theſe ſtraits? It is the ſinner, the wicked man here ſpoken of, he is the ſubject of the whole Chapter: Then learn, Sin brings into ſtraits.

There are none brought into ſuch ſtraits, as they who walk in the broad way. If you would be at liberty, keep in the narrow way, and walk, as they who are bound. None are freer from bondage then the Servants of God (indeed none are at all free but they) yet none are more bound then they. As for thoſe who would have more room for their ſteps, then the Commandments of God afford, they ſhall have but little room for themſelves. They will be found ſooner or later in the ſtocks, or in the net, in the ſnare, or in the grin, who walk looſely. Sin brings us into a twofold ſtrait.

Firſt, Into ſtraits of mind; a man ſhall not know what to do, who doth he cares not what. Thouſands have run themſelves into theſe ſtraits, who had room enough in the World; they walked which way they would, they waſhed their footſteps in Butter, and the Rock poured them out Rivers of Oyl; yet how have their poor ſouls been ſtraitened by turning aſide after vanity.

Secondly, Sin ſtraitens the outward man, the body is brought into priſon, into deaths, and dangers. For one who is brought into ſtraits for his Conſcience, there are hundreds who are brought into ſtraits by acting againſt Conſcience. Some are brought into ſtraits for doing their duty; but moſt for doing againſt duty: With whom are Priſons peopled, are they not with thoſe who break their bounds? Who are generally in the ſtraits of poverty, while they walk abroad, are they not ſuch as walk diſorderly? 'Tis ſin which uſually cloatheth a man with rags, and (though ſome are fed by it) which ſnatcheth the bread out of his mouth: Who are they that are brought into the ſtraits of a ſhameful death, and fall under the ſtrokes of Juſtice? Are they not ſuch as tranſgreſs the rules of Juſtice, and practically oppoſe Government?

I grant there is a ſtrait into which ſome are brought by the cloſeneſs of their walking with God, yea, by the enlargedneſs of their hearts towards God. Paul was in ſuch a ſtrait (Phil. 1. 23.) Then a man is in a ſtrait when he knows not what to chuſe; I am in a ſtrait between two; Why? I know not which to chuſe, whether to live or dye: It was the height of his grace which put him into this ſtrait: But O the ſtraits that men are brought into by the lowneſs and baſeneſs of their ſpirits, their wickedneſs entangles them in ſuch ſtraits, that they know not how to live, and yet are altogether unfit to dye.

Further, The providence of God hath caſt many into ſtraits too. Jehoſhaphat (2 Chron. 20. 12.) was brought into a great ſtrait when he ſaid, Lord, we know not what to do, but our eyes are towards thee. When wicked men bring themſelves into ſtraits, they either deſpair of help, or their eyes are towards the creature for it. But when God brings his own people into ſtraits, their eyes are towards him for help. The providence of God brought Jehoſhaphat into thoſe ſtraits; and the providence of God brought him out of them, and gave him not only enlargement, but renown and glory: God can quickly recompence us for all the evils which he layes upon us, but ſin cannot. Sin can wound, but it cannot heal; it caſts into ſtraits, but it cannot enlarge,

And ſin brings not only wicked men, but even good men to ſtraits, even to great ſtraits. What was it that brought David into that condition (2 Sam. 24. 14.) when he ſaid, I am in a great ſtrait? Was it not his ſin? When he would needs be numbring the people, and pride himſelf in the multitude of that Nation which he governed, and commanded; this humbled him into a grievous ſtrait. And what was his ſtrait? It was a hard election that God put him upon, whether he would chuſe Peſtilence, or Famine, or Sword; one of thoſe three he muſt; ſuch a liberty of chuſing is a ſad reſtraint. Our wills are then bound, when they have a freedom to make ſuch a choice. Thus David was hampered, when he went beyond his line. Sin will bring Saints to ſtraits, much more will it bring wicked men to ſtraits.

God ſometimes brings his own people to ſtraits when they ſin, that he may keep them from further ſins: (Hoſ. 2. 6.) I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall (that is, I will bring thee to ſtraits) that thou ſhalt not find a path. God brought them into the ſtraits of affliction, that they might not wander into ſtraits by tranſgreſſion. It is better to be ſtraitened with a hedge of Gods making, then with a hedge of our own making. The care of God makes a hedge to keep us from ſin. Our ſin makes a hedge (not as the efficient, but as the procuring cauſe) to curb our careleſneſs. The Word of God is one hedge, his Rods are another. It is beſt to be kept within bounds by the former; but 'tis well if the latter keep us in. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

Secondly, Note, Wicked men ſhall be ſtraitened when they are in their ſtrength, and judge themſelves furtheſt off from ſtraits.

To have ſaid he ſhall be ſtraitened when he is weak, when he is low, and poor, had not been much: but here he ſpeaks of God, acting like God, againſt wicked men; when they are in their ſtrength, and flouriſh, and verdure, and greenneſs, then they ſhall wither; when they think they have moſt room, and are at greateſt liberty, both in their eſtates and ſpirits, then they ſhall find themſelves ſhut up (as it were) in priſon. There is a Text (Job 20. 22.) which is very clear to this ſence, I will but name it here, becauſe it will come ſhortly to a fuller handling, where Zophar ſpeaking of the Hypocrite, ſaith, In the fulneſs of his ſufficiency he ſhall be in ſtraits; that's an amazing expreſſion. Here he ſaith, The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened; that's very much: but there, In the fulneſs of his ſufficiency he ſhall be in ſtraits. See the difference between the Saints and wicked men; between upright-hearted godly men, and wicked falſe-hearted Hypocrites. Paul ſaith (in a higher ſence, 2 Cor. 12.) When I am weak, then am I ſtrong. But when a wicked man is ſtrong, then he is weak; and when he walks at large, then he is in ſtraits; that is, weakneſs ſurpriſes him in his ſtrength; and ſtraits attend his greateſt enlargements. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

Thirdly, Note briefly this, There is no ſtrength of the creature that can protect it from the wrath, or from the judgment of God.

Let him ſtep as ſtrongly as he will, if he be againſt God, God can ſtraiten him quickly: As he ſaith of Sennacherib, I will put my hook in his noſe (2 Kings 19. 28.) He thinks himſelf a Leviathan, Who (as he is deſcribed Chap. 41. 27.) eſteemeth iron as ſtraw, and braſs as rotten wood, darts are counted as ſtubble, he laugheth at the ſhaking of the ſpear. One would think then that there is no putting of a hook into the noſe of this mighty Monſter, no drawing him up with an Angle; yet the Lord will put a hook in the noſe of Leviathan, and pull him up with a ſingle hair, as if he were but a Sprat: The Leviathans, the Elephants, the Lyons, are as nothing before Jehovah. Can thine heart endure? or can thine hands be ſtrong in the dayes that I ſhall deal with thee? ſaith the Lord to Jeruſalem (Ezek. 22. 14.) No, they cannot. For then the Dukes of Edom ſhall be amazed, the mighty men of Moab trembling ſhall take hold upon them, &c. Exod. 15. 15. Hannah concludes in her Song (1 Sam. 2.) By ſtrength no man ſhall prevail; man cannot prevail over other men by ſtrength, much leſs ſhall man deliver himſelf by ſtrength from the hand of God. How great ſoever the ſingle or united ſtrength of the creature is, if it be ſtrength againſt God, a ſtrength acting againſt the deſign of God for his people; fear not, the ſteps of that ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened. It is no matter what the ſtrength of any creature is, if the ſtrong God be with us, he can quickly ſtraiten it, The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened.

And his own counſels ſhall caſt him down.

There are two things by which man ſupports himſelf, two pillars, like the two pillars ſpoken of in Solomon's Temple, Jachin and Boaz, which ſignified, He ſhall eſtabliſh and ſtrength. There are two pillars, of Nations and Perſons; Firſt, Power; Secondly, Policy or Counſel. Counſel is as much a mans ſtrength as his ſtrength is. Now that it might appear, that a wicked man ſhall have all his props pulled away, and all his pillars thrown down: As 'twas ſhewed in the former part of the Verſe, that his ſtrength ſhall not help him, ſo here, 'tis ſhewed that his craft and counſel ſhall not. And this is ſpoken not barely, but with an aggravation: For firſt, That his counſel ſhall not help him, is bad enough; but His counſel ſhall caſt him down, and that is far worſe: Secondly, It had been a ſore affliction to have ſaid of his counſel, as he ſaid of his ſtrength, it ſhall be ſtraitened, or overthrown, but he ſaith that which is far more afflictive, his counſel ſhall overthrow him, His counſels ſhall caſt him down. Thirdly, It had been a great judgment to have ſaid, his counſel ſhall be caſt down; but it is a far greater to ſay, His counſel ſhall caſt him down. There is no difficulty in theſe words; therefore I will but give you two or three Notes upon them.

First learn, The vanity of all helps without God.

Strength cannot prevail, and counſel ſhall not. Gods counſel cannot be thrown down, and therefore it will hold us up from falling. But that counſel (and ſuch is the beſt of mens) which may be thrown down it ſelf, can never keep us from falling. As riches prevail not in the day of wrath (Prov. 11. 4.) ſo wiſdom and wit ſhall not prevail in the day of wrath. Though you could give counſels as deep as Hell, yet they cannot protect you from a Hell of troubles here, or a Hell of torment after. There is no truſting to any thing without God, if theſe two pillars be pulled away, ſtrength and counſel, upon what baſis ſhall a man eſtabliſh himſelf.

Again, Here is not only ſhewed the inability of counſels to ſupport a man; but here is ſhewed the activity of counſels againſt a man, his counſels ſhall caſt him down.

Hence Obſerve, God turns the counſels and projects of wicked men upon their own heads, or againſt themſelves.

This ſhews the extream vanity of humane policy, as ſeparated from holy Policy, or from the Wiſdom which is from above; ſeeing it is not only unable to help us, but it doth us hurt. As that which ſhews the extream wickedneſs of mans heart by nature, is this, that it is not only unable to do good; but it is vehemently active againſt good, and ſets it ſelf againſt the whole Law of God, and would overthow it, or caſt it down. Nature doth not only pull her hand from the work of God, but puts out her hand to reſiſt it. So that which ſhews the extream vanity of the counſels of men is this, that they are not only weak to help them, but ſtrong to ruine them. The Pſalmiſt tells us (Pſal. 64. 8.) God ſhall ſhoot at them with his Arrow ſuddenly, ſo they ſhall make their own tongues to fall upon themſelves; all they that ſee them ſhall flee away: (A Text formerly toucht at, yet conſider it again) How doth a mans tongue fall upon himſelf? Or if it doth, what hurt is there in that? What weight is in a mans tongue? It is a little piece of fleſh, there is not a bone in it; and I am ſure it can break no bones where it falls. The tongue is here taken tropically for words ſpoken, or counſels given by the tongue. So that when he ſaith, Their tongues ſhall fall, his meaning is, their counſels ſhall fall upon themſelves, and be their fall. It is an old Adage, Evil counſel is worſt to the counſellor. It may do hurt to thoſe againſt whom it is given; but it ſhall certainly do them hurt by whom it is given: (Pſal. 7. 15.) He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made; his miſchief ſhall return upon his own head. The making of a pit, is only the laying of plots, or the ſetting of deſigns to do miſchief; theſe ſhall be moſt miſchievous to the deſigners. (Pſal. 9. 17.) The Lord is known by the judgment which he executes: That is, It appears God hath done it, he doth it ſo exactly: Why? He gives inſtance in the latter end of the Verſe, The wicked is ſnared in the work of his own hands: That is, His own counſels ſhall caſt him down. (Prov. 26. 27.) Who ſo diggeth a pit, ſhall fall therein; and he that rolleth a ſtone, it ſhall return upon him. Doth every man fall into the pit that he digs? Is every man bruiſed with the ſtone that he rolls? No; There may be juſt cauſe to dig pits. The meaning is, he that digs a pit to catch others. But ſhall every one that digs a pit to catch others, fall into it? I think not ſo neither. We may as lawfully dig pits, that is, ſet counſels to take ſome men, as we may dig pits to take wild Beaſts, Foxes and Wolves, or any hurtful Creature that would annoy mankind. But the wicked man, who digs a pit for the innocent, who prepares miſchief for thoſe that have done him no wrong, ſhall fall into the pit himſelf. And he that rolls a ſtone: That is, He that would roul a ſtone upon a juſt man (for you may roul a ſtone upon a wicked man, and bring the wheel over him; but he that rouls a ſtone, or that moves every ſtone to bring ſome evil upon a righteous perſon, this man) ſhall feel the ſtone returning upon him; that is, his own counſel ſhall caſt him down.

Conſilium malum conſultori peſſimum.

Some of the Ancients have obſerved from the phraſe of rouling a ſtone and digging a pit, that every wicked man digs a pit, and rouls a ſtone; he digs a pit down to Hell, and he rouls a ſtone up againſt Heaven. Every act of ſin is the digging of a pit downward, and the rouling of a ſtone upward. He at once makes his grave in Hell, by ſinning; and throws a ſtone of defiance and rebellion againſt Heaven. That's a profitable meditation, though I cannot give it for the proper meaning of the Text; Who ſo diggeth a pit ſhall fall therein, &c.

And yet it is not the ſame hand that digs, which thruſts him into the pit; nor the ſame hand that rouls the ſtone, that cauſeth it to return. The hand of wickedneſs digs the pit; the hand of malice rouls the ſtone; but it is the hand of Juſtice that puts him into the pit, and cauſeth the ſtone to return upon him. And as (Matth. 10. 13.) Chriſt ſpeaks to his Diſciples whom he ſent forth to preach the Goſpel, When you come to any houſe ſalute it; and if the houſe be worthy, let your peace come upon it. But they might ſay, What if the houſe be not worthy, ſhall we laviſh out our peace at adventure? Were it not beſt to try firſt whether the houſe be worthy or no, before we ſalute it, and offer them peace. No, ſaith Chriſt, venture a peace upon it, worthy, or unworthy; and if they be worthy, your peace ſhall come upon them; and if they be not, what then? Be not troubled, your peace ſhall not be loſt; if they be not worthy, your peace ſhall return to you. Thus it is with Saints, and thoſe that are upright; we may ſay to ſuch, be not afraid to beſtow peace, or beſtow a prayer upon thoſe that are unworthy; for if it miſcarry in reference to them, if they get no good by it, you ſhall; your peace ſhall return into your own boſoms, your prayers, and good wiſhes ſhall not vaniſh into air, your peace ſhall return, or let it return, take it home again. On the other ſide, when a wicked man intends miſchief, or wiſheth a curſe upon the godly, when he plots evil againſt them, and hath done his worſt, his curſe ſhall not come: Though God may leave them under ſome outward evil, yet the curſe ſhall not come upon them, becauſe the curſe cauſeleſs ſhall not come. As the wicked world, is not worthy of them, or of the bleſſing which God gives with them; ſo they are unworthy of the curſe which the wicked world (of which gifts they are very bountiful) gives out againſt them. What becomes of it then? It ſhall return upon the head of the wicked, and they ſhall be burdened with their own devices. See more of this ſubject, Chap. 5. Verſ. 13.

Take one thing further from this Verſe; His own counſel ſhall caſt him down. Counſel is a very precious thing, yet that ſhall undo the wicked.

> Then note, The beſt thing which an ungodly man hath, ſhall turn to his hurt.

There is nothing in the world, of a worldly nature, but may do us harm. Only the grace of God, the favour of God, can never do us hurt, theſe never caſt us down: Your wit may undo you, your parts and your counſels may undo you; but holineſs never undid any man; humbleneſs of mind, ſincerity, faith cannot be accuſed as guilty of any mans fall. I never heard an inſtance of a man caſt down by faith, caſt down by love, undone by meekneſs, or humility. But how many have been undone, by their proud wit, and high parts, by their cunning, and their counſels. Surely, the beſt of natural things may prove our ruine, if counſel may. Counſel is the ſpirit or quinteſſence of reaſon; reaſon drops out and diſtils it ſelf into counſel; yet this may prove mortal and poyſonous. That extenſive promiſe is given to the Saints, (Rom. 8.28.) All things ſhall work together for their good. Among thoſe all things, we may even take in their ſins; among thoſe all things, we may take in their weakneſſes, their ignorances, their ſimplicity: The vertues of a carnal man work him ill; when as the very ſins of a gracious heart work him good. Though the godly have low parts, and are unable to adviſe themſelves, much leſs others, yet this ſhall not caſt them down. They ſhall thrive better by their ignorances and inabilities, then the other by their knowledge and ſubtlety.

From all we ſee again, that a total overthow is the portion of the wicked man, His ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened. And becauſe many a man, who hath loſt all his ſtrength, hath yet a cunning pate, therefore 'tis added, His counſel ſhall caſt him down: If a man can neither proſper by counſel, nor ſtrength, in what a condition is he? It was ſaid of old, Who would require in an adverſary, cunning, or ſtrength? It is a hard choice which to deſire, whether a mighty, or a ſubtle enemy: But when we deal with an enemy that hath neither ſtrength, nor ſubtlety, or if he have both, his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened, and his counſel ſhall be deſtroyed, why ſhould we fear him? If you ask, How comes it to paſs, that the counſels of a wicked man ſhall caſt him down? I anſwer, Sometimes, notwithſtanding his great wit, he gives fooliſh counſel. Secondly, Though he give counſel like an Oracle, yet God turns that into fooliſhneſs. He can never thrive by counſel, whoſe great underſtanding is either ſo darkned, that he gives fooliſh counſel; or when he hath given wiſe counſel, yet ſees it deſerted, as if he were a fool.

Dolus aut virtus, Quis in hoſte requiret?

Bildad is ſtill deſcribing the miſerable ſtate of a wicked man (in application unto Job) under the Allegory of Hunters, or Fowlers.

Firſt, The wicked man throws himſelf into a ſnare, as was ſeen at the cloſe of the former Verſe, and is further proſecuted in this.

Verſe 8. For he is caſt into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a ſnare.

Secondly, Others ſhall ſet a ſnare for him.

Verſe 9, 10. The grin ſhall take him by the heel, and the Robber ſhall prevail againſt him, &c.

So that the ſtraits, into which this man ſhall fall, are of two ſorts: Some of his own making; and others which are made by his enemies.

In this eighth Verſe, Bildad carries on that firſt branch of the manner how he is taken; He is caſt down by his own counſel, in the former Verſe; and here, He is caſt into a net by his own feet: Some read it, He is ſent into a net by his own feet, ſo Mr. Broughton; or, He hath ſent his feet into the net, ſo the Latine tranſlation: Which way ſoever we read it, the words are but an explication, or amplification of the latter part of the ſeventh Verſe, His own counſel ſhall caſt him down.

Immiſſis in rete pedes ſuos. Vulg.

He is caſt into a net by his own feet.

The word in the Hebrew which we tranſlate net, is not far in ſound from the Latine, Rete, and is derived from a root which ſignifies to poſſeſs; and the reaſon is given, becauſe when once a net hath taken either birds, or beaſts, it holds them faſt, as a man doth his land, or inheritance, as his poſſeſſion; whatſoever comes into the net, is (as it were) poſſeſt by it.

רשת rete, quidā à ירש poſſedit deducunt, quod retinet ea quæ capiuntur.

But what is this net?

There is a threefold interpretation of that.

Firſt, Some by the net underſtand ſin; He is caſt into a net: That is, He is overcome by ſome temptation, or corruption, and ſo is inſnared; ſin is a net, and the worſt of nets; ſin is a net to catch the ſinner. (Prov. 5. 22.) His own iniquities ſhall take the wicked himſelf, and he ſhall be holden with the cords of his ſins. (Prov. 29. 6.) In the tranſgreſſion of an evil man there is a ſnare, but the righteous ſhall ſing and rejoyce. The Proverb may be taken two wayes; either that there is a ſnare in his tranſgreſſion for others, a wicked man tranſgreſſing layes a ſnare for his Neighbour; or elſe that in his tranſgreſſion there is a ſnare for himſelf. I rather take the meaning of Solomon in this latter ſence: Sins are ſoul-ſnares, ſoul-ſhackles; and the offers which ſin makes are as the bait of the ſnare; for that which draws men into the ſnares of ſin, is the pleaſure, or the profit of ſin; ſome advantage or ſatisfaction is held forth, to entice affection. Moſes was invited by ſuch a bait, but he ſaw they were but the pleaſures of ſin for a ſeaſon; therefore he would not come into the net.

Peccata ſunt animarum retia, vincula, laquei, voluptates ſunt eſca.

Secondly, By this net, we may underſtand thoſe means or courſes which bring a wicked man into ſtraits, and undo him; and then his feet are his actions and puttings on to execution, by which he hoped to bring his counſels about, of which we read in the former Verſe; but he is every way diſappointed, His own counſel ſhall caſt him down, and his feet caſt him into a net. Now, when both a mans moſt ſerious counſels and aſſiduous endeavours turn againſt him, how is it poſſible that he ſhould proſper?

Thirdly, The net may be interpreted, as for the way to his ruine, ſo for the ruine it ſelf into which he falls; his troubles, miſeries, and afflictions are his ſnares; for as the wicked mans ſins are a net, and his own wayes are a net, ſo that is a net to which theſe nets lead him, puniſhment and miſery, theſe hamper and bewilder thoſe faſt enough, who fall into them. He is caſt into a net by his own feet.

Retia ſunt ſupplicia per quæ homo à conjectanda & obtinenda voluptate detinetur.

But here it may be queſtioned, Doth any man caſt himſelf knowingly or willingly into a net?

Surely no; he is ſaid to be caſt into a net by his own feet, not as if the man did actively contrive and promote his own undoing, or did weave a net purpoſely to entangle himſelf; but God ſo diſpoſeth of his plots, God ſo orders and over-rules his actions, that he makes his own feet carry him into the net, while he thinks they are carrying him into a Paradiſe of freedom and content; at leaſt, that he is making an eſcape from danger, and that his feet at next ſtep will ſet him beyond the borders of fear or trouble; the over-ruling hand and providence of God that doth all this; as Joſeph ſpake to his Brethren (Gen. 45. 8.) when he diſcovered himſelf to them in Egypt, whither they had betrayed and ſold him; Now it was not you that ſent me hither, but God: They ſent him thither inſtrumentally and enviouſly; but it was God that ſent him thither providentially and graciouſly, it was his Power and Wiſdom which ordered that diſpenſation ſweetly, elſe his Brethren had made foul work of it; or, they ſent him thither to make him a ſlave, that was their deſign; but God ſent him thither to make him a Prince and Ruler, to make him a Preſerver of Egypt, and of his own Family too; as he concludes in that Verſe, He hath made me a Father to Pharaoh, and Lord of all his Houſe, and a Ruler throughout all the Land of Egypt.

Deo ſic diſponente & illum ſuo facto deturbante. Jun.

Now as God over-rules the evil actions of men for the good of his own people, ſo that they may ſay, it was not ye that did this, but God; ye thought otherwiſe, but God hath brought good out of it; ſo God over-rules the actions of evil men to their own hurt: when a wicked man caſts himſelf into a net by his own feet, it is not he that doth it, but God; he intended nothing but good, and advantage, not miſchief, or miſery, not a ſnare or a net to himſelf, but God was too hard for him, and beat him both at and with his own weapons; he brought him into the net.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That no man is Maſter of his own deſigns or actions.

Man intends great things, his head is full of devices, but he cannot carry his work through to the end which he intends; wicked men cannot perfect their own purpoſes and propoſals; neither can the good. This is a common truth; The way of man is not in himſelf; neither is it in him that goes to direct his own ſteps, ſaith the Prophet (Jer. 10. 23.) That is, He hath not ſuch a command of his way, or of his ſteps, as to be ſure to reach, or attain unto his end; men would never come into ſnares, if the dominion of their wayes were in their own hand. A mans heart deviſeth his way, but the Lord directeth his ſteps (Prov. 16. 1.) Not that the heart lyes more out of the command and government of God, then the feet do; for he ſaith (verſ. 1.) The preparations of the heart in man, and the anſwer of the tongue is from the Lord. But when Solomon ſaith, A mans heart deviſeth his way, &c. I conceive his meaning to be this, that the Lord permits men a greater liberty of thinking, then he doth of acting (not that it is lawful for them to think any thing which it is not lawful for them to act, but) he gives them ſcope to lay their plots and deviſe their devices, to imagine ſtrange things, and he never checks or takes them off; but when once they come to acting and working, then he comes forth and ſtops them. God hath ſuffered many to take compleat counſels againſt his counſels, and to lay deviliſh plots againſt his divine plots; but he never ſuffered any to compleat their actions againſt his counſels. When once wicked men come to practiſing, let them look to themſelves. God never troubled thoſe firſt men of the ſecond World, while they were drawing the Scheme, and making the model or platform of their Babel; but when they fell to building, he quickly came down and confounded them.

Secondly, Obſerve, That as a wicked man keeps not the way which God hath appointed; ſo he comes not to the end which himſelf expected.

He is walking in the way of ſin, and God brings him to puniſhment, and into ſnares, there is his end which he looked not for; he goes he knows not whither; as Chriſt ſpeaks (John 12. 35.) He that walks in darkneſs (that is, in ignorance, or in an evil way, what of him!) he knows not whither he goes. But doth not a man that walks in darkneſs and ignorance propoſe ſome end to himſelf? Yes, he doth, eſpecially ſuch as are here ſpoken of; men full of parts, counſel, and wiſdom, theſe are full of deſigns; but though they are, yet they know not whither they go, becauſe they ſhall not go to that which themſelves have deſigned; but they ſhall go to that whither the juſt judgment of God determines them. He knows not whither he goes: An ignorant man walks in darkneſs; and becauſe he is ignorant of Gods way, he miſſeth his own end; he propoſeth happineſs to himſelf, and he falls into miſchief; thus he knows not whither he goes; wicked men are great lovers of themſelves, and it is out of ſelf-love that they go in ſuch wayes as prove nets to themſelves. They go meerly to ſave or exalt themſelves; but they caſt down and deſtroy themſelves; thus they know not whither they go.

Thirdly, Obſerve, It is a ſevere judgment of God upon wicked men, that they ſhould be the means of their own ruine.

That their own feet ſhould caſt them into a net; this ſpeaks wrath pour'd out upon them. As it is a great mercy when God directs his people to uſe the proper means of their own ſaving and deliverance, helping them to walk in ſuch wayes as have a tendency to their own good; ſo it is a judgment of God upon wicked men, when they through ignorance, or obſtinacy, betray their own peace, or run deſperately upon their own deſtruction, And are caſt into a net by their own feet. Solomon in the firſt of the Proverbs, verſ. 18. dehorts the young man from ill company, and inticers to ſin, by this Argument; Their feet (ſaith he) run to evil, and make haſte to ſhed blood, &c. And they lay wait for their own blood, and lurk privily for their own lives. Theſe men ſaid, (Verſ. 11.) Come with us, let us lay wait for blood; let us lurk privily for the innocent without cauſe; we will take the ſpoil, we will rob and oppreſs; yet when the Holy Ghoſt comes to make up the judgment concerning the actings of theſe men, he ſaith only this, They lay wait for their own blood, and lurk privily for their own lives: As if the men had entred that unholy League, on purpoſe to ſpoil themſelves, and cut their own throats. They thirſted for their Neighbours blood, but they drank their own; they coveted their Neighbours goods, but their own became a prey and a ſpoil. It will appear at laſt, that all the waiting and privy lurking of wicked men for their Brethrens either eſtates or lives, hath been againſt their own ſouls, and a cruelty to themſelves; this is a great aggravation of the miſery of a wicked man, that he hath ſo great a hand in it himſelf. The Lord ſaith by the Prophet Hoſea, O Iſrael, thou haſt deſtroyed thy ſelf (Chap. 13. 9.) and by Jeremy Chap. 4. 18.) Thy way and thy doings have procured theſe things unto thee. There is a great difference between theſe two, between that in the Prophet Hoſea, and this in the Prophet Jeremy; the one ſaith, Thou haſt deſtroyed thy ſelf; the other ſaith, Thy ſins and thy doings have procur'd theſe things to thee. It is true, the deſtruction of all men, of all Kings and Cities is from themſelves meritoriouſly, whatſoever deſtruction comes upon them, their ſins and their doings deſerve it; and this is miſery enough. But when the Prophet would ſhew the greatneſs of their miſery, he tells us, that their deſtruction was from themſelves inſtrumentally; not only hath thy ſin procur'd deſtruction from me, or cauſed me to ſend deſtruction and judgments, but thy ſins have been the very means, by which thou art deſtroyed: They have lifted up their hand to pull thee down. In the fourteenth of the Proverbs and the firſt, the fooliſh woman is deſcribed by her difference from the wiſe, in this, Every wiſe woman buildeth her houſe, but the fooliſh woman plucketh it down with her hands; here is her folly and her miſery; it would have been miſery enough, if (when ſhe had built a houſe, or had a houſe built) other hands had pluckt it down over her head, but it is far greater miſery when a woman ſhall be ſo fooliſh as to pluck the houſe down upon her own head; this is the judgment that God leaves many worldly wiſe men and Politicians to, that when they have plotted a great while to pull the houſe upon the heads of others, it falls upon their own heads; and when they have prepared ſnares, ſet their nets, and are waiting to catch their prey, they are enſnared, and their own feet caſt themſelves into the net.

Eſt proverbiale periculi, ſicut ambulare ſuper prunas. Druſ.

And he walketh upon a ſnare.

That's the ſecond Branch: Mr. Broughton renders, He walketh upon the platted grin. The ſence is near the ſame with the firſt, and therefore I ſhall but touch it. The former word noted a more violent and ſudden action, He is caſt; here, He walketh: Walking is an ordinary pace, and implyes an ordinary courſe of life. Now when it is ſaid, He walks upon a ſnare, it ſhews, that as (in the former clauſe) a wicked man often falls ſuddenly and violently into danger; ſo his whole life is a life of danger; the wicked man lives, but he lives miſerably, he lives in the midſt of a ſnare. Some interpret this as a proverbial ſpeech; To walk upon a ſnare, is like that of walking upon burning coals, or upon fire, both are proverbial, for extremity of danger.

Hence Obſerve, That an ungodly man is oft-times ſecure, but never ſafe.

Is he ſafe that walks on ſnares? whoſe ordinary courſe is upon the borders of death? Such is the walk, and the way of an ungodly man; while he would avoid, he falls into the pit; when he thinks himſelf moſt ſure, then is he neareſt confuſion; He walks upon a ſnare. Indeed, every thing that a wicked man hath, or that he ſets himſelf about, is a ſnare unto him.

Firſt, His Table is a ſnare; when he comes to his Table, and there finds comfortable proviſion, the fat and the ſweet upon it, then he rejoyceth in his portion, and ſaith, Soul take thine eaſe, eat, drink, and be merry; yet the curſe overtakes him there, His Table is made a ſnare, and that which ſhould be for his good, is to him an occaſion of falling (Pſal. 69. 22.) It is a ſore evil, when there is no bread upon the Table; but when a Table full of bread is a ſnare and a famine to us, that is far worſe.

Secondly, His riches are a ſnare to him: That which a rich man counts his ſtrong Tower, becomes his ſtrong Priſon. (1 Tim. 6. 9) They that will be rich fall into temptation and a ſnare (his riches are a ſnare, a greater ſnare then poverty) and into many fooliſh hurtful luſts, which drown men in deſtruction and perdition.

Thirdly, His wit, parts, and learning, are a ſnare, for which he is ſo much admired in the World; O he is a very witty man, a wiſe man, a man of a deep reach, a notable head-piece, what a nimble, what an eloquent tongue hath he? See how gracefully he expreſſes himſelf; yet all this is a ſnare; it had been better for him if he had been a fool, or dumb, then to have had all that wit, thoſe great abilities, conſidering how he hath imployed them. A carnal man preſumes to enſnare all the World with his wit and words, and theſe are often a ſnare for others, but chiefly for himſelf.

Fourthly, All his Relations, his Wife, Children, Friends, all the comforts that he hath in the World are ſnares to him.

Fifthly, Religion, ſo far as he profeſſeth it (a wicked man may make profeſſion of Religion (I ſay) his very Religion) is a ſnare: Religion as the World bears, and as many conceive, the notation of it, hath its name (a religando) from binding; Religion is a bond, it ſhould be a bond to all men, but it is a ſnare to wicked men; it ſhould be a bond to tye them faſt to God, to tye them to duties, to tye and hold them in the way of holineſs; but it is only a ſnare bond to wicked men; their outward profeſſion cauſeth them to flatter themſelves in their inward corruption, and they take to themſelves by ſo much the more liberty in evil, by how much they give up themſelves the more to a kind of bondage in doing good.

Sixthly, and laſtly, Which is more then all, Chriſt is a ſnare to a wicked man; when he hath Chriſt in his mouth, when he talks of Chriſt, he doth but walk upon a ſnare. If the Son make us free, we are free indeed; but none are more really in bondage, then they who are but ſeemingly freed by the Son. To thoſe that believe, Chriſt is precious; but to the unbelievers and diſobedient, he is a ſtone of ſtumbling, and a rock of offence, that they may ſtumble and fall, and be broken (1 Pet. 2. 7, 8.) What a woful condition are ſuch in, who not only caſt themſelves into a net, into troubles and vexations, but whoſe higheſt injoyments, temporal and ſpiritual, their profeſſion of Religion, yea, their pretenſions to Chriſt himſelf, are a continual walking upon a ſnare.

Bildad proceeds yet further in the explication of this Allegory.

Verſe 9. The grin ſhall take him by the heel; and the robber ſhall prevail againſt him.

We ſaw the wicked man catcht in his own ſnare before; now here is a ſnare laid for him: His overthrow is diſcovered two wayes in this ninth Verſe.

Firſt, A ſecret evil is ſet for him; The grin ſhall take him by the heel.

Secondly, Open violence ſhall ruine him; And the robber ſhall prevail againſt him.

אחם eſt apprehendere & apprehenſum firmiter tenere.

The grin ſhall take him.] The word ſignifies not only to take, but to hold that which is taken, and to hold it ſo as not to let it go, to hold it firm and ſtrongly, to keep in ſafe cuſtody. As the Spouſe ſpeaks of Chriſt (Cant. 3. 4.) I caught him, and I would not let him go. It is this word; now as the ſoul putting forth faith upon Chriſt, doth not only take him and lay hold upon him, but layes hold ſo, as not to let him go, ſticking cloſe, and cleaving to him. Strong faith doth this, ſuch as her faith was when ſhe ſaid, I caught him, and held him, and would not let him go: ſo evil doth not only take, but hold the wicked faſt, ſo faſt, that it will not let them go; that's the meaning of the word.

The grin ſhall take him by the heel.] Before he ſpake of a net, and of a ſnare, now of a grin. Here are all ſorts of hunting, and fowling inſtruments heaped together for the compleating and furniſhing of this Allegory. Here we have the grin.

פם laqueus à פוח flavit, perflavit, ſibilavit.

The Original root ſignifies to blow or puff with the breath; ſo the word is us'd (Prov. 29. 8.) Scornful men bring a City into a ſnare; ſo we tranſlate; it is the word which is here tranſlated grin; and we put in the Margin of our Bibles oppoſite to thoſe words, Bring a City into a ſnare, or, Set a City on fire; becauſe proud ſcornful men will not give over contentious ſpeaking, till they blow the ſpark into a flame, and ſo ſet a whole City, yea, Kingdom on fire; or as ſome render it, till they blow it up, as a Houſe or Tower is blown up by the violence of Gun-powder. That City and State is indeed brought into a ſnare, which is thus blown up or ſet on fire by the unquiet breathings and vexings of ſcornful men.

Exſufflant urbem.

The word alſo ſignifies to whiſtle ſoftly, becauſe Fowlers and Hunters uſe to draw the prey into the danger of the grin by a kind of ſoft muſical whiſtle. And indeed every man is brought into the grin or ſnare by a whiſtle; that is, by ſome enticing fallacious voice, tempting him to ſin. And hence the ſame word ſignifies both.

Sibilo utuntur Aucupes.

The grin ſhall take him by the heel.] The heel is taken four wayes in Scripture.

Firſt, For the whole body; as in the third of Geneſis, and the ſixteenth verſe, Thou ſhalt bruiſe his heel: The Serpent bruiſed the whole body of Chriſt, or (as ſome underſtand the heel in that Text) the whole humanity of Chriſt, which is but as the heel to his divinity: The divine nature being far more excellent then the humane, which alone ſuffered. For though he ſuffered who had two natures, yet but one did ſuffer.

Secondly, The heel is taken properly and ſtrictly for the loweſt part of the body; Jacob took his Brother by the heel (Gen. 25. 26.) Thus here. For a grin is uſually ſet to catch by the heel, not by the head, or other members of the body.

Thirdly, The heel is put tropically for the actions and motions of this life, (Pſal. 49. 5.) Wherefore ſhould I fear in the dayes of evil, when the iniquities of my [heel] ſhall compaſs me about? That is, When my ſins or failings in what I have done, come to my remembrance, or are chaſtened upon me; every mans heel hath ſome iniquity. As we ſhall have ſome dirt cleaving to our heels while we walk in a dirty world; ſo there is ſome dirt, ſome defilement, upon all our actions, which we may call, The iniquity of our heel.

Fourthly, In a tropical ſence, the heel ſignifies the latter part of a mans life, or old age; ſo ſome will needs underſtand it here; as if the ſence were thus, Though the wicked man proſper a great while, the firſt, the fore-part of his life, yet towards the heel of his life, that is, the latter end of his life, before he come to his grave, he ſhall be catcht, ſome miſchief ſhall fall upon him, or he ſhall fall into miſchief; he may proſper a great while, but the grin ſhall catch him by the heel, it will have him towards the end of his life. But I paſs that.

צמם Prædo, latro quod comam alat.

Conſtringens prævalet ei horridus: nimirum venator ſive auceps. Jun.

And the Robber ſhall prevail againſt him.] Mr. Broughton reads it, The Savage ſhall lay hold on him: The word which we tranſlate Robber, ſignifies any wild barbarous ſort of men, who live out of rule and order; properly a man that lets his hair grow diſorderly, becauſe Robbers and violent perſons uſe to let their hair grow ſo, either to diſguiſe themſelves, or terrifie others. Some by the Robber, underſtand the poor; others, his rich Creditors; we, in purſuance of the Allegory, may call the Robber the Hunter, or the Wood-man, who ſets the grin, and layes the ſnare, this man, this cunning Hunter prevails againſt him. When the Hunter hath ſet his grin for the Bird or Beaſt, as ſoon as they are caught, he comes in and prevails upon them. The grin doth not kill, but hold faſt till the Hunter comes. The grin ſhall take him by the heel, and the Hunter, or Robber, ſhall prevail over him. So we tranſlate the word (Job 5. 5.)

Exardeſcet contra eum ſitis. Vulg.

Further, the word ſignifies alſo a thirſty one; hence the Vulgar tranſlates in the abſtract, Thirſt ſhall prevail, or wax hot upon him, putting the abſtract for the concrete, thirſt for the thirſty one, Thirſt ſhall prevail againſt him; which is thus explained, The wicked man is caught by the grin or toyl, and there he vexeth himſelf till he is weary and thirſty; as Beaſts that are caught in a toyl, vex themſelves, and labour till they pant and breath for life, and are very thirſty: Thus the wicked man ſhall be caught in a grin, wherewith ſtriving to get looſe, he becomes the more troubled: It comes near the ſame ſence in general, which ſoever of theſe we take, namely, that the wicked man, as he runs into the ſnare, ſo there he ſhall periſh; he ſhall be held faſt till the Hunter makes an end of him, and he that ſets the ſnare deſtroyes him. Which falls in with the former interpretation, that the Lord in juſtice againſt wicked men, orders both the grin to catch, and the Hunter, or Robber, to prevail.

Verſe 10. The ſnare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

חבל Funis à ſtringendo ſeu ligando.

Here are two words of a different root; for though we tranſlate ſnare, as in the former Verſe, yet the Original varies; our language is not copious enough for the Hebrew in this particular. The word which here we tranſlate a ſnare, ſignifies properly a cord, or rope, and it comes very near in ſound to our Engliſh word, Cable, which is a great rope, becauſe ropes and cords ſtraiten and hold faſt as a ſnare doth. The word is metaphorically applyed to cruel Creditors, who will be ſure to tye their Debtors faſt as with a cord, that they ſhall not get looſe: It ſignifies alſo a pledge, or an earneſt; becauſe that tyes us to performance.

מלכדת à capiendo לכד. enim capere denotat. Omnia quæ ad rete pertinent hic cõgeruntur, & per elegantem expoſitionem eadem fere res pluribus ſententiis amplificatur. Pined.

The other word which we tranſlate a trap, is derived from a root which ſignifies to catch, to ſnap ſuddenly; The trap is laid in the way; that's another engine by which hurtful Creatures are taken by Hunters. Here are variety of expreſſions, all tending to the ſame thing. Read the like congregating of theſe words, Pſal. 140. 5. Iſa. 24. 17, 18.

The trap is laid for him in the way.] That is, it is ſet cunningly, cloſely, and ſecretly, it is hid for him; ſo ſome tranſlate.

And how is it hid?

It is a hidden trap two wayes.

Firſt, By the cunning skill of him that layes it: He layes it with care; and that it may not be diſcovered, he covers it with leaves, or ſhadows it with boughs.

Secondly, It may be ſaid to be hidden in reference to their blindneſs who are taken with it: To a blind man all dangers are hidden dangers; they are laid cloſe though they be laid open; eſpecially when there is a Judiciary blindneſs upon men; that is, when God blinds them on purpoſe that they may fall into the net and the ſnare. Solomon tells us, (Prov. 1. 17.) In vain is the net ſpread in the ſight of any Bird; therefore ſnares and traps are laid in ſecret; for, In vain is the net ſpread in the ſight of any Bird. Which may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, We may refer the word, in vain, to the Bird; as if he had ſaid, it will not help the Bird, or cauſe the Bird to withdraw from the danger, though the net be ſpread in his very ſight. The Bird is ſo hungry after the Corn ſtrowed by the net, that though you lay the net in his ſight, yet it is in vain, the Bird will come and venture for the Corn: We may exemplifie it thus, That when men are given up to any luſt, it is in vain that the net is ſpread in their very eye; though they ſee the danger of ſin, and be told of it; though it be ſaid, if you go there, you periſh; if you go in ſuch a way, you will be damn'd and undone; though the net be laid in their very eye, yet it is in vain, for they ſee the bait, and they muſt go forwards, pleaſure and profit, upon which luſt is ſet, carries them on againſt all counſel and perſwaſion. Thus it is in vain to ſuch ſilly birds, they get no good by it, they will not be warned, though the net be ſpread in their very eye, (Iſa. 26. 11.) Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not ſee it: So it is in this caſe, theſe fools will not ſee what they do ſee; they are ſo blinded with ſomewhat that ſin promiſeth, that though they be told of the danger, they will not take notice of the danger. When man is departed from God, who is light, he ſees no danger, no evil, though he ſee it. He hath no ſpiritual, yea, no rational ſight of that, of which he cannot but have a ſenſitive ſight. He falls into the ſnare which he ſees, yet (which aggravates his miſery) he knows not that he is fallen.

But rather ſecondly, In vain is the net ſpread in the ſight of any Fowl: That is, It is in vain for the Fowler; for if the Bird ſee the net, he will hardly come into it; therefore it is that Fowlers make it a great part of their art to keep the net and ſnare ſecret. And Solomon intimates, that if any man hearing of the danger, withdraw not, he is more a fool then a Bird, for he will not come into a ſeen danger. Who can pity thoſe who are taken in a trap which they ſaw, and yet would not avoid: They who periſh upon theſe terms, ſeem to be in love with periſhing. The trap is laid for him in the way.

From all laid together, the net, the ſnare, the grin, the trap, and the ſnare a ſecond time, all prepared for the wicked man, Obſerve, Firſt, Wicked men are catcht at unawares.

A trap, a ſnare, a net, note ſurpriſal: Theſe are like Stratagems or Ambuskadoes in war. It is one thing to meet an enemy in the open field, and it is another thing to lye in ambuſh and uſe ſtratagems to take him. Snares take unawares. Solomon (Eccleſ. 9. 12.) ſpeaks of the miſery of man, Man knows not his time: as the Fiſhes that are taken in an evil net, and as the Birds that are caught in the ſnare; ſo are the ſons of men ſnared in an evil time, when it falleth ſuddenly upon them; the ſnare takes ſuddenly, it gives no warning, there is no prevention, no fence againſt it.

Secondly, Obſerve, Wicked men are uſually taken when their hopes are higheſt, when they think themſelves in the very enjoyment of their own deſires, and the poſſeſſion of the good they have a long time lookt for, then God takes them away, and deſtroyes them.

The ground of this Obſervation is, becauſe ſnares, grins, and traps are baited with meat or ſome thing that is pleaſing to the Creature: To be catcht in a trap, is to be catcht with a pleaſant morſel. The Bird looks to be well fed, elſe he would not be enſnared; he ſeeks for meat where he finds a trap. As the table of ſome wicked men becomes their ſnare; ſo many run into a ſnare while they think they are coming to a full and well-furniſhed table. Hence it is, that when wicked men are neareſt their hopes, then good men may be furtheſt from fears; for their hopes, or the things that they hope for, are but as baits to entice them into a ſnare; they are catching at the bait, and think nothing of the ſnare. When they ſhall ſay, peace and ſafety, then ſudden deſtruction cometh upon them (1 Theſ. 5. 3.) Upon the wicked he ſhall rain ſnares (Pſal. 11. 6.) When it rains we expect plenty, the Clouds uſually drop fatneſs. The wicked mans cloud drops leanneſs, and rains a ſhower of ſnares upon his head. Thus when men are lifted up with hopes of great worldly enjoyments, when they ſay the day is their own, they are but running into the net, and the grin will catch them. True Scripture-hopes never make us aſhamed; but pure Creature-hopes ever leave us diſappointed, and while they offer us a bait, leave us in the trap.

Non eſt quod nos terreant improborum inſolentes minæ; cum enim tuta omnia ſibi pollicentur & aperto rictu jamjā præhenſuri prædam videntur, tum capiuntur, &c. Merl.

Thirdly, Note, When wicked men are once catcht, they cannot deliver themſelves.

Snares are ſet for ſuch Creatures as cannot eaſily be taken, they are ſo ſwift of wing, or foot, that you muſt take them at an advantage, or you cannot take them; but the wings of the Fowl, and the ſtrength of the Beaſt, avail them not, when the trap hath taken them. Wicked men have uſually great abilities, they are ſwift of foot, and nimble of wing; it is hard to take them, their power and policy are their ſecurity; but when the Lord brings them into a ſnare, neither wings, nor feet, neither ſtrength, nor ſwiftneſs, neither wit, nor greatneſs ſhall be able to deliver them. I (ſaith the Lord, Amos 2. 9.) deſtroyed the Amorite, whoſe height was like the Cedars, and he was ſtrong as the Oaks, yet I deſtroyed his fruits from above, and his roots from beneath.

Fourthly, Obſerve, A wicked man when he is taken in a judgment, the more he ſtirs to deliver himſelf, the more he is intangled,

Thus 'tis with Birds or Beaſts taken in a net or a toyl: Wicked men are as a wild Bull in a net (Iſa. 51. 20.) they tumble and toſs to get out, but their bands are made the ſtronger, by their ſtirring, and their attempts to eſcape danger, engage them faſter in it.

Fifthly, Grins, and ſnares, and traps are all artificial, Nature doth not ſet them, the skill and induſtry of man ſets and layes them.

Hence Obſerve, God prepares inſtruments to take wicked men with.

He hath his Hunters, and his Fowlers, he hath men skilful to deſtroy all ſorts of wild Beaſts, who riſe up to annoy his people. Some men are wild beaſts, tearing and ſpoiling all that come within their reach, they are Wolves and Foxes, ravenous Birds and Vultures; for theſe the Lord hath Hunters, and Fowlers, that can ſet traps, and grins, and ſpread nets to take them, they have an art in it. The Prophet ſpeaks to this alluſion, (Jer. 16. 16.) Behold, I will ſend for many Fiſhers, ſaith the Lord, and they ſhall fiſh them; and after I will ſend for many Hunters, and they ſhall hunt them from every Mountain, and out of the holes of the Rocks. Nimrod was a mighty Hunter before the Lord: The Lord had him in his eye, or he did not fear to hunt and oppreſs in the eye of the Lord (Gen. 10. 9.) The Lord hath his Hunters, and his Fiſhers too; the true Miniſters of Chriſt are Fiſhers of men; and the falſe Prophet was called, A ſnare of a Fowler in all his wayes, Hoſ. 9. 8. As God hath Fiſhers to catch the ſouls of men for good; ſo he hath Fiſhers to catch the bodies and powers of men for their deſtruction and hurt, when they uſe their power to the hurt of his. He hath all ſorts of Crafts-men at his call. In the firſt of Zachary (Ver. 18, 20.) there are four Carpenters (ſome read Smiths) What to do? To break the horns: That is, The Powers that vexed the Saints, that puſhed Judah and Iſrael. When Tyrants put forth their horns, God gives commiſſion to his Carpenters and Smiths to come with Hammers. And when men begin to play the Foxes and the Wolves among his Sheep, he ſends his Hunters, with nets, and ſnares, and traps to ſpoil theſe ſpoilers.

Sixthly, Obſerve from the accumulation or heap of words here uſed, nets, and ſnares, and grins, and cords, and traps, why all theſe? Do they not intimate to us,

That, God hath many wayes, variety of wayes, to catch and take evil men with?

If the net ſhould not take, the ſnare ſhall; if not that, the grin ſhall; if not the grin, the cord ſhall; if not that, the trap ſhall: It is threatened in the Prophet, He that flyes from the Lyon, the Bear ſhall take him; he that flyes from the Bear, a Viper ſhall ſting him. His avoiding of one danger ſhall be his falling into another; and while he thinks to out-run his trouble, he runs into it. As God hath infinite wayes to do his people good (he hath more wayes of bleſſing and delivering us then one; though he can make any one way do it, yet he hath variety.) And as the Lord pardons ſin abundantly (Iſa. 55. 7.) or multiplies to pardon, that is, he pardons more then one ſin, and pardons more then one time; he multiplies acts of pardon. So the Lord hath many wayes to vex and afflict wicked men; he hath variety of judgments, a treaſury, a magazine ſtored with them: He can ſet up ingine after ingine, inſtrument after inſtrument, if one fail, another ſhall fulfil all his pleaſure. Sword, famine, peſtilence, poverty, captivity, are all at his command: He can puniſh abundantly, or multiply to puniſh; he can multiply puniſhments both of a new kind, and of the ſame kind. He can add a ſnare to a net, a trap to a ſnare, a grin to a trap, or he can ſet up more nets, more ſnares, &c. till all the wild Beaſts and ravenous Birds be taken.

Retis, caſſis, laquei funiculi, decipulæ nominibus utitur ut doceat innumeras eſſe in manu dei rationes quibus homines ſua ferocitate ac rapacitate aliis moleſtos capiat, & captos laceret: Merl.

Laſtly, Obſerve, Wicked men are to be numbred amongſt wild and hurtful creatures.

I note this from the alluſion of hunting and fowling; they are either wild or hurtful creatures for whom we ſet ſnares and traps; no man ſets a ſnare to take a Sheep, or a grin to take a Chicken. Beaſts and Fowls that will not come to hand, or that prey upon thoſe which come to hand, we deſtroy with nets and traps. God would have us ſee what wicked men are in the proviſion he makes to take them; they are of a wild nature, they are ſuch as care not for community, all their care is for themſelves alone. Such is the nature of all wild and ſavage creatures, they live to themſelves, they make not a common ſtock, nor look to the publick, but every one is for himſelf. (Nah. 2. 12.) They are called Lyons, Who tear in pieces enough for their Whelps, and ſtrangle for their Lyoneſſes, and fill their holes with prey, and their dens with raven: And that's all the care they take; juſt enough for their own Wives and Children, who are there called their Whelps and Lyoneſſes; juſt enough to fill their own holes or houſes, let others be as empty as they will, what's that to them. Let the publick ſhift for it ſelf. Such poſſibly will pretend the Commonwealth, but they intend only their private wealth, or the publick no further then themſelves are concerned in it, or may gain by it. Is it not juſt that theſe men ſhould be brought into a ſnare, that every one ſhould ſet up a trap, and uſe means to catch them. For as he is a good Commonwealths-man that feeds the Sheep, and takes care of Oxen; ſo he is a good Commonwealths-man too, that ſets a ſnare for Foxes, and deſtroyes the Wolf. As in a ſpiritual reference it is a part of our duty to take the Foxes, as well as to feed the Sheep; ſo alſo in reference to civils. They who are like wild natural brute beaſts, of a ſavage and hurtful quality, are as the Apoſtle Peter ſpeaks (2 Epiſt. 2. 12.) made to be taken and deſtroyed. God hath raiſed them up (as he ſaith of Pharaoh) even for this ſame purpoſe, that he might ſhew his power in them.

Thus far Bildad deſcribes the wicked mans fall, under the Allegory of Hunters and Fowlers, with their ſnares, traps, cords, and grins.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

Terrours ſhall make him afraid on every ſide, and ſhall drive him to his feet.

His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten; and deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide.

It ſhall devour the ſtrength of his skin, even the firſt-born of death ſhall devour his ſtrength.

His confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, and it ſhall bring him to the King of terrours.

It ſhall dwell in his tabernacle, becauſe it is none of his: brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation.

THis Context contains the third Allegory, under which Bildad ſhadows out the miſerable ſtate of a wicked man, men, which he doth with a very tragical ſtile, in alluſion unto a proceeding at Law, as divers Interpreters ſtate the intendment of theſe words. And this is purſued and ſet forth gradually three wayes.

Allegoria ab exemplo forenſi reorum, qui graviſſimis criminibus tenentur. Jun.

Firſt, By thoſe perplexities, griefs, and gripings which follow the wicked while they live (Verſ. 11, 12.)

Secondly, By the torments of their diſſolution, (ver. 13, 14.) where we have the firſt-born of death, and the King of terrors, to whom the man is brought to receive his doom.

Thirdly, From that wrath and vengeance which is poured out, not only upon their perſons, but upon their eſtates, houſes and families, when they are dead, and taken out of the world, Ver. 15. It ſhall dwell in his tabernacle (when he ſhall be caſt out of his dwelling, and) brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation.

That I may not interrupt the opening of theſe words in making out the Allegory upon every paſſage, I ſhall ſhew it briefly upon the whole in five particulars.

Firſt, A wicked man is here compared to a notorious Malefactor, whoſe crimes render him as obnoxious to the Laws of man, and the ſevereſt ſentence of a bitter death.

Terrores ſunt quaſi apparitores & lictores regis cujus meminit (v. 14.) Jun.

Secondly, The terrors and diſtractions ſpoken of in the eleventh and twelfth Verſes, are as the Sergeants and Officers of the Court, who proſecute Offenders, to arreſt or apprehend them, and ſo to bring them to Juſtice.

Thirdly, The troubles which this wicked man is caſt into, ſhadow out the ſmart upon his body, fines and confiſcations upon his eſtate, which in legal proceedings are inflicted upon Offenders.

Fourthly, Death it ſelf, which is the chief and ſum of all puniſhments, is here compared to a dreadful King, or to a King of terrors, who is as the Judge before whom this Offender is brought for his tryal, and final ſentence.

Fifthly, The abiding of evil upon his Tabernacle, and the pouring out of deſtruction, expreſſed by brimſtone ſcattered upon his habitation, is an alluſion to that part of the Judgment which is pronounced upon Malefactors, whoſe houſes are pull'd down, when themſelves are put to death, and their dwelling places made for ever inhabitable. Nettles ſhall poſſeſs their pleaſant places, thorns ſhall be in their tabernacles (Hoſ. 9. 6.) The place that harbour'd ſuch wretches in former times ſhall be unfit for man to dwell in; only wild beaſts, The Owl and Schrich-owl ſhall reſt there, and find for themſelves a place of reſt (Iſa. 34. 14, 15.) for, Brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation.

In all this Bildad ſecretly ſtrikes through the ſides of innocent Job; he is the mark at which his parable aims. Bildad had heard Job complain; Firſt, Of terrors (Chap. 6. 4. & 7. 14.) and now he leaves them as his portion. Secondly, He had heard him complaining of ſpoiling and deſolation (Chap. 16. 7, 11.) and now he tells him of deſtruction at his ſide, and of a deſolate Tabernacle. Thirdly, He had heard him complaining of pains and dolor upon his body (Chap. 9. 17, 18. & 10. 16, 17. & 13. 25, 26. & 16. 13, 14.) and now he tells him, That the ſtrength of his skin ſhall be devoured. Fourthly, He had heard Job ſpeaking of himſelf as a dying man, as a man already arreſted by death, as a man for whom the graves were ready, and he ſaying to corruption, Thou art my father, &c. and here he tells him of the firſt-born of death, and of the King of terrors.

From all which Bildad ſeems to argue the matter thus againſt him in the preſent Allegory.

Only wicked men are terrified and tormented with fears of deſtruction, with the killing thoughts of the firſt-born of death, with the dreadful apparitions of the King of terrors.
But thus it is with thee by thy own confeſſion.
Therefore thou art a wicked man, thou art an hypocrite, and unto thee of right all theſe evils do belong.

So much of the Allegory in general.

I ſhall now open the terms and parts of it diſtinctly.

Verſe 11. Terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide.

The word which we tranſlate Terrors, ſignifies extream terrors, ſuch as put a man out of his wits, or make him not himſelf: Thus it is ſaid (1 Sam. 16. 4.) concerning Saul, that The Spirit of the Lord went from him, and an evil ſpirit from the Lord troubled or terrified him.

There is a twofold terror.

There is a terror from without, and a terror from within.

Terror from without, is the evil which we feel; the terror from within, is the evil which we ſuſpect or fear.

The Text is chiefly to be underſtood of the latter ſort of terrors, Terrors ſhall make him afraid: Though he be full of outward trouble, yet inward trouble ſhall be moſt troubleſom and vexatious. The deadly arrow ſhall dwell in his ſide, and the ſorrows of death ſhall take hold of him, before death comes near him. He dyes alwayes, that lives alwayes in the fear of death.

Theſe terrors are conceiv'd by ſome to be nothing elſe but the afflictions, twitches, and ſtings of Conſcience, which Heathen Poets call Furies: Theſe they fancied continually hurrying and vexing notorious offenders, bloody and treacherous men. Such they ſuppoſed poſſeſt with Furies, which were nothing elſe but diſquietments of Conſcience, when guilt riſing up, looked gaſtly upon them, and ſtared them in the face.

Nos generaliter quoſcunque terrores intelligimus etſi magna ex parte illi per Satanā ſuſcitentur. Merc. Terrores ſunt Dæmones. Rab. Sel.

Others interpret theſe terrors of Devils, or evil Spirits; Terrors ſhall make him afraid: That is, evil ſpirits terrifie him. This differs little from the former; for he may truly be ſaid to be hurried and vexed with Devils, who is terrified with his own evil Conſcience: That Conſcience which hath nothing of God in it, hath much of the Devil in it, and is an open Court for evil Spirits.

Yet we may further diſtinguiſh of three ſorts of terrors.

Firſt, There are terrors from God, and theſe the Saints, the beſt on earth may be filled with. (Pſal. 88. 15.) Heman complains, From my youth up, while I ſuffer thy terrors I am diſtracted. Thy terrors, that is, the terrors which thou (O God) ſendeſt or inflicteſt.

Secondly, There are alſo the terrors of Satan: As God ſets himſelf againſt his people; ſo he lets Satan looſe upon them, who can eaſily dart terrors into their ſpirits; as God ſhoots in his poyſoned Arrows, ſo doth the Devil too; God doth it as a Judge, the Devil as an Executioner.

Thirdly, There are terrors of Conſcience; Conſcience performs many parts in man: Firſt, Conſcience acts the part of an Obſerver, or Watcher: Secondly, Conſcience acts the part of a Witneſs, and brings evidence againſt us; Thirdly, Conſcience acts the part of a Judge, and pronounceth ſentence: Fourthly, Conſcience doth the office of a Tormentor; Conſcience it ſelf can puniſh thoſe, whom it adjudges to puniſhment: Conſcience gives deeper wounds then Care, and may well be compared to the Vulture, which Heathens feigned eating out the heart or liver.

All theſe terrors make wicked men afraid: God terrifies ſome immediately; others are terrified by Satan; and a third ſort by the gripes and convulſions of their own Conſciences. Or we may joyn all together, God awakens Conſcience, and gives Satan liberty to terrifie ſinful men.

Hence Obſerve, A wicked man is ſubject to continual terrors.

Terror doth not alwayes ſeize upon him, but it alwayes may; there is no keeping off terrors, unleſs ſin be taken off; unpardoned ſin purſues with fear; guilt and terror are as the ſhadow and the body: as by the ſhining of the Sun, the body caſts a ſhadow; ſo by the darkneſs of ſin guilt causeth terror.

There is a threefold terror upon a wicked man.

Firſt, There is a terror riſing from the evil which he actually feels; whilſt he is pained, he is afraid, and is jealous that his preſent ſufferings are but the earneſt of thoſe which are to come, or but the fore-taſts of a fuller cup of ſorrow.

Secondly, There is a terror from the evil which he really foreſees; though at preſent he feels nothing, yet he foreſees much; and while he is at eaſe, he doubts and ſuſpects he ſhall not.

Thirdly, There is a terror where there is no real evil either felt or foreſeen, but only imagined. The figments of the brain trouble as much as viſible or ſenſible troubles; no fear is more terrible, then that which is a fear of nothing: Evils which are not, nor ever ſhall be, render our lives as burdenſom, as thoſe which are. Of ſuch terror the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks (Pſal. 53. 5.) There were they in great fear; Where was that? In ſome place of great danger ſure, or in the valley of the ſhadow of death: The Pſalmiſt tells us, There were they in great fear where no fear was.

But can a wicked man be any place where no fear is?

I anſwer, Where ever he is there is a fear that he might fear; but he is often there, where there is no ſuch fear as he feareth; his uſual fear is no fear, or the thing which he fears is meerly a fancy, a ſhadow of fear; that which he fears he would not fear, did he but know what he feared; There were there in great fear where no fear was. They ſhall fly (ſaith the Scripture) at the noiſe of the ſhaking of a leaf; that is, they ſhall fear where no fear is: There's no hurt in the falling of a leaf, much leſs in the ſhaking of it; and therefore no real fear, or nothing to be feared.

Put theſe three together, and it muſt needs be that the life of a wicked man under ſin and guilt is ſubject to continual terror; what with the trouble he feels, and what with the trouble he really foreſees, and hath juſt cauſe to fear, and what with thoſe troubles that he fancies, fearing where no fear is, he muſt needs have a life full of terror; or, as the Text ſpeaks, Terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide.

Again, Conſider the miſerable ſtate of this wicked man is not deſcrib'd by outward evils, which vex the fleſh, and are grievous to ſence, as poverty, ſickneſs, pain, but by terror, which is an affliction upon the ſpirit.

Hence Obſerve, That terrors are worſe then troubles; the fear of evil is more grievous then the feeling of it.

The dread of an enemy is more killing then an enemy: The Lord aſſures Iſrael (Exod. 23. 28. and Deut. 7. 20.) I will ſend Hornets before thee, which ſhall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite before thee. Theſe Hornets may be taken properly; God who ſent an Army of Lice and Flyes to deſtroy Egypt, might much more uſe Hornets, which are a more terrible Creature, and have a more cruel ſting, to ſubdue the Canaanites: Yet the Hornets may be rather taken metaphorically, for the ſting and terror wherewith God did ſtrike the hearts of thoſe enemies; I will ſend a Hornet before you: That is, terrors. Which we find fulfill'd (Joſh. 24. 12.) I ſent the Hornet before you, which drave them out from before you, even the two Kings of the Amorites; but not with thy ſword, nor with thy bow. What theſe Hornets were is plain in the ſecond Chapter of Joſhua, verſe 11. where Rahab the Harlot made this acknowledgment, That the fear of them was fallen upon the people of the Land, and that their hearts did melt becauſe of them. Before ever Iſrael did ſtrike a ſtroke, they overcame; before ever the Canaanites ſaw the Hoſt of Iſrael, they fled before them. God ſent an Army of fears before the Army of the Iſraelites; Your fear is fallen upon us. Fear is a cruel Hornet, it quickly ſtings to death. It is ſaid (Heſt. 9. 2.) The fear of the Jews fell upon all people; fear overcame them firſt, and then the Jews overcame them, putting in execution the Kings commandment; They laid hands on ſuch as ſought their hurt, and no man could withſtand them. They who cannot withſtand the fear of an enemy, ſhall never be able to withſtand the enemy himſelf.

Now, as when a people are taken with the terror of an enemy, the enemy needs not take them; they are conquered without fighting, and beaten without a battel. So diſmaying fear of any kind, or from any other cauſe, doth the like; when that once takes hold upon the heart, 'tis no matter whether the evil it ſelf ever come in ſight. For as joy and comfort are better then thoſe things from which they reſult. Paul ſpeaking of thoſe dark times and places, when and where Goſpel-light had not ſhined, yet adds (Acts 14. 17.) That God did not leave himſelf without witneſs, in that he did good, and gave us rain from Heaven, and fruitful ſeaſons, filling our hearts with food and gladneſs. Food is a great mercy, but gladneſs is a better. Some have been ſatisfied with gladneſs, who have not been fill'd with food (Hab. 3. 17.) but no man was ever ſatisfied with a fulneſs of food, while he was empty of gladneſs. David prayes, Lord reſtore to me the joy of thy ſalvation (Pſal. 51. 12.) The joy of ſalvation is more refreſhing then ſalvation; though a man be in the ſtate of ſalvation, yet if he have not the joy of it, what is ſalvation it ſelf to him? As we may have many outward temporal mercies, and yet not have the joy of them; ſo we may have ſpiritual and eternal mercies without that joy which is annexed to them. David had the ſalvation of God, his ſoul was in a ſafe ſtate, he was not fallen from Grace, nor out of the love of God, yet he wanted the joy of it. Now (I ſay) as the joy of ſalvation to our feeling, is better then ſalvation it ſelf, and the gladneſs we have with our food, then our food; ſo the terrors, affrightments, and amazements which come with any judgment, are more afflictive then the judgment; and God can ſeparate theſe two when he pleaſeth. For as God can give a man food, and no gladneſs at all, riches, and no comfort at all; ſo he can give trouble and no terror, affliction and no fear at all. Many a good man hath had abundance of the one, and not the leaſt touch of the other. But as trouble is the portion of a wicked man; ſo terrors uſually accompany his troubles, if they come not before his troubles.

Again, The words, On every ſide, are an alluſion to a beſieged City. As Chriſt threatens Jeruſalem (Luke 19. 43.) The dayes ſhall come upon thee, that thy enemies ſhall caſt a trench about thee, and compaſs thee round, and keep thee in on every ſide: Thou ſhalt not be able to eſcape any way, there ſhall be no path, no port open; ſo here, terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide, his ſoul ſhall be ſo ſtraitly beleagerd with armies of evils round about, that he ſhall not have the leaſt hope to make an eſcape. This is the height of the miſery of a wicked man. It is ill to have terror on any ſide; but to have terror on all ſides, how terrible is it? The Prophet Jeremy gives Paſhur that wicked falſe Prophet this doom (Chap. 20. 3.) Thy name ſhall not be call'd Paſhur (he would give him a new name, what was that?) but Magor-miſſabib (the word of the Text) fear round about; which way ſoever thou lookeſt, thou ſhalt ſee fear, or thou ſhalt have viſions of amazement round about thee.

Yea, A man that is under the guilt of ſin, hath fear not only round about him, but above, beneath, and within him; he hath terrors coming upon him from above; The wrath of God is revealed from Heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs; he hath terrors from beneath, Hell ſmoaks up wrath againſt him, and vomits conſuming fire to burn him up; he hath a ſpring of fear within, his own ſpirit is reſtleſs, and meditates terror every moment. Now he that hath terror falling from above, riſing from beneath, ſpringing from within, and begirting him round on every ſide, ſhall never want his belly-full, his heart-full of terror.

A Believer may have much terror upon him, and manifold terrors about him; but he is not beſet with terror on every ſide; he hath ever ſome paſſage, ſome way free; when many doors of hope are ſtopt, yet he ſees ſome open; or if none appear open, yet he hath hopes to ſee thoſe blocks and bars removed. At leaſt he hath courage to venture, though he hath but litte hope to ſpeed. When he is at worſt, he argues it as the Leapers did (2 Kings 7. 4.) If we ſay, we will enter into the City, then the famine is in the City, and we ſhall dye there; and if we ſit ſtill here, we dye alſo.

Thus many times a godly man is put to it, if I go ſuch a way, I ſhall dye, I ſee no hopes; or if ſuch a way, I ſhall be loſt too, I ſee no hopes. But though death waited upon theſe two propoſals of the Leapers, yet then they had a third which gave them ſome glimmering beams of light, ſome remote appearances of life. Now therefore come and let us fall unto the hoſt of the Syrians, if they ſave us alive we ſhall live; and if they kill us, we ſhall but dye. As if they ſhould have ſaid, We cannot make an abſolute concluſion either for or againſt our ſelves, if we go out to the Syrians; come, we will try and put it to a venture, at the worſt we can but dye, and 'tis poſſible, that we ſhall live.

Thus at the worſt, a Believer hath ſomething, upon which he can pitch, if not with a probality, yet with a poſſibility of eſcape and deliverance. And if we ſhould ſuppoſe his terrors on every ſide, ſo that the creature can yield him no poſſible relief or remedy, yet the way upward is open, and he can ſend to Heaven for help and comfort, when the earth ſhews him nothing but terror on every ſide. When he walks in much darkneſs of ſpirit, and ſees no light, even then the Prophet counſels him, To truſt in the Name of the Lord, and ſtay upon his God (Iſa. 50. 10.) And though God ſeem to cloud his face, and cloath himſelf with thunder againſt him, though he ſeem to forbid his truſt, and to beat him off when he ſtayes upon him, ye he can plead intereſt, when he hath no evidence, and ſticks to the Covenant of his God, when he hath no encouragement from God. Saints had rather truſt and ſtay upon an angry God, then a pleaſed creature. And hence the Apoſtle when he ſpeaks of the ſoreſt temptations which befall the Saints, yet aſſures them (1 Cor. 10. 13.) That as there had no temptation taken them, but what was common to man; ſo, that God was faithful, and would not ſuffer them to be tempted above what they were able, but would with the temptation alſo make a way to eſcape, that they might be able to bear it. Here is a comfortable word, though you have terrors on every ſide, yet you ſhall eſcape; you ſhall have ſtrength to bear it, while it is upon you, and you ſhall not alwayes bear it: God can and will make a way for his to eſcape; only a wicked man is ſo compaſſed about and made afraid with terrors on every ſide, that he ſhall not eſcape; though, as it follows in the laſt words of the Verſe,

They ſhall drive him to his feet.

There are different readings of this clauſe.

Confringent eum pedes ſui: ut pedibus in terram allidatur & proſternatur.

Firſt, Thus, His feet ſhall break him; or he ſhall ſtumble ſo hard (through his fear) againſt the ground, that he ſhall fall, and his feet (by reaſon of his fall) ſhall break him. As if he had ſaid, When he aſſayeth to flee away from terrors, he ſhall break himſelf by falling, not deliver himſelf by fleeing.

Secondly, Mr. Broughton renders, They ſhall preſs him at his feet: That is, Where ever he goes terrors ſhall preſs him: As if he had ſaid, If this man, who hath terrors round about, and on every ſide, ſhould at any time make an eſcape, and break through them, yet terrors ſhall preſs him at his feet; where ever he goes, terror will follow and overtake him. To preſs a man at his feet, as to tread upon a mans heels, may be taken as a proverbial ſpeech, noting a very hard and a cloſe purſuit.

Disjiciunt eum ad pedes ejus. Jun. i.e. fugientis & vagabundi veſtigiis inſiſtunt, donec ſiſtunt ipſum regi. Id.

A third renders it thus, And ſhall caſt him down at his feet; Terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide, and caſt him down at his feet: At whoſe feet? It is reſolved thus; At the feet of the King of terrors, or, of the Judge. This man thinks to make an eſcape, and get out of the hand of trouble, but terror ſhall arreſt him, and caſt him down bound at the feet of the Judge.

The ſence is fair from each of theſe three rendrings, but I rather take a fourth.

Huc illuc vagus & errabundus præ metu: nullo loco poſſit ſubſiſtere, ubique obverſante ei terrore.

They ſhall drive him to his feet.] That is, They ſhall make him flee or run for it: Terror ſhall hurry him up and down, and even drive him to his feet. While his mind is unſetled and cannot reſt, his body ſhall not. His heart wanders, and ſo do his feet. He cannot ſtay any where, becauſe whereſoever he comes, terrors follow and dog him; he may change his place, but he cannot change his company; in what place ſoever he is, terrors are with him; theſe preſently drive him to his feet, he would out-run his terrors, or find a place, where they ſhould not find him, but he cannot.

The approach of terrors have a different effect, as perſons differ.

First, They drive ſome to their defence.

Secondly, They drive others to their feet.

When terrors and troubles appear to men of courage, and of a ſound mind, they go to their Arms and Weapons, they ſtand upon their guard. (Heſt. 8.41.) As ſoon as Ahaſhueroſh had granted the Jews liberty to defend themſelves againſt their enemies, they preſently gathered together, and ſtood for their lives; they gathered themſelves together; they did not run away, they were not driven to their feet, but to their hands. Their enemies had authority to deſtroy them (for the Kings Writ was not withdrawn; only he ſent a ſecond Writ whereby the Jews had liberty to defend themſelves) terror was on every ſide, yet they gathered together to ſtand for their lives, and to oppoſe their enemies.

Thus when terrors appear and draw near the innocent, God gives them a ſpirit and power to ſtand upon their guard, and to withſtand their dangers. But when terrors meet guilty conſciences, they drive them to their feet, they ſee no hope nor help, but in running away, and that ſhall not help them neither. Such was the judgment upon Jeruſalem, as Chriſt intimates (Matth. 24. 20.) when he bids them pray, That their flight might not be in winter, nor on the Sabbath-day. This implyed, that their beſt help ſhould be in their flight, and their ſtrongeſt refuge in running from the danger: The terror which made Cain afraid on every ſide, drove him to his feet; his own tongue could not conceal the courſe which his heart intended; I ſhall be (ſaith he) a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth (Gen. 4. 14.) The terror which purſued our firſt Parents after they had ſinned, drove them alſo to their feet; Adam and his Wife hid themſelves from the preſence of the Lord among the Trees of the Garden (Gen. 3. 8.)

Hence Note, Flight is an argument of guilt.

When troubles drive us to our feet, not to our hands, when we dare not reſiſt our dangers, but run from them, in ſuch caſes, either our dangers are extream great, or which is worſe, our ſpirits are extream little, and our fortitude nothing at all. It is a miſerable ſafety which is ſought by running away; ſuch fear ſhews the mans condition to be worſe then his affliction. God threatens his own people, that if his fear did not keep them from ſinning boldly and preſumptuouſly againſt him, their own fear ſhould make them run cowardly and baſely from the face of their enemy; they ſhould be driven to their feet, not to their hands for help, and they are but miſerable helpers: They that flee, flee in confuſion, and ſo may as well run upon the danger as from it; they may ſoon run into their hands whom they fear; but they cannot get out of the reach of their fear. When the ſpring of fear is within our ſelves, we cannot be delivered from fear, until we are delivered from our ſelves.

Thus the righteous God either keeps wicked men in on every ſide, as cloſe priſoners, that they cannot flee, or elſe being driven to their feet, they flee and run from that which ſuch as they cannot eſcape, as is further evident in the next Verſe.

Verſe 12. His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten, and deſtruction ſhall be ready on his ſide.

יהי רעב
אנן

erit fames opulentia ejus.

The Hebrew is very elegant, and ſpeaks in the abſtract; His ſtrength ſhall be famine; not famiſhed, but famine; his ſtrength ſhall turn famine, or famine ſhall be his ſtrength. We render, fully to the ſence of the Text, His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten.

There are two opinions about this Strength, what is meant by it.

Firſt, Some underſtand it of his Children. As if having ſhewed calamity falling upon his perſon in the former Verſe, he intended here to ſhew the calamity of his Family. His ſtrength, that is, his Children, ſhall be hunger-bitten. And the reaſon why this word is applyed to Children, is, becauſe Children, eſpecially the firſt-born, are their Parents ſtrength, (Gen. 49. 3.) Jacob ſaith of Reuben, Thou art my firſt-born, my might, and the beginning of my ſtrength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power. All Children are their Parents ſtrength, in reference to their birth and generation; Dutiful Children are their Parents ſtrength, or a ſtrength to their Parents by defence and preſervation. (Pſal. 127. 4, 5.) As Arrows in the hand of a mighty man, ſo are Children of the youth; happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them. Arrows are offenſive weapons; yet becauſe that which ſmites our enemies, is a means of ſafety unto us, we may well call theſe living Arrows our defence. Jacob called his youngeſt Son Benjamin, The Son of the right hand; as hoping (ſay ſome) that Son would prove a ſtrength, or as his right hand to him; yet that phraſe doth rather ſpeak the nearneſs and dearneſs of that Son to him, whom he would love and take care of, as of his right hand.

And thus we may interpret it here, His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten: That is, Want ſhall enter into his Family, and eat up his Children: This curſe is at once propheſied and threatned (Pſal. 109. 9, 10.) Let his Children be fatherleſs, and his Wife a Widdow: Let his Children be continually vagabonds, and beg; let them ſeek alſo their bread out of deſolate places. It is an affliction when Children are left fatherleſs, and the Wife a Widdow; but for Children to be hunger-bitten, and to beg their bread, or to eat their bread precariouſly, meerly upon courteſie; this is a great judgment: As it is a truth, that the children of many wicked men are hunger bitten; ſo ſome Expoſitors fix upon this interpretation as the truth of this place. But I rather keep to the firſt channel, that the deſcription of the wicked mans perſonal evils is here continued; and therefore,

Secondly, By Strength, underſtand his riches, his fulneſs and worldly abundance; his very abundance ſhall be reſolved into want. This Hebrew word is ſometimes tranſlated riches or ſubſtance (Hoſ. 12. 8.) And riches are elegantly called ſtrength.

Firſt, Becauſe riches ſtrengthen a man to attempt great matters; they make him daring and venturous. He that hath a full purſe, and a great ſpirit, what will he not enterprize?

Secondly, Riches are a ſtrength of defence, or as a ſtrong Tower (eſpecially in the opinion of worldly men) to protect againſt the aſſaults of trouble, and the approach of dangers.

Both theſe wayes riches are a mans ſtrength. But in both theſe the wicked rich man ſhall be ſhorten'd, his ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten.

Hence Note, Creature-fulneſs cannot preſerve from want, creature-ſtrength cannot preſerve from weakneſs.

Eleganter robori tribuit, quod ipſimet impio erat tribuendum. Merc.

He ſaith not, the ſtrong man ſhall be hunger-bitten, but his ſtrength ſhall, and his very plenty ſhall be famine; the bleſſing of God gives plenty in famine, or ſufficiency in want; but where the bleſſing of God is wanting, there is a want in all outward ſufficiency. Chriſt tells the Devil in anſwer to his firſt temptation in the fourth of Matthew, Make theſe ſtones bread; it is written, Man ſhall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. A man may have bread, and yet not live; he may fill himſelf with all manner of worldly comforts, and yet be comfortleſs. (Luke 12.) The life conſiſts not in abundance. A full Purſe, or a full Table cannot maintain life. The Promiſe is, (Pſal. 33. 19.) That God will deliver the ſouls of his from death, and keep them alive in famine. As God can deliver his in death, and continue life, without the means of life; ſo he can let a wicked man famiſh in fulneſs, as well as take away his fulneſs. Which latter Hannah in her Song (1 Sam. 2. 5.) ſpeaks as an experience, They that were full have hired out themſelves for bread; and they that were hungry, ceaſed: That is, The rich had not ſo much means left as would feed them with ordinary bread, much leſs with dainties and curious fare; they hired themſelves out for bread; they were forced to work for a living, yea, to ſweat for a cruſt. 'Tis extreameſt famine, when they that have bread enough, cannot fill themſelves; but 'tis extream famine when they who were full have no bread. The Prophet threatened famine in that extremity (Iſa. 5. 13.) Their honourable men are famiſhed, and their multitude are dryed up with thirſt. If there be any water to be had, the multitude, the common ſort will have it; water is a common commodity (even as the air is) and uſually lyes in common to all. And if there be any bread to be had, great and honourable men will have it, though the poor ſtarve. Therefore to ſay, Their honourable men are famiſhed, argues the greatneſs of a famine. And that's the reaſon which ſome give of David's choice (2 Sam. 24. 14.) when God offered him, which he would of thoſe three Judgments, War, or Famine, or Peſtilence; he choſe the Peſtilence; and gives the reaſon, Let us fall now into the hand of God, whoſe mercies are great; but let me not fall into the hand of man. He durſt venture himſelf rather to the Sword of God, then to the ſword of man; not as if he thought, that man could ſtrike harder, or wound deeper then God; but becauſe he knew God would temper his ſtrokes with mercy, which man would not. And yet David makes choice of that judgment, which put him in equal hazzard of falling by it, with the meaneſt of his Subjects. For had he choſen the Sword, the King might have ſecur'd himſelf in ſome ſtrong Fort or City; thouſands of the people might fall by mans ſword, and his perſon not come near the danger. Again, if he had choſen famine; David being King would not want, as long as there had been a bit of bread to be found in the whole Land. The famine might have glutted it ſelf upon multitudes of his people, while he, poſſibly, might have had a plentiful, at leaſt, a ſufficient Table. Therefore David to ſhew the ingenuity of his ſpirit in this election, choſe a judgment, to eſcape which his outward Greatneſs and Power gave him not the leaſt advantage; He putteth himſelf meerly upon the mercy of God, who chuſeth to be puniſhed by the immediate ſword of God: Whereas if the ſword of man or famine be ſent againſt a Nation, Princes can make the beſt ſhift to avoid the danger in the one, and hunger in the other. For as (according to that of the Prophet) when the poor can get no water; ſo when the great and the rich can get no bread, then famine hath its full ſcope, rides (as it were) in triumph, and hath done its worſt.

His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten.

Yet this hunger is not to be confined literally to the want of material food: For while the man continues in his ſtrength, and hath all creature-comforts about him, ſomewhat pincheth and pines his ſpirit, he is vexed and hunger-bitten in the midſt of plenty.

Hence Note, A wicked man is never ſatisfied.

The righteous ſhall abide ſatisfied, there ſhall be no hunger upon his ſpirit: Diſſatisfaction is the hunger, contentment is the fulneſs and ſatiety of the ſoul. Many are hunger-bitten, who have more bread then they can eat. Was it not ſo with Haman? We read him boaſting of a banquet, yea, making proclamation of his ſtrength, power, and greatneſs (Heſt. 5. 11.) Haman told them of his glory, and of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the King had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the Princes and ſervants of the King; and he ſaid moreover, yea, Heſter the Queen did let no man come in with the King unto the banquet which ſhe had prepar'd, but my ſelf; and to morrow I am invited unto her alſo with the King, &c.

This man had all the honour and power, which that mighty Monarch could pour upon him; nevertheleſs, we may report him hunger-bitten, as appears in the next Verſe; Yet all this (ſaith he) availeth me nothing, ſo long as I ſee Mordecai the Jew ſit at the Kings gate. As if he had ſaid, What though I and the King banquetted with the Queen to day, and ſhall to morrow, yet it is not only hunger, but death to me to ſee this man thrive whom I would not have live. Thus becauſe he could not have his will upon an honeſt man, to ſubdue and deſtroy him, all that he had was nothing to him, for it availed him nothing. What we account doth us good, is to us (how good or great ſoever it is) no better then nothing.

There is ſuch a ſpirit in wicked men, though they live upon the faireſt terms in the world, though they be quiet and peaceable, and have profits and pleaſures more then they can mannage, or tell what to do with, yet all is nothing, unleſs they can have their wills upon ſuch as ſtand in the way of their pride and ambition. What tell ye me (ſaith ſuch a one) that I have a great eſtate, that I may take my fill of pleaſure, unleſs I may alſo take my fill of revenge, and throw down every man that ſtands not by my favour, or with my intereſt. Nor is it any wonder, that wicked men are never at reſt with what they have; ſeeing it is not poſſible that he who makes the world his all, ſhould ever be ſatisfied, if he had all of it, much leſs (which is all that any man but the firſt ever had, or I believe ever ſhall have) with a piece of it. Ahab had a Kingdom, he was rich and full; yet though he had the fulneſs of a Kingdom, he was hunger-bitten for a Vineyard (1 Kings 22.) This is a ſore judgment, and it is daily inflicted upon the ſpirits of many wicked men; they have bread enough, riches enough, gold and ſilver enough, yet they are bitten with hunger after ſome forbidden fruit; which if they get not, all is loſt to them which they have gotten. And as ſomewhat which they want, hinders their enjoyment of all they have: ſo ſomewhat which another man hath, hinders them more then all their own wants. Such a man proſpers, and is in power; this bites their ſouls, this gnaws their bowels, and they cannot be quiet. His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten.

And deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide.

איד propriè vapor & nubes quæ ſurſum attollitur, unde pro infortunio & calamitate, quæ ſuper aliquem ut nubes quædã incidit ſumitur. Merc. Forte parata deſtructio eſt pœna & ſuppliciũ conſtitutũ legibus, & præparatum ſontibus. Pin.

The word which we render deſtruction, ſignifies vapours, aſcending up from the earth, condenſed into a cloud: and (among the Rabbins) it is uſually applied, to any (as we ſpeak) misfortune, or calamity, which comes ſuddenly and falls down upon us like a cloud when it melts and diſſolves into a ſtorm-ſhower; Any unexpected evil may well be called deſtruction wrapt up in and dropt from a cloud. Deſtruction ſhall be ready prepar'd or fixt; ſo the word is rendred, (Pſal. 108.) O God, my heart is fixt, or my heart is prepar'd. So here, deſtruction prepared, or ready at hand, it is not to be now debated or reſolved on, what it ſhall be; That's done long ago. Some interpret this readineſs, in alluſion to a judiciary tryal, where the penalty is ſet and determined by the Law. Deſtruction is ready according to Juſtice for the offender: It is ready, as it follows in the Text.

At his ſide.] Some of the Rabbins who interpret the former word Strength, for Children (as was toucht before) in purſuit of that, interpret his ſide, for, his wife. The Hebrew word ſignifies either the ſide or the rib; hence 'tis rendred, Deſtruction ſhall be ready at his rib, or, upon his rib; that is, deſtruction ſhall be upon his wife, who was a rib taken out of Man (Gen. 2.21.) Thus the Rabbins deſcant upon it; His ſtrength, that is, his children ſhall be hunger-bitten, and deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide, that is, it ſhall wait upon his wife whether ſoever ſhe goes. So here is a deſcription of compleat deſtruction. The wicked man, in his perſon, as alſo in his wife and children ſhall be deſtroyed.

Others expound it only of wounds in his own ſide or rib. In the book of Samuel we read of wounds given, under the fiſt rib, becauſe there wounds are moſt killing and deadly.

Effractor paratus ad coſtas. Cajet.

Another reads it in the Concrete, not deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide, but the Deſtroyer ſhall be ready at his ſide; His enemy ſhall wait on him to deſtroy him. But the abſtract hath a greater force and elegancy. To ſay, deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide, is more then to ſay, the deſtroyer ſhall be ready at his ſide.

Therefore Fourthly, All that I conceive lies in this expreſſion, (Deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide) is this, to ſhew that he ſhall have a ſudden and an unavoidable deſtruction; for thoſe evils which are at our ſide, are ſo near us, that we can hardly acquit our ſelves of them. Evils at a diſtance may be avoided, but if they come up cloſe to our very ſides, how can we eſcape?

Latrones dicti ſunt quaſi laterones, latent enim ad inſidias & ex latere adoriantur. Habere aliquid ad manũ & ad latus utrumq; ſignificat habere aliquid proximũ. Bold.

Some Criticks tell us, that latro the Latine word for a thief, is quaſi latero, becauſe he lies by ſide of a man, he skulks in a buſh, or rides cloſe by the travellers ſide, talking with him, and then falls upon him; that's alſo the elegancy of the Hebraiiſm.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, God hath deſtruction ready for evil men; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready; he hath alſo prepared for him the inſtruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows againſt the perſecuters, (Pſal. 7.12,13.)

When we ſee a bow bent, and the ſhaft pull'd out of the quiver, and put upon the ſtring, then a man is ready to ſhoot; Divine deſtructions may be acted as ſoon as threatned, they are not to prepare, but prepared.

When the Lord denounceth eternal judgement upon wicked men, he ſaith; Go to the fire that is prepared for the Devil and his Angels; The fire is made, the treaſure of wrath is full. As the mercy of God is a ready mercy, and as his pardons are ready for his people; his pardon and mercies are not to ſeek, he hath them at hand, he is good and ready to forgive, (Pſal. 86. 5.) Whereas moſt men, though they will forgive, yet they are not ready to forgive, they are hardly brought to it, though they do it at laſt. But God is ready to forgive; he hath (as it were) pardons ready drawn (as a man who would be ready to do a buſineſs, he will have ſuch writings as concern the paſſing of it ready) there is nothing to do, but to put in the date and the name; yea indeed the date and the name are put in from all eternity. Thus the Scripture ſpeaks to ſhew how forward, God is to do good; He needs not fit his heart to it, his heart is ever in the exacteſt fitneſs. Now as God hath mercies ready for his own people, ſo he hath deſtructions as ready for the wicked. They are as ready as if he had made, and kept them by him ready made from everlaſting.

Again, As a godly man is uſually ready to do good, O God, my heart is prepared (ſaith David) ſo God is ready to bring evil upon them who continue to do evil; and therefore fear not when you ſee men ready bent and ſet to do miſchief, their deſtruction is more ready then they are to deſtroy, and God can bring deſtruction upon them in a moment.

Secondly, Note, Deſtruction comes ſuddenly upon wicked men, and ſurprizes them unawares.

Chriſt will come at laſt upon all the world ſuddenly, but the ſurprizal ſhall only be upon wicked men. The Apoſtle ſhadows this in two Alluſions, (1 Theſ. 5. 2, 3.) For your ſelves know perfectly that the day of the Lord ſo cometh as a thief in the night; for when they ſhall ſay, peace and ſafety, then ſuddain deſtruction cometh upon them as travel upon a woman with child, and they ſhall not eſcape. The thief gives no warning, and the travel of a woman with child, many times gives as little.

Now as in the great day of Judgment, God will come as a thief, and as pain upon a woman with child; ſo alſo in the leſſer dayes of judgement, thoſe of this life.

Obſerve, Thirdly, There is no running away from that deſtruction which God ſends.

Can a man run from his ſide? deſtruction is at the ſide of a ſinner; where ever his ſide is, there deſtruction is; Evils which have a Commiſſion from above, never fail to find the offender; we may eſcape the evil which man plots, man may make ready a thouſand deaths for us, and we out-live them all; as Paul ſaith of himſelf; In Damaſcus, the Governour under Aretas the King, kept the City with a Garriſon, deſirous to apprehend me: And thorow a window in a basket, was I let down by the wall, and eſcap't his hands. Paul got clear away, though man laid deſtruction at his ſide; but if God lay deſtruction, there is no window to get out at, nor basket to be let down by; we can neither ſtand before the judgements of God, nor out-run them.

Verſ. 13. It ſhall devour the ſtrength of his ſkin.

The thirteenth and fourteenth verſes contain the ſecond degree or ſtep of the miſery of a wicked man. It ſhall devour the ſtrength of his ſkin. Deſtruction was ready at his ſide; in the former verſe, now it devours; the word ſignifies to ſwallow up at a bit, and ſo to devour as to conſume and bring to nothing; it notes thoſe conſumptions which fire and ſword make. They are terrible conſumers, cruel devourers; theſe ſhall devour like a hungry monſter.

בדי עורו

The ſtrength of his ſkin.] The Original word which we tranſlate ſtrength, ſignifies properly a bough or branch of a tree; it ſignifies alſo the bar of a door.

And hence it is that ſome render, It ſhall devour his branch; and by this branch the members of his body may be meant, becauſe as the body of a tree ſhoots forth branches, which are as its members, ſo the body hath many members, which are as its branches, and ſo the ſame word may very well ſerve both.

Comedet vectes cutis ejus, comedet vectes ejus primogenitus mortis. Jun. Devoret pulchritudinem ejus. Vulg. Mors devoret ſpecioſa ejus, 70.

Again, Others tranſlate, It ſhall devour the bars of his ſkin; bones are as the bars of the ſkin, and therefore the ſtrength of the ſkin, like bars, the bones bear up and ſupport both ſkin and fleſh.

The ſtrength of his ſkin.] The Vulgar reads, It ſhall devour the beauty of his ſkin; the ſtrength, ſay we, the beauty ſaith he. The Septuagint follows that reading, death ſhall devour his moſt beautiful things, or thoſe things which were moſt amiable and pleaſant in his eye.

Our reading is very ſutable both to the context and to the original word; for the members of the body are the ſtrength of it, and the bars of a door are the ſtrength of it; therefore, it ſhall devour the ſtrength of his ſkin, contains and takes in both.

It ſhall, what ſhall? What is the antecedent? Some ſay the devourer is famine, of which he ſpake in the former verſe; His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten; famine ſhall devour; famine is a great devourer, famine eats up both the ſtrength and the beauty of the ſkin, it ſucks the marrow row of the bones, all fade before the face of famine, (Lam. 4. 5.)

Others underſtand deſtruction or miſery in general, as the devourer, deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide, it ſhall devour. That is, deſtruction ſhall devour the ſtrength of his skin; ſo it is only a repetition of the ſame thing, with an elegant force and heightning of the ſence.

The firſt-born of death ſhall devour his ſtrength.

The thing to be opened in this latter branch (the ſence being the ſame with the former) is, what we are to underſtand by the firſt-born of death, and how this phraſe and form of ſpeech is us'd in Scripture; There are divers opinions about it.

Firſt, One of the Rabbins conceives, that it is to be expounded by an Hypallage; as if the firſt-born of death ſhall devour, were put for Death ſhall devour his firſt-born: That is, his ſtrength, as the firſt-born is called. But we need not make ſuch an inverſion in the words; and therefore,

Mors devoret primogenitũ ejus. Rab. Dav.

Secondly, This firſt-born of death ſay others, is the Devil, becauſe he was the author of death, he brought death into the world, for he brought ſin into the world, he by temptation, and Adam by hearkning to the temptation. The Apoſtle makes the derivation of death from Adam, (Rom. 5. 12.) Death entred by one, and we may ſafely derive its pedegree yet higher by one; for death entred that one, by the Devil.

Again, The Devil may be called the firſt-born of death, becauſe he hath the power of death in his hands: So the Apoſtle, Heb. 5. 14. For as much then as the Children are partakers of fleſh and blood, he alſo himſelf likewiſe took part of the ſame, that through death he might deſtroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the Devil. He that hath the power of death is the firſt-born of death. The Devil hath the power of death, not as if the Devil could by his will cauſe men to die, or paſs a ſentence of death upon them; for this is too high a priviledge for the Devil, he hath no ſuch power of death; It is the ſole priviledge of God himſelf to have this power of death. The power of death, and the power of life are committed to Chriſt; whom he will he ſlayes, and whom he will he makes alive. But the Devil is ſaid to have the power of death as Chriſt gives him a Commiſſion, arms him with a power to inflict death upon wicked men and unbelievers; or he hath the power of death, not as a Judge, but as an Executioner; He is therefore called (Revel. 9. 11.) in the Hebrew Abaddon, and in the Greek Apollyon, that is, the Deſtroyer, or, if you will, the Executioner, the Hangman. God puts the buſineſs into his hand, therefore he it is that hath the power of death. Some of the Hebrews ſay upon that place, that God doth ſet ſome ſpecial evil Angel over ſome wicked men, he puts the power of death concerning them into his hand; and ſo he is the firſt-born of death; but I ſhall not ſtay upon that.

Angelus morti præpoſitus vel mortis princeps, cui à domino poteſtas data eſt homines interimendi. Merc.

Primogenitus mortis eſt morbus graviſſimus. Rab. Joſ.

Morbus graviſſimus, à quo mors abeſt proximè ex uſu ſcripturæ mors appellatur, quod enim parũ differt à forma perfecta illius ſibi nomen vendicare ſolet. Sanct.

Thirdly, Others by the firſt-born of death, conceive that we are to underſtand the diſeaſe which firſt ſiezeth upon the body before the man dies; for death when it ſiezeth upon the body, appears firſt in a diſeaſe or a diſtemper, and ſo the diſeaſe is as it were the eldeſt ſon of death. The diſeaſe being that which death ſends forth and neceſſarily follows, it is therefore called the firſt-born of death; as it were death it ſelf; for thoſe things which are near accompliſhment, though they are not fully accompliſht, receive the name, title, or denomination of the thing accompliſhed. As a man contending with another, if we ſee he hath a great deal the better of him, though the other make reſiſtance, yet we ſay, he hath the victory over him: And as Chriſt himſelf (Joh. 19. 30.) when he was alive upon the Croſs, ſtrugling and ſtriving with the powers of darkneſs about the deliverance of Man, crys out, it is finiſhed: and yet the work was not then done, it was not finiſhed till he died indeed; but becauſe he ſaw he had the better of the day, and he was aſſured that he ſhould carry it through, therefore thus he ſpake before the work was totally and compleatly finiſhed. So a diſeaſe, a malignant diſeaſe, a mortal diſeaſe, taking hold upon any man, may be call'd the firſt-born of death; that is, ſuch a diſeaſe as death hath begotten; or you may call it death it ſelf, becauſe death will certainly and ſuddenly follow.

Primogenitus mortis eſt mæror animi quem mors præmittit ut ſibi præparet hoſpitium. Cajet.

Fourthly, The firſt-born of death, ſay others is that trouble of mind, that anguiſh or ſorrow which death ſends as a harbinger to take up its lodging in the ſpirit of a wicked man; The afflicting fore-thought of death, is a death, or the firſt-born of death.

Fifthly, Some take the firſt-born of death, to be an early death, or death in the flower and ſtrength of age.

Primogenita mors eſt, quæ naturalis ætatis prævenit finem. Aqu. Liran.

Primogenitus mortis eſt proverbiale dictum, pro morte nõ vulgari ſed violenta & maxime Horrenda.

Primogenita mors. Vulg.

Primogenitus mortis eſt mors quæ præ aliis mortibus, tãquã fratribus, in enecando duplicẽ veluti & potiſſimam poteſtatem habet.

Scriptura ob maxima primogenitorum præ aliis filiis privilegia vocare ſolet primogenitũ quicquid in ſuo genere aliis antecedit. Bold.

Sixthly, The firſt-born of death, is ſome unuſual or extraordinary death; that is, look upon that death which is moſt deadly, that death into which many deaths are collected, that death which is (as it were) an aggravation of all that is in death, this death is the firſt-born of death: hence it is that the vulgar tranſlation reads, not, the firſt-born of death, but the firſt-born death; that is, whatſoever death is more deadly, and bitter, more cruel and painful, that death, which among all the wayes of dying, carries away the preheminence, that death, which is the very ſtrength of death, and hath in it a double portion of dying, that's the firſt-born of death. And ſo the firſt-born of death, is nothing elſe but a proverbial ſpeech for an extraordinary death, for an extream bitter death; For as it is among our children, there is the firſt-born, the eldeſt, and then the younger, as they ſtand in their degree, but among them all, the firſt-born is chief; ſo here, That death which among all other deaths is the chiefeſt, ſuch a death is the firſt-born of death, and ſuch a death ſhall ſieze upon the wicked man. And hence alſo Mr. Broughton (as I conceive) avoiding the letter of the Original (which he ſeldom doth, yet here he doth it,) inſtead of the firſt-born of death, ſaith, a ſtrange death ſhall eat the branches of his body. And we find in Scripture this uſage of the word applyed to others, in whom there is an eminency, or a high degree in any kind, though not literally the firſt-born, becauſe the firſt-born hath the preheminence above the reſt of his Brethren; As Jacob ſaith of Reuben, his real firſt-born; Thou art my might, and the beginning of my ſtrength, &c. And the Law provided, that a double portion ſhould be given to the firſt-born, yea though he lay under ſome accidental diſadvantages, (Deut. 21. 17.) He ſhall acknowledge the Son of the hated for the firſt-born, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath; though he were a ſon of a wife that he hated, yet this muſt not be pleaded as a bar to his priviledge. Though the mother was hated, yet the ſon muſt be honoured. Where note (by the way) that he ſpeaks comparatively of hatred, that is, though ſhe were a wife whom her husband did not love with ſtrength of affection, yet if ſhe hath born him his ſtrength, his firſt-born, he muſt acknowledge his right, by giving him a double portion. According to this Analogy we are to underſtand the Prophet Iſaiah ſpeaking of the firſt-born of the poor, (Chap. 14. 29, 30.) Rejoyce not thou whole Paleſtina, becauſe the rod of him that ſmote thee is broken; for out of the Serpents root ſhall come forth a Cockatrice, and his fruit ſhall be a fiery flying Serpent, and the firſt-born of the poor ſhall feed, and the needy ſhall lie down in ſafety. The firſt-born of the poor, is not to be interpreted of the eldeſt ſon of the poor; but by the firſt-born of the poor, the Prophet means thoſe who were moſt poor, extreamly poor, thoſe who were ſo far from having a double portion of worldly things, that they had no portion at all. Or they are called the firſt-born of the poor, becauſe they had only a double portion of want and poverty, or were oppreſſed under the very ſtrength of it.

Cætus ſanctorum quos primitivos appellavit, nõ quod omnes primi natura ſolverint matrũ uteros, ſed quia major honor primogenitis lege tribuebatur, eorum præſtantiam ſignificavit per hanc Appellationem. Theod. in 1 Coloſs.

Now, to ſhew that God would raiſe his Church, and lift her up, and give his afflicted people deliverance, he aſſures them, that the firſt-born of the poor, that is, ſuch as were doubly poor, doubly afflicted, ſhould feed and be comforted. Thus, in the twelfth of the Hebrews, verſ. 22, 23. Believers are all called the Congregation of the firſt-born; But ye are come to Mount Sion, and unto the City of the living God, the heavenly Jeruſalem, and to an innumerable company of Angels, and to the Aſſembly and Congregation of the firſt-born, &c.

Why the firſt-born, not becauſe all believers, all Saints are elder brethren, or ſuch as were the firſt-born of their parents; for the firſt-born may be an unbeliever, and the younger may be a Saint, a believer. But he calls them the Congregation of the firſt-born, becauſe they ſhall all be dealt with as the firſt-born, they ſhall all be lookt upon as the ſtrength of Chriſt, and all ſhall have a double portion, tion, they ſhall all have that honour which the firſt-born hath, a fulneſs of excellency and dignity; hence their title, is, the Congregation of the firſt-born.

So we are to underſtand that of the Apoſtle, (*Coll.*1.18.) where we find two expreſſions, ſtanding directly oppoſite to this in the Text; he calls Chriſt the firſt-born from the dead: He is the head of the body the Church, he is the beginning, and the firſt-born from the dead. As Bildad here ſpeaks of the firſt-born of death, or the firſt-born death; So Chriſt is called (as it were) in way of oppoſition, the firſt-born from death. Chriſt is called the firſt-born from death, not only becauſe he was the firſt that did ariſe to an immortal life, (ſome there were that did riſe before, as when Chriſt died the graves were opened, and ſome aroſe, but Chriſt was the firſt that did ariſe to an immortal life) and ſo he was (in a ſence) begotten and born again; there was an heavenly nativity in his reſurrection, therefore he is called the firſt-born from death, death gave him up, and was delivered of him for ever. Now (I ſay) Chriſt was not only called the firſt-born from death, (upon this account) but becauſe he was the chief, (as it were) the exemplar and leader in the reſurrection, he was the higheſt in the reſurrection, and his reſurrection was moſt glorious. Thus he was the firſt-born from death, he aroſe with the greateſt glory and preheminence.

In the fifteenth verſe of the ſame Chapter, Chriſt is called the image of the inviſible God, the firſt-born of every creature; that is, the higheſt, the fulleſt of glory among all creatures; for we are here to take heed of the ſence of the Arians, and others that follow them, who take hold of this Scripture, where Chriſt is called the firſt-born of every creature, as if the ſence were only this, that Chriſt is the chiefeſt creature (though it be a truth, that according to his humane nature he is a creature, and ſo the chiefeſt creature, but they reſtrain it to the whole perſon, as if he were only the chiefeſt of creatures) and not God at all. For he is not only in his humane nature the chiefeſt creature, but according to his Divine Nature, the beginning of all the creatures; ſo he is called (*Revel.*3.14.) The beginning of the creation of God, which we may explain by the firſt-born of every creature; he is the beginning of the Creation of God, not principium principiatum only, the beginning begun. Chriſt may be called the beginning of all the creation of God, becauſe God looked on him firſt: but alſo he is principium principians, the beginning of the creation, becauſe every creature had its beginning from him. Chriſt is the active beginning, or beginner of every creature; For as the Evangeliſt John gives it out (*Chap.*1. verſ. 2, 3.) The ſame was in the beginning with God; All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. Again, the Lord ſpeaking of David to the height in the Letter, and of Chriſt in the figure, ſaith, (*Pſal.*89.27.) I will make him my firſt-born, higher then the Kings of the Earth; that is, he ſhall be my chiefeſt, my higheſt, my only one. Thus as the firſt-born among the living, or from the dead, ſtill denotes the choiceſt of thoſe who live, ſo the firſt-born of death, is the chiefeſt, the higheſt, the ſtrongeſt death that any man dies when he is gathered to the dead.

Laſtly, Some labour much to fix it upon a particular death, and would ſhew us what this firſt-born of death, this moſt deadly death is; and upon debate, the vote caſts it upon famine; which ſome conceive alſo moſt proper to to this place, in reference to the words before, His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten, deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide. The firſt-born of death; that is, (ſay they) Famine, the chiefeſt of deaths ſhall devour his ſtrength, and make an end of him: For though we may ſay, there are as many deaths as there are diſeaſes and wayes to death, yet there are three great deaths, which do as it were ſtrive for preheminence; Firſt, Sword; Secondly, Plague; And Thirdly, Famine; theſe are, as it were, the firſt three among the Deſtroyers of mankind: ſometimes in the Prophets God puts a fourth, and ſaith, My four ſore Judgements; as if they were Judgments above all the reſt: and then I remember the evil beaſt comes among them; but ſword, peſtilence, and famine are the firſt three, and according to this opinion famine is put for the firſt of the three, the chiefeſt of the three, like the Tachmonite (2 *Sam.*23.) I find one Interpreter ſo confident of it, that he ſaith without all doubt by the firſt-born death, he means famine, which is not an infirmity or a diſeaſe tending to or giving us warning of the approach of death, but is it ſelf a continued death, and the moſt bitter death. And indeed the Prophet Jeremy in his Lamentations ſeems to give the preheminence to famine; They that be ſlain with the ſword, are better then they that are ſlain with hunger; for theſe pine away, ſtricken through for want of the fruits of the field, (*Chap.*4.9.)

Dubio procul illa primogenita mors eſt fames, quæ non eſt infirmitas vel morbus ſed continua mors, quâ non datur amarior, &c. Bold.

But I rather take it of any ſort of death, as it is heightned and made grievous by circumſtances, then conclude or faſten it upon any one ſort of death; For as any kind of ſin may by circumſtances be ſo aggravated, and made ſo exceeding ſinful, that it may juſtly deſerve to be ſtiled, The firſt-born of ſin; ſo likewiſe may any puniſhment or death, which is the wages of ſin.

Hence Obſerve, The Lord hath various degrees of Judgements, and of deaths, to pour out upon the wicked.

Some deaths are but like younger Brethren, others are like the firſt-born. It is with puniſhments and judgments as it is with ſins, there is a difference in the degrees of them; though all ſins be of the ſame quality, yet all are not of the ſame quantity. Upon ſome ſins the ſinner layes out his ſtrength, and commits them with all his might, theſe may deſervedly be called the firſt-born of ſin, and ſuch ſinners the firſt-born of ſinners; as Polycarpus anſwered Marcion the Heretick when he came into his preſence, and asked him if he did not know him; Yes, ſaith he, I know thee well to be the firſt-born of Satan. Now, I ſay, as there are degrees in ſin and ſinners, among whom ſome are as the firſt-born, ſo there are degrees in puniſhment; and therein lies the exactneſs of Juſtice to apportion and meaſure out to every one according to his ſin, whether in practice or opinion. To give alike judgments upon all offenders, would be very unlike to Juſtice; And there would be much inequality in ſuch equality. The Lord tells Babylon, who was the firſt-born of ſinners, (*Iſa.*47.9.) Judgments ſhall come upon thee in their perfection; perfect judgments are the portion of a perfect ſinner; where there is a compleatneſs of wickedneſs, there the compleatneſs of wrath ſhall be powred out, even the firſt-born of death.

ἐπιγινώσκω τὸν πρωτότοκον τοῦ σατανᾶ. *Euſeb.lib.*4. Eccl. Hiſt. cap. 13.

Now, as the firſt-born is our ſtrength, (which is obſervable) 'tis added in the Text; The firſt-born of death ſhall devour his ſtrength.

Hence Obſerve, That all the power of man fails before the meſſengers of the wrathful power of God.

Strength ſhall go forth to devour ſtrength; Though ſin be armed, though an aſſociation, or an hoſt of ſinners be in Arms, and ſtand upon their guard, though the ſtrength of each one among them be the ſtrength of ſtones, and his fleſh of braſs, as Job complained his was not (Chap. 6.) yet God can provide a judgement that ſhall devour it all at a bit, and ſwallow it as a morſel, he can have a firſt-born judgement to diſpatch the firſt-born, the ſtrength of ſinners. The Prophet Iſaiah in a holy ſcorne invites all the enemies of the Church to joyn forces and councels, to put their ſtrength and their wit together: Gather together on heaps, O ye people, and gird your ſelves, (and again he ſaith) gird your ſelves. Of all ſtrength, united ſtrength is the ſtrongeſt; united weakneſs is very ſtrong, how ſtrong then is united ſtrength? Hence Politians adviſe (divide & impera) divide your enemies if you would conquer them; but the Lord needs not take his enemies at an advantage, and therefore he ſaith; Gather together, gird your ſelves, and ye ſhall be broken in pieces, (Iſa. 8. 9.) Make your ſelves as ſtrong as you can, ſee if I cannot devour your ſtrength. Do your worſt againſt me, and the beſt for your ſelves, yet all ſhall be brought to nought. Creatures may be dealt with, and kept out, but there is no fortifying againſt the Almighty. When the Lord comes to aſſault or batter, then all our ſtrong Holds, even our ſtrongeſt hold ſhall be, as the Prophet ſpeaks (Nahum 3. 12.) as the firſt ripe figs, which if they be ſhaken fall into the mouth of the eater; and by how much any man is the more confident, that his ſtrong hold, will hold out in the day of aſſault or battery, by ſo much the ſooner ſhall it be rendred up or beaten down, as it follows in the next verſe.

Verſ. 14. And his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, and it ſhall bring him to the King of terrours.

As if he had ſaid, though this man was ſo ſtrong, that he grew confident, (ſtrong men are uſually confident) yet not only his ſtrength, but, his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle.

His confidence.] The word ſignifies ſuch an aſſurance and acquieſcence of ſpirit, as puts a man out of doubt; A man of confidence hath no fear, either of danger or about ſucceſſe; He is not afraid that the danger will come, or that the ſucceſs will not; he ſits down ſecure, and feels not the leaſt pain of ſo much as one jealous thought. Confidence is the mother of ſecurity, and the daughter of pride.

His confidence ſhall be rooted out.] He doth not ſay, it ſhall be ſhaken, weakened, or much abated, but it ſhall be rooted out, or grub'd up. The wicked mans confidence is compar'd to a tree that takes root, and ſpreads it ſelf in the ground, that grows up and ſends forth goodly fruitfull branches; but when he hopes to devour the fruit, the firſt-born of death devours his ſtrength, and his confidence ſhall be rooted out; to root out, notes total deſtruction.

Hence obſerve, The worſt of men are apt to be confident of good things.

Such a one Bildad deſcribes in this Scripture, and yet he is full of confidence. None have ſo great hopes, as they who have leaſt reaſon to have any. Some wicked men have a plerophorie (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks) their ſayls are fill'd with confidence, they are ſure of good things in this life, and of eternal life,they are high-built in hope, but they have no ground, no foundation for their hope. Theirs is a meer preſumption, who are full of ſin, and yet full of hope; full of wickedneſs, and yet full of confidence: Saints who are full of holineſs, are yet often full of fear; full of ſincerity, yet full of doubts. Fancies of faith are eaſily gotten, and as eaſily loſt. Many are high-flown, who never knew what the laying of a good foundation means. His confidence ſhall be rooted out.

Note, Secondly, The confidence of wicked men ſhall be deſtroyed totally; it is rooted out.

The confidence of a godly man may be ſhaken, and much unſetled: now he is well aſſured, and anon he queſtions all, but his confidence ſhall never be rooted out. (Pſal. 112. v. 10.) The deſire of the wicked ſhall periſh; That is, thoſe things that he is moſt deſirous of. His deſires live, yet they live as a puniſhment, not as a bleſſing, becauſe the thing he deſires, dyes; His deſires ſhall periſh.

As his deſires periſh, ſo his confidence ſhall. The thing that he was confident of periſheth, and at laſt confidence it ſelf, both root and branch, act and habit,is rooted out. Solomon (Prov. 10.20.) by way of oppoſition ſets the one over againſt another; The hopes of the righteous ſhall be glad; That is, he ſhall ſee the thing he hopes for, or the thing he hopes for ſhall come to paſs,this will make him glad. When the man who hopes is glad, then his hopes are ſaid to be glad; but the expectation of the wicked ſhall periſh; that is, the thing he expects ſhall periſh, and then his expectation ſhall periſh too, he is weary of expecting, he waits no longer. Faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for: but he that hath no faith, how can his hope have any ſubſtance, i.e. He can have no true hope in the good of the promiſe, who hath no true faith in the truth of the promiſe. Unleſs faith live, hope muſt needs give up the Ghoſt,or be as the giving up of the Ghoſt.

A godly mans hope fails not, becauſe his faith doth not; the thing he expects may fail,worldly things fail him often, and ſo may his preſent ſenſe of ſpirituals, yet his expectation fails not: when nothing appears to ſenſe, his hope is vigorous, and his confidence retains not only life but ſtrength. But when the ſence of what a carnal man would have, is loſt, his confidence is alſo loſt; when the one goes, the other ſtays not long behind. If our confidence be rooted in the earth, 'tis no wonder, if it be rooted up. Where the wicked mans confidence ſpoken of in this Text was rooted, will appear yet further from the next enquiry. His confidence ſhall be rooted out.

Whence? from what ground, where was his confidence rooted? The text ſaith;

Out of his Tabernacle.] The Tabernacle undergoes here a threefold interpretation.

Firſt, Some conceive that this Tabernacle is his body; He truſted much in his ſtrength, in the ſtrength of his body, as much as in any other ſtrength. Now (ſaith he) his confidence ſhall be rooted out of this Tabernacle; he thought he had ſuch ſtrength, ſuch a good conſtitution of body, that it would have ſtood like a Caſtle againſt all batteries; but it proved a Tabernacle, whoſe ſtakes are quickly pulled up. The body of man is compared in Scripture to a Tabernacle; And the Septuagint clearly adhere to this tranſlation, rendring it thus; Health ſhall be broken off from his Tabernacle; that is, his body ſhall decay. Paul (2 Corinth. 5.4.) We in this Tabernacle groane; That is, in this body. I ſhall ſhortly lay down this Tabernacle, ſaith Peter, (2 Epiſt.1.14.) that is,my body. The Lord Jeſus while he was in the world did but tabernacle with us a while; The Word was made fleſh, and dwelt among us, (Joh. 1. 14.) He dwelt amongſt us as in a Tabernacle.

Rumpatur de tabernaculo ſuo ſanitas. Sept.

The body is called a Tabernacle; firſt,becauſe it is weak; ſecondly, becauſe it is moveable. When a Tabernacle is reported for ſtrength or continuance, 'tis extraordinary. (Iſa. 33.20.) Look upon Sion the City of our ſolemnities, thine eyes ſhall ſee Jeruſalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that cannot be removed, and the ſtakes thereof can never be taken away, neither ſhall any of the cords thereof be broken. This is a ſtrange kind of Tabernacle, this Tabernacle may goe for a houſe, yea 'tis better then any houſe, a Tabernacle that ſhall never be removed. The Prophet ſpeaks thus by way of oppoſition to common worldly Tabernacles; Tabernacles were ordinarily removed and taken down, their ſtakes were ſoon pull'd up, and their cords broken. But Sion at laſt ſhall be ſuch a Tabernacle as ſhall not be removed. But how ſoon is the Tabernacle of mans body removed? the ſtakes thereof are eaſily taken away, and the cords thereof broken; There is no truſting to it for a day, yet the wicked man truſts to it, as if it were ſet up for Eternity. Here's his confidence, he thinks to live long, that his body ſhould hold out in all winds and weathers, but down it ſhall, dye he muſt. Let not the ſtrong man glory in his ſtrength, but let him that glorieth glory in the Lord.

Secondly, By Tabernacle we may (according to Scripture) underſtand The place of Worſhip; ſo his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, is as if it had been plainly ſaid, All the confidence (he may pretend to have very much) that he hath in God ſhall fail him. The wicked mans confidence grows ſtrong upon this conſideration, that he frequents the Tabernacle, that he goes to the publick worſhip, and applies himſelf to a bodily exerciſe in outward ordinances; Thus 'twas with the Jewes (Jer. 7. 3, 4.) their confidence was rooted in the Tabernacle, and at laſt it was rooted out of the Tabernacle; they cryed, The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord are we; they thought to carry it againſt all, becauſe they were a Temple, a Tabernacle, and they had the pure inſtitutions of worſhip among them. In this they truſted and were rooted, when there was falſe ſwearing and lying among them, when they committed abomination againſt God, and dealt falſely with one another, yet then their confidence was in the Tabernacle. Some think Bildad aymes particularly at the Oratory or publick place of worſhip, which Job had formerly frequented, and in which he had a great name; With this his friend checkt and upbraided him, that now his confidence was rooted out of his Tabernacle. Eliphaz took him up thus in the 4th Chapter, Is this thy fear and thy confidence? thou buildeſt much upon thy religious attendance at the Tabernacle, that thou art a worſhipper, yet God hath rooted out thy confidence, and manifeſted that thy Religion is vain. Saints are planted in the houſe of God, (Pſal. 92. 13.) they have a kind of rooting there; but though the Tabernacle be a good rooting place, yet we cannot root firmly there, unleſs we are rooted in Jeſus Chriſt. To root in Tabernacle-work, or in the bare uſe of ordinances, as if that would carry it, and commend us to God, when there is no heart-work, when there is no looking to the power of godlineſs, and to communion with Chriſt; what is this but building upon the ſand? Many come often to the Tabernacle, who are meer ſtrangers to Chriſt; they uſe pure ordinances, but are themſelves impure.

pure. Theſe may have a great name in the Tabernacle for a while, but God blots their names, and roots their hopes out of the Tabernacle, yea he pulls them from the horns of the Altar, or ſlayes them there, as Solomon gave commandment concerning Joab. Many ſhall ſay, Lord, Lord, have we not prophecied in thy name? &c. To whom Chriſt will profeſs, I never knew you, depart from me ye that work iniquity, (*Mat.*7.22,23.) That Text is this ſecond interpretation of the Text in hand, and ſpeaks to us fully what it is (in this ſence,) for any man to have his confidence rooted out of the Tabernacle.

Yet, thirdly, I conceive we are to expound this Scripture of a vulgar Tabernacle; and then his confidence ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, is no more but this, it ſhall be rooted out of the place where he dwells; as if Bildad had ſaid, the wicked man hath a great deal of confidence in his outward ſtate and worldly proſperity, in the riches, honour, and greatneſs of his houſe, yet all theſe ſhall fail him; And then the act of truſting is put for the thing truſted unto; His confidence; that is, that which he confided in, ſhall be rooted out of his Tabernacle, he truſted in and boaſted of the multitude of his riches, when ſuddenly they made themſelves wings, and fled away.

Hence Note, Firſt, There is no aſſurance of earthly things.

Confidence in that which periſheth in the uſing, muſt needs periſh when we come to uſe it.

Secondly, Obſerve, Where a wicked mans greateſt confidences are, there his greateſt diſappointments are.

The world is his God, the earth is his hope, his Taberbernacle is his delight; As his Tabernacle is full of the creature, ſo he is full of confidence in his Tabernacle; There he lives, and there he loves, yet nothing can protect him from utter extirpation, when the wrath of God begins to dig about him; His confidence ſhall be rooted up.

This Bildad further aggravates in the laſt part of the verſe;

And it ſhall bring him to the King of terrours.

It ſhall bring him.] What ſhall bring him? his broken confidence will do it; when confidence is ſpoil'd, man is amazed; This brings to the King of terrours.

And who is this King of terrours?

The King of terrours.] A ſtrange title! We have heard and read of many titles given to the Kings of the earth, but rarely, if at all, of ſuch a one as this.

Who is this King of terrours, this black Prince, or (as ſome tranſlate) Prince of clouds and darkneſs? becauſe darkneſs and clouds are full of terrour.

Principem Dæmonū intelligit, ſicut poetæ Plutonem regem inferni finxerunt. Rab.Sel. Scriptura aliquando poeticè loquitur. Merc. Rex terrorū videtur phraſi Hebraica dici maximus & potentiſſimus terror, qui inter cæteros principatum tenet. Pined. Nomen ſubſtantivū genitivi caſus & numeri multitudinis junctū alteri ſubſtantivo ſingularis numeri vices gerit ſuperlativi. Bold.

It was ſhewed before that ſome interpret the firſt-born of death, to be the Devil, becauſe he hath the power of death. The ſame opinion concludes The King of terrours to be the Devil, or Beelzebub the Prince of Devils. As the Poets fabled Pluto King of thoſe infernal Territories.

The Scripture ſpeaks ſometimes poetically, yet alwayes holily and ſpiritually.

Secondly, The King of terrours, is ſtrong and mighty terrour. As the firſt-born of death, notes the moſt deadly death, ſo, the King of terrours according to that Hebraiſm notes thoſe terrours which are moſt terrible. Such terrour as overcomes, ſubdues, and keeps down all other terrours, and makes them as ſubjects to it, ſuch a terrour as is chiefeſt and greateſt among terrours, that is, the King of terrours.

This Hebraiſm is frequent in Scripture, in the language whereof a man of bloods is a moſt cruel bloody man, and a man of deceits, is a man exceeding deceitful; and a man of ſorrows (as Chriſt is called Iſa. 53. 3.) is a man full of ſorrow; and a woman of fornications, is a woman extreamly immodeſt, and given up to unclean deſires. Hence this general rule, That a ſubſtantive of the genitive caſe plural, joyned with another ſubſtantive of the ſingular number, doth increaſe and aggravate the ſence, and ſtands in the place and force of the ſuperlative degree.

Again, As becauſe of the excellency and preheminency of the firſt-born; every thing which doth excel in any kind, may be call'd the firſt-born; ſo by the like proportion, becauſe of the eminency of a King, that which is great in any kind, may be called King. In this ſence (Job 41.30.) the Whale is called King over all the Children of pride, becauſe he is a creature of a vaſt and mighty body, and is deſcribed full of contempt, and prouder then the proudeſt. (1 *Sam.*25.36.) The feaſt that Nabal made is ſaid to be like the feaſt of a King, that is, a great feaſt. In that ſence, great terrour may ſuitably be called here, the King of terrour. Some labour much to place it upon a particular; and ſay, the King of terrours is death; and ſo according to legal proceeding, which was toucht at the beginning, we have the wicked man now brought unto execution; Deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide, it ſhall devour the ſtrength of his skin, the firſt-born of death, (a ſtrange way or kind of death) ſhall devour his confidence, and root it out of his tabernacle, and he ſhall be brought unto the King of terrours, to death it ſelf; there's an end of him. The Philoſopher (in this ſence) call'd death the King of terrours, when he called it the moſt terrible of terrible things; there we may reſt the interpretation of this Scripture, he ſhall bring him to the King of terrours, that is, to death, or to his laſt end.

There is another reading which I find much inſiſted upon by the Latine Tranſlator, who ſaith not as we, It ſhall bring him to the King of terrours, but terrour ſhall tread upon him as a King, or, deſtruction as a King ſhall tread and trample upon him; and ſo it is an alluſion to thoſe Kings, Emperours, and great ones of the world, who prevailing over their enemies were wont to tread upon their necks; we find Joſhua commanding the people of Iſrael to tread upon the necks of the Canaanitiſh Kings, in token of the victory obtained over them, (Joſh. 10. 22.) And as God in his providence gave them power to ſet their feet in triumph upon the necks of Kings, ſo it was a Cuſtom among the ancients, when victorious Princes led captived Princes in triumph, to lay them proſtrate on the ground, and tread upon their bodies, or go over their necks, in token of their total overthrow and ſubjection. Thus (according to the preſent reading) death and deſtruction like a conquering King ſhall tread upon the wiced man. This heightens the ſence ſtill, to tread and trample upon another, is a note of abſolute Conqueſt. (*Pſal.*91.13.) Thou ſhalt walk upon the Lyon and Aſp, the young Lyon and Dragon ſhalt thou tread under thy feet; Thou ſhalt tread upon them, not accidentally, as a man treads upon an Adder or a Serpent in the way; but his meaning is, thou ſhalt intentionally tread upon them like a Conquerour, thou ſhalt tread upon them to teſtifie thy dominion over them. So (*Luk.*10.19.) When the Lord Jeſus gave that promiſe to his Diſciples that they ſhould do great things, he ſaith, And you ſhall (ſaith he) tread upon Serpents, that is, you ſhall have power to overcome whatſoever may annoy you; ſerpentine power is all hurtful power, whether literal or myſtical. As the Apoſtle aſſures all believers, (*Rom.*16. 20.) God ſhall tread down Satan (that old Serpent) ſhortly under your feet. Thus death or deſtruction ſhall tread upon the wicked like a King.

Calcet ſuper eum quaſi rex interitus. Vulg.

Calcare aut conculcare vincentis, & triumphantis eſt. Mos erat apud Imperatores Conſtātinopolitanos ut captū hoſtem & humi diſtentū in illius cervices & collū inſultando conculcarent. Cedrenus.

Taking this King of Terrours for death; which interpretation I pitch upon,

Obſerve, That, Death is very terrible.

It is the King of terrours; It is very terrible under a threefold conſideration.

Firſt, It is terrible, if we conſider the Antecedents, the fore-runners, or harbingers of death, which are pains, ſickneſſes and diſeaſes, theſe are terrible.

Secondly, It is terrible, if we conſider the nature of it; What is death? Death is a diſunion; all diſunions are troubleſom, and ſome are terrible. And as ſome diſunions are terrible, ſo thoſe are moſt terrible which rend that from us which is neareſt to us. The diſunion of neareſt friends, of a loving husband and wife, how grievous are they? Now death makes a diſunion of thoſe that are nearer then husband and wife, even of ſoul and body. Theſe are (as I may ſay) more then married together; Husband and wife are one fleſh, but ſoul and body are one perſon. This marriage-bond is broken by the violence of death.

And not only is death a diſunion, but it is alſo a privation: every privation hath ſome terribleneſs in it, but this is not an ordinary privation, this is a total privation.

Death is ſuch a privation, as from which there can be no return according to nature, this makes it very terrible; and as it is a total privation of life, ſo of all thoſe things which appertain to life, all worldly riches, all worldly relations, all worldly comforts, all worldly honours are removed by death; it lays all low, it equalls the higheſt with the loweſt; death is the greateſt Leveller, as the Poet ſaith; death levels Scepters and Plow-ſhares, it makes all alike.

Mors ſceptra ligonibus æquat.

Thirdly, There is a terribleneſs in death in regard of the conſequents; rottenneſs and corruption conſume the dead, and darkneſs covers them in the grave. Theſe natural conſequents of death are terrible.

But death is yet more terrible if we ſtep beyond this natural conſideration of it; this makes it terrible to Heathens, who lookt no further then the grave: but to look on death as the fruit or wages of ſin, and as ſin is the ſting of death, this renders it moſt terrible. We may make a threefold gradation of the terribleneſs of death.

Firſt, To godly men; Secondly, to moral men, who live without any great wickedneſs, yet ſtill in a ſtate of nature; Thirdly, to wicked men, who have an awakened conſcience as well as a conſcience extreamly guilty.

Death is ſometimes a King of terrours, very terrible to the godly; though they have reaſon to look on death (in a ſence) as the King of Comforts, becauſe when they die they enter upon the enjoyment of their higheſt comforts, yet, I ſay, death ſtrikes them with ſome terrour; eſpecially in two caſes.

Firſt, Death is terrible to a godly man, when his ſpiritual eſtate is unſetled; indeed when he ſees all cleer between God and him, then well-come death, there's no terrour in it; the paleneſs of death pleaſeth him better then the pureſt beauty that ever he ſaw in the world: but when the ſoul cannot ſee an intereſt in Chriſt, when the conſcience is ravell'd, and the actings of faith ſtopt, then the heart is full of fear. He that is in a good eſtate, is not alwayes in ſight of it; This darkneſs breeds doubtings. That which is not ſeen, gives us no more comfort, then that which is not at all.

De non exiſtentibus & non apparentibus eadem eſt ratio.

Secondly, Death may be terrible, as a King of terrours to a godly man, not only when his ſpiritual eſtate is unſetled, but alſo when his worldly eſtate is well ſetled, when he hath deeply engaged in the creature, and his earthly mountain (as he apprehends) ſtands ſtrong. Some godly men have much in the world, and that may quickly have too much of them. Now, if once we over-reckon the creature, though but a little, and cleave, though but weakly, to the world as our friend, we ſhall reckon that as our enemy, which (as death cannot but do) ſeparates us quite from the world. We may obſerve ſome who judge that their ſpiritual eſtate is very well bottom'd (they have no fears about it) and yet the fear of death takes hold upon them, becauſe their outward eſtate is ſo well bottom'd; they are not much taken with the pleaſures of heaven, becauſe they live pleaſantly on the earth; it is their ſorrow to leave the world while they find ſo much joy in it; and they are hungry after life, becauſe full of the things of this life. The Apoſtle ſpeaks of ſome (Phil. 3. 19.) Whoſe end is deſtruction, and whoſe glory is in their ſhame; But I may ſay of godly men, they ought to be aſhamed of this ſorrow, ſeeing their end is ſalvation. How diſhonourable is it, that they ſhould reach ſo greedily after a life which they cannot hold, whoſe faith hath laid hold upon eternal life?

Secondly, To meer moral men, death is properly a King of terrour; they who cannot ſee any good in death, cannot but ſee it an evil to die. Now it is impoſſible that they ſhould ſee any good (except the ſtop of preſent evils) in their own death, who are not ſpiritually acquainted with, and in ſome degree experimentally intereſſed in the death of Chriſt.

Thirdly, Death is moſt terrible to thoſe who though they have the knowledge of God, and outwardly profeſs the Goſpel of Chriſt, yet walk contrary to it. Death is not half ſo terrible to a moral heathen, as to a wicked Chriſtian; their conſciences are convinced, they underſtand what death is, and what follows death. Heathens live ſo much in the dark, that they ſee little of that, which is the terrour of death. But enlightned Chriſtians (though continuing in the darkneſs of ſin) have heard and know that there is a Revelation of wrath from heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs. And that after death they muſt appear before the righteous God in Judgment. They have learned, that death cuts down unbelievers as fewel for the fire; that being carried out of the world, they are caſt to hell. And that as preſent death is the wages of ſin, ſo the greateſt part of that wages is paid in eternal death.

To cloſe this point, ſeeing death is the King of terrours, it ſhould be our ſtudy, as it is of our wiſdom, to make this King of terrours, a kind of King of comfort to us. Many believers have attained to this. And there are many conſiderations held out in the Goſpel, which eaſe the pains of death, and ſet the ſoul above the terrour of it. Natural men can ſay, All muſt die; why ſhould any man fear that which is common to all men? The natural man can ſay alſo, that many indure more pain while they live, then all the pains of death. Theſe poor ſhifts the natural man can make to ſtifle the terrour of death. But a believer moves upon higher principles. As Firſt, That death cannot at all break the bond of the Covenant between God and us; the Covenant is alive though we die. (Mat. 22. 31, 32.) I am the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob. They were dead, when God ſpake this. Now ſaith Chriſt there; God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all are alive to him, even the dead are alive to him; as their ſouls are alive, ſo their bodies are as living bodies to him, and though rotting in their graves, he owns them as much as when flouriſhing in ſtately pallaces. The relation of God to Abraham was as ſtrong when he was dead as when he was alive; I am the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob.

Secondly, Though death breaks the union between ſoul and body, yet death cannot break the union between the ſoul and Chriſt; this alſo out-lives death: For as when Chriſt died, death could not break that hypoſtatical union between the divine nature and the humane nature; though death diſunited the ſoul and the body of Chriſt, yet it did not diſunite God and man in Chriſt. So though death triumph over the natural union of ſoul and body, it can never break the myſtical union between Chriſt and the ſoul; the union between Chriſt God-man and a believer is inviolable, therefore why ſhould they who believe fear death.

Thirdly, The Apoſtle tells us plainly, that there is no terrour in death, while he aſſures us that the ſting of death is out; and if death have no ſting, it hath much honey for believers. Jeſus Chriſt our true Sampſon hath ſlain this Lyon, and brought us a honey-comb out of the carkaſs. Chriſt hath been the death of death for us, and why ſhould that have terrour in it, which hath no life in it? We ſay the living Lyon is not ſo terrible as he is painted; what terrour then is there in a dead or in a painted Lyon?

Fourthly, The Scripture often calls death a ſleep, a reſt; And what terrour is there in reſt and ſleep? what trouble in going to bed? And this ſleep muſt needs be ſweet, becauſe it is ſleep after labour, yea after ſore labour, as Solomon ſpeaks of the reſt of a labouring man.

Fifthly, As it puts a period to our worldly comforts, ſo to all our ſorrows, and we have no reaſon to be ſorry for that; It puts an end to our few dayes, and to our many troubles, and we have no reaſon to be troubled at that. And as it is an end of that ſorrow and trouble which ſin began, ſo it is a beginning of that happineſs and joy which Grace begins, and ſhall never end; it is the privation of our looſable habits, but it occaſions the fruition of thoſe that ſhall never be loſt. It is the opening of the door to eternity, and therefore,

Sixthly, It is call'd a going to God, in whom we ſhall have an eternal injoyment. Death is often in the Old Teſtament called a going to our Fathers, or, a gathering to our Fathers; but know that as death is a going and a gathering to our earthly Fathers, ſo it is a going to our God, and a gathering to our Father in heaven.

Seventhly, This may abate the terrour of death; It is a dying to live, as well as it is a dying from life: we die from a life, and we die to a life, and the life to which is better then that from which we die. The Grave is our long home, but it is not our laſt home; we ſhall riſe again and live for ever. As Chriſt argues (*Joh.*12.24.) concerning his death; Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it remains alone, but if it die it brings forth fruit. A man dies as a Corn dies, which dies ſo as to ſpring out into a blade, and then to bring forth the ear, and at laſt full corn in the ear. Indeed if a man were to die, and there rot and never riſe more, this were terrible; but to die only to live, and to die from a miſerable life that he may live a joyful life, to die as a grain of wheat dies, to grow up in greater beauty then he had, yea in a glory that he never had, why ſhould there be any terrour in this? Though in it ſelf conſidered, as alſo to wicked men, death be a King of terrours, yet all theſe conſiderations laid together, are enough and enough to perſwade the Saints to better thoughts of it, and that Chriſt the Prince of life and King of Comforts, hath deſpoſed this King of terrours; ſo that as ſin ſhall not, ſo death ſhall not have dominion over us: and though our fleſh cannot reſt in this hope, (in which Chriſt reſted) that God will not ſuffer us to ſee corruption, yet we may fully reſt in this hope, that our fleſh ſhould be freed from corruption.

Some heathen tyrants were wont to ſcorn Chriſtians, who believed a Reſurrection, when they fled to avoid death and perſecution; Why are you (ſaid they) ſo ſparing of a life, which (you ſay) will return again. And indeed why ſhould we be ſparing of our lives, when we know we ſhall receive them again with advantage? why ſhould we be afraid to let that go which we cannot looſe?

For as we ſhould not be over-careful to retain that which we cannot keep, nor ſpend many thoughts upon that which is gone with a thought; ſo we ſhould not be over-careful to keep that, which when we have parted with out of our own hands, we know how to commend to a ſafe hand, even to him who will as ſurely return it ſafe into our hands, as he at firſt put it into our hands.

Thus Bildad brings Job to execution, and leaves him in the hand of the King of terrours, Death, yet (as he conceives) miſery is not come upon him to the utmoſt. There is (as I may ſay) a divine Fate attending the wicked man after death, his troubles die not when himſelf dies; evil ſhall ſurvive him, and dwell in his family, when he is turned out of his dwelling; Though this evil man ſhall know his place no more, yet miſery ſhall know his place, and abide there too, as it follows, It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, becauſe it is none of his, &c.

Verſ. 15. It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, &c.

It ſhall.] What ſhall? Who is this inhabitant, or this tenant? who lodges there? who is it? It ſhall dwell. There is neither perſon nor thing expreſt, and the conjectures are various in making out an Anſwer to this Queſtion, Who dwells there?

Firſt, The Text is read, not as if others ſhould dwell in his Tabernacle, but as if ſome of his ſhould dwell in the Tabernacle of others. So the Chaldee Paraphraſt, who finding the Hebrew for dwelling, to be of the Feminine Gender, tells us, that 'tis the wife of that wicked man who was driven out of his dwelling, and at laſt taken hold of by the King of terrours; and ſo whereas we ſay, It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, becauſe it is none of his; He ſaith, His wife ſhall dwell in a Tabernacle which is none of his. And in compliance with this rendring, he expounds the words as an argument of that miſery which ſhould fall upon the family of this wicked man; A miſery ſo great, that his wife ſhould not have a houſe of her own to dwell in, but be forced to dwell in a Tabernacle which was not his: that is, to be either as a ſervant, or at beſt but as a ſojourner in another mans houſe. It is an affliction for any man, when he dies, to leave a wife, and not to leave her a room of his own to live in.

Uxor ejus habitabit in tabernaculo non ſuo. Chald.

Secondly, The vulgar reading carries a good ſence, but departs too much from the original. Thus; His companions ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle. Some expoſitors who favour that tranſlation, take no ſmall pains to fit this to the Text, and to find out who are meant by theſe companions.

Habitent in tabernaculo ejus ſocii ejus. Vulg.

Some ſay, his friends, who were formerly his companions, they ſhall come to his Tabernacle, lamenting their loſs, and mourning for him. But that's an honour rather then a judgment to the dead.

Others ſay, Theſe companions are the worms, Worms ſhall dwell with him in the grave. But that cannot be a ſpecial matter of judgment neither, becauſe it is common to all mankind; when any man dies, worms are his companions; or he may ſay (as Job ſaid, *Chap.*17.14.) To the worm, thou art my mother and my ſiſter.

Therefore, thirdly, It is concluded, that by his companions are meant ſuch as ſometimes dwelt about him, or near him: Thoſe neighbours, whom he living had oppreſſed, and wronged, vexed, and expulſed out of their dwellings, even they ſhall come when he is dead, and take poſſeſſion of his dwelling, they ſhall enter upon all. Maſter Calvins tranſlation comes near this explication; He that is none of his ſhall dwell in his tent; He joyns thoſe words which we ſet laſt (and render, Becauſe it is none of his) to the firſt part of the verſe, and gives them not as a reaſon why evil ſhould dwell in his houſe, but as a deſcription of that perſon, who ſhould dwell in his houſe; He that is none of his ſhall dwell in his tents; that is, the man that had nothing to do with him, or was a meer ſtranger to him, ſhall come and dwell in his tent. As if he had ſaid; Neither his wife, nor his children, nor any of his kindred ſhall poſſeſs what he hath purchaſed, ſtrangers ſhall take it, and divide it among themſelves; he that is none of his ſhall dwell in his tent. And that's the judgment threatned, (*Deut.*28. 30, 31.) Thou ſhalt build houſes, and ſhalt not dwell therein; thou ſhalt plant vineyards, and not gather the grapes thereof; thine ox ſhall be ſlain before thine eyes, and thou ſhalt not eat thereof. It is a great evil when he that is none of ours, that is, a meer ſtranger dwells in our tents, and eats up thoſe good things, which we provide for our ſelves and families. Thus the Lord tells the Inhabitant of Mareſhah, that he will bring them an heir, (Micah 1.15.) and who was this? not one of their blood and linage, but a ſtranger, the Aſſyrian ſhould be their heir, and make himſelf Lord, by the ſword, of all their poſſeſſions.

Secondly, We may carry the interpretation more generally. For ſeeing that the puniſhment of a wicked man after death is here deſcribed, the meaning appears thus; It ſhall dwell, &c. That is, deſtruction or miſery ſhall dwell in his houſe. We read before, Deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide; now, It ſhall dwell in his houſe. As if he had ſaid; the deſtruction and miſery I ſpeak of, ſhall not only be perſonal, and fall upon the wicked man himſelf; but it ſhall be, as it were, hereditary, it ſhall deſcend and fall upon the head of all thoſe that belong to him: miſery ſhall inhabit his fair Pallaces.

Habitabit in tentorio ejus cunctarum rerum interitus. Theod.

Another keeping this way of interpretation, fixeth it thus; Fear, or the King of terrours, ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle. But whether we ſay, deſtruction, or fear, ſhall dwell there, it matters little; for the difference is not conſiderable between theſe inhabitants, the one being the iſſue or conſequent of the other.

Habitabit in tentorio ejus timor. Vatab.

A third ſaith; Want ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle; nothing, or have nothing ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle; which is made out by reading the words, Mibili lo, for a nominative caſe: Mibili lo ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, that is, Want, or, nothing to him; he ſhall have nothing remaining in his Tabernacle; when his perſon is gone, his eſtate ſhall be gone too; nothing ſhall dwell there; his houſe ſhall be full of want, repleniſhed with emptineſs; ſcarcity ſhall be the furniture of this mans habitation; his houſe ſhall be (according to that deſcription of the earth, before the Lord put that rude heap into this exquiſite method) without form and void; emptineſs and confuſion ſhall lodge in his houſe for ever.

Nobis videtur τὸ מבלי לו pro nominativo eſſe Græce ſic aptius reddi poteſt, οἰκήσει ἐν τῇ σκηνῇ αὐτοῦ τὸ μέλλειν αὐτῷ, ſc. ὑπάρχειν vel ut Theodotio reddit, ἀνυπαρξία, inopia. Coc. Habitat in tentorio ejus nihil habere.

Laſtly, It ſhall dwell; That is (as ſome conceive) ſome wild beaſt, or noiſom creatures ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle; When one beaſt is out, many other beaſts ſhall come in; It ſhall be dwelt in by Satyrs and Serpents, &c. And this is very conſonant to other Scriptures. For we find it threatned as a judgment upon wicked places, that the wicked being thruſt out, wild beaſts ſhould ſucceed them, and hateful birds make their neſts, where men of ſuch hateful conditions neſted. (Iſa. 13. 19, 20, 21, 22.) Babylon ſhall never be inhabited, neither ſhall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither ſhall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither ſhall the Shepherds make their fold there. But wild beaſts of the deſert ſhall lie there, and their houſes ſhall be full of doleful creatures, and Owls ſhall dwell there, and Satyrs ſhall dance dance there. And the wild beaſts of the Iſlands ſhall cry in their deſolate houſes,& Dragons in their pleaſant pallaces, and her time is near to come, and her dayes ſhall not be prolonged.

Again, *Iſa.34.11.&c. The Cormorant, and the Bittern ſhall poſſeſs it, the Owl alſo and the Raven ſhall dwell in it, and he ſhall ſtretch out upon it the line of confuſion, and the ſtones of emptineſs. And thorns ſhall come up in her Palaces, nettles and brambles in the forteſſes thereof, and it ſhall be an habitation for Dragons, and a Court for Owls. The wild beaſts of the deſert ſhall alſo meet with the wild beaſts of the Iſland, and the Satyr ſhall cry to his fellow, the Shrichowl alſo ſhall reſt there, and find for her ſelf a place of reſt. There ſhall the great Owl make her neſt, and lay and hatch, and gather under her ſhadow: there ſhall the Vultures alſo be gathered, every one with her mate.* See how large the Spirit of God is in deſcribing theſe uncouth Inhabitants. When wicked men are gone, then wild beaſts, Owls & Satyrs, whatſoever can be afflictive, or unwelcome to the ſpirit of man, is ſent in to take up its lodgings and gueſt it in the houſes of that ſinful generation.

I find a learned Commentator, who collects this from the latter part of this clauſe, from Mibili lo, which we render, Becauſe it is none of his: he finds theſe wild beaſts in that expreſſion, and therefore he doth not take the word Mibili, for an adverb negative, as we do, but for a none, ſignifying corruption, or putrifaction, from the Hebrew word Balah to decay or wax old. So the word is uſed (Iſa. 38.17.) from the pit of (Beli,) deſtruction, or corruption. Thus ſome render in the ſixth Chapter of this Book, *verſ.*6. Can that which is unſavoury be eaten without ſalt? Can that which is unſavoury, Mibili, through the corruption of ſalt, or which having been ſalted is now corrupted, (can that) be eaten? as was ſhewed upon the place. Now taking that tranſlation, here is a plain deſcription of noiſom creatures, or vermine, dwelling in the wicked mans houſe. As if to the queſtion, Who ſhall dwell there? This anſwer were returned; There ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, whatſoever is engendred of corruption, or filthineſs, whatſoever derives its pedegree from, or is the off-ſpring of any naſtineſs or uncleanneſs, adhering to and remaining in his Tabernacle, this is the Tribe that ſhall dwell there. As if he ſaid; When he is gone out of his houſe, the ſtink, corruption, and filth that he left behind him, ſhall breed filthy creatures, naſty monſters enow to inhabite his Tabernacle; we know many noiſom creatures proceed from putrifaction, ſuch as are mice, rats, and ſpiders, as Naturaliſts obſerve, and experience teacheth.

Non ſumo cum vocem בלי Beli, pro negatione, ſeu particula non, aut abſq; ut fere omnes ſumunt, ſed pro nomine, quod corruptionē macrorem, &c. ſignificat, à verbo בלה quod eſt veteraſcere, putreſieris. Bold.

Thus we ſee what variety of conjecture there is about the antecedent of this word, who are the tenants of this wicked mans houſe when he is ejected, If we follow our tranſlation, that leads us to the third interpretation before given; It, that is, deſtruction, or want ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle.

> Obſerve Hence, The wrath of God dwells in the houſe, and upon the eſtate of a wicked man, when he is caſt out of it, dead and gone.

That's the ſcope of the verſe; and theſe various interpretations meet in this one ſence, that there is a wrath abiding in this wicked mans houſe. Whether his companions, ſuch as were none of his, ſtrangers dwell in it; or fear and deſtruction dwell in it, or wild beaſts dwell in it, or vermine dwell in it, whoſoever of theſe are the tenants, and poſſeſſors of his houſe after him; this is the meaning, that the wrath of God dwells there. As Chriſt ſpeaks of unbelievers; He that believeth not is condemned already, and the wrath of God abides upon him, Joh. 3. It dwells with or inhabits him; it is an abiding wrath. So, here; It ſhall dwell. He doth not ſay, ſome evil ſhall fall upon his habitation, ſome evil ſhall happen to him: but he uſeth a word that notes the perpetuity of it, It ſhall dwell. It ſhall not come, and lodge for a night, or ſojourn for a week, or a moneth; but there it ſhall dwell, it ſhall be an inhabitant; wrath ſhall continue upon it.

As bleſſings abide upon the Tabernacles and dwellings of the people of God; they do not only happen in ſometimes, but they take up their abode in them. The houſes of the Saints are the dwelling places, or the abiding places of mercy. Mercy hath no where elſe to reſt, but in ſuch houſes and hearts. So deſtruction, and wrath, wild beaſts, and whatſoever diſcovers it ſelf in a way of judgment, is the portion of evil men while they live, and ſhall take poſſeſſion of their houſes when they die. When their bodies are paſt feeling, their eſtates, poſſeſſions and families ſhall feel the wrath of God. It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle,

Becauſe it is none of his.

There are divers tranſlations of this clauſe. I ſhall touch only upon three.

Firſt, Some render it, who is not; Thus the vulgar; His companions ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, who is not. And ſo the words are a deſcription of man, vile and baſe. For as either things which are low in the eſteem of men, are ſaid not to be, (1 Cor. 1.28.) God uſeth things which are not, to bring to nought thoſe things which are. Now, I ſay, as baſe things are ſaid not to be, ſo are baſe men: and then the Tabernacle of him who is not, is the Tabernacle of a vile perſon. Or it is a deſcription of one who is dead. Death is often noted in Scripture by a not being, Jer. 31. *Rachel weeping for her children, becauſe they are not, would not be comforted, Revel.*17.8. The beaſt which was, and is not; That is, who is dead and gone, his power is broken. So, *Ezek.*28.19. Thou ſhalt be a terrour, and never ſhalt thou be any more; That is, thou ſhalt die.

Propter non ei. Reg. Ex non ei. Cajet. Non exiſtente in eo. Pagn. Qui non eſt. Vulg.

Secondly, Thus; It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, becauſe it ſhall no more be to him; That is, his Tabernacle ſhall no more be for his uſe or habitation, therefore deſtruction or wild beaſts may dwell in it, or take it up.

Nō ei amplius deſerviet ſuum tabernaculum. Pined.

A third renders as we; or we from him; becauſe it is none of his. The negative particle, is alſo cauſal. And then the ſence is this; It ſhall dwell in his Tabernacle, becauſe it is none of his; That is, he never got it honeſtly. So our late Annotators give the ſence; He did not come truly by it. This expoſition is clear, as giving an account why judgment dwells in a wicked mans houſe when he dies, even becauſe it is none of his. It was unduly gotten, and unjuſtly kept. So, here is a correction, he calls it his Tabernacle, in the former part of the verſe; but now he ſaith, it is none of his. For this Tabernacle was ſet up by oppreſſion, bribery, and injuſtice, and ſo maintained. He built his houſe by unrighteouſneſs, and now he is gone, nothing ſhall dwell in it but miſery and judgment. When the earthly houſe of his perſonal Tabernacle ſhall be diſſolved, the Tabernacle wherein his perſon houſed, ſhall be left utterly deſtitute.

> Hence Obſerve, Firſt, That which a man gets unjuſtly, is none of his, he hath no right to it.

Man hath no right to poſſeſs that which he hath obtained unrighteouſly. The Apoſtle ſpeaking to the Church of the Theſſalonians, (2 Theſ. 3.12.) directs all in their callings to be diligent, and laborious; and why? if a man be idle, and negligent, and will not take pains in his calling, all the bread he eats he ſteals, it is none of his: therefore he adds; We command, and exhort you, by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that with quietneſs he work, and eat his own bread: they who do not work, eat the bread of other men, that is, the bread to which they have no title. As our ſweat and labour are the beſt ſauce to our meat, ſo the price which we muſt lay down for it, elſe, it is none of ours. Indeed a man may be unable to work, much more to ſweat for his bread, and yet the bread which he eats may be his own. Such a one hath a right to every mans bread, and every man is bound in that caſe to relieve him. 'Tis Idleneſs, not inability, which is the thief. But he that hath ability to labour in his calling, and is idle, all the bread which he eats is ſtollen, 'tis none of his own. Hence we may infer, if a man meerly upon his idleneſs may be ſaid to ſteal all the bread he eats, as having no right to it, much more that bread is not his own, that is wrung out of the hands, and pulled out of the teeth of others. That which is gotten by grinding the faces of the poor, or by doing wrong to the rich, this bread is not our own; Houſes and Lands ſo gotten, are not our own. That which is juſtly gotten is a gift from God, but that which is gotten unjuſtly, is ſtoln from men. Deceiving is thieving.

> Secondly, Obſerve, That which is unjuſtly gotten, ſhall not be kept.

All worldly things periſh with the uſing, but ſuch worldly things uſually periſh before we or ours can uſe them. Hence we have that dreadful ſentence, (*Jer.*22.3.)

Wo to him that buildeth his houſe by unrighteouſneſs, and his chambers by robbery, that uſeth his neighbours ſervice without wages, and giveth him not for his work; that ſaith, I will build me a wide houſe, and large chambers, &c. This wo doth not only belong to thoſe who build houſes by that which they get unrighteouſly, but it belongs to all who have any thing in their houſes which is gotten unrighteouſly. Houſe is not taken ſtrictly for the dwelling place, (though that be a truth) but any thing that a man poſſeſſeth, or enjoyeth, or is part of his inheritance, is his houſe. Wo to him that builds a houſe by unrighteouſneſs. Why? what wo ſhall be upon him? This ſhall be his wo, himſelf ſhall not long inhabit the houſe which he hath built, and the wrath of God ſhall inhabit it long when he is out of it; deſtruction ſhall dwell there, becauſe it is none of his.

Bildad goes further to ſhew the miſery of this man. Not only ſhall deſtruction and miſery dwell there, becauſe the houſe is none of his; but Brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation.

As if he had ſaid, either the eſtate of a wicked man ſhall be conveyed over to, and poſſeſſed by ſtrangers; or if not, yet it ſhall periſh, it ſhall be conſumed as with fire, and brimſtone, from heaven; Brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation. Theſe laſt words of the Allegory, ſhew the extremity, the utmoſt of the judgment; Brimſtone is a dreadful word, it hath a ſavour of hell in it, the ſavour of eternal death in it; Brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered. And it is conceived, that Bildad in this, either intimates the manner of that judgment which God ſent upon Job in the firſt Chapter, when the fire of God fell from heaven, and conſumed his ſheep. Fire from heaven is a ſulphurious fire; Here Bildad ſeems to ſay, Thou art the man; on thy habitation brimſtone was ſcattered, thy flocks of ſheep were burnt with fire from heaven.

Non dubiū quin in Jobum contorqueat cujus facultatum pars igni cælitus delapſo conſumpta fuit. Merc.

Or, That, he in this minds Job of the terrible judgment of God upon Sodom, and Gomorrah, of which we read (Gen. 19. 24.) whom God conſumed from heaven by raining down brimſtone upon them; Brimſtone was ſcattered upon their habitation. So the meaning is; The dwelling of this wicked man, ſhall either paſs away to others, or miſery ſhall dwell in it, or it ſhall be utterly conſumed by fire; Brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation.

It is very frequent in Scripture, when any great judgment is ſpoken of, to allude to the dealing of God with Sodom, and Gomorrah, in ſcattering fire and brimſtone. Deut. 29. 23. The whole land thereof is brimſtone, and ſalt, and burning, that is not ſowen, nor beareth, nor any graſs groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath, Pſal. 11. 6. He ſhall rain down upon the wicked, fire and brimſtone, this ſhall be the portion of his cup, Ezek. 38. 22. Iſa. 34. 9. Iſa. 13. 9. Jer. 49. 18. In all theſe you ſhall find an alluſion ſtill made to the conſumption of Sodom and Gomorrah. When God threatneth to bring a total conſumption upon a people, and to deſtroy them utterly from the face of the earth; then (ſaith he) I will do to you as I did to Sodom, and Gomorrah; that is, according to the Text, ſcatter brimſtone upon your habitations.

Secondly, The ſcattering of brimſtone is conceived by others, to note that ſpecial judgment, Barrenneſs: his beautiful habitation, (ſo the word ſignifies) or (as we may extend it) all his poſſeſſions, his fruitful fields and paſtures, his goodly hills, mountains, all theſe beautiful things, ſhall be as if brimſtone had been ſcattered upon them; that is, they ſhall be barren, God ſhall ſtrike them with barrenneſs, and they ſhall bring forth no fruit at all. (Deut. 29. 23.) Brimſtone and barrenneſs go together; The whole land thereof is brimſtone, and ſalt, and burning, it is not ſowen, nor any graſs groweth therein; ſo the ſcattering of brimſtone is of the ſame ſignification as ſowing with ſalt, Judg. 9. 45. For no ſooner had he ſpoken of brimſtone and ſalt, but preſently adds, it is not ſowen, nor graſs groweth therein: as if he had ſaid, it ſhall be deſolate and uninhabited. The Land of Sodom, and Gomorrah (Gen. 14.) was like Eden, the Garden of God; but as ſoon as God had ſcattered brimſtone upon it, it was like a deſolate wilderneſs, or fruitleſs deſert. The apples of Sodom are a proverb, to this day, for fruitleſs fruit, or a ſhew only of fruit. No fruit (ſay ſome) grows there to ripeneſs, or perfection. Or if brimſtone ſpeak not barrenneſs in general, yet (as others reſtrain it,) barrenneſs as to him and his, who was thus caſt out of his poſſeſſion. The land of a wicked man may bear fruit, and yet be as fruitleſs to him, and his, as if it were ſowed with brimſtone inſtead of corn; he ſhall never have the crop, or harveſt, or revenue of it, he ſhall never eat of the fruit of it, though others do, and though poſſibly it continue as fertile, and be improved as much as ever. A land flouriſhing with milk and honey to others, may be to former owners as a land whoſe ſtreams are turned into pitch, and the duſt thereof into brimſtone, as the Prophet ſpeaks (Iſa. 34. 9.)

Sulphur eſt ſymbolū ſterilitatis.

Salſugo, quia ſal exugit omnem terræ ſuccū.

Thirdly, Others conjecture, that this ſcattering of brimſtone implies only that his houſe ſhould never be inhabited any more, becauſe brimſtone is of ſuch an ill ſavour, that it drives away both man and beaſt.

Fourthly, That it is a deſcription of that mourning, or of thoſe terrible cries and lamentations which ſhould be made for him at his funerals. Some of the ancients obſerve, that it was a cuſtome in times of extream mourning, to ſcatter brimſtone, and things of ill-ſavour, to afflict the ſmell, as it is to wear black Garments to afflict the ſight. Or the reaſon of ſcattering brimſtone at his burial, may rather be given as an argument of his diſhonour, he being a man whoſe very memory did ſtink. And therefore whereas ſweet ſpice, and odours are properly burnt at the funerals of ſuch whoſe names and memorials are as a box of ſweet ointment powred out, this man's Tabernacle (after he is dead,) ſhall be perfumed with brimſtone; while he breathed in it, though his manners left an ill ſavour there, yet he took care to keep it ſweet; but when he hath breathed his laſt, then (according to that which is ſpoken, Iſa. 3. 24. of the proud women of Iſrael) It ſhall come to paſs, that inſtead of a ſweet ſmell, there ſhall be a ſtink. As he lived wickedly, and died miſerably, ſo he ſhall be buried ignominiouſly.

Eſt circumlocutio luctus domeſticorum in obitu patris familias odores tetros & fœtidos adhibentium in ſignū mœroris, ſicut etiam nigræ veſtes ſumuntur à lugentibus. Aquin.

Ad extremā funeris ignominiam pertinet. cum enim in funere divitis aroumata cremarētur, hic ſuccedit teterimus ſulphuris fœtor. Cajet.

But I rather take the former interpretation, that this ſcattering of brimſtone, either notes the extremity of the judgment in general: Or in particular, that barrenneſs ſhall be the portion of his poſterity, when once the wrath of God hath ſiezed on and ſwept him away. And ſo it gives a ſutable cloſe to this third Allegory of the wicked man, proſecuted in a legal way, to whoſe doom or ſentence this is added, that his houſe ſhall be pull'd down, or conſumed with fire, that nothing may remain his of him, but a perpetual execration of name and wayes.

Poſtquā cauſa cognita ab illa adjudicata ſunt bona immittuntur lictores ad incendendas ædes ejus in facti perpetuā memoriā. Jun.

Hence Obſerve, God hath judgments of all ſorts and ſizes for wicked men.

He hath Sodoms-judgments, ſuch judgments as were poured upon Sodom, for high offenders, for Sodom-like ſinners; He hath not ſpent all his fire and brimſtone upon that City; brimſtone ſhall yet be ſcattered upon the habitation of the wicked. And this notes,

Firſt, The ſuddenneſs of the judgment. The Sodomites were ſurprized, when deſtroyed; they expected it not; The Sun roſe upon Sodom, ſaith the Text, there was not a cloud threatning rain, they did not ſuſpect a ſhower of water, much leſs did they ſee a cloud or ſuſpect a ſhower of fire and brimſtone, when God deſtroyed them.

Secondly, It notes the unavoidableneſs of it; for who is able to withſtand burning brimſtone, or to withdraw from that calamity, which drops from heaven? Our houſes may ſhelter us when it rains water, but when it rains fire, our houſes are no ſhelter.

Thirdly, It ſhews the immediatneſs of the judgment; The text ſaith only, that brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered, but by whom, it ſaith not; if no hand of man appear againſt the wicked, God will; when none can deal with them, God can. God only appeared in the deſtruction of Sodom, and Gomorrah. All creatures are as ready at Gods call for the ſervices of wrath and vengeance, as of mercy and ſalvation. If he do but hold up his finger, fire and brimſtone are at hand to conſume, as ſhowers of rain to comfort the habitations of the world. Thus much of the third Allegory contained in theſe five verſes. The wicked man was firſt apprehended by the meſſengers of death, and then brought to death that King of terrours; being dead, his goods are confiſcate, others enter upon his eſtate, and brimſtone is ſcattered on his habitation. Here's compleat wrath, and judgment in perfection.

Verſ. 16. His roots ſhall be dried up beneath, and above ſhall his branches be cut off.

This is the fourth Allegory, taken from a tree. Men are often in Scripture compared to trees; all ſorts of men, good men, bad men are ſo compared. Good men are compared to trees flouriſhing by the river ſide, (*Pſal.*1.) Wicked men are alſo compared to flouriſhing trees, but with this difference, they flouriſh only for a while; but godly men are as trees that flouriſh continually, (*Pſal.*92.14.) They ſhall ſtill bring forth fruit in old age.

In this text the wicked man is compared to a tree; and he is compared to a flouriſhing tree, he hath both root, and branches, yet he is near declining, yea he is not far from deſtroying.

His root ſhall be dried up beneath.] He had a root; what was his root? The root of this wicked man, may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, For thoſe ſecret counſels, purpoſes, and deſigns which he layes for himſelf, theſe are to a man as his roots. A mans eſtate and affairs are ſetled and faſtned by counſel, as a tree is by the roots: the root alſo which maintains and feeds his affairs and deſigns is counſel. So ſome interpret this place, his root ſhall be dried up; That is, his counſels, his under-ground-plots and projects which he laid deep, and low, quite out of ſight, as the root of a tree is, theſe God will dry up, he ſhall ſee them come to nothing.

Secondly, By the roots in this Allegory we may underſtand more generally any thing by which this wicked man thought himſelf ſtrong, or ſecure: For that is the uſe of a root. A root to a tree is as the foundation is to a houſe, the ſtrength of it. His root is whatſoever may ſtrengthen, and hold him faſt, whatſoever may keep him in his ſtate, and greatneſs. Thus not only his contrivances, and counſels, but his riches, and relations, his correſpondencies, and allies, whatſoever we may put the notion of ſtrength upon, all that is his root, by that he is upheld, and by that moiſture is ſent forth into all his branches. But there ſhall come rooters to his root, they ſhall grub, and ſtock him up, they ſhall take that from him in which his ſtrength lay, and from which his enlivening moiſture came.

And above his branches ſhall be cut off.] The word that we tranſlate branch, ſignifies, a crop or a harveſt; the fruit of a tree is the crop of it. You ſee compleat miſery in this Allegory; root and branch, is all that a tree hath; and to be cut off root and branch, is to be utterly cut off. If the root be dried up, though the branches be not cut off, yet the tree withers and dies. Or if the root be not dried up, yet if all the branches be cut off, there's no beauty in it, nor can it bring forth any fruit; A trees bears not at the ſtock, but at the branches; 'tis but a ſtump if the branches be cut off.

But take it, as here, in both, and then the judgment is univerſal; what hath a tree left, when it hath loſt, both root and branches. (Mal. 4. 1.) Behold the day cometh that ſhall burn as an Oven, and all the proud, and all that do wickedly ſhall be ſtubble, the day comes that ſhall burn them up, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, it ſhall leave them neither root nor branch; That is, it ſhall totally conſume them. As it ſpeaks perfect mercy when both root and branch proſper (2 King. 19. 30.) And that remnant that ſhall eſcape of the houſe of Judah ſhall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward; So it ſhews the compleatneſs of a judgment, when there ſhall be neither root nor branch. The branches of man, are whatſoever man put's forth, to ſhew his excellency or vertues, his pomp or ſplendour by. Some interpret branches for children. So they are called, Pſal. 127. Thy children ſhall be as Olive branches, &c. And then his branches ſhall be cut off, is, his children and poſterity ſhall be cut off. This alſo argues the greatneſs of the judgment.

Others by branches, underſtand his deſires acted, or the work he had begun, and put forth: The motions and puttings forth of a man's ſpirit in actions, are like the branches of a tree: The thoughts of man in the Hebrew are expreſſed by a word which ſignifies the boughs of a tree: the fruits which our thoughts ſhoot, bloſſom, and bring forth, are our actions. Thus as the wicked man's root, his plots and deſigns ſhall be ſpoiled below; ſo the branches which ſhoot out from him into action, ſhall be broken off; and God will ſay to this man, as Chriſt to the Fig-tree, (Mat. 21. 19.) Never fruit grow on thee more. The root ſhall be dried up beneath, and the branches ſhall be cut off above.

Some underſtand this more literally, his root, and his branches, that is, his trees ſhall bear no fruit, or he ſhall be deprived of their fruit; the eſtate which he hath abroad in the field, his lands, and woods, his Gardens and plantations ſhall be deſtroyed: according to that (*Deut.*28.16.) Curſed ſhalt thou be in the field; that is, thy cattel ſhall miſcarry, thy corn and fruits ſhall wither; or as we may apply that of the Prophet Iſaiah (which is ſpoken (I conceive) of the general conſumption which ſhould come upon that people and their poſterity) to this particular Judgment of ſpoiling all the hopes of fruit in the field. (*Chap.*5.24.) Therefore as the fire devoureth the ſtubble, and the flame conſumeth the chaff, ſo their root ſhall be rottenneſs, and their bloſſom ſhall go up as duſt. The root is fruit (in potentia remota) at a diſtance, the bloſſom is fruit (in potentia proxima) at next door, or the immediate antecedent of fruit; the Prophet to ſhew that there was no hope of fruit remaining, ſhews that both their remote and their neareſt hope of fruit ſhould be removed.

Nihil non peribet è rebus impii, peribit quod latet (radix) & quod eminet, ramus.

Hence Note, Wicked men may be fully furniſhed with means for the attaining of their ends.

Here are roots, and branches, deep counſels, high actings, many ſtrengths, which are to the wicked man as the foundation is to the houſe, and as root and branches to the tree. The Prophet (Pſal. 37. 35.) ſpeaks under this ſimilitude; I beheld the wicked like a green Bay-tree, O how he flouriſhed! yea you may behold him ſometimes, as an Oak of Baſhan, as a Cedar of Lebanon; He caſts forth his roots (in worldly and civil things, as a godly man doth in ſpirituals,) as Lebanon (Hoſea 14. 5.) that is, mighty roots: and his branches ſhall ſpread, and his beauty ſhall be as the Olive tree, and his ſmell as Lebanon. It is no unuſual thing to ſee the worſt of men thus rooted, thus branched, yea and (for a while) fruited too.

Secondly, Obſerve, When wicked men are in their greateſt ſtrength and beauty, when they have both root and branches, then judgment comes upon them.

The ſtrength of man cannot protect againſt the juſtice of God, ſinners ſhall feel the impreſſions of his anger; not only ſhall their goodly branches feel it, but their ſtrongeſt roots. What root can keep its earth, when God raiſeth a wind, and ſends out his ſtorm? What branch can keep either leaves or fruit, when God ſends out his blaſting mildew? (Pſal. 37. 35.) David ſpeaks of ſuch a goodly flouriſhing-tree; I have ſeen the wicked in great power, there is his root; ſpreading himſelf like a green Bay-tree, there are his branches; yet he paſſed away, and lo he was not, yea I ſought him, yet I could not find him. And the very interpretation which the Pſalmiſt makes (in another place) of all the flouriſhing of wicked men, of their ſtrong roots, and goodly branches, is, that they ſhall be rooted up; When the wicked ſpring as graſs, and all the workers of iniquity flouriſh. What is the meaning of this? how may we interpret this? It is that they ſhall be deſtroyed for ever, (*Pſal.*92. 6, 7.) And that which is ſpoken of mankind in general, is moſt true of this ſort of mankind. In the morning they are like graſs that groweth up: In the morning it flouriſheth, and grows up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth, Pſal. 90.6. The ſtrongeſt of men are but as graſs, in the morning they grow; The beſt of their worldly beauty is but like graſs, for both they and it, they and their glory are cut down and wither in the Evening. At what time ſoever man is cut down, it is his Evening; but to ſhew that man ſhall not continue long, he is here meaſured by the length of an artificial day, whereof the evening is rather the limit, then a part. Now if the beauty of all men be thus ſubject to a ſudden decay, how much more they and theirs, who are the ſpecial objects of the wrath of God, becauſe of their ſpecial ſins. The Prophet Amos ſeems to imply, that the Amorites had ſome hopes to withſtand their overthrow, and preſerve themſelves from a fall: Yet I deſtroyed the Amorite before them. What was this Amorite? His height was like the height of the Cedars. There was his flouriſhing branch. And he was ſtrong as the Oaks (deeply rooted) yet I deſtroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from beneath, (Chap. 2. 9.) Though he were in height like the Cedar, though he were for ſtrength like the Oak, yet up came his root, and down came his top. The creature is no match for the Creator. There is no ſecuring our ſelves againſt God, when he comes to take vengeance; both root, and branch, beauty, and ſtrength muſt wither, and dry up before his conſuming jealouſie.

Hitherto Bildad hath covered and wrapt up his meaning in Allegories; in the allegory of light; in the allegory of hunting, and fowling; in the allegory of a judiciary proceeding; and now in the allegory of a tree. In all which, though there be much variety of uſefull meditations for us, yet they all meet in this one great concluſion, that God hath prepared, and will certainly bring forth ruine and deſtruction for the portion of wicked men.

VERS. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21.

His remembrance ſhall periſh from the earth: and he ſhall have no name in the ſtreet.

He ſhall be driven out from light into darkneſs, and chaſed out of the world.

He ſhall neither have ſon, nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.

They that come after him ſhall be aſtoniſhed at his day, as they that went before were affrighted.

Surely ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

WHat the Diſciples ſaid to Chriſt, Joh. 16. 29. the ſame may we to Bildad about this ſhutting up of his diſcourſe; Now ſpeakeſt thou plainly, and no parable. Theſe words are the plain Engliſh, or the explication of what he had delivered under the vayle of thoſe Metaphors and Allegories already opened.

In them Bildad ſhadowed the eſtate of a wicked man; and here he ſets it in the open light.

In the context of theſe five verſes, we have three things eſpecially to take notice of.

Firſt, A deſcription of the miſery of a wicked man in the 17, 18, 19. verſes.

Secondly, We have the effects which this ſhall produce, verſ. 20.

Thirdly, The concluſion or upſhot of all, in a rhetorical exclamation, verſ. 21.

The miſery of this wicked man is ſet forth three wayes.

Firſt, By his diſhonour, verſ. 17. His remembrance ſhall periſh, he ſhall have no name.

Secondly, By his death, or baniſhment, verſ. 18. He ſhall be driven out from light to darkneſs, he ſhall be chaſed out of the world.

Thirdly, By the deſolation of his family; He ſhall neither have ſon nor nephew, nor any remaining in his dwellings, verſ. 19.

The effects which follow this great miſery of the wicked man, at the 20*th* verſe, are conſiderable two wayes.

Firſt, What effect it ſhall have upon thoſe that come after.

Secondly, What upon thoſe that went before, or that lived with him; the one ſhall be aſtoniſhed, and the other affrighted.

The concluſion of all is; Such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

I ſhall briefly paſs the miſery of this wicked man in thoſe three verſes, becauſe it is only the expoſition of what we had before under allegories.

Apodoſis ſive accommodatio ſuperiorum Allegoriarum ad theſim de ſtatu improbi, ut obliquè perſtringat Jobum. Jun. Dicitur memoria alicujus perire pro eo quòd eſt in æternum ab hominum recordatione divelli. Bold.

Verſ. 17. His remembrance ſhall periſh from the earth.

This ſome take from the former verſe; His root ſhall be dried up beneath, and his branches ſhall be cut off above. When root and branch are gone, then the memory of all is gone: what can remain when both theſe are removed?

The periſhing of his remembrance, notes the utter extinction of his remembrance, as Chap. 3. 3. Job wiſheth that the day might periſh wherein he was born; his meaning is, that it might no more at all be remembred; ſo here, His remembrance ſhall periſh.

And he ſhall have no name in the ſtreet.

No name.] The Hebrew is, There ſhall not be a name to him. By name, in Scripture, is meant honour or eſtimation among men; For wicked men have a name remaining; but it is an ill name, a name of diſhonour, a blemiſh. So that when he ſaith, He ſhall have no name, the meaning is, he ſhall have no good name, or no honourable name remaining. Better have no name, then an ill name. Cain hath a name, and ſo hath Pharoah in the old Teſtament; Judas hath a name, and ſo hath Demas in the new, but they are all names of diſhonour, and ſo no names. It is uſual in Scripture to put the name for renown, and men of name by an hebraiſme are men of renown, Numb. 1. 16. we render, Theſe were men renowned: The Hebrew is, Theſe were men of name. Theſe were the renowned of the Congregation. Theſe were men of name in the Congregation. Numb. 16. 2. And they roſe up before Moſes with certain of the children of Iſrael, 250 Princes of the aſſembly famous in the Congregation, men of renown, or, men of name. The Apoſtle (Rom. 1. 1.) is conceived to advance the honour of his Apoſtleſhip, when he ſaith, Paul called to be an Apoſtle. So we tranſlate it, called to be; the Greek is, Paul called an Apoſtle: that is, Paul whoſe name is Apoſtle. Which may be taken according to this hebraiſme, as a vindication of himſelf from that diſ-repute which was caſt upon him by many among the Romans. Therefore (ſaith he) Paul named an Apoſtle, or, he that hath this honour to be an Apoſtle writes to you. Paul was not ambitious of his own honour, but zealous, leſt the Goſpel which he preached ſhould be contemned through the contemptibleneſs of him whoſe office and charge it was to preach it.

In the Text, His remembrance ſhall periſh, is therefore put before he ſhall have no name; becauſe a name is that by which we are remembred; The name of a man is his memorial. See both joyned together concerning God himſelf (Exod. 3. 15.) Thus thou ſhalt ſay to the children of Iſrael, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob, hath ſent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all Generations. That is, by this name I will have a memorial, or be remembred to all Generations. A man of no name, and a man of no number, are proverbials for a man of no eſteem.

He ſhall have no name [in the ſtreet.]

In the face of the ſtreet; ſo ſaith the Original: that is, among men he ſhall have no name: men meet in the ſtreet, in publick places, there they diſcourſe both of things, and perſons. This man ſhall have no name there; or if he be there ſpoken of, (as one of the Ancients gloſſes the place,) men ſhall turn away their heads at the mention of him; they ſhall turn away with indignation, as if an ill ſavour diſtempered the ayre every time he was ſpoken of.

Super faciem plateæ Heb: Superficies cujuſque rei, facies vocatur. Druſ.

> Hence note, It is the puniſhment of wicked men to have their names dye when they dye, much more while they live.

A good name among men, is a great bleſſing: and hence it is a great ſin to bear falſe witneſs againſt another, becauſe that takes away his good name. A falſe witneſs ſpeaks to the diſcredit of his neighbour, and ſets a brand of diſgrace upon his name. If a good name were not a precious commodity; if to be remembred among men were not a great honour, this were not ſo great a ſin. The memory, or name of the wicked ſhall rot, Prov. 10. 4. He doth not ſay, his houſe, or his body ſhall rot, though they muſt, but his memory ſhall rot; that is, either it ſhall not be remembred at all, or when ever it is, it ſhall be remembred as a rotten thing.

Good men, uſually, have an ill name among many in the world, and indeed they can ſcarce be good, of whom all ſpeak well; yea the beſt may for a time have a blot upon their name among thoſe that are good; but commonly their blot is given by thoſe that are evil. And it is ſome addition of honour to be ill ſpoken of by thoſe that are evil. For as it is a diſcommendation to be commended by ſuch, and a kind of diſreſpect to be reſpected by them, ſo it is our commendation to be diſcommended by them, and an argument of our integrity, when they condemn us. But it is a precious priviledge to have a name with thoſe whoſe names are precious, and to be eſteemed by thoſe who are juſtly had in eſtimation. Further, though the name of a good man for a while be under a cloud, yet his light breaks forth again; and though all the while he lives, his name ſuffer among many, yet when he dyes, his name revives among all. How precious was the name of Paul, to the Saints in his dayes? how precious is it among all true Saints to this day? yet while he lived, he was accounted by moſt, as the off-ſcouring of all things! Reproached Saints recover honour when they dye, whereas the names of wicked men who lived in honour, fall under reproach when they dye. A good mans name is beſt when he is dead: A wicked man may have a name while he lives. Nero is now called a Tyrant; if any had called him ſo while he lived, he could not have had ſafe living in any part of the world. But though flatterers cry up wicked men while they live, in hope to get by them, and though the ſincere dare not cry them down, fearing to be ruin'd by them; yet when they are in their graves, they have no name in the ſtreets, but a name of diſgrace.

Again, Obſerve; To want a name among men, is moſt grievous to a wicked man.

Loſs of credit and eſtimation among men, is an affliction to any man, but moſt to wicked men; when they loſe their name here, they have loſt it every where: They have no name in heaven, there they are men of no name; if they loſe their name on earth too, then they are men of no name indeed. Though a Godly man ſhould have no name on earth, yet he hath a name written where it ſhall never be blotted out; his name is written in heaven. Chriſt would have us rejoyce in this more then in all worldly names, (Luk. 10. 2, 3.) when his Diſciples rejoyced becauſe they had power over evil ſpirits, and could cure all diſeaſes, ſo that their name was up in the world, and 'twas talked of in all places, what mighty things they had done, and Chriſt denied not that it was an honour to be impower'd for the doing of thoſe great things, Yet (ſaith he) rejoyce not in this, but rather rejoyce that your names are written in heaven. Now, I ſay, as the Saints ſhould rejoyce in this honour, that their names are written in heaven, above all their rejoycings in an earthly name; and ſhould not onely out-joy worldly joyes, but even joy them out, with the joy they have in God. So, though the Saints have no name upon earth, though their name be written in the duſt, yea,though an evil favour be ſcattered upon their name, yet they have cauſe to rejoyce that their names are written in heaven, that their names are enrolled among Saints and Angels; among Patriarks, and Apoſtles; that their names are fixed where the names of the greateſt Potentates in the world (who know not God) ſhall have no place. 'Tis then a ſpecial evil to wicked men to loſe their name in this world, becauſe when they have loſt that, they have loſt all: And when they have loſt it here, they can find it no where. And we may take notice, that whereas the ambition of carnal men layes it ſelf forth in nothing more then to provide for the perpetuating of their names in the world, that yet they loſe their deſign, their names being blotted out, and their memorial loſt in the world. The natural Hiſtorian obſerves of thoſe famous Pyramides, which were ſet up in Egypt; that though the work was ſtupendious, and admirable, and is remembred by many ancient Writers; yet (ſaith he) it doth not appear among all thoſe Writers, who were the founders of thoſe Pyramides. Upon which he gives this obſervation, That by a juſt judgment, their names who raiſed thoſe amazing or rather mad ſtructures, are buried in an eternal night of forgetfulneſs, or (as this Text ſpeaks) their remembrance is periſhed from the earth. And as this befel thoſe ſons of ambition, who intended to make themſelves famous with poſterity, by erecting thoſe vain-glorious fabricks; ſo much more will it fall to their lot, who hope to make themſelves famous, by wicked works, by injuſtice, tyranny, and oppreſſion, by voluptuouſneſs, intemperance, or any other abomination. The Lord will ſend a rot upon ſuch names, and their memory ſhall periſh for ever. This is the firſt judgement threatned; He ſhall not have an honourable mention among men; He ſhall have no name in the ſtreet.

Cum ſcriptores plurimi de tribus illis molibus inſanis multa prodiderunt, inter omnes tamen illos non conſtat à quibus factæ ſunt, juſtiſſimo caſu obliteratis tantæ vanitatis Authoribus. Plin. l. 36. c. 12.

The ſecond is;

Verſ. 18. He ſhall be driven out from light to darkneſs, and chaſed out of the world.

He ſhall be driven.] The word notes a forcible violent or compulſory act, he ſhall be driven, like a beaſt againſt his will, or whether he will or no. But what ſhall drive him, or who ſhall drive him? The Hebrew is plural, and the verb which we read paſſively, is active; ſo it is rendred by a learned tranſlator, They ſhall drive him. But who are theſe Drivers? who they are is not expreſt. Some underſtand his troubles, and ſorrows, they ſhall drive him from light to darkneſs, he ſhall dye under the preſſure of his afflictions.

Expellent eum. Mont.

Others refer it to God himſelf, who is the ſupream diſpencer of judgments; He ſhall be driven by God, or God ſhall drive him from light to darkneſs, and chaſe him out of the world. But whether we apply it to God the efficient, or to thoſe afflictions which are the inſtrument of his expulſion, the ſence and tendency of the Text is the ſame.

He ſhall be driven, [from light to darkneſs.]

From a threefold light to a threefold darkneſs; firſt, from the light of honour, to the darkneſs of diſgrace; ſecondly, from the light of life, to the darkneſs of death; thirdly, from the light of temporal felicity, to the darkneſs of eternal miſery and condemnation: whither ſoever, or into what eſtate ſoever he goes, He ſhall be driven. So the wrathful dealing of God with the wicked is expreſt in Scripture. Some conceive, that the Goſpel-language alludes to this paſſage of Bildad. (Mat. 8. 12.) The children of the Kingdome ſhall be caſt out into utter darkneſs. The Jewes were children of the Kingdome, and they thought themſelves heirs of the Kingdome; yea, they preſumed, as if the Kingdome had been entailed upon their perſons, becauſe they were Abrahams poſterity; yet ſaith Chriſt, even you, for all your confidences, ſhall be caſt into utter darkneſs; that is, to hell, where there is nothing but darkneſs, or you ſhall be caſt quite beyond the verge, or utmoſt bound of the Kingdome. The Kingdome hath light all over, but beyond the Kingdome there is no light; being then caſt out of all hopes to enter the Kingdome, they muſt needs be caſt into utter darkneſs, or into that darkneſs, which is without. And as thoſe children of the Kingdome, ſo all unprofitable ſervants are under the ſame doom, Matth. 25. 30. And again, (Matth. 22. 13.) Bind him hand and foot, and caſt him into utter darkneſs; there ſhall be weeping, and wayling, and gnaſhing of teeth.

We may expound the wicked man in the Text, driven from light to this darkneſs. Not onely is he driven from the light of honour, to the darkneſs of diſgrace, and from the light of life, to the darkneſs of a temporal death, but to the darkneſs of eternal death, which is utter darkneſs.

Videtur Bildad id maxime ſignificare, quod omnibus improbis evenit. Omnes autem improbi non ita puniantur in hac vita, ſed omnes tandem detrudentur in tenebras exteriores. Coc.

And chaſed out of the world.] This clauſe is of the ſame mind with the former; To chaſe, as to drive, notes a violent purſuit; and he is chaſed not onely out of the ſociety of his friends, or out of the Land where he lived, but out of the Land of the living.

Hence note; Wicked men do not go, but are violently caſt out of the world.

ינדוהו fugabunt eum à נדד vagatus eſt.

He is chaſed as a wild beaſt; He hath no mind to go out of his fat paſture, from the place he knows, to a place he knows not. (Luk. 12. 20.) It is ſaid of the rich man; This night ſhall they fetch thy ſoul from thee. He did not reſign, and give it up, but he was driven from it, or it was drawn from him; either of which is to be chaſed out of the world. This is the wicked mans ſecond woe.

Behold, A third;

Verſ. 19. He ſhall have neither ſon nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.

This verſe extends the curſe upon him in reference to his poſterity. There is nothing difficult in theſe words; here's total eradication; not onely ſhall he have no ſon, but no ſons ſon. And when he ſaith, nor ſon, nor nephew; it is not to be taken ſtrictly; but as including all his kindred, in what degree ſoever. It is as much as to ſay, he ſhall have none of his lineage remain, all ſhall be extinct. Again; He doth not ſay, he never had ſon nor nephew, but he ſhall not have; there ſhall none remain among his people.

And not onely ſhall he have no kindred remaining among his people; but he ſhall not have any remaining in his dwellings: That is, not any friend, not any acquaintance, not any that bears good will to him. A mans children are neareſt, and then his nephews; then profeſt friends, acquaintance, and familiars. But when neither ſon, nor nephew, nor any friend remains, this is a ſweeping Judgement, a very beſome of deſtruction. It leaves none remaining

In his dwellings.] Or in the place of his peregrination and ſojourning in this world, as the word imports. In this Bildad ſtrikes at Job, and wounds the heart of the good man; from whom God had taken all his children; as if he had plainly ſaid; God hath dealt with thee as with a wicked man, thou haſt neither ſon nor nephew among thy people, nor any remaining in thy dwellings. But paſſing by this ſuppoſition in reference to Job; we may take up a point or two, as it concerns wicked men in general. Firſt note;

The children and poſterity of wicked men, are ſwept away for their fathers wickedneſs.

Though children ſhall not be puniſhed for their fathers ſin, if they repent, and return to God; yet greater evils fall upon children who do not repent, becauſe of the iniquity of their fathers. Yea good children who walk with God, may have ſome touch, though not in wrath to them, yet in wrath to their fathers, becauſe of their evils. I have met with this before, and therefore onely touch it.

Secondly, Obſerve how he puts this as a ſpecial judgement belonging to wicked men, for though ſometimes it be the lot of godly men, to have neither ſon, nor nephew, nor any remaining in their dwellings (Some good men never had ſon or nephew, and others have been bereaved of all they had) yet this is not ſo great an affliction to a godly man, as it is to the ungodly. For he that can call God father, and ſpeak to Chriſt as his brother, he that is allied to all the Saints in heaven and earth, in a ſpiritual relation, hath no want of natural relations, though he hath them not: it is no great matter to him, though he have neither ſon nor nephew, who is an adopted ſon of God.

As before, in reference to honour, and renown; a godly man can ſpare his honour and credit in the world well enough; becauſe he hath ſo good a name in heaven; he is ſo well reported of with God, that if the wicked trample his honour in the duſt, and reproach him here on earth, he hath no reaſon to be diſcomforted. So, he can ſpare, and be without the outward bleſſing of ſons and daughters, of nephews and friends, becauſe he hath higher alliances, and a more noble conſanguinity, as the Prophet ſpeaks; God hath given him a name better then that of ſons and daughters, (Iſa. 56. 5.) But for a wicked man, if he want ſons, and nephews, to inherit his eſtate, and to carry on his part in the world; he hath nothing to relieve that want. He that is childleſs, and Chriſtleſs too, hath reaſon to weep for his children, and not be comforted, becauſe they are not. The fruit of the body was put among the promiſed bleſſings to the Jewes, (Deut. 28. 11.) Children are the comfort of their living parents, and the continuance of their name and memory when they die. That promiſe (Pſal. 72. 17.) ſpeaks this fully; His name ſhall endure for ever; his name ſhall be continued as long as the Sun; men ſhall be bleſſed in him; all Nations ſhall call him bleſſed. The Hebrew is; He ſhall be as a ſon to continue his fathers name for ever. So we read in the Margine. Some render the place; His name ſhall be ſonned, or ſonnified, If I may ſpeak ſo; that is, his name by many ſons ſhall be continued. This was a prophecy concerning Jeſus Chriſt. As if the ſeveral acts, (ſo ſome interpret it) and paſſages of Chriſts life ſhould be as ſo many ſons, to declare his name to all Generations. But we may rather interpret it of the ſeed, or children of Chriſt: his name is continued by ſons: he hath a mighty ſeed, and, He ſhall ſee his ſeed, (Iſa. 53. 10.)

Filiabitur nomen ejus. Mont. i. e. multi filii nomen ejus deducent in omnes Generationes, vel ita celebria erunt Chriſti geſta, ac ſi ſingula opera eſſent filii, qui ſunt memoriale ſui parentis. Pined.

In the firſt ages of the world, either not to have a ſon, or to have a ſon die before the father, was an unheard of affliction. One of the Ancients hath obſerved, that there is not in the Geneallogies before the floud, nor in ſome generations after, mention of any father, whoſe ſon died before himſelf. But as all had ſons, ſo their ſons out-lived their fathers; God giving that as a ſpecial comfort to thoſe ages. The firſt ſon that died before his father, is recorded (Gen. 11. 27, 28.) Now theſe are the Generations of Terah, Terah begat Abraham, Nachor and Haran, and Haran begat Lot: and Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity. It ſeems to be noted as a ſtrange thing never heard of, nor mentioned in the Book of God before, that the ſon ſhould die before the father. And, ſaith my Author, it is to be conſidered, that this Terah, whoſe ſon Haran died before him, was not onely a worſhipper of Idols, but (as it is conceived) an inventer of Idols; This was the onely man upon record, whoſe ſons death prevented his in thoſe elder times. And in all times it hath been numbred among the afflictions incident to ſinfull man, when any ſon dies before the father, much more when the father hath no ſon remaining when he dies.

Author & artifex fingendi Idola. Id.

Epiphanius in his Writings againſt hereſies reports that ſome held no reſurrection, but the riſing up of the fathers in their children; when the father dies, the child riſes in his place; this was their reſurrection. Though this were a groſs hereſie, yet there is a truth in it; the father riſeth in his child; parents have a kind of reſurrection in their children, and while they live parents can ſcarcely be ſaid to be dead: upon this account the greatneſs of the affliction riſeth yet higher, he that hath neither ſon nor nephew remaining in his dwellings when he dies, may be accounted more then dead.

Quidam reſurrectionem aliam non admittebant quam eam, qua conſebantur rurſus vivere in ipſis filiis parentes mortui. Epiphan.

This is the third evil that Bildad ſets down as the portion of the wicked man, who, as he ſhall be driven out of the world himſelf; ſo his poſterity ſhall be blotted out.

He proceeds to ſhew us what effect this, with the forementioned judgments, ſhould have upon the ſpirits of the living, what the ſight or report of theſe terrible judgments will work, both in preſent and after ages.

Verſ. 20. They that come after him ſhall be aſtoniſhed at his day, as they that went before were affrighted.

For the opening of this verſe, we may enquire; firſt, whom he means by, They that come after, and, they that went before him; ſecondly, what by his day; thirdly, what by aſtoniſhed and affrighted.

They that come after him, &c.] Thoſe that come after, and thoſe that went before, are all men. If it be ſaid, how could they that went before him be affrighted at his day? they that never ſaw his day, could not be troubled at it?

I anſwer; The Original word doth not ſignifie ſtrictly ſuch as live before we live, but ſuch, who though they were born before us, yet are alive while we live; that is, men more ancient then our ſelves, and yet our contemporaries; ſo here, they who went before this wicked man, are ſuch, who though they were born before him, yet lived with him, and ſaw the judgments of God upon him: So the meaning of it is onely this, That as they who lived at that preſent when God brought thoſe evils upon him were affrighted; ſo they that come after ſhall be aſtoniſhed at him. That is, the one was affrighted at the ſight of thoſe judgments, and others ſhall be aſtoniſhed at the report, and hearing of them. So our tranſlators expound thoſe words in the margine; They that went before him, that is, they that lived with him ſhall be affrighted. This ſence is alſo expreſly given by Mr. Broughton; As they at preſent took an horror.

Again, Theſe termes, They that went before him, and they that come after him, may refer not only to time, but to degree. That is, thoſe that went before him in eſtate, and honour; and they that come after him in eſtate, and honour. As if he had ſaid, high and low, rich and poor, his ſuperiours and inferiours, one and other ſhall be aſtoniſhed and affrighted at the terrible fall of this man; when firſt and laſt, high and low are afflicted, all are.

They that come after him [ſhall be aſtonied.]

The Original word which we tender aſtonied, ſignifies to admire greatly and ſilently. Silent admiration is aſtoniſhment; it ſignifies alſo to be waſted and made deſolate. And ſo ſtrictly that aſtoniſhment is meant, which ariſeth from the ſight or view of places or perſons made or left deſolate. In the 143 Pſalm, ver. 4. David ſaith, (as we tranſlate) My heart within me is deſolate: another tranſlates; My heart within me is amazed. Thus here the deſolation of the wicked ſhall be ſo great, that they who hear the report of it, or behold the ruines of the place, where once he dwelt and flouriſhed, ſhall ſtand amazed; even as they who lived to ſee it acted upon him

Were affrighted.] The Hebrew is, They took hold of fear, or Horror; which is equivalent with this; Fear or Horror took hold of them, or ſiezed upon them like an Armed man. Yet ſome of the Jewiſh Doctors think that Bildad ſpake thus induſtriouſly; uſing that phraſe; They took hold of fear, rather then this, Fear took hold of them; to intimate, that when they ſaw ſuch judgments, they were even active to ſtir up fear in themſelves, or to over-awe their hearts with fears, and turn to the Lord, leſt the ſame calamities ſhould alſo befal them; according to that, Luk. 13. 3. Except ye repent, ye ſhall all likewiſe periſh. They that went before him were affrighted

At his day.] But, what day is this? This day, is his black day, the day of his calamity. It is frequent in Scripture to put the word day alone, without any addition, to note an eminent evil day. The patience of God bears long with the wickedneſs of man, but it will not bear alwayes. (Pſal. 37. 13.) The Lord laughs at him: for he ſees that his day is coming. While the wicked plots againſt the juſt, hoping to have the day againſt him, and gnaſheth upon him with his teeth, as being vext and filled with envy that he hath a day for himſelf; while he is thus buſie againſt the man whom God loves, God makes ſport at him; The Lord laughs at him, (and ſaith, as it were, let him plot, let him go on,) becauſe he ſees his day is coming: What day? The day of his ruine, and deſtruction; this ſhall ſuddenly come upon him. In the ſame ſence the word is uſed (Pſal. 137. 7.) Remember O Lord the children of Edom, in the day of Jeruſalem. Was this the day of Jeruſalems triumph, and glory? no, it was the day of Jeruſalems miſery, and ſorrow; it was the day, when the children of Edom cryed; Raſe it, raſe it, even to the foundations thereof. In the Prophecy of Obadiah (verſ. 12.) Thou ſhouldeſt not have looked on the day of thy brother; That is, upon the day of his affliction, or upon the affliction of that day. What! may we not look upon the afflictions of our brethren? yes we may, to pity, and compaſſionate them, but we muſt not look upon them with pleaſure or delight, with contempt or ſcorn, as the Edomites did; thou ſhouldeſt not have looked ſcornfully, or contentfully upon the afflictions of thy brother: The day of thy brothers affliction ſhould have been a ſad day to thee.

Thus it is frequent in Scripture to call the day of affliction a day emphatically. And ſo we may interpret that of the Apoſtle, (1 Cor. 3. 13.) where he deciphers ſeveral ſorts of doctrines, under thoſe allegorical expreſſions of gold and ſilver, of wood, hay, and ſtubble. Now (ſaith he) every mans work ſhall be tryed, it ſhall be made manifeſt; for the day ſhall declare it. What day? the day of tryal; he puts the day alone, for the day of tryal, or of judgment, when God ſhall come to lay the work and the rule together; when he ſhall bring ſtubble, &c. and the fire together; the day of tryal ſhall diſcover and make manifeſt what every mans work is. So here, They ſhall be aſtoniſhed at his day; that is, at the day of his affliction.

Dies in quibus impius fæliciter vivit, commodatos habet & quaſi alienos non proprios.

Further, this is called his day, to note, that it is his of right, or that it is his due. For all the good and comfortable dayes that he lives, are borrowed dayes, they are but lent him, onely the evil day, is his day; that's his own.

The Lord will ſend ſuch judgments upon the wicked, as ſhall be an aſtoniſhment and an affrightment to thoſe who behold or hear of them.

As the works of mercy which God hath done for his people are wonderfull, (Pſal. 78. 4. Pſal. 107. 15.) And as God hath wonderfull mercies and bleſſings in ſtore for his people againſt that great day of his appearing; he will then come to be admired in all them that believe (2 Theſ. 1. 10.) That is, he will do ſuch things for believers as ſhall be both to their own and others admiration: So his works of judgments ſhall be admired too; He will make the plagues of the wicked wonderfull. The Lord threatens (Deut. 28. 59.) I will make thy plagues wonderfull. Such was the deſolation prophecied againſt Tyrus (Ezek. 27. 35.) All the inhabitants of the Iſles ſhall be aſtoniſhed at thee; their Kings ſhall be ſore afraid. They ſhall not be afraid of thee, but for thee. They ſhall not be afraid of thy ſtanding, but at thy overthrow. So (Ezek. 32. 10.) at the fall of Egypt, Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee, and their Kings ſhall be horribly afraid for thee. When I ſhall brandiſh my ſword before them, and they ſhall tremble at every moment, every man for his own life in the day of thy fall, &c. See how the Merchants ſhall be aſtoniſhed at the fall of Babylon (Rev. 18. 11, 15.) The judgment upon Jezabel (2 King. 9. 37.) is expreſſed by ſome tranſlators in the language of Aſtoniſhment, The carkaſs of Jezabel ſhall be as dung in the field in the portion of Jezreel: So that they ſhall not ſay, this is Jezabel. Thus we tranſlate: others render it; The carkaſs of Jezabel ſhall be as dung in the field in the portion of Jezreel; So that they (being amazed) ſhall ſay, Is this Jezabel? What, is this Jezabel? is ſhe become as dung in the face of the field, who ſo lately ſate upon a throne: what, is this ſhe that painted her face, and looked ſo delicately out at the window, the great commandreſs in Iſrael, is this Jezabel? Thus they wonder. The judgement denounced upon the houſe of Eli, made the ears of thoſe that heard it tingle, (1 Sam. 3. 13.) That which makes the ear tingle, will alſo make the heart tremble, and amaze the hearer.

Obſtupentes qui præter ibant, dicebant, illa Jezabel?

Now Bildad ſhuts up his argument, having thus laid down the lot of the wicked, and ſet it out in ſeveral portions; he gives (as it were) a confirmation to all, he puts his ſeal to it. As if he had ſaid, I have not ſpoken at randome, I have not ſpoken what may be; but I have ſpoken that which ſhall be, this ſhall certainly come to paſs. And if others ſhall be aſtoniſhed who hear or ſee onely, how ſhall they who bear and feel thoſe calamities?

Verſ. 21. Surely, ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Epiphonema totius orationis; Epilogus hujus loci, hæc eſt conditio iniqui hominis, in quo redigatur. Merc.

Surely] He concludes confidently; What I have ſpoken, I will ſtand to for a truth; thus it ſhall be. When Ahaſuerus (in the Book of Heſter) advanced Mordecai, and ſet him in royal apparel upon the beſt horſe, he (according to Hamans counſel) cauſed it to be proclaimed before him, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King delights to honour. So here Bildad having ſhewed the wicked man in a compleat equipage of miſery, ſtript of all his comforts, and good things, and not ſo much as a good word left him from any man; but all men ſtanding amazed and aſtoniſhed at his downfall, he ſeems to proclaim, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom God reſolves to diſhonour: thus ſhall it be done to the man whom God diſ-favours and frowns upon; ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, this their end.

Illud dicitur eſſe res aliqua, non quod aliquandiu eſt, ſed in quod tandem deſinit.

Hence note; We may certainly conclude, that the eſtate of a wicked man is miſerable.

As ſome Believers have an aſſurance for themſelves perſonally, that it ſhall be well with them; ſo we may be aſſured in reference to the preſent ſtate of a wicked man, that it ſhall go ill with him and his; Such are the dwellings of the wicked. Though we cannot conclude concerning the perſon of a wicked man, that he ſhall be caſt away for ever, for 'tis poſſible he may repent and be ſaved, yet as to his preſent ſtate, and to his perſon as continuing in that eſtate, we may with aſſurance, conclude him undone for ever. The Prophet Iſaiah hath this charge from the Lord, (Iſai. 3. 10.) Say to the righteous, it ſhall be well with him: for they ſhall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe to the wicked, it ſhall be ill with him: for the reward of his hands ſhall be given him; and that reward is woe. The reward put into the hand of a wicked man is ſuch as the work of his hand is; he is a worker of iniquity, then what can his reward be, but woe and miſery? Such as a mans way is, ſuch will his end be; If the premiſes be falſe and unſound, the concluſion cannot be ſafe and good. As by a mans fruit we may know what he is, ſo what he ſhall be, unleſs he be changed from what he is. Such are the dwellings of the wicked.

And

And this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Periphraſis impii qui Deum nec novit nec colit, nam colit qui novit, unde pii vocantur יְהוָה יוֹדְעֵי noſcentes domini. Druſ.

In theſe words we have the character of a wicked man; the man who knows not God, and the wicked man, are the ſame. No wicked man knows God, and every man that knows not God is wicked. Theſe are termes convertible. This is the place of him that knows not God. There is a fourfold not knowing of God.

Firſt, There is an utter not knowing of God, or a total ignorance of God. He muſt needs be wicked and walk in darkneſs, that hath no light at all of the knowledge of God.

Secondly, They are ſaid not to know God, who have but a falſe or an erroneous knowledge of God. wrong knowledge is a kind of ignorance; they who know not God, as God, and as God hath declared himſelf to be known, theſe know him not. Now as they who are under a night of total ignorance, ſo they who have an unſound knowledge, and live under a falſe light, are numbred with the wicked; for where there are falſe principles, and apprehenſions of God in the head, there cannot be a right frame of heart towards God.

Thirdly, There is a practical not knowing of God, and that is moſt proper to this place (though both the former may be underſtood.) Some have a notional knowledge of God, and that (poſſibly) a right notion, their underſtanding is not wrapt up in errour; yet they may be numbred among thoſe that know not God, becauſe they act contrary to their knowledge. Of theſe the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Tit. 1. 16. They profeſs that they know him, but in their works they deny him; This knowledge is practical ignorance. We read of ſuch in the Epiſtle of Jude (ver. 10.) who what they know naturally as bruit beaſts, in thoſe things they corrupt themſelves; That is, they live not according to natural principles: as they ſpeak evil (the former part of the verſe rebukes that) of thoſe things which they know not, ſo they do evil about, or in thoſe things which they know. Their knowledge is according to the light of nature, but their actions are againſt the light of nature. They know onely as beaſts do, naturally, but they act contrary to this knowledge, which beaſts do not. Now as a wicked man corrupts himſelf in that which he knows by nature, ſo he may corrupt himſelf in that which he knows by doctrine, or inſtruction. And in this reſpect, though he have a higher knowledge then a beaſt, yet he is but as a bruit beaſt in his knowledge; or as the Prophet ſpeaks of thoſe in his time, (Jer. 10. 14.) He is bruitiſh in his knowledge. To have notions according to knowledge, and actions according to ignorance, is to be bruitiſh in knowledge. And I conceive the Apoſtle aymes at theſe, (1 Cor. 15. 34.) Awake to righteouſneſs, and ſin not (the Greek is, awake righteouſly, that is, give your minds and endeavours unto righteouſneſs) for ſome have not the knowledge of God: I ſpeak this to your ſhame. He writes not of thoſe that had no knowledge of God; but either of thoſe who had an erroneous knowledge, or rather, of thoſe that lived in wayes of unrighteouſneſs againſt their knowledge, as the immediate fore-going words intimate; Awake unto righteouſneſs: for ſome have not the knowledge of God: That is, they have not ſuch a knowledge of God, as keeps them to the rule of righteouſneſs. Here again is practical ignorance, or a not knowing of God, when he is known. How great a wickedneſs this is in ſuch as have ſcriptural revelations of God, we may eaſily collect, when we find God charging it as a piece of wickedneſs upon the old Gentiles, who had onely natural revelations of God, that is, onely ſo much knowledge of God as might be pickt out of, or learned by an attentive ſtudy in the book of the creature. (Rom. 1. ver. 21.) Becauſe when they knew God, they did not glorifie him as God, neither were thankfull, but became vain in their imaginations, and their fooliſh heart was darkned; and becauſe (though they had a knowledge of God in them, yet) they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, or to acknowledge God, as we put in the margin of our Bibles (ver. 28.) this provoked God to give them up to vile affections, and to a reprobate mind. We may take meaſure of the ſin by the puniſhment. Spiritual judgements are worſe then corporal. To be given up to vile affections, is more penal then to be given up to the vileſt enemies; yet thus were the Gentiles plagued for ſinning againſt that light which the creature ſheds forth concerning God; then what will their plague be, who ſin againſt Scripture-light, and are ſuch as know not God in their own works, when they know him in his word?

In ſcriptura ſacra illa ignorari cenſemur, quæ cognita nullum nobis uſum attulerunt, quomodo dicimus illa non audire quibus non obedimus. Sanct. Dicit eos Deum non noſſe, qui in peccatis perſeverantes, Deum ſic norunt, ut ejus penitus obliti videantur. Bez.

Fourthly, There is an affected not knowing of God, or (as we may expreſs it) a ſtudied ignorance of God; For as we all ought to know God, ſo ſome ſtudy to be ignorant of God, and to keep out the knowledge of holy things. And as, to all, it is a burden to get knowledge, ſo, to many, knowledge gotten is very burdenſome. Man cannot ſin ſo eaſily in the light as in the dark; he puts himſelf hard to it to ſin, who ſins againſt what he ſees. And therefore that they may have liberty to ſin, they have no will to ſee. Such are deſcribed (Job 21. 14.) They ſay to God, Depart from us, we deſire not the knowledge of thy wayes. Thus as ſome in their practice oppoſe the good which they know, ſo others refuſe to know what is good, that they may the more freely practice evil. And when any man hath long oppoſed light received, he grows unwilling to receive light. He follows on to be ignorant of God; and at laſt is willing to believe, There is no God. He that cares not what God ſaith, will not care much to ſay, there is no God. Atheiſm riſeth from prophaneneſs; and he that blaſphemes the word of God daily in his converſation, will at laſt blaſpheme the being of God in his opinion. Theſe know not God indeed, who know not that there is a God; and into this the affected ignorance of God will quickly caſt the wiſeſt (who are ſuch) among the ſons of men.

We may take in all theſe ſorts of not knowing of God, into the interpretation of this Text; but ſpecially the third, and fourth; ſuch as know God, yet walk contrary to him; or ſuch as refuſe to know God, leſt they ſhould be troubled to walk according to their knowledge. And indeed a wicked man may have the higheſt knowledge of God, on this ſide the love of God, and obedience to his will, which is attainable; he may have any knowledge of God, but that which gives an experimental taſte and reliſh of the goodneſs of God, or that God is good. And hence it is that he ſometimes hinders his own proficiency in the knowledge of God, leſt if he knew as much as he could, he ſhould be hinder'd from doing (what he hath a mind to) evil as he could.

Cognitio hæc quæ impio negatur eſt practica quædam ſapientia quæ in divino cultu conſiſtit in pietate, & in guſtu quodam & quaſi ſapore divinæ bonitatis.

Hence note; Firſt, Wickedneſs and ignorance go together.

Where there is only an invincible Ignorance of God, that is, ſuch an ignorance as the man cannot help or avoid, there is nothing but wickedneſs; much more where there is this profeſſed ſtudied ignorance. When the Prophet Hoſea ſets forth the great iniquity of that people, he gives this in the cloſe, as the cauſe of all, (Hoſ. 4. 1.) The Lord hath a controverſie with the Inhabitants of the Land; becauſe there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the Land. It is ſtrange that the Prophet ſhould bring in ſuch a charge againſt Iſrael; What could he ſay more of the Philiſtims, of the uncircumciſed Nations, and rude Barbarians, who ſate in darkneſs, and in the valley of the ſhadow of death? What could he ſay more againſt them, then that there was no knowledge of God in their Land? could he ſpeak thus truly to the people of Iſrael, and Judah, Gods own people? Was there no knowledge of God in their Land? This cannot be underſtood of a total Ignorance, or as if there had been none at that time who publiſhed the truth, or knowledge of God in that Land. But the meaning is, either that there was not much knowledge of God in the Land; (for in Scripture that which is not in ſome competent meaſure what it ought to be, is ſaid not to be at all) or though they had the knowledge of God, yet they oppoſed the receiving of it, at leaſt they were not zealous to promote it, nor carefull to walk up to it. Now though a land were full of knowledge, as the waters cover the Sea, yet (in ſuch caſes) we might ſay, There is no knowledge of God in the Land. This want of knowledge cauſed that plenty of ſin, and over-flowing of wickedneſs, for which God had a controverſie with their Land. We have ſuch a character of ſinfull times given (2 Chron. 15. 3.) Now, for a long ſeaſon, Iſrael was without the true God, and without a teaching Prieſt, and without Law. They were not totally deſtitute of theſe, but comparatively; There was a great neglect of teaching and expounding the Law; and then there was ſo little of God among them, that they were ſaid to be without the true God. Wickedneſs and ignorance grow up together; ignorance is the mother of prophaneneſs, not of devotion, as the Popiſh teachers (with ignorance enough) perſwade their deluded Votaries. The Pſalmiſt (Pſal. 14. 2.) joynes theſe two together; There is none that underſtandeth, or that ſeeketh after God. Would you know the reaſon why they did not ſeek God? it was becauſe they did not underſtand: and (verſ. 4.) Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge, who eat up my people as bread, and do not call upon the Lord; As if he had ſaid, if they had but a little true knowledge among them all, they would not thus greedily devour my people; they made no bones of oppreſſion, they ſwallowed the poor as pleaſantly as bread, they did they cared not what, when they knew not what they ought to do. The flood-gates of wickedneſs are open, where the door of knowledge is ſhut.

When Chriſt tells us (Joh. 17. 3.) This is eternal life to know God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom he hath ſent. Why doth he ſay, this is eternal life, but becauſe it ſets us in a frame of holy life? It works grace, and therefore it is glory. It is a holy life to know God thus, therefore it will be a happy life. As to know God is eternal life; ſo not to know him is eternal death. He that knows God, loves him, and he that loves him keeps his commandments (Joh. 14.) And they that do not know God, do not love him; and they that do not love him, do not keep his commandments. Many ſin againſt their knowledge, but they cannot avoid ſin, who have no knowledge. The blind eat many a fly, yea poyſon inſtead of bread.

Further, Some underſtand this Text of the knowledge that God hath of man; not of the knowledge that man hath of God; reading it thus; This is the place of him whom God doth not know. It is a truth both wayes: for they that do not know God, are not known of God. It is as true a character of a wicked man that God doth not know him, as that he doth not know God. But doth not God know every man? How then is it ſaid that God doth not know a wicked man? As men are ſaid not to know God, when they do not love and reverence him, when they do not fear and obey him; ſo God is ſaid not to know thoſe men whom he doth not love nor approve. (Mat. 7. 24.) Depart from me ye workers of iniquity, I know you not. Wicked men do not know God obedientially, and God doth not know wicked men favourably; and whether we ſay of a man he knows not God, or of God that he knows not ſuch a man, it equally ſpeaks him a wicked man.

—quem non agnoſcit Deus fortis. Jun.

Noſſe Deum eſt reſpicere, revereri, obedire, amare.

Laſtly, Whereas Bildad (as his friends before him) makes ſo large a deſcription of the ſtate of a wicked man, and of the portion due to him; firſt, in allegories, and then in plain words, inſiſting upon and repeating it again and again. It is queſtioned by ſome, why his and their ſpirits were drawn forth ſo frequently and unanimouſly to ſpeak of this matter? I anſwer; This might be, firſt, to undeceive the ſimple, who are ready to call the wicked happy, becauſe of their preſent proſperity; Secondly, to conquer the unbelief of moſt who can ſcarcely be perſwaded, that ſin will be ſo bitter in the end.

Many hope to thrive by wickedneſs, and not a few are afraid they ſhould be undone by keeping cloſe to the wayes of holineſs. Therefore the Lord doth ſo often thunder by the voyce of his ſervants, and reveal his wrath from heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs; Therefore he hath cauſed the penmen of the holy Scriptures to write the evil of it (as it were) in letters of blood, and to give teſtimony, that it hath ſhed the blood of thouſands already, and will deſtroy all eternally who turn not from it.

Take this anſwer more fully in the following obſervation.

The heart of man is hardly brought to believe that God will indeed pour out wrath upon ſinful men.

As it is a hard thing to believe that God will pour out ſo many bleſſings on his own people: ſo to believe that God will pour out ſo many vials of miſery upon wicked men. Therefore as we hear of the promiſes again, and again; and God oft repeats his mercies to perſwade us that he will indeed perform what he hath ſpoken: ſo we hear threatnings again and again, to overcome the unbelief of wicked men, or to make all know this ſad truth; Woe to the wicked, woe to the wicked. If the heart were ready to receive this, it would not be ſo often repeated. Few would take God at his word if he had ſpoke this but once. God ſpake to man in the ſtate of perfection; In the day that thou eateſt thou ſhalt ſurely die. No, ſaith the Devil, and the Woman believes him, it ſhall not be ſo: the threatning was but once given, and it was not believed at all. The heart of man doth hardly cloſe, either with promiſes or threatnings. Again, God doth it to render wicked men more unexcuſable. If he had ſpoken but once, if there had been but one word of threatning againſt ſin all the Bible over, ſinners had been without excuſe; but how ſhall their mouths be ſtopped, when theſe threatnings are ſo often renewed? when every Page of Scripture teſtifies the deſtruction of wicked men, and ſeals wrath upon them, if they go on in their wickedneſs. How deeply ſhall they be condemned when they are condemned by the mouths of ſo many witneſſes? David ſaith, (Pſal. 62. 11.) God hath ſpoken once, twice have I heard it, that power belongeth unto God; the meaning is, either that God ſpake that often, or that David heard it often, though God ſpake it but once; that is, he throughly weighed and conſidered it, at once ſpeaking, that power belongeth to God. A holy heart hears that twice, that God ſpeaks but once; Grace hath a quick ear, it makes us, as the Apoſtle James ſpeaks, (Chap. 1. 19.) Swift to hear; but God ſpeaks twice, and thrice, yea a hundred times, to wicked men, and they will not hear once; Then how great will their judgement be, and how will their mouthes be ſtopt, becauſe they ſtopt their ears? Hath not God ſaid it again and again; This is the dwelling of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God? Hath he not ſpoken it in figures, and allegories? Hath he not ſpoken it in plain words, and in examples? hath he not ſpoken it in blood? hath he not ſpoken it in fire, in ſword and famine? How often hath he made his wrath ſmoak, yea, blaze and burn before the eye of ſence? how often hath he made ſinners ſmell the brimſtone of his diſpleaſure?

Have they not heard of, have they not ſeen the deſolations which ſin hath made? how it hath left thoſe places which were as the Garden of God, like a waſte or wilderneſs? Have they never read or heard of the old world drowned with water? Have they never heard of Sodom and Gomorrah conſumed with fire? Have they not heard of Pharoah over-whelmed in the red Sea, for vexing the people of God? and of Korah, Dathan and Abiram ſwallowed up alive by the earth for their murmuring againſt Moſes? Whole volumes of examples have been collected, wherein the threatnings of God againſt ſin have been made viſible in the ruine and downfall of ſinners themſelves, and in the rooting out of their poſterity. As therefore the Apoſtle argues from the holy lives and happy deaths of the old Patriarchs and others enumerated in the eleventh Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, ſo may we from the unhappy deaths of many whoſe lives have been unholy in all ages; Seeing we are compaſſed about with ſo great a cloud of witneſſes, let us lay aſide every weight, and the ſin which doth ſo eaſily beſet us.

If ſinners go on, after all this, what can they plead, why their dwelling ſhould not be made deſolate? or why themſelves ſhould not be condemned for ever?

Thus far Bildad's ſecond diſcourſe with Job, wherein he ſeverely reproves him of wickedneſs, and ſets before him, the wofull concluſion of the wicked; How grievous and wounding his words were to Jobs ſpirit, how unſuitable to his condition, how unappliable to his perſon, will appear in the opening of his pathetical Anſwer in the following Chapter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX. Verſ. 1, 2, 3.

Then Job anſwered and ſaid ;

How long will ye vex my ſoul, and break me in pieces with words ?

Theſe ten times have ye reproached me ; ye are not aſhamed that ye make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

Bildad's ſharp reproof of Job in the former Chapter, procures from him a ſharp reply in this from Job ; whoſe whole diſcourſe declares him the object of mans pity, and God the object of his faith ; the ſum of his anſwer to Bildad, is to ſhew how hardly (yea, as he thought how inhumanely) he had hitherto been dealt with ; and that upon a four-fold conſideration.

Firſt, As he was afflicted.

Secondly, As he was their friend.

Thirdly, As he was innocent, not conſcious to himſelf of any evil that he had wilfully committed againſt God, or of any wrong done to man.

Fourthly, That they uſed him thus unkindly while he profeſſed full hope in God, notwithſtanding all the calamities which God was pleaſed to lay upon him.

There are three parts of the Chapter ; in the firſt he very accurately and tragically (as ſome expreſs it) amplifieth his own ſad eſtate ; and this is carried on from the beginning of the Chapter to the twenty third Verſe.

Secondly, He holdeth forth, and maintaineth his own integrity, both by a vehement deſire, and an aſſured hope of his reſurrection and appearance before God at the tryal of the laſt judgment, Verſ. 24, 25, 26, 27.

Thirdly, He exhorts his Friends to deſiſt, and repent, leſt they draw down the judgments of God upon themſelves, in the two laſt Verſes: But ye ſhould ſay, &c. ver. 28. and ver. 29. Be ye afraid of the ſword, for wrath bringeth the puniſhment of the ſword, that ye may know there is a judgment.

From theſe parts of the Chapter laid together, we may collect the general ſence of Job's Argument, in anſwer to Bildad, thus ;

Bildad endeavoured to prove, that Job was a wicked man, becauſe he was burdened with affliction ; Job anſwereth, I indeed endure thoſe afflictions, which for the matter are the portion of wicked men, yet I am not wicked, as my own Conſcience, full of peace and hope in God, doth aſſure and witneſs to me ; therefore the induring of greateſt afflictions, is no ſound proof that a man is wicked ; nor do theſe afflictions befal ſuch only as are wicked. The propoſition, (namely, that he himſelf was under the preſſure of great afflictions) is clear in the firſt part of the Chapter, from the ſixth to the twenty-third Verſe ; the Aſſumption, that he himſelf was not a wicked man, he proves by his faith and hope in God, laid down to the life, Verſ. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27. The Concluſion or Inference is implyed.

Job leads us to the deſcription of his afflictions by a pathetical Preface, wherein he taxeth, and reproveth his Friends two wayes : Firſt, By ſhewing their ſeverity againſt him. Secondly, By ſuppoſing his own guilt againſt God. He reproveth them by ſhewing their ſeverity againſt him three wayes.

Firſt, That they had troubled him long, in the ſecond Verſe ; How long will ye vex, &c. Verſ. 2.

Secondly, That they had troubled him who was troubled before ; How long will ye vex my ſoul ? In the ſame Verſe : As if he had ſaid, My ſoul was vexed with afflictions, why have ye vexed me, who came to comfort me.

Thirdly, That as they had done it long, ſo they perſiſted ſtill in doing it ; Verſ. 3. Theſe ten times have ye reproached me ; you are not aſhamed, that &c. q. d. ye did it, and ye do it.

His ſecond way of reproving, is by a ſuppoſition of his own guilt : Suppoſe I have ſinned, ſuppoſe I have erred, ver. 4, & 5. if I had done ſo, yet ſurely ye ought not to carry your ſelves thus towards me ; there is ſome other way of dealing with an afflicted friend, though faulty, then that which you have yet hit on ; therefore he goeth on to tell them, as what his caſe was, ſo how they ſhould have handled the matter with him ; Know that God hath overthrown me, &c. Ver. 6. Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me (ver. 21.) As if he had ſaid, While the hand of God was overthrowing me, your hand ſhould have been ſupporting me, and your hearts pitying me. So much for the opening of the whole Chapter, which lets in ſome light to the underſtanding of each particular.

Verſe 1, 2. Then Job anſwered, and ſaid, How long will ye vex my ſoul ?

How long?] The Queſtion concludes againſt his Friends, that they had vexed him already too long ; it argues alſo, their perſeverance in troubling him ; ſo the word is frequently uſed in Scripture : David ſpeakes much to this ſence, Pſal. 4. 2. O ye ſons of men, how long will ye love vanity ? How long will ye turn my glory into ſhame ? That is, How long will ye go on diſhonouring me ? And in Pſal. 13. we have this, How long, four times repeated in two verſes, while David complained of his affliction, How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord ? For ever ? (That's long indeed.) How long wilt thou hide thy face from me ? How long ſhall I take counſel in my ſoul, having ſorrow in my heart daily ? How long ſhall my enemies be exalted over me ? Here are four times how long, to ſhew that David's trouble had continued exceeding long.

How long will ye vex my ſoul ?] The word which we tranſlate to vex, ſignifies an internal trouble, ſuch as ariſeth from the contempt and ſcorn that others put upon us ; many know by experience (though grace ſets them above it) how much their ſpirits are burdened when they are contemned : They who are duly honoured, have a weight in them ; and they who are (though undeſervedly) contemned have a weight upon them. The word ſignifies alſo ſimply to grieve (Lam. 3. 32.) for it is applyed to the act of God ; The Lord will not caſt off for ever, but though he cauſe grief, yet will he have compaſſion, according to the multitude of his mercies ; for he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men. So the word is uſed again (Lam. 1. 12.) Was there ever ſorrow like to my ſorrow, which is done to me in the day wherein the Lord hath afflicted me ? The Vulgar reads, In the day wherein the Lord hath gathered my grapes, or fruits ? As if the Church had ſaid, I was once like a fruitful flouriſhing Vine, but now the Lord hath ſtript me of all my glory, and left me naked and bare, as a Vine after the Grapes are gathered. So Iſa. 51. 21. Zeph. 3. 18. The afflictions of the Church and People of God in their ſaddeſt ſorrows, are expreſſed by this word.

יגה notat internam animi mœſtitiam, illam præſertim quæ ex contēptu quodam, vel ſeveriore alicujus increpatione verbo aut opere naſcitur. Pined.

Vindemiavit. Vulg.

How long will ye vex my ſoul ?] The word vex, alone had ſignified the vexation of the ſoul ; but when he adds ſoul, it increaſeth the ſignification of the word, to ſay, You have vexed my ſoul, is more then to ſay, You vex me, though that be the meaning of it ; ſo that here's the deepeſt ſorrow, that which toucheth not only the fleſh, and skin, but that which pierceth to the very ſoul : As 'tis ſaid of Mary, A ſword ſhall paſs through thy ſoul : That is, Thou ſhalt be deeply wounded.

Addendo, animam meam, vis orationis augetur & penetrans graviſque mœſtitia indicatur. Bold.

In that he complains, How long will ye vex ?

Obſerve, Firſt, The length or continuance of an affliction is more grievous to us, then the weight and burthen of it.

He doth not ſay, how much? or how great? but how long? A light burthen carried far is heavy; what then is an heavy burthen carried far? The length of the croſs grieves more then the breadth or bulk of it. The ſouls under the Altar cryed (Rev. 6. 10.) How long Lord, holy and true, doſt thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on earth? So David, Pſal. 120. 5, 6. My ſoul hath long dwelt with them that hate peace: He did not complain that he had been amongſt thoſe that hated peace; but that he had dwelt long with them; he could not get free from that hateful company. (Dan. 8. 13, 14.) The queſtion is put concerning the affliction of the Church (How long?) As if it would render her affliction ſhorter, but to know how long it ſhould continue, eſpecially to know that it ſhould not continue long; Then I heard one ſpeaking, and another Saint ſaid unto that certain Saint which ſpake, How long ſhall be the viſion concerning the daily ſacrifice, and the tranſgreſſion of deſolation, to give both the Sanctuary and the Hoſts to be trodden under foot? As if he had ſaid, Might we but know when this deſolation ſhould end, it would be ſome comfort in the midſt of that deſolation; And he ſaid unto me, until two thouſand and three hundred dayes, then ſhall the Sanctuary be cleanſed: Though this anſwer had much obſcurity in it, yet it had ſome comfort in it. To hear of a period of our troubles, though we can ſcarce pick out the time of that period, is ſome abatement of our troubles. It troubles us to ſtay long from the enjoyment of good; but it troubles us much more while we are long, and know not how long we ſhall be under the indurance of evil. Many are ready to ſay in theſe troubleſome times, if we could but ſee an end of our troubles, if we thought there would be an end of theſe wars, we could more chearfully bear the expence both of our blood and treaſure. When will there be an end? But what is all this length to the endleſs length of thoſe troubles, which are the portion of impenitent ſinners? What will they ſay, where good ſhall never be injoyed, and evil for ever felt? How long, will be the Cry in Hell for ever. How long ſhall we indure? When will this end? No date, no period can be ſet to the how long of that miſery. And this makes every moment of miſery as miſerable as the eternity of it. And indeed, every moment of an eternal miſery hath an eternity in it: As every moment of eternal mercies is like an eternity of mercy.

Secondly, Obſerve, Thoſe afflictions pain us moſt that reach our ſpirits.

The ſoul it ſelf cannot be pained; it being a ſpiritual ſubſtance, hath nothing to do with ſenſible paſſions; yet pain and trouble in their effects, grief and ſorrow, may quickly paſs through the fleſh to the ſpirit: There are ſome evils which do not make ſo much as a ſkar in the fleſh, which make deep wounds in the ſpirit. Chriſt ſweat drops of blood in the agony of his ſoul, before any hand touched his body; and ſome evils make deep wounds in the fleſh, which make not the leaſt ſcratch upon the ſoul; yea, the ſoul may rejoyce, triumph, and glory, while the body is martyred and torn in pieces. But thoſe afflictions which wound and vex the ſoul, are moſt grievous; as thoſe mercies are ſweeteſt, which refreſh the ſoul, and comfort our ſpirits; many enjoy mercies which comfort and refreſh their bodies, but they know not what it means to have their ſouls comforted. Now as thoſe comforts are moſt comfortable which comfort the ſoul; ſo thoſe ſorrows are moſt ſorrowful which afflict the ſoul: O, ſaith afflicted Job, Ye vex my ſoul; were it but my fleſh which the Devil wounded at the firſt, I could bear it: The Sabeans took Job's eſtate away, and Satan ſmote his body from the crown of the head to the ſoal of his foot with botches and ſores; but his Friends gave ſorer wounds, they vexed his ſoul by their unkindneſſes, and we ſhall ſee his ſoul wounded farther by and by; now only remember that ſoul-wounds are the ſoreſt wounds.

Thirdly, Compare this vexation of Job's ſoul with the intention of Job's Friends in viſiting him, as hath been toucht before upon ſome other paſſages of this book; they did not plot upon him to vex him, nor had they a deſign to trouble him, doubtleſs the men had upright hearts, and feared God; they came really to comfort him, and do him good; yet all the pains they took with him, was only a pain to him, His ſoul was vexed. We may intend comfort to our friends, and yet only trouble them; we cannot give our actions that effect which we deſign them to: Job found it ſo in his Friends. And he might ſay to them, you came to comfort me; if vexing a ſoul be comforting it, you have comforted me with full meaſure: But call you this comforting an afflicted friend? Is this the lifting of him up that is fallen? Only God can make our counſels and our perſons comfortable to others: As for us we may ſpeak words in the matter comfortable, as well as in our intendment, and yet no comfort come to thoſe we have a mind to comfort. (Iſa. 50. 4.) Thou haſt given me the tongue of the learned, that I may know how to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to him that is weary: To comfort is a gift of God, a ſpiritual gift; and as a power to comfort, ſo the preſent act is the ſpecial gift of God; a man may have the gift of applying the conſolations of the Goſpel, and yet not give comfort. God hath charged the uſe of all Goſpel means upon us, both to ſave and comfort our ſouls; but he hath reſerved the fruit and ſucceſs of both in his own power. We muſt at once ſhew our diligence about the means, and our dependance upon God for the end. How long will ye vex my ſoul, Hoccine eſt mæſtum conſolari?

And break me in pieces with words?

The word that we tranſlate, to break in pieces, notes a very vehement breaking, to break with extream violence, to break and bruiſe, as ſeeds or ſpices are bruiſed in a Morter, to pound to duſt or powder. The word is uſed for the breaking of the heart with godly ſorrow: Sorrow is a breaker, it breaks no bones, but it breaks the heart. Worldly ſorrow breaks the heart to death; Godly ſorrow breaks the heart to life, (Iſa. 53. 15.) I dwell with thoſe that are of an humble and contrite or broken ſpirit, to revive the ſpirit of the humble, and to revive the ſpirit of the contrite ones. The ſorrows of Jeſus Chriſt are expreſt by this word, (Iſa. 53. 5. & 10.) He was wounded for our tranſgreſſions, he was bruiſed for our iniquities; and in the tenth Verſe, Yet it pleaſed the Lord to bruiſe him, he hath put him to grief. Thus the ſpirit of Job was bruiſed and broken: But, what was the inſtrument of his breaking? Was he broken with clubs and ſtaves? No, but with hard words and ſevere rebukes. How long will ye break me in pieces

דכא verbum vehemens. Metaphora à contuſione granorum in mortario.

With words?] Job doth not title their words, he ſaith not, ye have broken me with hard, cruel, or bitter words, he ſaith only, Ye have broken me in pieces with words, leaving us to conſider what words were fit for ſuch a work; ſoft and kind words may melt the heart; but thoſe are hard and harſh words which break it.

Hence Obſerve, Unkind and hard words make deep wounds, and break the heart.

Words are full of power, both to wound and to heal, to break and to bind up, to grieve and to comfort: As the word of God hath an Almighty power to break the heart; ſo the word of man hath a mighty power to do it. Some are more troubled with what is ſaid to them, then with any thing that is done to them: Unfriendly and reproachful ſpeeches have lain heavier upon them, then the heavieſt of other preſſures.

Nihil ſic hominis affligit animū ut ſermo durus. Orig.

David had many hands againſt him, but he was moſt afflicted with the tongues which were againſt him; As with a ſword in my bones, mine enemies reproached me, while they ſay daily unto me, where is thy God? Pſal. 42. 10. And as God works upon the heart with two ſorts of words: Sometimes with ſoft words, ſuch are his promiſes: Sometimes with hard words, ſuch are his threatnings. So alſo (in his proportion) doth man; man hath his ſoft words, and they are of two ſorts: Firſt, Friendly words: Secondly, Flattering words; both theſe inſinuate and ſoak into the ſpirit of man. Secondly, Man hath his hard and bitter words; theſe vex and break the heart, and are written (as I may ſay) upon the broken pieces and ſplinters of it, as with a Pen of iron, and the point of a Diamond, there's no getting them out again, till grace get them out, or holy patience wear them out. Cruel words are the heightning of cruel actions (Mat 5.10,11.) When Chriſt had ſaid, Bleſſed are they that are perſecuted for righteouſneſs ſake, it follows, Bleſſed are ye when men revile you, and perſecute you, and ſay all manner of evil againſt you falſly. The bleſſing is promiſed not only to thoſe who ſuffer evil done to them, but to thoſe who ſuffer evil ſpoken againſt them. Hard words are numbred among our hardeſt tryals: The Apoſtle (Heb. 10.32,33.) exhorts the Saints to call to remembrance the former dayes, in which, after they were illuminated (that is, after they had received the light of the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt) they indured a great fight of affliction; they who receive the faith, muſt expect a fight; they might have been in the darkneſs of unbelief and ignorance long enough without a fight of affliction; but as ſoon as ever they were illuminated, the Prince of darkneſs ſtirr'd up a war againſt them: What the war was he tells us at ver. 33. Partly while ye were made a gazing-ſtock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly while ye became companions of them that were ſo uſed: He calls the bearing of reproaches, a great fight of affliction.

Πολλὴν ἄθλησιν, Ingens, certamen. Bez. Magnum dicit quod multum ex proprietate vocis Græcæ poſſis dicere, quod ingens eſt exaggeratio contumeliæ, quaſi cum multis hoſtibus confligat qui cum una contumelia depugnat. Pin.

The word which we render great, doth not ſignifie ſo much the greatneſs of any one, as the concurrence of many afflictions: As if he had ſaid, Ye indured a multitude, or manifold fights of affliction. He that indureth hard words, fights with a numerous Hoſt; words come thick, and like an Army renew the charge: He contends with many enemies at once, who is aſſaulted with reproaches. And he is a ſtrong man, that is able to ſtand theſe aſſaults, or receive theſe charges, and not be broken. Job was a ſtrong man both in faith and patience, yet he was broken, his peace was much broken, yea, his ſpirit was broken; Ye have vexed my ſoul (ſaith he) and broken me in pieces with words.

Job proceeds to ſhew us particularly what kind of words his Friends ſpake, they were unkind words; and more,

Verſe 3. Theſe ten times ye have reproached me, ye are not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

Here is an army of evil words, Theſe ten times, &c. What? juſt ten times? Did Job keep tale, and ſcore up the unkind words of his Friends? Were his reproaches juſt ten? We uſe to ſay, 'Tis unfriendly to keep account of kindneſſes done to our friends; but it is more unſutable to the laws of friendſhip, to take an account of unkindneſſes received from friends. The leſs we remember them, the better is our memory. Why then is Job ſo exact and particular in this unfriendly Arithmetick? Theſe ten times ye have reproached me.

Numerū denariū ſtrictè accipit Cajetanus. Ipſas Jobi reſponſiones ei redundaſſe in confuſionem aſſerēs.

Some conceive that Job ſpeaks to the very letter, that when he ſaith, ten times, he means ten times, and only ten times, neither more nor leſs. Which number is made up thus; Five times his Friends had ſpoken, and five times Job had ſpoken, here were ten ſpeeches; He was reproach'd as well when himſelf ſpake, as when they ſpake; his own anſwers were reckoned to his diſhonour by his Friends, as he reckoned their replyes: But I paſs this.

Notæ multitudinis ſolent per hyperbolem uſurpari; ita ut Decies ſignificet ultra decē plurima, quamvis res ipſa infra decem conſtiterit.

Further, we may make it out thus; that in each ſingle anſwer made by his Friends, there was a double reproach, or much reproach, therefore he reckoneth every one of them for two: We find in Scripture, that the word ten is uſed in a kind of Hyperbole; yea, though the number of the thing done be under ten, or leſs then ten, yet it's ſaid to be done ten times, only to ſhew that it hath been done oftner then it ſhould, or when it ſhould not have been done at all. So ſome underſtand that ſpeech of Jacob to his Wives (Gen. 31.7.) complaining of the harſh dealing of Laban, Your Father hath changed my wages ten times. 'Tis not probable (though ſome attempt to prove it) that Laban did actually change his wages ſo often; yea, 'tis conceived that he changed his wages but twice, ver. 8. yet Jacob ſaw ſo much unkindneſs in that twofold change of his wages, that he ſaith, He had changed his wages ten times.

Further, Ten times may be taken indefinitely for many times. It is uſual among the Latines to expreſs any unuſual greatneſs by the number ten, and ſo doth the Scripture too: (Eccleſ. 7.19.) Wiſdom ſtrengtheneth more then ten mighty men which are in the City; that is, more then many, or then all the mighty men in the City: Wiſdom is better then the weapons of war. The Law given about the keeping of the Ammonite out of the Congregation, is thus expreſſed (Deut. 23.3.) An Ammonite or Moabite ſhall not enter into the Congregation of the Lord; even to their tenth generation, ſhall they not enter into the Congregation of the Lord for ever. The tenth generation is not to be taken terminatively to their excluſion from the Congregation, as if at or after the tenth generation they might enter in; but the tenth generation is named to ſhew, that they ſhould not be received in for many generations, yea, that they ſhould not at all be received in; for ſo the latter branch explains it, They ſhall not be received to the tenth generation into the congregation of the Lord, no not for ever.

Ea latini Decumana vocarunt quæ excellentiſſima & ampliſſima in ſuo quæq; genere eſſent. Hinc Decumanus fluctus, Decumana Ova.

Again, To ſhew the greatneſs of the famine that God would bring upon his own people for their great ſins, 'tis ſaid (Levit. 26.26.) When I have broken the ſtaff of your bread, ten women ſhall bake your bread in one Oven: As if he ſhould ſay, when Corn is plentiful, two or three women fill an Oven, but when I have broken your ſtaff of bread; then (ſuch ſhall be the ſcarcity of Corn, that) ten women, that is, many women may put your bread into one Oven, and not fill it, neither ſhall ye be filled, as the next words aſſure us, They ſhall deliver you your bread again by weight, and ye ſhall eat and not be ſatisfied. So the word is uſed (Numb. 14.22.) Where the Lord complains, Ye have tempted me now theſe ten times. Thus when Nehemiah would ſhew how unceſſant the enemies were in bringing ſad reports to terrifie them, he ſaith (Chap. 4.12.) Ten times ye have ſaid from all places, they will be upon you; that is, ye have often ſaid we ſhould be ſurpriſed and cut off by ſuch a time. Once more (Zach. 8.23.) The glory of the Jews in the latter dayes is thus deſcribed, It ſhall come to paſs, that ten men ſhall take hold (out of all Languages of the Nations) on the ſkirt of him that is a Jew, ſaying, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. Ten men, that is, many men, even multitudes of men ſhall deſire favour and friendſhip with the Jews; We will go with you, we will be on your ſide, for we have heard that God is with you.

> Note by the way, 'Tis good being with thoſe with whom God is, as 'tis beſt of all to be with God.

All men ought, ten men (ſaith that text) ſhall deſire to be with the Jews, when God appears among them. Rev. 2.10. Ye ſhall have tribulation ten dayes; that is, for many dayes, or for a long time. So here, Theſe ten times have ye reproached me; that is, ye have reproached me very often, I know not how often; he puts it in ſuch a number, as may note any number, yea, that which is only not innumerable; Who is able to number the reproaches ye have put on me? The number ten, ſeems to go burdened with innumerability, becauſe it brings forth the greateſt numbers: When, in numbring, unities ariſe to the number ten, we can go no further, but by reſuming unities, and adding them to ten. So that, ten being the greateſt ſimple number, and all compound numbers being renewed at ten, the number ten ſtands as the chief, and contains the greateſt numbers. Ye have reproached me ten times.

Hic numerus videtur infinitate gravidus, eò quòd omnes numeros quantūcunq; maximos gignit. Bol. Denarius numerus ut qui numerandi finis ſit videtur maximus: nam cum ad decem pervenitur, ulterius non itur, ſed iterum reſumitur unitas & denario adjungitur. Semper ad uſque decem numero creſcente venitur principium ſpatiis ſumitur inde novis. Ovid. Faſt.]

Ye have reproached me.] The word ſignifies ſuch a reproach, as not only puts a man to ſhame, but makes him greatly aſhamed. So the word is uſed (Ruth 2.15.) Let her glean among the ſheaves, and reproach her not; we put in the margin, ſhame her not; ſay not that ſhe ſtealeth, for if a gleaner come into a field and glean among ſheaves, 'tis ſuſpected that ſuch a one ſtealeth. Therefore Boaz gave this as a ſpecial priviledge to Ruth, let her come among the ſheaves, it ſhall be no ſtealing to her, reproach her not with it, put her not to ſhame. Thus while Job ſaith, Ye have reproached me, the meaning is, ye have endeavoured to put me to ſhame, as if I were a wicked man, a thief, or a murtherer, and this (though once had been too often) ye have done ten times, or often times.

We may conſider theſe words: Firſt, As they ſet forth the ſin and unkindneſs, or rather the ſinful unkindneſs of Job's Friends: Secondly, As they ſet forth the grace and patience of Job, or rather that ſpecial grace of patience.

Firſt, As they ſet forth the ſin of Job's Friends in the frequent and often repeated unkind carriages of that viſitation. Theſe ten times, &c.

Obſerve, To fall often into the ſame ſin, is a great aggravation of ſin.

To reproach, or to do evil once, is too oft; but to do it often, ten times, how much evil is in that? One of the greateſt burdens which we can put either upon our own ſins, or upon the ſins of others, is the number of them. An evil act ſingle is heavy, what then are many bundled up together? As it is one of the greateſt heightnings of the mercies of God, that he is pleaſed to do us good often, who have not deſerved that he ſhould do us good once, that we ſhould have as many and manifold mercies, ſo thoſe mercies daily renewed upon us, and ſent in freſh every morning; ſo, that which heighteneth ſinful actings againſt God or man, is the frequency of them, that they are renewed every day, or often in a day. (Luke 17. 4.) If thy brother treſpaſs againſt thee ſeven times in a day, and ſeven times in a day turn again to thee, ſaying, I repent, thou ſhalt forgive him: Chriſt puts it upon the number, If thy brother treſpaſs ſeven times in a day, it is no great matter to forgive a brother, who offends once a day, or who offends us but ſeldom; but if he offend ſeven times in a day, here is the greatneſs of his ſin in treſpaſſing, and the great tryal of our charity and patience in bearing and forgiving. Peter put this Queſtion (Matth. 18. 21, 22.) Lord, how oft ſhall my brother ſin againſt me, and I forgive him, till ſeven times? As if he had ſaid, A ſin ſo often repeated is very great, and will put me to the exerciſe of all the love I have in my heart to forgive it. And though he thought this a very hard taſk for his grace to go through with, to forgive to ſeven times, yet he hath a harder taſk ſet him in the reply which Chriſt makes (ver. 22.) Jeſus ſaith unto him, I ſay not unto thee until ſeven times, but until ſeventy times ſeven. Peter's ſeven is multiplied to ſeventy ſeven; in which as we learn that the multiplication of ſin is one of the greateſt aggravations of it; ſo likewiſe is the multiplication of forgiveneſs: He that multiplies to ſin, ſins abundantly; and he that multiplies to pardon, doth (as God, Iſa. 55. 7.) pardon abundantly.

Secondly, If we conſider the ſtate of the men whom Job charged to have reproached him ten times, they were good men.

Hence Obſerve, That a good man may fall often into the ſame error.

He that is upright may do amiſs again and again, he may ten times wrongfully reproach man, and as often act diſobediently towards God; it is no great matter to hear vile wretches ſpeak evil and do evil an hundred times. They muſt needs do much evil, and do evil often, who being themſelves evil, cannot but do evil, or do evilly whatſoever they are doing. But 'tis very ſad (though very poſſible) when we ſee thoſe who are good, yet do evil, eſpecially when we ſee them do it often. It ſhould keep the beſt humble, that ſtill (by reaſon of their in-dwelling corruption) they are ſubject to fall into ſin, and it ſhould keep them watchful that they fall not.

Thirdly, Obſerve, Reproaches make breaches.

He ſaid before, You break me with your words, now he ſhews plainly what thoſe words were, reproachful words; reproaches make outward breaches between friends, but he that is reproached, finds a breach within. Sorrow breaks him, and ſhame breaks him. That which cauſeth ſhame hath ſorrow in it: When Paul wrote ſharply to the Corinthians, he ſaith, I write not theſe things to ſhame you, but as beloved children to warn you. We rebuke offenders, that we may make them aſhamed, but not to ſhame them; but reproaches are caſt upon others, to ſhame them, not to make them aſhamed. Among all the tryals which Jeſus Chriſt underwent to break and bruiſe him, reproach was one of the greateſt. (Pſal. 22. 6.) I am a worm and no man, a reproach of men, deſpiſed of the people: Chriſt was not only reproached among men, but a reproach of men, he was, as it were, reproach it ſelf. The Prophet (Iſa. 50. 6, 7.) foreſhewed the wonderful tryal of his patience, in bearing ſhame, I gave my back to the ſmiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; I hid not my face from ſhame and ſpitting, for the Lord will help me, therefore ſhall I not be confounded; therefore have I ſet my face like a flint, and I know that I ſhall not be aſhamed: They did what they could to make Chriſt aſhamed, they reproached and reviled him, yea, they condemned him as a wicked man, therefore it follows in the eighth verſe, He is near that juſtifieth me, who will contend with me? Let us ſtand together, who is mine adverſary? Let him come near to me. As if he had ſaid, I am not afraid, either of his tongue, or of his hand, of what he can ſay, nor of what he can do.

Fourthly, Obſerve, It is uſual for them to be much reproached amongſt men, who are moſt precious with God.

None receive more contempt on earth, then they whoſe names are written in Heaven; God hath reſerved abundant honour for his people in the next life, but he often gives them up to reproach in this. The men of the world cannot but deſpiſe thoſe who are in eſteem with God; for as 'tis in things, ſo in perſons; The things which are highly eſteemed among men, are abomination to God; and the things that are highly eſteemed by God, are an abomination among men; ſo thoſe perſons who are highly prized with God, are an abomination with men: Should the worth of Saints be taken by the rate-book of the world, how vile were their price? To how low and poor a market would many precious ſouls come? The Apoſtle concludes concerning the old Saints and Worthies among the Jews (Heb. 11. 38.) that the world was not worthy of them; yet they were adjudged unworthy to live, or have a room in the world.

'Tis ſad when good men, who are precious, yea, who rule with God, are reproached and reviled by the world; but it is moſt ſad when one good man reproaches another: 'Tis a grief to hear thoſe who are vile, revile, and throw dirt in their faces, whoſe faces ſhine through that beauty and comelineſs of grace which God hath put upon them; but to ſee one Saint throw dirt in the face of another, to beſpatter and bemire the credit of another, by Pen or Preſs, by words or geſtures, this is a grief indeed, this is a lamentation, and ought to be for a lamentation among all the people of God, as it is (and will be while it is ſo) a rejoycing to the world that lyes in wickedneſs. But though now ſome of the Saints may ſay (with Job) to their brethren in the ſame faith, Theſe ten times have ye reproached us, yet we have a promiſe that a time is coming when they ſhall not ſo much as once in one thought reproach one another; Ephraim ſhall not envy Judah, and Judah ſhall not vex Ephraim any more (Iſa. 11. 13.)

Laſtly, As theſe words refer to the grace and patience of Job.

Obſerve, 'Tis perfect patience when we can indure reproaches, eſpecially many foul reproaches.

It is a work of patience to indure but one reproach; but when we indure many reproaches, then patience hath a perfect work; as it ſhews the miſerable perfection of a man in ſin, to perſevere in ſinning, or as it argues the perfect hardneſs of a mans heart in ſin, to ſin after he hath been ten times or many times reproved; ſo it ſhews the perfection of a man in patience, to continue patient after he hath been ten times reproached. This anſwers that Rule of ſuffering given by Chriſt (Matth. 5. 39.) I ſay unto you that ye reſiſt not evil; but whoſoever ſhall ſmite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other alſo: That is, When ye have received one wrong, be ye not meditating how to revenge that, but be ye preparing how to receive a ſecond. Though Grace doth not bid us invite injuries, yet it teaches us to bid them welcome. Theſe ten times have ye reproached me.

And are not aſhamed, that ye make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

The word that ſignifies to be aſhamed here, is of a milder and gentler ſignification, then that we had before, for reproach or ſhame. As if he had ſaid, Ye have reproached me, as if ye intended not only to make me aſhamed, but to confound me with ſhame; but you who have reproached me are not aſhamed at all, you have not the leaſt tincture of a bluſh appearing in your faces, though you have gone about to fill my face with ſhame, and my heart with ſorrow.

Verbum aliquanto lenius qũam ſuperius; q. d. cum veſtris me approbriis vehementer pudefacitis, vos neque leniter erubeſcitis. Pined.

Further, The word ſignifies ſuch ſhame or bluſhing as cauſeth a ſtop in the work or enterpriſe which we have in hand. Many would go on in doing good, and not a few in doing evil, were they not ſhamed out of their purpoſes. How holy in outward profeſſion and performances would ſome be were it not that they fear ſhame, this ſtops them in their courſe, and turns them out of the way. Hence that ſevere threat (Mark 8. 38.) Whoſoever therefore ſhall be aſhamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and ſinful generation, of him alſo ſhall the Son of man be aſhamed, &c. Chriſt our Lord foreſaw, that as many would take up the profeſſion of the Goſpel for their credit, ſo many would withdraw from it for fear of ſhame. Now as many turn from keeping the holy Commandment for ſhame; ſo many are kept from breaking the holy Commandment only for ſhame. How unholy, how vile would they be, were they not aſhamed that it ſhould be known that they are ſo? Thus ſhame is the check of ſin. But ſaith Job to his Friends, Ye are not aſhamed; there is not ſo much as any ſhame upon you, cauſing you to bluſh at what you are doing, or to deſiſt from doing yet more. Ye are not aſhamed.

Verbum hoc aſſerre videtur eum pudorem, quo quis deterretur ab aliquo opere faciendo. Pined.

That ye make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

תהכרן Multas patitur interpretationes.

The word which we render to make ſtrange, is found on only here in this ſence all the Bible over, yet it undergoes (according to the various apprehenſions of the learned in the Original Language) much variety both of tranſlation and of interpretation, yet none of them hurt the ſence of the Text, and may all ſtand with the truth of that which is here aſſerted.

Quod appareatis mihi. i. e. apertè averſamini.

Firſt, Some render it thus, Ye are not aſhamed that you ſhew your ſelves openly againſt me; q. d. Are ye ſo bold and confident, as to ſpeak evil of me in my own hearing? It were much for you to vent ſuch words behind my back, but are ye not aſhamed to ſpeak thus to my face?

Quòd obſtupeſcatis mihi.

Secondly, Others give it thus, You are not aſhamed to ſtand wondring and gazing at me, as if I were ſome ſtrange Monſter never ſeen before: As ſome men are wondred at for their noble actings, ſo others for their extream ſufferings.

הכר Arabicè ſignificat ſtuporem. Rab. Jona. Significat etiam Arabicè, ſubſannare. Multa ſunt Arabica in hoc libro. Merc.

Thirdly, The word in the Arabick (with which the language of this Book of Job often mingles) ſignifies to ſcorn or deride; in anſwer to which our Text is read, Are ye not aſhamed to jear and jeſt at me in my miſery? He hath expreſly charged his Friends with mocking, more then once before, and 'tis not improbable, that he doth touch it here again. We cannot but ſpeak much and often of that, which grieves us much.

Obfirmatis vultūm in me. Rab. Joſ. Kinch.

Fourthly, One of the Rabbins ſpeaks Job's meaning thus, Ye are not aſhamed to harden your faces againſt me: He that hath no compaſſion towards man, hardens his face as well as he that hath no repentance towards God. He that hardens his face againſt a man, hath alſo hardened his heart: The ſhew of the countenance teſtifies the frame of the Spirit. A man doth not (uſually or naturally) look or ſpeak hardly till he thinks hardly. Thus Montanus tranſlates, Ye are indurate againſt me: And ſo Mr. Broughton, But ye harden your ſelves againſt me, ye take no pity of me.

Indurati eritis mihi. Mont.

Opprimitis me. Vulg. ἐπίκεισθέ μοι, incumbitis mihi. Sept.

A fifth reads, Ye oppreſs me; the Seventy, Ye load me, ye lye hard on me, or, ye are not aſhamed to lay your whole weight upon me.

כרה Significat. 1. Fodere. 2. Inſtruere convivium. 3. Emere vel cauponari.

Once more, Others deriving the word from a root which hath three ſignifications, apply them all three to this place.

Firſt, To dig, making the ſence thus, Ye are not aſhamed to dig me; that is, to pierce and wound me: So the ſufferings of Chriſt upon the Croſs are prophetically deſcribed, (Pſal. 22. 16.) They pierced (or they digged) my hands and my feet.

Secondly, To make a feaſt or a banquet. So 'tis uſed (2 Kings 6. 23. Job 40. 3.) and then the ſence appears thus; Ye are not aſhamed to feaſt upon me: That is, to make your ſelves merry with my ſorrow, to feed upon my troubles. What he ſpeaks at the twenty-ſecond Verſe of this Chapter, hath ſome correſpondence with this reading; Ye are not ſatisfied with his fleſh: As if he had ſaid, The ſorrows of my fleſh, or my outward ſufferings are not enough to content and fill you, and therefore you ceaſe not to fill my ſoul with ſorrow.

Cauponari aliquem eſt avari alio

Thirdly, The word ſignifies to buy, to barter, to bargain and ſell for gain: And then, this is the ſcope of his reproof; Ye are not aſhamed to make merchandize of me: That is, You deal with me, as with a man whom you might uſe at pleaſure, as if I were to be bought and ſold, at any rate, as if I were ſo contemptible, and of ſo cheap a credit, that I were fit only to ſerve turns, or an object for every one to play upon. We ſay of a man that is abuſed, or wronged, either through treachery or revenge, either to make ſport or profit for others, This man is bought and ſold; every one makes his advantage, and takes his penny-worths out of him.

ad ſuā gloriā voluptatem vel commodum. Coc.

Inter omnia quæ interpretes in hanc vocem afferunt, hoc accommodatiſſimum puto ut נכר & הכר idem valeant, ſc. extraneum ſe geſſerit. Merc. Alios vos mihi exbibitis. Vatab.

All theſe tranſlations yield a ſence ſutable to the ſcope of this Scripture, yet, I conceive, ours is more proper then any of them all, and is approved by many learned Interpreters as the beſt, Ye are not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me. As if he had ſaid, Ye are my friends, and kindred, I have been long acquainted with you, yet now ye ſtand off, and keep your diſtance, as if I and you were ſtrangers, and had never known or heard of one another until this day, or as if you were much my ſuperiours, and ſo 'twere too much condeſcention in you to be familiar with me. So the word is uſed (Gen. 42. 7.) Joſeph knew his Brethren when they came to Egypt for bread, but he made himſelf ſtrange, he diſſembled his knowledge, or forced himſelf to a neſcience of them, he would not be known that he knew them, he made himſelf ſtrange to them, as if he had been ſome other man. Joſeph had abundance of kindneſs in his heart towards his Brethren, and therefore did (with State-Art) but feign a ſtrangeneſs: Job feared his Friends had no kindneſs at all in their hearts towards him, but were as real in their ſtrangeneſs, as if they had been very ſtrangers. Ye are not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, It adds to the ſinfulneſs of the evil we do, not be aſhamed that we have done it.

It is good to be aſhamed when we have done evil: Shame is a good effect of a bad cauſe; ſhame is the fruit of ſin: Till there was ſin in the World, there was no ſhame in the World; and ſin will make them aſhamed for ever, who ſin now and are not aſhamed. They who have not the ſhame of repentance, ſhall have the ſhame of puniſhment. As the people of God have this promiſe, that they ſhall never be aſhamed by the diſappointment of their hopes; ſo they have this promiſe alſo, that they ſhall be aſhamed repenting of their ſins. And indeed to confeſs or bewail ſin, and not to be aſhamed of it, is not repentance, but impudence. It is one of the greateſt deſigns of Satan at preſent to ſeparate ſin and ſhame, to make men at once bold and wicked. And he ſo far prevails with ſome, that they are ſo far from looking upon ſin as their ſhame, that they count it a kind of honour; and as the Apoſtle gives the character of ſuch brazen faces, with tears in his eyes, (Phil. 3. 19.) They glory in their ſhame; that is, what they look upon as their glory, is indeed their ſhame. The Prophet alſo ſpeaks of theſe (Iſa. 3. 9.) The ſhew of their countenance witneſſeth againſt them, they declare their ſin as Sodom, they hide it not: How did Sodom declare her ſin? Sodom did not declare her ſin as Nineveh, Repenting in duſt and aſhes: Sodom did not declare her ſin as they that are truly humbled before the Lord declare theirs, who, to uſe the Prophets language (Iſa. 43. 26.) Declare that they may be juſtified; but Sodom declared her ſin impudently, ſhe cared not who ſaw it, or who knew it: How ſad is it when Jeruſalem patterns her ſelf by Sodom? Jeremy complains of this (Chap. 6. 15.) Were they aſhamed when they had committed abomination? Nay, they were not at all aſhamed, neither could they bluſh: They who harden themſelves becauſe they would not bluſh, ſhall at laſt be ſo hardened that they cannot bluſh. Shame is the leading act unto repentance; they that are aſhamed of their ſin, are in a good way to turn from it. And hence ſhame is put ſometimes for repentance; What fruit have ye in thoſe things whereof ye are now aſhamed (Rom. 6. 21.) That is, whereof ye now repent, and from which ye are converted. The repentance of Ephraim is ſo deſcribed (Jer. 31. 19.) Surely after I was turned I repented, and after that I was inſtructed, I ſmote upon my thigh, I was aſhamed, yea, even confounded, &c. 'Tis beſt to do ſuch things of which we need not be aſhamed; but they that have done evil ſhall do well to be aſhamed: Job ſuppoſing his Friends had done ill in making themſelves ſtrange to him, charges this upon them as an aggravation of it, Ye are not aſham'd to make your ſelves ſtrange to me?

Secondly, From the matter about which they ought to have been aſham'd, their ſtrangeneſs to him; Ye are not aſham'd that ye make your ſelves ſtrange to me.

Obſerve, To be ſtrange to friends, ſpecially to godly friends, is an act that we ought to be aſham'd of.

It is a ſhameful thing to be aſham'd of friends, eſpecially of godly friends: This ſhame might juſtly fall upon many at this day; what ſtrangeneſs is there between friends, and godly friends? Such as heretofore lay in one anothers boſom, are grown ſo ſtrange, that they cannot ſtay with content in one anothers ſight, they will ſcarce look upon one another, who not long ſince (at leaſt in profeſſion) dearly loved one another. They who met purpoſely to ſpeak one to another, will ſcarce ſpeak to one another when they meet accidentally. Yea, they who ſhould be ready to dye for one another, can hardly live by one another. When ſhall we be aſhamed of this ſtrangeneſs? When will the love of many which hath waxen cold gather heat again? 'Tis Englands ſin at this day, Strangeneſs among the Saints; they who profeſs themſelves to be all acquainted with, and Friends to Jeſus Chriſt, are unfriendly and unacquainted among themſelves. They who are near to God, behold each other afar off. Were it not monſtrous, if one member of the body ſhould withdraw offices of love from another member, or ſhould be as a ſtranger to it? Theſe unnatural diſtances among the members of the ſame myſtical body, are too open either to be hid or denyed. Is it not a reproach to Chriſtianity, that they who indeed are members of the ſame Chriſt, ſhould act as if they were not members of the ſame World. To how many thouſands of Saints may we ſay, as Job here, Are ye not aſham'd to make your ſelves ſtrange one to another? And conſider this further, if ſtrangeneſs, if a meer withdrawing of converſe be ſo uncomely that Chriſtians ought to be aſham'd of it, what then is that which is the root of it, alienation to affections? If Chriſtians have cauſe to bluſh when they are not free and openhearted one to another, how ought they to be confounded, who are guilty of heart-burnings and bitterneſs of ſpirit one againſt another? If we ought to be aſhamed that we are not kind to one another, that we are not ready to do one another good, how ſhould we be aſham'd to be cruel to, or to deviſe evil one againſt another? Strangeneſs is not the doing of evil, but a ſuſpenſion from doing good, or from ſhewing wonted reſpects. Now if it be a ſhame not to do good, how ſhould we be aſham'd of doing evil to our Brethren?

Thirdly, We may conſider Job not only as a friend, and as a godly friend, but alſo as an afflicted friend, as a man almoſt overwhelmed with ſorrow.

Then obſerve, It is a ſhameful thing not to own a good man when he is in a low, or in the loweſt condition.

Job knew the time when enough would own him, when enough would viſit him, and were ambitious of his friendſhip; but being upon the dunghil, few would come at him, and none cared for his ſoul. Strangers deſire the favour of thoſe who are in proſperity, and neareſt friends will ſhew themſelves ſtrange to thoſe that are in adverſity; but is it not their ſhame to do ſo? Paul ſpeaks it to the high commendation of Oneſiphorus (2 Tim. 1. 16.) He oft refreſhed me, and was not aſhamed of my chain: Many are much aſhamed to look upon a godly friend in chains; as they are afraid to wear a chain for godlineſs. No man was ever more proud of his own golden chain, then ſome are aſhamed of the iron chain of others. When Jeſus Chriſt was apprehended and under his ſufferings, this temptation went high even upon his own Diſciples and Servants, whom he had often forewarned of ſufferings, and inſtructed how to ſuffer, (Matth. 26. 56, 58.) Then all the Diſciples forſook him and fled. They who before forſook all and followed him, now forſook him and fled: Neither was this the act of ſome one or two, but of all the Diſciples. Then all the Diſciples forſook him. And though Peter followed him, yet his following was as bad as a forſaking, for he followed him afar off (ver. 58.) And when he was come near into the houſe, he did worſe then forſake him, he denied him and forſwore him. Peter made himſelf ſo ſtrange to Chriſt, that he profeſſed ſtrongly, yea, with an Oath, I know not the Man: As if he had ſaid, If you will not take my word, I will ſwear I know him not: O what a diſtemper of ſpirit did fear bring him to? How was his ſpirit overwrought with worldly ſhame, when he wrought all theſe ſinful coverings, that he might appear a ſtranger to Jeſus Chriſt? O Peter, waſt thou not aſhamed to ſhew thy ſelf ſtrange to Jeſus Chriſt when he was afflicted, who was therefore afflicted to make us who were ſtrangers, and afar off from God, near unto him and his friends? It is no eaſie thing to be acquainted with the croſs of others; how hard will it be to be acquainted with our own croſs? If men be ſtrange to their friends when they are afflicted, O how ſtrange will they be to their own afflictions? When there is no ſutableneſs in our ſpirits to ſuffering and affliction, we cannot ſute with thoſe that ſuffer and are afflicted. The Man in the Goſpel (Luke 10. 30.) travelling from Jericho to Jeruſalem, fell among thieves, which ſtripped him of his rayment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead; then cometh a Levite and a Prieſt, and what do they? do they own the Man? No, they go on the other ſide, as if the Man had been ſick of the Plague, and they durſt not come near him for fear of infection; they ſaw him in that lamentable pickle, and paſſed by, they would not do the office of a Neighbour (that's the intent of the Parable, to ſhew who is a Mans Neighbour) if the Man had been mounted on his Horſe, riding gallantly on the way, poſſibly the Prieſt and the Levite would have joyn'd with him, and have ſaid, Sir, whither travel you? They would have fallen into diſcourſe with him, as a Man of their own Tribe, and have gone to the ſame Inn with him; but ſeeing him lye wounded, and groveling upon the high-way in his blood, they made themſelves ſtrange to him. As men naturally ſhun their own afflictions, ſo thoſe that are in affliction: 'Tis againſt the light and common principles of Nature to do ſo; yet naturally Men do ſo. And becauſe 'tis againſt the light of Nature to do ſo, therefore 'tis a ſhame to do ſo. And if it be againſt the light of Nature, and the principles of Morality, how much more is it againſt the light of Grace, and the principles of Religion, when this ſtrangeneſs is ſhewed to thoſe who have Grace, and are indeed religious? 'Tis a Goſpel-duty to do good to all, but eſpecially to the houſhold of Faith: They break all the bands and tyes of love, who refuſe to do them good that have received and expreſs the tokens of divine love; or are ſtrangers in affection to them, who are of the houſhold of Faith. Every godly Man may ſay to his uncharitable brethren, as Job did here to his friends, Are ye not aſhamed to make your ſelves ſtrange to me? Thus Job hath reproved his friends undeſerved ſeverity, and he reproves them yet further in the next words, upon ſuppoſition that he had deſerved it.

VERS. 4, 5, 6.

And be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with my ſelf.

If indeed you will magnifie your ſelves againſt me, and plead againſt me my reproach.

Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compaſſed me with his net.

IN the fourth and fifth Verſes of this Context, Job proceeds to reprove his Friends ſeverity towards him, by way of grant, or ſuppoſition. He reproves them, not only, becauſe they dealt thus with him who was innocent; but he ſuppoſes or grants (though he yields it not) that himſelf had been an offender, or had erred, and yet ſhews that their proceeding with him was juſtly offenſive and erroneous.

Verſe 4. And be it indeed that I have erred, &c.

He uſeth a figure in Rhetorick called conceſſion, when the Reſpondent is willing to grant more then the Opponent can prove, and gives that which is diſadvantageous to his cauſe, upon confidence of the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, or when he yieldeth as much as his Adverſary deſireth, Conceſſio eſt cum aliquid etiam iniquum videmus cauſæ fiducia pati. Quint.

Profeſſus ſum integritatem meam, ſed ut illam taceam, & confitear me errando provocaſſe iram Dei an continuò dignum eſt vobis ut miſerias accumuletis miſero. Pined. שגה importat deficere vel errare per ignorantiam.

and yet maintains what himſelf deſireth. Be it indeed that I have erred. As if he had ſaid, I have often profeſſed (and ſtill do) mine own innocency; but becauſe I ſee you are very greedy to charge me with, and convince me of an error, I will be ſilent in that point, and ſuppoſe, what you cannot prove; put caſe it be ſo, that I have erred, yet you have erred more in your carriage towards me: my error doth not juſtifie you in what you have ſpoken and done to me: Though I by ſin have provoked God to anger, will that bear you out in your anger againſt me? Muſt you needs ſmite me with your tongues, becauſe he hath ſmitten me with his hand? Will you add miſery to him that is in miſery?

Eſto ignoravi. Vulg.

Be it that I have erred.] Some render, Be it that I am ignorant, or have been ignorant. So the Vulgar.

The word in the Hebrew ſignifies two things.

Firſt, To be ignorant.

Secondly, To be in an error, or to fall into error through ignorance. (Pſal. 19. 12.) Who knoweth the errors (or ignorances) of his life?

The force of this word was opened (Chap. 6. 24. ) Therefore I ſhall not here ſtay upon it.

Be it that I have erred.] We may take it three wayes.

Firſt, Be it that I have erred in judgment, and think amiſs.

Secondly, Be it that I have erred in word, and have ſpoken amiſs.

Thirdly, Be it that I have erred in action, and have done amiſs. Lay the ſuppoſition thus large, be it that I have erred in opinion, in ſpeech and practiſe, yet what have you gained, or how can ye be excuſed?

We may conſider this clauſe firſt in it ſelf, and then in relation to this diſpute.

Be it that I have erred.] In as much as the ſame word ſignifies both ignorance, and error, it may ſuggeſt this note to us.

Ignorance and error are very near akin, yea, ignorance is the cauſe or mother of moſt errors.

Ignorantiæ duæ peſſimæ filiæ falſitas & dubietas. Aug. l. 22. de Civit. dei ca. 22.

Ignorance is the Mother of two very uncomely Daughters, as one of the Ancients long ſince obſerved. The firſt Daughter of Ignorance, is named Dubeity or doubtfulneſs, which is a conſtant wavering in opinion. A knowing Man hath a ſetled judgment, but an ignorant man (though he may be ſtubborn and wilful, yet he) cannot be fixt, or ſteady. The ſecond Daughter of Ignorance is named Falſity or error, which alwayes ſettles us (if ever it be ſetled) in that which is unſound. It may be hard to convince a knowing man of his error, but he that knows no reaſon, will not be convinced by reaſon. Error ſtrictly taken, proceeds ever from ignorance; for he that maintains either an opinion or a practiſe againſt the light of his knowledge, is more then in an error; 'tis obſtinacy in him, as it refers to practiſe; 'tis hereſie in him, as it refers to opinion.

Secondly, Job ſuppoſed that which might very well be, while he ſaid, Be it that I have erred; he did not ſuppoſe an impoſſibility.

Hence Obſerve, It is common to man, to the beſt of men, to godly men, to be in an error.

A godly man ſhould not ſuppoſe himſelf an Heretick; who as he uſually errs againſt light, ſo he alwayes delights in his error; but he may ſuppoſe himſelf erring for want of light. They who in this life have moſt light in them, have alſo much darkneſs in them; and we are apter to follow the darkneſs of our own ſpirits, then the light of Gods Spirit. He that thinks he cannot err, reckons himſelf for more then a man. And while we confeſs that either we have, or may err, we do but confeſs that we are men. Yea, as he that ſaith, He hath not ſinned, ſo he that ſaith, he hath not erred, hath no truth in him. A denial that we have erred, is the grand error; and there are none ſo ſtiff in that denial, as they who are moſt erroneous. While there remains any corruption in the will, the underſtanding cannot be wholly free from corruption. While ſin hath any part in us, it may act it ſelf in every part. Though ſome (poſſibly) do not err, yet 'tis too much for any man to ſay ſo of himſelf; no man is exempt from a poſſibility of erring: Till we arrive at perfect purity, we ſhall not arrive at infallibility.

Thirdly, Note, Conceſſions are ſometimes the ſtrongeſt refutations.

We may unanſwerably convince others of an error, by ſuppoſing that we have erred.

Laſtly, Take this brief Note alſo, It may be our wiſdom to give another leave or ſcope to ſay, that we have erred when we have not: but it is our ſin to charge our ſelves poſitively with error, when we have not erred.

It is one thing to let it be ſuppoſed that we have erred when we have not, and another thing to ſay we have erred when we have not. No man hath liberty to charge himſelf falſly, to take that ſin or that error upon his own account, whereof he is not guilty. Yea, we ought to be more careful that we bear not falſe witneſs againſt our ſelves, then againſt another. Every man (next to God) owes moſt duty and reſpect to himſelf. And as we muſt not ſuffer the glory of God, or the credit of our brethren to be diminiſhed, ſo neither muſt we ſuffer our own. We may let others work upon a ſuppoſition of that which is not; but we muſt not make poſitions either concerning our ſelves or others of that which is not. We may ſpeak it Rhetorically, but we muſt not ſpeak it Logically, that we have erred when we have not. Thus Job ſpeaks, Be it indeed that I have erred.

Mine error remaineth with my ſelf.] This ſounds like an aggravation of Job's ſinfulneſs; If he had ſaid, Be it that I have erred, yet I am now willing to renounce and depart from my error; or ſuppoſe I have erred, I will now diſclaim and recant mine error; this had ſounded well. But to ſay, Be it that I have erred, mine error remaineth with my ſelf, ſeems to imply a love to error, a hugging, and an embracing of it. We ſay, It is incident to man to err, but to perſevere in error, or willingly to let error remain upon us, is diabolical and wicked. How is it then that Job ſaith, Mine error remaineth with my ſelf?

Humanum eſt errare, in errore perſeverare eſt diabolicum.

The word that we tranſlate remain, ſignifies, to dwell, to tarry, to reſt, to take up a nights lodging. All which expreſſions ſeem to meet in this, that he was willing his error ſhould not be tranſcient but permanent; not as a paſſing ſtranger, but as a welcome friend. We have the word (Jer. 4. 14.) where the Prophet chargeth this upon Jeruſalem, O Jeruſalem waſh thine heart from wickedneſs, that thou mayeſt be ſaved: How long ſhall thy vain thoughts lodge (or reſt) with thee? The beſt have vain thoughts, paſſing through them; vain thoughts will come and knock at the door for entertainment; but to open the door and receive them, to like and lodge them, this argues a heart not waſhed from wickedneſs. But did Job's error thus remain and lodge with him?

Mecum morabitur, dormiet, manebit, pernoctabit, habitabit, hæc omnia ſignificat verbum לון

There are three or four Interpretations in anſwer to this.

Firſt, Thus, Mine error remaineth with my ſelf. If I have erred, mine error will not hurt you, it hurts no body but my ſelf: What need you be ſo angry with me for mine error? You ſhall not anſwer for it; you ſhall not ſuffer for what I have done amiſs: So divers give the ſence. But this, according to ordinary underſtanding, is very unbecoming a gracious ſpirit. As Job tells his Wife (Chap. 2.) when ſhe adviſed him to curſe God, and dye, Thou ſpeakeſt like one of the fooliſh women. So, according to vulgar ſence, it might be ſaid, that Job in ſpeaking thus, ſpake as a fooliſh man, who when he is told of his faults, ſaith, What is that to you; my faults ſhall not dammage you. Thus waſters and rioters miſ ſpending their eſtates, being told of it, or reproved for it, anſwer, Why do you meddle with us? you ſhall not ſmart for what we do: Such is the language of fooliſh and vain men, who have neither honeſty to do well, nor can be aſhamed when they do ill. Such anſwers ſpeak a man who hath neither any love to holineſs, nor abhorrence of wickedneſs: For as it argues a ſinful frame of heart to let another lye in ſin, or to ſay, what is it to me that my Brother ſinneth, he may look to himſelf, Am I my Brothers keeper? So when a man ſaith, Why do you trouble your ſelf about my ſin? What is that to you? Let me alone, take you no care of me; Mine error remaineth with my ſelf.

In me ſit iſte error illiuſque punitio, quid ad vos? nihil vos læſi.

Talis reſpōſio eſt illius, qui neq; pudoris habeat illum nec virtutis ſtudiū. Sanct.

Sinete me luere pœnas erroris mei, ego ſum qui ob eum punior, non vos quid ad vos? hoc dicit illorum aſperitatē taxans, ut levius ſibi putet mala quæ patitur perferre, quam eorum contumelias audire. Merc.

Yet ſome who maintain this explication, make a favourable conſtruction of it. As if he had ſaid thus, To bear the worſt that my error can bring upon me, is not ſo bad as your ſevere dealing with me; your reproaches and cenſures grieve me more, then all my afflictions; 'tis more troubleſome to hear what you will ſay to me, then to feel what God doth to me. All the evil which I ſuffer from his hand, is not ſo heavy as your tongue, his blows are not ſo bitter and ſmarting as your words. But I paſs that.

Non propter vos ab opinione mea diſcedam quam vos errorem appellatis, Rab. Set.

Secondly, One of the Rabbins interprets it in the future, thus, Be it that I have erred, I am reſolved to err ſtill, or my error ſhall remain with me. As if he had ſaid, That which you call an error, I am purpoſed to hold ſtill. As Paul profeſſed (Acts 24. 14.) After the way which they call hereſie, ſo worſhip I the God of my Father. So Job ſpake here according to the tendency of this interpretation. Job was not reſolved to ſtick to an error indeed, but (ſaith he) if you call this an error which I have maintained, I am reſolved to maintain it, I will not be driven from my opinion, becauſe you have branded it for an error. This, where it hits right, is a juſt and vertuous pertinacy.

He that judgeth himſelf to be in the truth, ſhould not leave it becauſe others call it error.

As we ſhould not take up error, becauſe ſome (poſſibly wiſe and learned Men) call it truth; ſo neither ſhould we let go or depart from that which is truth, becauſe many (poſſibly wiſe and learned Men too) call it error. As we ought to try all things, ſo to hold faſt that which is good, whoſoever would pull it from us. The evidence which any way or opinion hath from the Word of God, and the clear light of our own Conſciences, may bear us out againſt any contrary evidence or contradiction of man. It becomes the people of God, to be meek and yielding, that a little Child may lead them (Iſa. 11. 6.) in the right way; yet it becomes them as well to be ſo ſtout and true to the Truth, that the greateſt Men in the World ſhould neither lead nor force them out of it.

Thirdly, The words are expounded as a redargution of his Friends inſufficiency in arguing with him; Mine error remaineth with me: That is, You have not yet removed mine error, nor convinced me that I am out of the way. All that you have ſaid, doth not ſatisfie my Conſcience, nor give me any light to change my judgment. You have ſpoken much, but you have proved little; your reaſons are more in number then weight; I find not my ſelf at all preſſed with them, nor hath mine opinion received any dammage, much leſs a downfal by them. If I have erred, mine error remaineth with me, ſafe and untoucht, for any thing you have hitherto done or ſaid. Job ſpake this ſence before (Chap. 6. 25.) How forcible are right words, but what doth your arguing reprove? This is a fair Interpretation.

Hence Note, Many are bitter againſt thoſe whom they ſuppoſe to be in error, whom yet they have not proved to be in an error.

Job's Friends had reproached him ten times, but they had not anſwered him to purpoſe once. He had ſtore of hard words from them, but few ſound arguments. It is an eaſier matter to be angry with error, then to argue againſt it. And the reaſon why many are ſo angry, is becauſe they have ſo little reaſon. Much paſſion and little reaſon uſually dwell together. They will often be moſt earneſt againſt an opinion, who have leaſt to ſay againſt it.

Fourthly, The words are interpreted with reference to that which follows, (Ver. 5.) If indeed ye will magnifie your ſelves againſt me: As if he had ſaid, Let it be granted, that I am in an error, and not only ſo, but that mine error remaineth, that I perſiſt in mine error after all your counſels and admonitions; yet, ye ought not to magnifie your ſelves againſt me, or trample upon me. Though you cannot all this while gain me from mine error, and make me ſenſible of my miſtake, yet you may not (without juſt blame) thus reproach and throw dirt upon me.

Hence Note, He that cannot be convinced nor reclaimed from his error, muſt not preſently be inſulted over and reproached.

Though he that is an Heretick after the firſt and ſecond admonition, is to be rejected (Tit. 3. 10.) yet every one that is in an error ought not. The Apoſtle gives an excellent Rule (2 Tim. 2. 24, 25.) The ſervant of the Lord muſt not ſtrive, but be gentle unto all men, in meekneſs inſtructing thoſe that oppoſe themſelves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. I ſhall touch at this again by and by.

Verſ. 5. If indeed you will magnifie your ſelves againſt me, and plead againſt me my reproach.

As this Verſe may be connected with the former in the ſence laſt given, ſo with the following Verſe; Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compaſſed me with his net; and then the meaning is this; Let it be granted that I am in an error, If ye (upon that ground) magnifie your ſelves againſt me, and plead againſt me my reproach, then know that God hath overthrown me, and he hath compaſſed me with his net. There's an anſwer for you: This may put you to ſilence, and ſtop your mouths, both from villifying me, and overvaluing your ſelves. As if he had ſaid, The hand of God is upon me, why do you lift up your heads againſt me? Doth it become you to greaten your ſelves, becauſe God hath made me little? Or to heighten your ſpirits againſt me, when God hath laid me low?

If indeed you will magnifie your ſelves againſt me.

תגדילו. a גדל in hiphil, Magnificavit, auxit, magnificè egit, magna locutus, gloriatus fuit. Shind.

The word which we tranſlate to magnifie, refers both to words and works, ſignifying as to act highly, ſo to ſpeak big, to boaſt and vaunt. We magnifie God, not by making him Great, but by making it appear how great he is. But when Man magnifies himſelf, either he would make himſelf appear greater and better then he is, or he would make his fellow-brethren appear leſs and worſe then they are. (Pſal. 35. 26.) Let them be aſhamed, and brought to confuſion together that rejoyce at mine hurt; let them be cloathed with ſhame and diſhonour that magnifie themſelves againſt me. While David prayed that theſe ſelf-magnifiers and admirers might be brought to ſhame, he plainly intimates, both that they had taken more honour to themſelves then was their due, and that they had taken that from him, which was his due. Thus he pleads with God again upon the ſame account (Pſal. 38. 16.) For I ſaid, hear me, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould rejoyce over me; when my foot ſlippeth, they magnifie themſelves againſt me: As if he had ſaid, Lord, hold me up and eſtabliſh my goings, for if I ſlip, mine enemies think they ſtand the faſter, and if I fall, their pride riſeth. Once more, he complains of the inſultations of his falſe friends in the day of his diſtreſs. (Pſal. 55. 12.) It was not an enemy (that is, an open enemy) that reproached me, then I could have born it; neither was it he that hated me (that is, who profeſſed hatred) that magnified himſelf againſt me, then I would have hid my ſelf from him. While David's profeſſed or ſecret enemies magnified themſelves, they ever leſſened, and abaſed him.

Quandoquidem vobis viſum eſt ærumnas meas Grandiloquentia tanta deſcribere, &c. Bez. Ingrandeſcitis. Heb.

Thus here; If indeed ye will magnifie your ſelves againſt me, if ye will grow upon me, or (as we ſay) crow over me in words; if ye will flouriſh it in high language, and come with full mouth againſt me, then know, &c. Maſter Broughton refers it to their whole carriage, rendring it thus, And truly ye deal ſtately over me.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, Man is apt to magnifie himſelf over thoſe that he ſuppoſeth fallen into error, or whom he ſees fallen into trouble.

Man is ready to think highly of himſelf, when he beholds another down. We ſee this in that great caſe (about which the Apoſtle enlarges his diſcourſe, Rom. 11.) between the Jews and Gentiles. The Jews were fallen, they were as branches broken off: The Gentiles, who were a wild Olive-tree, were graffed in among (or for) them, ver. 17. The Apoſtle had a jealouſie that this priviledge would ſwell the Gentiles into great thoughts of themſelves, and into a contempt of the Jews, and therefore he cautions them (verſ. 18.) Boaſt not againſt the branches; that is, againſt the branches that are broken off. For if thou boaſteſt, thou beareſt not the root, but the root thee? But it may be objected againſt the Apoſtles way of arguing; Why, what if they did not boaſt? Should they then bear the root, and not the root them? Surely whether they boaſted or boaſted not, they being branches, the root muſt bear them, and not they the root. I anſwer, The Apoſtle doth not at all ſuppoſe, that if they did not boaſt they ſhould bear the root, but uſes this as an argument why they ſhould not boaſt againſt the branches which were broken off, even becauſe themſelves, though graffed in, yet were but branches, and therefore they did not bear the root, but the root them. Now there is nothing more uncomely then to boaſt againſt that thing or perſon which beareth us up, or againſt that which receiveth no benefit from us, but we receive much from it. As the Apoſtle ſpeaks in the cloſe of the ſeventeenth verſe; Thou with them partakeſt of the root and fatneſs of the Olive-tree. By the Olive-tree, we are to underſtand the viſible Church of God (Jer. 11. 16.) The Lord called thy name a green Olive-tree, fair and of goodly fruit. The root of this Olive-tree was Abraham, by vertue of the Church-covenant in Chriſt, which was made firſt, by name, with him, who is hence alſo called the Father of the faithful. Yet (in paſſage) take this caution, Abraham was not the root of the Olive-tree (the Church) by way of communication, as if either Jews or Gentiles did receive any ſap of ſpiritual life from him, as branches do of a natural life from the root; for thus Jeſus Chriſt alone is the root of the Church, or of all Believers; but Abraham was and is the root of the Olive-tree only in a way of Adminiſtration. The Lord calling him forth as the firſt Man with whom he was pleaſed to treat, and enter that Covenant with, which yet was originally, and (as I may ſpeak) radically made with Chriſt, in the behalf not only of ordinary Believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, but even of Abraham himſelf. Thus I have ſtept a little out of my way, to ſhew in what ſence Abraham is called the root of the Olive-tree. The fatneſs of this Olive-tree, is all the outward Priviledges and Ordinances inſtituted, together with the inward Graces promiſed. Of this root and fatneſs the Gentiles did partake, being taken into the viſible Church, from which, before, they were aliens and ſtrangers. Now though the Gentiles were thus eſtated through free Grace in the priviledges of the Jews, yet Paul foreſaw that they inſtead of thankfulneſs to God for the mercy beſtowed on them, would be ready to exalt themſelves againſt the Jews, who for a time, through their own unbelief, were caſt down and broken off, and therefore he ſaith, Boaſt not againſt the branches. And again (ver. 20.) Be not high-minded, but fear: As if he had ſaid, Thy ſtate is high, let not thy mind be ſo too: The Jews are fallen, and unleſs thou walkeſt in holy fear, thou canſt not ſtand. The Apoſtle gives another inſtance of mans readineſs to exalt himſelf againſt thoſe that are weak in faith, as before againſt thoſe who were fallen through unbelief. (Rom. 14. 3.) Let not him that eateth, deſpiſe him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not, judge him that eateth; for God hath received him. Here are two ſorts, him that eateth, and him that eateth not: He that did eat was the ſtrong Brother; he that did not eat was the weak Brother. Now the ſtrong who had a clear light about Goſpel-liberties, and was fully convinced that the difference of meats was taken away by Chriſt, ſeeing his Brother ſcrupled, and forbearing to eat, judged him preſently as weak, and ſo was ready at once to deſpiſe him, and magnifie himſelf. Theſe two may eaſily enough be diſtinguiſhed, but they are never ſeparated. He that thinks lightly of another, hath alwayes high thoughts of himſelf. A deſpiſer of the leaſt of his brethren, is no ſmall man in his own opinion. Paul being informed that the ſtrong (among the Saints at Rome) deſpiſed the weak, did not only forbid them in this third verſe, but chides them at the tenth verſe, Why doſt thou judge thy Brother? Or, Why doſt thou ſet at naught thy Brother? And as he took down the Gentiles, Chap. 14. with Be not high-minded, but fear. So he doth theſe, with We ſhall all ſtand before the Judgment-ſeat of Chriſt. As if he had ſaid, We muſt all be judged by One, and therefore let not any one be ſo buſie in judging: To love is our duty, to judge is Chriſts prerogative, let us be more in charity, and leſs in cenſure.

Paul alſo intimates this harſhneſs of ſpirit towards a fallen Brother, in the dealing of the Corinthians with the inceſtuous perſon, whom himſelf had ordered to be caſt out of the Church, and given up to Satan (1 Cor. 5. 5. 13.) He perceived their ſpirits too high againſt him, and therefore in the ſecond Epiſtle he mollifies and moderates them (Chap. 2. 6.) Sufficient to ſuch a man is this puniſhment which was inflicted of many; do not puniſh him ſtill, do not imbitter your ſpirits againſt him; Ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, leaſt he be ſwallowed up with with over-much ſorrow (ver. 7.) We cannot have over-much faith in God, we cannot have over-much love to God; the greateſt abundance of theſe is no exceſs, but we may have over-much ſorrow; and though we cannot be too preſſing upon Saints to believe, and love, yet we may be too preſſing upon ſinners to mourn and ſorrow. Wherefore (ſaith the Apoſtle) I beſeech you to confirm your love towards him. Carry it meekly, mildly, and gently with your formerly offending, but now deeply humbled and repenting Brother; do not magnifie your ſelves againſt him, who hath abaſed and laid himſelf low before you.

Secondly, Obſerve, It is very ſinful to magnifie our ſelves againſt thoſe that are fallen.

Firſt, Such forget their own frailty, how apt they are to fall. We ſhould be taught by the failings of ſome, what we may be tempted to do, as well as we ſhould be taught by the holy actings of others what we ought to do. That corruption, that temptation which hath prevailed againſt thy Brother, and caſt him down, may prevail againſt thee too, and caſt thee down. Wherefore let him that thinketh he ſtandeth (not inſult over his Brother that is fallen, but remember that himſelf may fall, and) take heed leſt he fall; as the Apoſtle gives us warning (1 Cor. 10. 12.)

Secondly, Such forget that themſelves have fallen into other ſins or errors, and poſſibly into the ſame: Some who are deeper in ſin and error of another kind, then their Brethren in thoſe charged upon them, or proved againſt them, yet cannot contain from over-acting in cenſures upon them. Yea, ſometimes they who have fallen into the very ſame ſin, and have been chief in it, will yet heighten themſelves againſt thoſe who have ſinned with them, till they are awakened to conſider their own ſin. Judah had defiled Tamar (Gen. 38. 24.) yet as ſoon as they brought word that Tamar was with child, Burn her (ſaith he) to the fire with her preſently. Thus he condemned her, being himſelf guilty of the ſame fault. He was a moſt ſevere Judge of that crime in her, for which it doth not appear that he ever ſo much as queſtion'd himſelf, though the principal. The Scribes and Phariſees (John 8. 5.) haled the poor Woman taken in adultery before Chriſt, they called for Juſtice, and urged the Law. Yet it ſhould ſeem that they were as bad as ſhe or worſe; for when Chriſt ſaid, He that is without ſin among you, let him firſt caſt a ſtone at her, they went out one by one, being convicted within their own conſciences, which ſecretly ſuggeſted, that they could not throw a ſtone at her for that offence, but they muſt alſo hit themſelves. How ſinful is it to vex and judge others for that, of which our ſelves are guilty, and have never asked forgiveneſs. But ſuppoſe a man were free from that ſpot, which he ſees his Brother hath taken, and is defiled with. Yea, ſuppoſe him as far from a poſſibility of taking a ſinful ſpot, as the holy Angels confirmed by Grace, yet it were ſinful even for him to magnifie himſelf againſt thoſe that are fallen into ſin. Doth God inſult over poor ſinners? No, he pities and he ſpares them. The Lord doth not magnifie himſelf againſt any who are fallen, unleſs ſuch as being fallen, riſe up and magnifie themſelves againſt him by their impenitency and preſumption. Now doth God (againſt whom man offends when he falls) pity him, and deal tenderly with him, and ſhall man inſult over an offending Brother? It is our duty to bewail and pray for thoſe that fall, to help, and counſel them up again. To bleſs God who hath kept us from thoſe ſnares and temptations, with which, as we ſee others are, ſo our ſelves might be overcome. Such thoughts will keep us from ſwellings and ſelf-magnifyings againſt our Brethren, though they have erred, yea, though their error remaineth with them. If ye will magnifie your ſelves againſt me,

Increpatis probose non ſpiritu lenitatis.

And plead againſt me my reproach.] Some render the whole verſe thus, Should you magnifie your ſelves againſt me, and plead reproachfully againſt me? you ſhould not; 'tis not only beſide, but againſt your duty to do ſo.

Hence Note, We may repreve, but not reproach an erring brother.

We ſhould have a reſpect to the credit of our Brother, while we are rectifying either his conſcience or his converſation; and while we take care to ſave his ſoul, we muſt not be careleſs of his name, or deſtroy his reputation. Reprehenſion ſhould not ſavour of reproach. Our zeal for God muſt be mingled with pity towards man. The Apoſtle gives that Rule (Gal. 6. 1.) Brethren, If a man be over-taken in a fault, you that are ſpiritual reſtore ſuch a one (ſet him in joynt again. How? With a rough hand? No,) with the ſpirit of meekneſs; Do not plead againſt him his reproach. Do not charge his ſin upon him, as if his ſin were not common to man; Do it conſidering thy ſelf, leſt thou alſo be tempted. Deal clearly, and faithfully, but not reproachfully with him; Reſtore him with the ſpirit of meekneſs. Paul was unwilling to deal ſeverely with the faulty Corinthians, and therefore he, as it were, puts it to their choice, and even begs of them to prevent his coming among them with a rod in his hand (1 Cor. 4. 21.) What will ye? Shall I come to you with a rod, or in love, and in the ſpirit of meekneſs? Now ſurely, he that was unwilling to chaſten them with the rod of reproof, had no will to ſting or bite them with the Scorpion of reproach.

Omnis reprehenſio vacare debet contumelia.

Again, Reproach may be taken for affliction it ſelf: And then the ſence riſeth thus; as if he had ſaid, Suppoſe I have erred, and that mine error remaineth with my ſelf; Will you plead my afflictions againſt me as an argument that I am in, or remain in an error? So Mr. Broughton renders it, You bring my wretched caſe as an argument againſt me. Afflictions are often called in Scripture, reproaches; becauſe they are charged on the afflicted as a reproach. Thus Rachel ſpeaks (Gen. 30. 23.) God hath taken away my reproach: That is, My affliction of barrenneſs, which was objected againſt me as a reproach. The ſame Elizabeth (Luke 1. 25.) She having conceived hid her ſelf five months, and ſaid, God hath taken away my reproach. So (Ezek. 36. 30.) the Lord promiſeth his people, that they ſhall receive no more the reproach of famine among the Heathen: For when the Heathen ſaw the people of God in outward wants, and eaten up with famine, they at once blaſphemed the holy Name of God, and reproached them; See what a God ye ſerve, you that would be eſteemed the darlings of heaven, ſee your condition, your God ſuffers you to ſtarve, to be hunger-bitten: Therefore they are comforted with this word, You ſhall not ſuffer the reproach of famine among the Heathen: implying, that the Heathen uſually reproached them in times of famine and affliction.

Hence Note, Affliction layeth us open to reproach.

And that is one of the greateſt burdens of affliction. The old Poet could ſay, That poverty had nothing more grievous in it then this, that it leaves men under diſgrace, and expoſes them to ſcorn. Worldly men eſteem others, by their lands, and riches, not by their goodneſs, or the grace of God.

Secondly, Note, We are apt to plead the evil which any man ſuffers as an argument of his ſin.

The reproach or affliction which Job ſuffered, was all the argument and proof which his Friends could produce againſt him. They brought no witneſſes to accuſe him, but what they found upon him, his poverty and diſeaſes. Job's uprightneſs had never been queſtioned by them, if he had not loſt his riches. Other paſſages of this Book, have yielded the like Obſervation, and therefore I only touch it here; and as Job's Friends inſiſt often upon the ſame arguments for ſubſtance, ſo alſo doth Job upon the ſame anſwers and replies. Job hath already told his Friends more then once, in effect, what he is about to tell them in the next Verſe.

Verſe 6. Know that God hath overthrown me, and compaſſed me about with his net.

Will you plead my reproach, or my affliction againſt me? If you will, I deſire you to conſider whence or from what hand my affliction comes; Know that God hath overthrown me.

Know.] There is ſometimes a threat, alwayes a reproof in this form of ſpeaking. Know, is, I would have you know, or you ſhall know to your coſt. It uſually implyes a teaching by correction, yea, by deſtruction, not by inſtruction (Exod. 7. 5.) When God ſaith, The Egyptians ſhall know that I am the Lord, He means, they ſhould know it to their ſorrow, or by their ſorrow: As if he had ſaid, You will not acknowledge it, but you ſhall know that I am the Lord; you ſhall know by your own puniſhments that I have power both to command and puniſh. We have a like expreſſion (Pſal. 9. 20.) Put them in fear, O Lord, that the Nations may know themſelves to be but men. But were the Nations unskill'd in this piece of knowledge? It is indeed a very hard thing for a man to know himſelf; but, it ſeems, very eaſie for any man to know that he is but a man. The Orator ſaith, There was never any Nation ſo rudely barbarous, but knew there was a God; and ſurely there was never any Nation ſo blindly ambitious, as not to know themſelves to be but men. The Pſalmiſt therefore doth not ſuppoſe that they thought themſelves more then men in the conſtitution of their nature, but in the inſtitution of their lives. They think themſelves Gods, who either will act by their own rules, or are confident they can give ſucceſs to their own actions; when men either do what they pleaſe, or think they are able to carry whatſoever they do, then they forget that they are but men. Hence David prayes, O Lord, put them in fear, daſh their counſels, break their plots, then the Nations will know, that is, thou ſhalt make them know that they are but men. So here, Know that God hath overthrown me, is, as if he had ſaid, You have not taken notice of this, I have ſpoken of it before, and you would not receive it, you have acted towards me, as if God had nothing to do in bringing me thus low. Therefore I warn you again, Know that God hath overthrown me: I tell you, it is your error and ſin, to charge my afflictions upon the account of my ſin, Know that God hath overthrown me. He hath done it, who may do it to an innocent, and yet be juſt himſelf. And ſeeing God hath done it, how know you that he hath done it, becauſe my ſin provoked him to do it, rather then becauſe himſelf (for ends beſt known to himſelf) was pleaſed to do it?

Mirus habet hæc loquendi formula.

Know that God hath overthrown me.

The word tranſlated overthrown, ſignifies in its root, to turn a thing aſide, to put it out of the way, as alſo the making of a thing crooked; and in the Noun, that which is crooked, Lam. 3. 36. He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men. To cruſh under his feet all the priſoners of the earth, To turn aſide the right of a man before the face of the moſt high, To ſubvert a man in his cauſe, the Lord approveth not. The Lord doth not ſubvert or overthrow a man in his cauſe. God did not overthrow Job's right, but his ſtate. The Vulgar tranſlation ſpeaks that in the Letter (and the Original will bear it) Know, that God hath not afflicted me according to juſtice. Yet that reading doth not charge injuſtice upon God, for that were blaſphemy: But the ſence is, he hath not done it according to the way of men, or the ordinary courſe of Juſtice between man and man. God acts that juſtly towards man by his prerogative, which between man and man were perverting of Juſtice. Hence the Lord himſelf tells Satan (Chap. 2. 3.) Thou movedſt me to deſtroy him without cauſe. To deſtroy a man without cauſe, is to pervert Juſtice. In that ſence we may underſtand Job here; Know that God hath overthrown me: As if he had ſaid, He hath not dealt with me by the common rule of legal proceedings, but according to the pleaſure of his own will. God never doth any man, nor hath he done me any injuſtice; yet mans juſtice is not the ſquare of what he hath done to me; therefore you are quite beſides the buſineſs, when all along you charge me with ſin, and error, as the reaſon of all my ſufferings; Know that God hath overthrown me. Firſt, Job ſpeaks this declaratively, not complainingly; he affirms God had done it; but he did not murmur becauſe he had done it.

Hence Note, A godly man freely and chearfully owns the hand of God in all his troubles.

As when he is raiſed, he owns the hand of God delivering and reſtoring him; ſo when he is overthrown, he owns the hand of God ſmiting and caſting him down. We honour God as much by looking to him as the Author and Orderer of our afflictions, as of our conſolations; of our loſſes, as well as of our gainings; of our overthrows, as well as of our victories. The Confeſſions of the Church run fully in this ſtream, Pſal. 44. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14. Thou haſt caſt us off, and put us to ſhame. Thou makeſt us turn back from the enemy. Thou haſt given us like ſheep appointed for meat. Thou ſelleſt thy people for nought. Thou makeſt us a reproach to our neighbours. Thou makeſt us a by-word among the Heathen. An evil heart obſerves not the hand of God, either eſtabliſhing or overthrowing. The Prophet ſpeaks this fully (Iſa. 26. 11.) Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not ſee: What had the hand of God been doing that they were thus wilfully blind, and would not ſee? The tenth verſe tells us his hand had been doing good; Let favour be ſhewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteouſneſs, &c. in the Land of uprightneſs will he deal unjuſtly, and will not behold the Majeſty of the Lord. Now as wicked men will not ſee the hand of God in favours, ſo not in judgments. Their ſight is bounded with ſecond cauſes; the Creature is their Horizon, and ſhuts them in, they ſee nothing above or beyond it. 'Tis the malice of this man, or the unfaithfulneſs of that man, which hath overthrown them. 'Twas the negligence of thoſe they imployed as inſtruments, or the activity of thoſe that were oppoſite to them, 'twas a chance, or their ill fortune, upon which they have miſcarried. God is not in all their thoughts.

Secondly, Job tells his Friends, God hath overthrown me, that he might abate the keenneſs of their ſpirits towards him, and to move compaſſion.

Hence Obſerve, We ſhould take heed of troubling or grieving them, who are already grieved and troubled under the afflicting hand of God.

And if it be unnatural and uncomely to grieve thoſe who are in ſorrow, what is it to rejoyce at their ſorrow? The wiſdom of God gives caution againſt this, even in the caſe of an enemy, (Prov. 24. 17, 18.) Rejoyce not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he ſtumbleth; (Why not? The reaſon is ſubjoyned) Leſt the Lord ſee it, and it diſpleaſe him, and he turn away his wrath from him: That is, The Lord will take it ſo ill at thy hand, to ſee thee rejoycing at the fall of thine enemy, who hath been overthrown by his hand, that he will turn his wrath upon thee inſtead of him.

Convertet ab illo vel redire faciet iram ſuam, ſc. in te.

Fourthly, Job ſaith, God hath overthrown me; to ſhew his Friends, that there was no neceſſity why they ſhould charge him with wickedneſs, becauſe he was overthrown.

Hence Note, God may, and oft doth overthrow his choiceſt ſervants, and ſpoil them of all outward comforts, without reſpect to their ſinfulneſs.

When we ſee man puniſhed by man, we may well conclude he is a tranſgreſſor, becauſe no man hath power to afflict, or to overthrow an Innocent: Man hath no right to ſmite his Brother, either in body or eſtate, but for his fault. But when God ſmiteth man, we cannot conclude unerringly, that he doth it for his faults or errors. Know that God hath overthrown me,

Metaphora à re venatoria.

And compaſſed me with his net.] It is a Metaphor from hunting. The Church bemoans her ſad condition in this language (Lam. 1. 13.) From above hath he ſent fire into my bones, and it prevaileth againſt me; he hath ſpread a net for my feet. Thus Zedekiah is threatened (Ezek. 12. 13.) My net alſo will I ſpread upon him, and he ſhall be taken in my ſnare.

מצור à radice צור ſignificat rete vel etiā arcem & munitionem altiſſimam & fortiſſimam.

The Hebrew word which we tranſlate Net, ſignifies alſo a Tower, or Caſtle, or Fort. A learned Interpreter contends earneſtly for this tranſlation: And gives Reaſons why it ſhould be rather tranſlated Tower, then Net. Firſt, From the words following in the next verſe, where Job ſpeaks of himſelf as if he were crying out at a priſon window, Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard. Secondly, Becauſe at the eighth verſe he ſpeaks of darkneſs ſet in his paths; which ſuits better with the metaphor of a Priſon-tower, then of a Net. But whether we render Tower, or Net, the meaning is the ſame: And by both, afflictions are underſtood. And when he ſaith, He hath compaſſed me with his net, he ſhews the extenſion or largeneſs of his affliction; for as when promiſe is made to him that truſteth in the Lord, That mercy ſhall compaſs him about (Pſal. 32. 10.) the meaning is, that he ſhall have many and manifold mercies, compleat and perfect mercies. So that's a compleat affliction which compaſſeth us about, as a net doth a bird or beaſt that is enſnared in it.

Afflictions may be compared to a net for divers Reaſons.

Firſt, Becauſe there is a contrivance in them, a divine hand doth as it were weave divers providences together, and knot them one with another, to make up an affliction. The Lord uſeth a kind of holy art and skill in the preparation of our troubles. There is as much wiſdom ſeen in framing and forming of our afflictions, as there is mercy and kindneſs in working our deliverances and ſalvations. Hence alſo the Church compares them to a building, which is an artificial pile or Fabrick, He hath builded againſt me (Lam. 3. 5.)

Secondly, Afflictions are like unto a net, becauſe moſt men fall ſuddenly into them, and are taken unawares. Job indeed ſaith of his affliction (Chap. 3. 25.) The thing which I greatly feared is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. It ſeems he was jealous of a change; and though his mountain was ſtrong, yet he ſaid not (as David once did) I ſhall never be moved. But uſually men put the evil day far from them, and look no more for trouble then the ſilly bird doth for the net when ſhe is caught with it.

Thirdly, Afflictions are like a net, becauſe we are entangled with them; we are entangled with doubts what to do, yea, in affliction we are ready to ſay, Lord, we know not what to do. If we know and are reſolved what to do, then we are apt to be entangled, either with cares how, and by whom to get it done, or with fears, that when all is done, it will not be ſucceſsful and effectual for our deliverance.

Fourthly, Afflictions are like a net, becauſe we being once entangled in them are held faſt, and cannot get forth, till God, who hath compaſſed and taken us with his net, be pleaſed to open it, and diſingage us from our entanglements. The bird cannot get out of the net till ſhe is taken out. We bring our ſelves into trouble, but unleſs the Lord bring us out, there we ſtick. As our eternal, ſo our temporal ſalvations are of the Lord. The nets of affliction which God makes are ſtrong enough to hold the ſtrongeſt. His nets are not like the Cobweb or Spiders net, which detain the weak Flyes, but are eaſily broken by the greater or leſſer Fowls. Though a wild Bull come into Gods net, as the Prophet ſpeaks (Iſ. 51. 20.) yet neither his might nor his madneſs can help him out. It was noted, in opening the Original word here uſed for a net, that it may ſignifie alſo a Tower, or a Fort. The ſame affliction is both a Net and a Fort; a Net, becauſe it entangles; a Fort, becauſe it holds us faſt.

Fifthly, As afflictions are like a net, becauſe they entangle and hold us faſt; ſo, becauſe the more we ſtrive to looſen and free our ſelves, the more we are entangled, and the faſter held. There is no getting out of, no, nor getting any eaſe in affliction by ſtruggling. 'Tis beſt for us to be quiet and patient. Not but that we may ſtir heaven-ward by earneſt prayer to God; yea, and earthward too in the diligent uſe of lawful means with man to free our ſelves. The ſtirring and ſtriving which ſtraitens the net of our affliction upon us, is only our diſpleaſedneſs and impatience with it, or againſt God, who hath caught us in it. Or it is our ſtriving to get looſe by the uſe of creature hands and helps alone, without dependance upon, or application made to God. Such ſtirring as this will indeed entangle us, and when we have ſtirr'd thus the moſt we can, we ſhall find our ſelves the more entangled. When God compaſſeth us with his net, we muſt neither ſit ſtill ſullenly and negligently, nor move impatiently and unbelievingly. Let us give God glory (as Job did) in our net, and he will not only give us eaſe, but ſet our feet in a large place.

VERS. 7, 8, 9.

Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

He hath fenced up my way that I cannot paſs; and he hath ſet darkneſs in my paths.

He hath ſtript me of my glory, and taken the Crown from my head.

THe words contain a part of Job's renewed complaint, and continue the aggravations of his ſorrow. Having ſaid in the former verſe, That God had overthrown him; that he had compaſſed him with his net; here he tells us two things.

Firſt, What courſe he took to relieve himſelf in that miſerable condition; He petitioned and complained earneſtly, and he cryed out ſo loud, as might make all amazed, and look out, Behold, I cry out, &c. And he did not (as ſome) cry out before he was hurt, or complain without cauſe. He was preſſed to it by the oppreſſion that was upon him; Behold, I cry out of wrong.

Secondly, He tells us what ſucceſs his ſuit or petition had; I am not heard, ſaith he, in the firſt part of the verſe; and he adds, there is no judgment, in the ſecond.

Verſe 7. Behold, I cry out of wrong, &c.

He did not only cry, but he cryed out, and that aloud.

Behold.] Is a demonſtrative Particle, Some render the Original as a conditional; If I cry out of wrong there is none to hear. As if he ſhould ſay, It is my miſery that I ſuffer wrong; but this is a greater miſery that I find none to do me right in my ſufferings; If I cry out of wrong (there is none to hear, or) I am not heard. All my crying avails me nothing; every ear is ſhut, and every hand turn'd againſt me.

We may here conceive Job under a twofold notion. Either,

Firſt, As a poor priſoner crying through his grates, or out at the window, telling the paſſengers of his doleful condition, that he is ſhut up within thoſe walls, and irou grates, that he hath been oppreſſed by hard-hearted Creditors, and that after ſo many months or years of impriſonment, he can get none to right or deliver him out of their hand.

Secondly, Some conceive him under the notion of a wounded or diſeaſed man, confined to, or ſhut up in his Chamber, to whom when Phyſitians or Chirurgions come to apply medicines and means for his cure and healing, he cryes out, they torture and trouble him, they hurt and vex him, they are cruel to him, and will kill him. The Patient cryes out of wrongs, but the Phyſitian will not hear him: He that is to have his fleſh lanced, laments pitifully, yet he is lanced; he whoſe fleſh is to be cauteriz'd, complains ſadly, yet the fiery Inſtruments are applyed to him. The Artiſt muſt ſhew a kind of cruelty as well as skill, elſe the cure is not wrought.

Ægyptiorũ more loquitur qui cum in manus medici venirent acti doloribus verba quadam injurioſa in ipſum medicũ non ex judicio, ſed ex amaritudine proloquuntur. Philip.

Thus Job is here repreſented, as under the Phyſitians hands, though indeed an experiment was to be wrought upon him rather then a cure. To take an experiment of our graces, may put us to more pain, then the cure of our corruptions. An experiment (I ſay) was to be wrought on Job to exerciſe and try him, and he cryes out of wrong, as if their purpoſe had been to cut his throat, or at leaſt to undo him for ever in this World.

Behold, I cry out of wrong.] The word which we tranſlate to cry out, ſignifies, properly, that cry which is cauſed by the enduring of extream pains of body, or anguiſh of mind. Yet ſome apply it to the vehemency of his ſpirit, in diſputing and pleading with his Friends (Diſputants and Advocates often fall into heats and paſſionate exclamations.) Behold, I cry, in this diſpute and plea, urging Arguments for my ſelf, and making my defence, yet none regards. I can neither find an equal Judge, nor a faithful Advocate. But I rather reſtrain it to that cry, which the rack of grief and ſorrow forced from him, I cry out, צעק propriè eſt clamare præ dolore, aut alio vehementi animi ſenſu. De diſputatione cum amicis, in qua neminẽ habebat patronum aut judicem intelligit. Orig.

Of wrong.] The word ſignifies any kind of oppreſſion or injury. Here it may be queſtioned; Firſt, Of whom? Secondly, To whom Job made this cry? He cried out of wrong. Who wronged him? Or wherein was he wronged?

חמס injuria, iniquitas.

I anſwer, The wrong he cryes out of, was received of men; he doth not challenge the Almighty, that he had wronged him: He indeed ſpeaks it out plainly in the former verſe, God hath overthrown me, and compaſſed me in his net, yet he doth not charge God fooliſhly, as 'tis ſaid in the firſt Chapter, as if he had done him wrong. The wrong of which he complains was done him by men, and thoſe men his Friends; they wronged him by their hard ſpeeches, and unkind uſages (ver. 2.) How long will ye vex my ſoul, and break me in pieces with words? Theſe ten times have ye reproached me. That reproach was the wrong he complained of. But to whom did he complain?

Firſt, He complained to men, he told his Friends how they had wronged, and cenſured him, but they would not hear.

Secondly, He complained to God of the wrong done him by men; but as then he did not hear.

Ob violentiam quæ mihi fit vociferor ad Deum. Druſ.

I am not heard.] Or as 'tis tranſlated by many, I am not anſwered; the word ſignifieth both to hear, and to anſwer, the work both of the ear, and tongue. And the reaſon (as ſome tell us) why in the Hebrew one word ſerves both, is, becauſe there is ſuch a connexion and nearneſs of relation between the ear and the tongue: So that he who doth not anſwer, is ſuppoſed not to hear; and he that doth not hear, cannot make anſwer. In nature, uſually, they who are deaf are dumb; and when a man to whom we ſpeak makes us no anſwer, we ask him, what, do you not, or can you not hear? I cry (ſaith Job) but I am not heard.

ענה ſignificat audire & reſpondere, hæc enim ſunt inter ſe nexa, ut qui audit reſpõdeat & qui non reſpondet credatur non audiſſe. Inde etiam ut qui mutus eſt continuo etiam ſurdus eſt. Pined.

We are not to take hearing ſtrictly; For the Lords ear is not heavy that he cannot hear; and Job ſpake loud enough for men to hear. The Lord hears the leaſt whiſperings, the leaſt breathings of the ſoul. He doth not only hear our loweſt ſpeech, but he hears our very thoughts. Thoughts are the firſt-born of the ſoul, the language of our hearts. This language of our hearts is as loud in the ears of the Lord, as thunder is in ours. Yea, he underſtandeth our thoughts afar off (Pſal. 139. 2.) That is, long before we think them. He to whom all times are the preſent time, cannot but know that which to us is future, and he from whom all things receive their being, underſtands thoſe things which as yet have no being. Now, if God underſtand our thoughts at this diſtance, even before we think them, then ſurely he hears all our words (which are thoughts formed and made up) as ſoon as we have ſpoken them.

And if ſo, then hearing (in the Text) is not to be taken for receiving the ſound of words, but for the return which is made to the words which are received. To be heard, imports help, or the giving out of that help, mercy and deliverance, which is deſired and asked, whether of God or man. To be heard in prayer, is to be anſwered in prayer: To be heard when we cry, is to be relieved when we cry. Thus, ſaith Job, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: That is, I have no eaſe, no comfort, nor is any deliverance wrought for me. David, as the figure of Chriſt, gives glory to God, becauſe he had been thus heard; Thou haſt heard me from the horns of the Unicorns (Pſal. 22. 21.) That is, Thou haſt delivered me from the horns of the Unicorns. To be among the horns of the Unicorns, is a proverbial ſpeech, for being encompaſt with greateſt danger. The horn is ſharp and ſtrong, and the Unicorn is fierce and terrible; ſo that to be heard from among the horns of the Unicorns, is to be reſcued from deadly danger.

Exaudire & reſpondere clamanti eſt adeſſe laboranti & opem atque ſalutem afferre. Eſt enim hujuſmodi reſponſio non tam verbo, quam re & auxilio præſtito. Pined.

This in the Pſalm is of the ſame ſence with that of Paul, (2 Tim. 4. 17.) I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion: Nero was this Lion, before whom when Paul firſt appeared, he had no ſecond; At my firſt anſwer (ſaith he, ver. 16.) no man ſtood with me, notwithſtanding the Lord ſtood with me, and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion: That is, When I was ready to be devoured by the bloody Tyrant, I cryed to the Lord, and he heard me.

So then, when he ſaith, I am not heard, it may be referred (as his cry was.) Firſt, To men. Secondly, To God. I was not heard by men, they did not right me as they ought; I was not heard by God, he did not reſcue me as he was able, or as he might. Take it firſt, as his not being heard, refers to men.

Hence Note, Men are very deaf uſually to the cry of the oppreſſed and grieved.

There are two voices at which the ear of Nature is exceeding deaf, or thick of hearing.

The firſt is the voyce of holy counſels; when God ſpeaks, many are as the deaf Adder, who ſtops her ear, and will not hear the voyce of the Charmer, charm he never ſo wiſely.

Secondly, At the voyce of humble complaints, when the poor and diſtreſſed ſpeak, many turn away their ear, or turn a deaf ear.

And there are (upon the matter) the ſame reaſons why the counſels of God, and the complaints of the poor are not heard.

Firſt, God commands both, and the heart of man naturally withdraws from the command of God concerning man, as much as from that command which immediately concerns himſelf.

Again, They who hear the counſels of God, are more engaged to obey them, and walk up to them. Many could be ſwift enough to hear, as the Apoſtle James exhorts (chap. 1. 19.) if that would ſerve the turn, but they are ſlow to do. Barely to hear the ſound of words, is no great burden to the ear, and 'tis none at all to the heart; but hearing carries an obligation to practiſe, yea, to hear indeed is to practiſe; and therefore counſel is not heard.

So, hearing the complaint of the poor, ingageth to relieve and help them, to ſupply their wants, and redreſs their injuries; yea, to hear their cry indeed, is to relieve and help them; therefore they are not heard. While Solomon in his Book of Proverbs, ſhews the danger of not hearing the cry of the poor, he alſo implies the commonneſs of it (Prov. 21. 13.) Whoſo ſtoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he alſo ſhall cry himſelf, but ſhall not be heard. He that hath a ſtone in his heart, or whoſe heart is a ſtone, hath alſo (as we ſay) wool in his ears at the voyce both of God and man.

Secondly note, Not to hearken to thoſe that cry out of wrong, is very ſinful, a very crying ſin.

God in judgment burdens them with oppreſſions, who neglect the cry of the oppreſſed; the greatneſs and provocation of the ſin, may be read in the threats denounced againſt it, and in the judgments executed upon it. It is not enough (though it be more then many can ſay) for a Magiſtrate to ſay by way of challenge (as old Samuel did, 1 Sam. 12. 3.) Whom have I oppreſſed? unleſs he can alſo ſay, When did I not hear the cry of the oppreſſed? It is indeed moſt ſinful to make the poor cry, but not to hear their cry, is very ſinful. To deliver the poor and needy, to rid him out of the hand of the wicked, is at once the duty and the honour of thoſe who are in power (Pſal. 82. 3.) And if man will not, God will ariſe for the oppreſſion of the poor, and the ſighing of the needy, to ſet him at liberty from him that puffeth at him (Pſal. 12. 5.)

Thirdly note, Not to hear when the diſtreſſed cry out of wrong and oppreſſion, is it ſelf a wrong and oppreſſion.

Job doth not only cry out, becauſe he was in trouble, but becauſe his cry was not heard in trouble: That he was not heard, was more grievous to him then any of his troubles. When they who have power and truſt for the help of thoſe that are oppreſſed, will not hear and help them, their not helping them, is a ſecond, a renewed oppreſſing of them. Yea, whereas an act of oppreſſion is wrong done at once; the not hearing the oppreſſed, is the continuing, or (as I may ſay) the perpetuating of their wrong. The anger of God will burn as hot againſt the Judge who hath not delivered the oppreſſed, as againſt his Adverſary, or the Author of his oppreſſion.

Secondly, As theſe words, I am not heard, refer to God, note,

That, God himſelf ſometimes defers the hearing or relieving of his people when they cry to him.

The Lord ſometimes anſwers before we pray; It ſhall come to paſs that before they call I will anſwer, and while they are yet ſpeaking, I will hear (Iſa. 65. 24.) As there is a grace of God alwayes preventing our converſion, he turns to us before we turn to him; ſo there is a grace often preventing our petitions, and our mercies are given in by God, before our deſire of mercy is made known to God. Yet mercy doth not alwayes out-run our motions, yea, the Lord lets us move and move again, ask and ask again, before the mercy asked and moved for, is given in. God ſees it needful to exerciſe our patience as well as to ſupply our needs, and therefore lets us tarry before he hears our requeſts; as we put him very often, if not alwayes to the exerciſe of his patience, and let him tarry before we obey his counſels and commands. And he doth this not only in a way of juſt retaliation, but in a way of trial. Nor is it any wonder that God delayes his ſervants, ſeeing he was pleaſed to delay his Son, who though he ſaith, Father, I know that thou alwayes heareſt me; yet in ſome ſence he was not alwayes heard. The Lord deferred Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, whom we find complaining much after the rate of Job. (Pſal. 22. 2.) Where David as a type of Chriſt, cries out, O my God, I cry in the day time, but thou heareſt not; and in the night ſeaſon, and am not ſilent That is, I cry night and day, or continually, but thou heareſt not. Chriſt was not heard, that is, he was not preſently relieved in the thing that he prayed for. God ſeemed even to ſhut up, and ſtop his ears againſt his cry; He cried, and was not heard. Chriſt was heard, and not heard. He was not heard for the removing of the Cup from him, the Cup did not paſs; yet he was heard as to the ſupply of ſtrength in drinking that bitter Cup (Heb. 5.) He was heard in that he feared, or, for his fear. He was heard as to the ſupport of his ſpirit, and the carrying him through the ſuffering; yet he was not heard as to the removing of the ſuffering. Chriſt prayed againſt ſuffering, though he was not willing to ſuffer, and God ſuffered wicked men to have their will over him. The Prophet Habakkuk hath a very parallel complaint to this of Job (Hab. 1.2.) O Lord, how long ſhall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? About what did he cry? Even of violence, and thou wilt not ſave. When the Prophet ſaith, How long ſhall I cry? he doth not ask how long he ſhould yet cry; but he affirms that he had already cried very long: and therefore he adds, Why doſt thou ſhew me iniquity, and cauſe me to behold grievance? He means not his own iniquity, but the iniquity of others. As if he had ſaid, Why do I ſee the unjuſt dealing, and iniquity of wicked men, by whoſe violence thy people are wronged and grieved? And as the Prophet bemoans himſelf, that notwithſtanding his cry, he had yet converſed ſo often and long with theſe doleful viſions; ſo at verſ. 13. he ſeems to ſtand admiring how the Lord could bear the beholding of them. Wherefore lookeſt thou upon them that deal treacherouſly, and holdeſt thy tongue when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous then he, and makeſt men as the fiſhes of the Sea? &c. Where the greater ſwallow up the leſs. As if he had ſaid, Lord, I have often prayed about, and preſſed thee with theſe things, yet thou giveſt no anſwer; Thou ſeeſt all theſe evils, and though much hath been ſaid to thee about them, yet thou art as a man that ſaith nothing; Thou holdeſt thy tongue, even when thy people are ground between the teeth of their cruel oppreſſors. Why doſt thou ſhew me theſe ſad ſpectacles? Why doſt thou not rather hear my cry, ſave thy people, and work deliverance for them?

If it be enquired, how doth this anſwer the promiſe of God to his people, that they ſhould cry, and he not deliver, ſeeing he hath ſaid, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver?

I anſwer, The Lord doth alwayes hear ſo as to give his people the promiſed good, though he doth not give them the petitioned good. He defers to hear, he lets them cry out of violence and wrong, and will not help for ſuch reaſons as theſe.

Firſt, That they may be more fit to receive deliverance; many cry out of wrong, who are not yet fit to be righted. Deliverances may be our undoing, if we are not prepared to receive deliverance. As we wait for the Grace and Mercy of God, ſo God waits to be gracious (Iſa. 30. 18.) We wait for mercy, and he waits till we are rightly diſpoſed to receive mercy.

Secondly, The Lord doth not deliver his preſently from the wrong and oppreſſion of the wicked, becauſe ſome wicked men have not yet done wrong or oppreſſed enough, and are therefore ſuffered to do more wrong to others, that themſelves may be more fit for ruine. They muſt fill up the meaſure of their ſin; therefore they are not taken off with a high hand in the way of ſin. The Lord alwayes puts a moral impediment in the way of ſin, he declares his mind, and gives the rule againſt it, but he doth not alwayes put a judiciary impediment, he doth not alwayes come forth with power and ſtrength, to ſtop men from going on in the way of ſin. He alwayes ſends his earthly Angels or Meſſengers with a word to ſtay the progreſs of wicked men; but he rarely ſends his heavenly Angels (as he did to Balaam) with a drawn ſword, to ſtop their progreſs in wickedneſs.

Thirdly, Many cry out of wrong, and God doth not hear, becauſe he deſires to hear more of their cries. When the oppreſſed cry in faith, with fervency, and from a holy frame, their very cry is as muſick in the ears of God. Not that he delights in the miſery of their ſtate, but in the holineſs of their heart. The heart is uſually in the beſt frame for prayer, when our worldly ſtate is out of frame. And then our ſpirits are in the ſweeteſt tune towards God, when we meet with nothing but diſcord, nothing but wrong and violence from men. The Kingdom of heaven ſuffers moſt violence from a gracious heart, and he takes it (as it were) by force, when himſelf ſuffers moſt violence here on earth, or when his earthly portion is taken from him by force. And therefore,

Fourthly, God ſometimes (that he may teach his to pray better) ſuffers their outward condition to grow worſe. Prayer is the gift of God, and he can make his people perfect in a moment (if he pleaſe) in this great duty and heavenly Art of prayer; yet much of it comes in by exerciſe. Our proficiency in any holy duty, lies much in the practice of it; we muſt not forbear the practice of it, till we can do it better; for in the practice of it, we learn to do it better. Now becauſe our continuance in ſuffering, provokes us to continue in prayer and ſupplication (the oppreſſed widow, Luke 18. cried night and day, till ſhe got the ear of the Judge, and releaſe from her oppreſſors) therefore the Lord lets the oppreſſion continue upon many of his precious people, that they continually exerciſing themſelves in prayer, may grow more ſpiritual and heavenly in prayer.

Fifthly, The Lord defers to ſend relief, when his people cry out of wrong, that he may make their relief and deliverance from wrong, more ſweet when at laſt he ſends it: It is therefore long a coming, that it may be more welcome when it comes. They who cry out of wrong, and are not heard after many cries, when once they are heard, how do they ſing for joy? We ſay proverbially, He that gives ſpeedily, doubles his gift. And 'tis ſo indeed in the nature of the thing given, and in the deſert of the giver; but 'tis rarely ſo as to the prizings and improvement of the receiver. That which is given ſuddenly, is by moſt receivers ſlightly valued, and little improved; whereas thoſe mercies which we have ſtayed long for, and have coſt us much, ſtick longeſt by us, and turn to greateſt profit, whether we reſpect the honour of God, or the good of our own ſouls.

Sixthly, God lets them cry long without an anſwer, for the exerciſe of ſome ſpecial Graces: The Lord loves to ſee Grace at work, and ſome Graces have no long time to work; for though all Graces are eternal in their nature, yet in their uſe they are not: And ſuch are all ſuffering Graces. When we enjoy all (as in Glory) we can ſuffer nothing. Now when God lets his people cry out of wrong all their dayes (which are not many dayes) 'tis becauſe he would have that ſort of Graces kept in exerciſe (as well as other Graces) the Grace of Faith, of Meekneſs, of ſelf-denial, and of Patience, all which (with ſome others) belong to paſſive obedience; that theſe (I ſay) may be kept in breath, he lets the Saints cry out of wrong, and doth not hear them.

Seaventhly, God ſomtimes doth not mind his when they cry, that they may hereby take occaſion to remember how oft he hath cried, and they have not minded him: doth not the Lord cry out to his people of duty, and they do not hear him? Doth he not complain of this neglect, not only as a diſhonour, but as a grief unto him? (Pſal. 81. 11.) O that my people had hearkened to me, and that Iſrael would have heard my voyce. No marvel then, if God let his people cry out of miſery, and doth not hear them. The Lord ſhuts his ear, that he might conſider how we have ſhut our ears; yea, he ſhuts his ear, that he may open ours. We are moved to hear and anſwer the call and command of God, when we find that he doth not hear nor anſwer our call and cry. If the Lord ſhould alwayes be ſwift to hear us, how ſlow ſhould we be in hearing him? and while we have all our deſires, forget moſt of our duties? In heaven we ſhall have all our deſires fulfilled, and yet not fail in any duty; but while there is corruption in the heart, there will be ſloth in the hand, and when we are waxen fat by the ſpeedy ſucceſs of all our petitions, we are more apt to kick with the heel againſt God, then to work with the hand for him.

Laſtly, God hears alwayes, though he doth not alwayes anſwer in our time, or in our way; yea, it is a hearing, and an anſwer of prayer, that we can pray, though unheard and unanſwered.

Secondly obſerve, A godly man is under a great trial, a ſtrong temptation, when he cries out to God, and is not heard.

As when Satan tempts us, there is a great conflict between the fleſh and the ſpirit, about the doing of good, and the refuſing of evil; ſo about our receiving of good, and the removing of evil; when we cry to God, and he is pleaſed to tempt us by deferring to hear us. Then the Spirit hopes, and the fleſh doubts; the ſpirit labours to maintain believing thoughts, and the fleſh labours to raiſe deſponding, yea, deſpairing thoughts. David was ſo hard put to it upon this account, that though he made no concluſions againſt the gracioufneſs of God, yet he could not avoid the putting, no nor the doubling, and more then trebling of the queſtion about it (Pſal. 77. 7, 8, 9.) Will the Lord caſt off for ever? and will he be favourable no more? is his mercy clean gone for ever? doth his promiſe fail for evermore? hath God forgotten to be gracious? &c. How full of Queries was the ſpirit of David when he could get no anſwers? And though faith lay all this while in the bottom of David's heart, yet that which lay at the bottom of theſe Queries was his infirmity, as himſelf diſcovers, ver. 10. And I ſaid, this is my infirmity. It argues a great degree, and much ſtrength of Grace, when we maintain high thoughts of God, and ſetled reſolves that he is good, when he not only lets us fall low into trouble, but lets us lie unheard in the day of our trouble. Such was the ſtrength of David's faith, or rather of Chriſts, of whoſe ſufferings that Pſalm is a Propheſie; who as ſoon as he had ſaid, O my God, I cry in the day-time, but thou heareſt not, &c. (Pſal. 22. 2.) adds in the next verſe, But thou art holy, O thou that inhabiteſt the praiſes of Iſrael. As if he had ſaid, I will not have an evil, or an uncomly thought of thee, though thou refuſeſt to hear; I know thou art holy, and therefore canſt not but be juſt and good, whatſoever thou art pleaſed to do with me. Every ſoul arrives not at this freedom of faith. The denial of an anſwer to prayer, puts moſt upon complaints and queries; and ſo it doth, eſpecially while they conſider how explicitly and clearly the Lord hath engaged himſelf to anſwer prayer, and to relieve his people when they cry; yea, the Lord hath engaged, not only to hear them when they cry (which notes earneſt ſtrong prayer) but to hear them in their weakeſt ſincere addreſſes in prayer, when they do but whiſper and breath towards him. The promiſe is peremptory (Pſal. 50. 15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee. 'Tis ſo alſo (Acts 2. 21.) Whoſoever ſhall call on the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved. The Prophet Joel, from whom thoſe words are borrowed, ſpeaks of a time when there ſhould be ſore troubles in the world, Fire and Blood, and Vapour of ſmoke, all in combuſtion, heaven and earth (to ſenſe) mingled, good and bad, holy and unholy mingled (in appearance) and wrapt up in the ſame common calamity; yet then, Whoſoever ſhall call on the name of the Lord ſhall be ſaved; as if prayer made us ſhot-free, and were a ſure defence in all ſtorms; as if no evil could touch their perſons, or come near their dwellings, who can touch the Lord by faith, when they draw near to him in prayer. And which is more, the Lord promiſeth to prevent prayer, at leaſt (as was toucht before) that his ear ſhall be open as ſoon as our mouths, Iſa. 65. 24. It ſhall come to paſs, that before they call I will anſwer, and while they yet ſpeak I will hear: As if the Lord had ſaid, I will ſometimes give you mercy before you ask it; but when you ask it, you ſhall not go without it; even while prayer fills your mouths, mercy ſhall fill your hearts. While your deſires are but in forming and framing, your deliverances ſhall be formed and framed. You ſhall have perfect mercies, before you perfect duties. While ye are yet ſpeaking I will hear.

Gravis eſt lucta dubitantis carnis & expectantis ſpiritus. Merl.

Now when the Lord ſaith, He will anſwer before we ſpeak, and yet lets us ſpeak long, and gives no anſwer; how is the ſoul puzzled to reconcile the Word of God, and his Works; the Promiſes of God, and his Providences; this put Job hard to it, and ſtrengthned the temptation upon him; I cry out of wrong, but am not heard.

This tryal riſeth by a gradation of four ſteps.

Firſt, It is a tryal, when the anſwer is deferred.

Secondly, It is a greater tryal, when we are denyed an anſwer. As God ſeldom gives what we ask at our time, ſo ſometimes he will not at all give us what we ask.

Thirdly, It is yet a greater tryal, when God in ſtead of granting, appears angry with our prayers, or with us when we pray, as the Pſalmiſt ſuſpected (Pſal. 80. 4.) O Lord God of Hoſts, how long wilt thou be angry (or ſmoak) againſt the prayer of thy people? They cryed out of wrong, they were under the rage and anger of men, and God ſeemed angry with them while they cryed. So ſaith the Prophet (Lam. 3. 8.) Thou haſt ſhut out my prayer. Which action notes God highly diſpleaſed with his prayer. When a man comes to our door, and we do not only deny, or defer him, but ſhut the door againſt him, this is proof enough, we are angry with him, or that we count him for an enemy. Yet thus the Lord ſometimes deals with his people; in ſtead of opening when they knock, he ſeems to lock or ſhut the door againſt them.

Fourthly, To cry out of wrong, and not be heard, is then moſt grievous when the Lord ſuffers us to be wronged more, and encreaſes that trouble, the removing of which we pray for, even while we are praying. This is a ſore tryal indeed. Thus the Iſraelites, who were under heavy burthens in Egypt, cryed to the Lord, yet their burthens were made heavier, and their preſſures multiplyed. If our diſeaſe ſhould gather ſtrength while we are taking medicines to cure it; if our wound wrankle while we are applying Balſams to heal it, we are then ready to conclude, that our caſe is deſperate. How are poor ſouls brought to the very brink of deſpair, when their troubles and ſtreights grow more upon them, while (which is the moſt approved means to be eaſed of them, or eaſed in them) they are plying the throne of grace with conſtant fervent cryes and prayers.

I cry aloud, and there is no judgment.

Exponit eandem rem aliis verbis:

שוע hæc vociferatio eſt ex proprietate vocis implorandæ alutis & opis cauſa cum gemitu & ululatu.

This ſecond part of the verſe is of the ſame ſence with the former. Only there is ſome variety in the reading, and expreſſions. He ſaid there, Behold, I cry out of wrong. Here, I cry aloud. It is but one word in the Hebrew, but we can hardly reach it with two in our language; it ſignifies more then to cry, yea more then to cry out; it ſignifies to cry aloud, and not only to cry aloud as a Man, but as Dogs and Wolves, whoſe crying is howling. So ſome render it, a howling cry. We put both together in our tranſlation, (Hoſ. 7. 14.) though the Original words vary from that here uſed. They have not cryed to me with their hearts, when they howled upon their beds. Take this Note from it, Strong afflictions uſually raiſe ſtrong affections in Prayer.

As trouble and grief riſe, ſo we riſe in our ſence of them, and complaints about them. The Apoſtle ſaith of Chriſt, (Heb. 5. 7.) That, in the day of his fleſh, that is, of his humiliation and weakneſs, while he was ſubject to the common (ſinleſs) infirmities of our nature; For as the word fleſh is taken in Scripture for our natural impurity, and for our pure nature, ſo for our natural frailties and infirmities. Jeſus Chriſt never had fleſh in the firſt ſence; he ſtill hath fleſh in the ſecond (Glory hath not aboliſhed, but exalted the humane nature of Chriſt) But in the third ſence, he once had fleſh, but now hath not, he ſhook off all our infirmities in the day that he aroſe from the dead, and aſcended into heaven; therefore (ſaith the Apoſtle) in the dayes of his fleſh, while he was continually burdened with temptations and afflictions (In thoſe dayes) he offered prayers and ſupplications, with ſtrong cryings and tears. Chriſt was in a ſtrong conflict; the pains of death took hold of him: And as his conflict was ſtrong, ſo alſo were his cryes. When Jacob wreſtled with the Angel, he did not only pray but cry; He wept and made ſupplication (Hoſ. 12. 4.) Weeping is a loud cry; though we ſpeak not, every tear hath a voyce in it: but uſually they who have the weeping cry, have the ſpeaking cry too. And in proportion, when God, at any time, urgeth his people with greater and greater troubles, his people urge him with louder and louder cryes; I cry aloud,

Et non eſt qui judicet. Vulg. Veluti quidam Athleta in ſtadio conſiſtens vociferor, nec tamen meum inſtituitur judicium. Orig. Proprium erat Athletarum curſorum & pugilum clamor & gemitus quo ſe in lucta & certamine confirmarent Pined.

And there is no judgment,] Some render it, and there is none to judge. A learned Interpreter tells us, that this is ſpoken in alluſion to the ancient cuſtom of Fencers, Wreſtlers, or Runners in a race, who in thoſe exerciſes were wont to cry out, to cry aloud, to ſtir up themſelves mightily, and ſhout, and then judgment was given, who had the better, or who had prevailed. According to this interpretation Job is conceived complaining thus; I have endured a great fight of affliction, I have been wreſtling with ſtrong temptations, but the matter is not yet determined, no man appears to take up the controverſie, and paſs ſentence for me.

Others refer theſe words to the day of judgment, I cry aloud, and there is no judgment. As if he had ſaid, the day of the great trial is not come, therefore my crying is but in vain. There will be a revelation, as of the righteous judgment of God, ſo of the righteouſneſs and innocency of man; but that day muſt yet longer be waited for. I cry aloud, but it is not yet judgment-time. So, 'tis an argument to ſchool and quiet his ſpirit into faith and patience; Till the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs, and will make manifeſt the counſels of the heart, and then ſhall every man have praiſe of God (1 Cor. 4. 5.) That is, every man who is praiſe-worthy ſhall be approved in judgment.

But I rather take it of the preſent time, I cry aloud, and there is no judgment; that is, there is none to judge between me and my brethren in this caſe. There is judgment of two ſorts.

Firſt, In relieving, and acquitting the innocent.

Secondly, In condemning, or puniſhing the guilty.

Job complains of the want of both: he found no Judgment either acquitting himſelf, or condemning his adverſary.

Hence obſerve, The defect of judgment is a deplorable evil.

We find God himſelf complaining of this (Iſa. 59. 5.) None calleth for juſtice; many called for juſtice, by way of entreaty, but none called for juſtice by way of command; there were many ſuiters for juſtice, but there were none to do or award juſtice. But as it follows (verſ. 14.) Judgment is turned backwards, and juſtice ſtands afar off; truth is fallen in the ſtreet, and equity doth not enter. Here are four words, Judgment, Juſtice, Truth, Equity, all tending to the ſame thing, and all denied entertainment among that people: Which is alſo expreſſed by an elegant gradation in four words. That which we will not receive, we uſually turn back; here the Text ſaith, Judgment is turned backward; if not ſo, yet we will not let it come near; ſo here, Juſtice ſtands afar off; if it come near us, yet it ſhall not be maintained by us, therefore 'tis added, Truth is fallen in the ſtreets; or if it doth not utterly fall, yet it ſhall not prevail, as the fourth expreſſion tells us; Equity cannot enter; that is, it cannot find entrance and entertainment: upon all which the Prophet concludes (verſ. 15.) The Lord ſaw it, and it diſpleaſed him, becauſe there was no Judgment. The Prophet Habakkuk laments this (Chap. 1. verſ. 4.) Therefore the Law is ſlacked, and judgment doth never go forth: for the wicked doth compaſs about the righteous: therefore wrong judgment proceedeth. Wrong judgment is no judgment; when wrong judgment proceeds, Juſtice is at a ſtand, or Judgment doth not proceed; that is, there is none to do any man right according to Juſtice; it is more ſad when judgment is perverted, then when judgment is ſtayed. When wrong judgment is given, 'tis worſe then when no judgment is given. The abuſe of a thing is a ſorer evil then the abſence of it (Amos 6. 12.) They turn judgment into gall (Hoſ. 10. 4.) Judgment ſpringeth up like hemlock in the furrows [illegible] the field. Gall is bitter, and Hemlock is a poyſonous weed:

it were better nothing ſhould grow in the furrows of the field then Hemlock, and that we ſhould have nothing to drink, rather then drink Gall. Juſtice (though the ſentence of it be death, which is bitter as gall or wormwood, yet) is ſweet. Injuſtice (though the ſentence of it be life, which is ſweet as honey or ſugar, yet) is bitter as gall or wormwood. But when wrong judgment (which is it ſelf bitter) is alſo the judgment of death, how bitter is it? God ſends a privy ſearch through Jeruſalem, to find a man, (Jer. 5. 1.) Run to and fro through the ſtreets of Jeruſalem, and ſee now, and know, and ſeek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment. That City hath not a man in it, that cannot yield a man to execute judgment, though it have multitudes and throngs of men in it. A people are then at the laſt caſt, when God makes ſearch, and finds not a lover of Juſtice among them. Nothing layes a people more open to the judgment of God, then the want of a man to execute judgment. When the oppreſſed cry out, and there is no judgment done by man, both oppreſſors and their favourers ſhall cry out becauſe of the judgments of God.

Job proceeds,

Verſ. 8. He hath fenced up my way that I cannot paſs, he hath ſet darkneſs in my paths.

Miſerias ſuas comparationibus amplificat, prima eſt à viatoribus, quibus duo in itinere valdè ſunt noxia. 1 ſepes. 2 tenebræ.

This verſe contains a further amplification of his ſorrow, by comparing himſelf to a diſtreſſed traveller; for here we have a way, and a path, and thoſe things which are moſt offenſive to a traveller in his way. Two things are very troubleſom to a traveller in his way.

Firſt, If he meet rubs in his way, much more if he meet with great blocks or fences ſet croſs his way: Of this Job complains in the firſt part of the verſe; He hath fenced up my way that I cannot paß.

A ſecond evil which troubles a traveller (though his way be plain) is darkneſs; How can a man go that cannot ſee before him? A man travels a good way with more fear in the dark, then he doth a bad way in the light. Job complains of this latter annoyance in the latter part of the verſe, He hath ſet darkneſs in my paths.

I ſhall ſpeak but little to this verſe, becauſe the ſubſtance of it was opened (Chap. 3. 23.) Why is light given to a man whoſe way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in.

Eſt oratio ſine ſuppoſito

He hath fenced up my way.] But who was it that fenced up his way? No perſon is expreſſed. But as he ſaid before, God hath overthrown me; ſo here his meaning is, God hath fenced up my way. The Septuagint read not as we, He hath fenced up my way, but, He hath built round about my way. So Jeremy deſcribes the ſtraitned condition of Jeruſalem (Lam. 3. 8.) He hath built about me. This ſimilitude is uſed in Scripture when either a perſon or a people are brought into great ſtraits, or are at a difficult point, ſo that they know not which way to turn themſelves. The Lord tells the Church of the Jews, (Hoſ. 2. 6.) I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that ſhe ſhall not find her paths; that is, the paths of her former ſinful pleaſures, in which ſhe was wont to walk, and take delight. Now as the Lord hedges up the wayes of ſome, that they cannot do what they reſolve; ſo he hedges up the way of others, that they cannot reſolve what to do. In this ſence Job complains, He hath fenced up my way.

In circuitu circumædificatus ſum. Sept.

Hence note, God ſometimes brings his people into great ſtraits.

Many cannot tell how they come into trouble, and moſt know not which way to get out. The way of that good King was fenced up, when he cryed out, Lord, we know not what to do.

Secondly, Job ſpeaks this as a heightning of his troubles, which yields this Note,

It is an aggravation of our trouble, to ſee no way out of trouble.

The preſent enduring of any evil, doth not ſo much grieve us, as when we ſee our ſelves concluded and ſhut up in it. The fence which ſtops our way before us, afflicts more then the burden which is upon us. Thoſe afflictions which are not only a pain to us, but a priſon to us, are the greateſt trials of our patience. He hath fenced up my way.

And ſet darkneſs in my paths.] As his way was fenced or ſtopt with many difficulties, ſo his path was covered with darkneſs. Job cryed out (Chap. 3. 23.) Wherefore is light given to a man whoſe way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? He ſpeaks there, as if being in an evil way, he had deſired darkneſs, that he might not ſee the evil of it; or as if becauſe there was a hedge in his way, it had been a trouble to him to have any light in his way.

There is a threefold light.
Firſt, The light of Knowledge.
Secondly, The light of Comfort.
Thirdly, The light of Life.

Job's way was ſo full of the darkneſs of trouble, that it was a trouble to him that he then enjoyed the light of life; and therefore under that temptation, and darkneſs of Spirit, he expoſtulates, Why is light given? That is, why is life given to a man whoſe way is hid? But as there, that kind of light in his way was a grief to him, ſo now darkneſs is his grief. He hath ſet darkneß in my paths. What is this darkneſs?

Darkneſs is taken diverſly in Scripture.

Firſt, Properly for the privation of the natural light, or Sun-light. Job's path was troubled no more with this ſort of darkneſs, then the paths of other men; without doubt, the Sun in the firmament ſhone freely enough upon him; therefore

Secondly, Darkneſs is taken improperly, and figuratively, for that which bears the image and likeneſs of darkneſs; Such was the darkneſs ſet in Job's path.

This figurative darkneſs is chiefly of two ſorts.

Firſt, 'Tis put for affliction, or the uncomfortableneſs of our condition, and that either external or internal, either of body and eſtate, or of mind and ſpirit.

Secondly, 'Tis put for our doubtfulneſs or unſatisfiedneſs, for our ignorance or neſcience about our condition. Job had all theſe darkneſſes in his path; yet I conceive, he in this place principally intends, either the darkneſs of inward trouble, which accompanied his outward troubles, or the darkneſs of ignorance and doubtfulneſs, what to do, which way to go in, or to get out of his troubles.

Hence obſerve, God ſometimes quite withdraws all comfort from his people in affliction.

Per hujuſmodi tenebras ut plurimum ſignificatur, mentis cæcitas, animi perplexitas, & hebetudo & privatio omnis conſilii. Bold.

Light is the portion of Saints, and yet they may walk in darkneſs, and ſee no light. Not only are their paths darkned by afflictions, but darkneſs is in that darkneſs; Darkneſs dwells upon their affections, and darkneſs covers the face of their underſtandings. They are at once in that darkneſs which is oppoſed to comfort, and in that darkneſs which is oppoſed to Counſel. They can neither tell how to rejoyce, nor what to adviſe. The Pſalmiſt affirms (Pſal. 112. 4.) Unto the upright there ariſeth light in darkneß; that is, comfort in affliction. He hath comforted others in affliction, and been light to them in their darkneſs, as is ſhewed in the latter end of that fourth, and in the fifth verſe, and therefore by way of gracious retaliation, the Lord will comfort him in his affliction, and command the light to riſe upon him in his darkneſs. Many righteous perſons have experimented the truth and ſweetneſs of this promiſe; yet not a few have been denyed it, and in ſtead of light riſing to them in darkneſs, have had darkneſs riſing in darkneſs, or darkneſs upon darkneſs; inward darkneſs upon outward darkneſs; the darkneſs of an afflicted Spirit, upon the darkneſs of an afflicted State; a darkneſs about what becomes them to do, mingled with the darkneſs of their greateſt ſufferings; their path is at once a painful one, and an obſcure one; they are full of pain when they go, and they are full of uncertainties and doubts, both when and where to go. He hath ſet darkneß in my paths; And,

Verſ. 9. He hath ſtript me of my glory, and taken my Crown from my head.

This verſe contains a ſecond compariſon, by which Job amplifies his affliction. He amplified it in the former verſe by comparing himſelf to a Traveller, who meets with thoſe two great diſcommodities in his way, Croß-fences, and darkneß: now he amplifies it by comparing himſelf to a man lately cloathed and furniſhed with rich and excellent ornamens, but now ſtript naked and bare. Thus in a literal ſence Joſeph's brethren dealt with him (Gen.

37. 23.) they ſtript him out of his coat, his coat of many colours (or pieces) that was on him. The ſame word is uſed in both places, Job complains of ſuch hard uſage;

פשט
In hiphil eſt ſpoliare altero ſuadente; ex verbo dicas Fecit ſpoliare, ut ſignificet multos in ſuam calamitatem alicujus præcipuè hortatu & ſuaſu conſpiraſſe.

He hath ſtript me of my glory.] The word which we render Stript, being in Hiphil, imports the doing of a thing at the perſwaſion of another; He hath ſtript me of my glory; That is, he hath cauſed, or encouraged others to ſtrip me of my glory.

'Tis the barbariſm of the worſt ſort of thieves and robbers, to ſtrip travellers, or ſuch as fall into their hands, and leave them naked. The word ſignifies alſo a greater cruelty, then ſtripping off the cloaths, even the ſtripping off the ſkin; ſo we tranſlate it (Micah 3. 3.) where the Prophet thus beſpeaks the oppreſſing Princes of Iſrael; Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob, &c. Who alſo eat the fleſh of my people, and flay their ſkin from off them, and break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot, and as fleſh within the caldron. We give the ſame ſence here; He hath ſtript me of my glory; that is, he hath taken it off, even as the ſkin of a beaſt is flain off, he hath left me not only without cloaths, but without a ſkin. When a man hath all taken from him to his ſkin, then we may ſay his ſkin is taken off too. And that's the meaning of the Prophet Micah, when he ſaith, They flay their ſkin from off them. Not that they did formally exerciſe that act of inhumanity to flay off the ſkin. He that ſleeps (as we ſay) in a whole ſkin, may yet in this ſence have his ſkin flayed off. A man is then ſaid to have his ſkin flayed off, when he is ſtripped to his ſkin, and all is taken from him. Cloaths and other outward conveniences, are to a man as the ſkin is to a beaſt; therefore, they are ſaid to flay a man, or to ſtrip off his ſkin, who take away ſuch conveniencies. Thus to ſtrip a man to his ſhirt, is to flay off his ſkin; much more do they flay off the ſkin, who take ſhirt and all. Job ſeems here to bemoan the loſs, not of mean things, or of pure neceſſaries, without which he could not live, but of great things, the honours and ornaments of his life. He hath ſtript me of

Gravitas, pondus; Gloria hominem gravem reddit & ponderoſum.

My glory.] The word ſignifies that which is weighty, or ponderous; glory and honour are weighty, and they make the man weighty in the eſteem, or ballance of the world, who hath them. The Apoſtle calls it, A weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 16. They that have no glory nor honour, either in them, or upon them, are light perſons, and they are lightly eſteemed.

But what was this glory, of which he was ſtript?

There are three ſorts of glory.

Firſt, There is Spiritual glory.

Secondly, There is Heavenly or Eternal glory.

Thirdly, There is Earthly or Temporal glory.

Firſt, We cannot underſtand it of the former. Spiritual glory, is the grace of the Spirit wrought in us. Grace is ſpiritual glory. Hence the Kings daughter, typifying the Church, is ſaid to be all glorious within, even here in the ſtate of grace (Pſal. 45. 13.) God will not ſtrip his meaneſt ſervant of this glory, and all the powers of earth or hell cannot. Job was cloathed with this glory when he was naked, and cryed out, He hath ſtript me of my glory.

Secondly, Nor can we underſtand it of the ſecond; It was not heavenly, or eternal glory, Job had not yet put on that cloathing, and therefore he could not be ſtripped of it.

Therefore we are to reſtrain it to the third ſort, Earthly glory. And earthly glory may be taken,

Firſt, Strictly, for that which we call fame, or renown in the world.

Secondly, We may take glory more generally for that thing, whatſoever it is, which gets us fame or glory in the world; that which gives any man preheminence above other men, that's his glory. Therefore the mercy of God is called his glory (Rom. 3. 23.) becauſe it renders him ſo glorious; And for that reaſon the paſſing over a tranſgreſſion is called the glory of a man (Prov. 19. 11.) Hence alſo the Woman is called the glory of the man (1 Cor. 11. 7.) The man (ſaith the Apoſtle) is the image and glory of God, but the woman is the glory of the man. But is not the woman alſo the image and glory of God? The woman may be conſidered, either firſt, according to her ſpecifical nature, and ſo ſhe was created according to the image of God in righteouſneſs and holineſs, as well as the man; or ſecondly, according to her ſex and perſonal relation to her husband, and in that regard, the woman is not the image of God but the man, becauſe dominion (which is the mans priviledge) is the image of God, and not ſubjection, which is the womans duty (Epheſ. 5. 24.) And in this ſence the woman (though her Glory be inferior to the mans) is the Glory of the man; for if the ſubjection of the irrational creatures unto man, be his glory, or honour; then what an honour, what a glory is it for man to have ſo excellent a creature as the woman, a creature endued with reaſon, as himſelf is, ſubject to him? Hence upon the ſame common ground, Civil power, rule, and authority among men, are called the Glory of a man, and ſo alſo are worldly riches and ſubſtance, becauſe they occaſion mans eſteem, and put a kind of glory upon him in the world. In this language the ſons of Laban complain enviouſly of Jacob (Gen. 31. 1.) And he heard the words of Labans ſons, ſaying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our fathers, and of that which was our fathers hath he gotten all this glory; That is, all this ſubſtance and riches, his flocks and heards of cattel, he hath feathered his neſt well out of our fathers eſtate; this they call his glory. Joſeph gives charge to his brethren (Gen. 45. 13.) to make report to his father how it was with him; Tell him (ſaith he) of all my glory in Egypt; that is, let him know, how much I am enriched and advanced, being made, by the good hand of God with me; A father to Pharaoh, and a ruler over all the land of Egypt. Joſeph would have this told his father, out of affection to comfort him, not out of ambition to exalt himſelf. Joſeph did not vainly ſpread his plumes like Haman, who in a kind of ſelf-admiration, or in an extaſie of pride called for his friends, and Zereſh his wife, as ſoon as he came from Court, and told them of the Glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things, wherein the King had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the Princes and ſervants of the King. Such promotion and advancement is the brighteſt ſhine of earthly glory; and whatſoever makes us ſhine with any brightneſs, is our glory here on earth. Hence likewiſe children are called their fathers glory. So that place is expounded (Hoſ. 9. 11.) As for Ephraim, their glory ſhall flie away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. The glory of Ephraim conſiſted in their numerous off-ſpring, according to the propheſie of Jacob; His ſeed ſhall become a multitude of Nations (Gen. 48. 19.) The departure or rather flight of this glory is ſignificantly threatned, when he ſaith, Their children ſhall flie like a bird from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception; that is, either their women ſhall be barren and have no conception, or if they conceive, their infants ſhall ſuffer abortion and die in the womb; or if they live to the birth, they ſhall dye as ſoon as they are born; Their glory ſhall flie away.

Theſe external things, as children, riches, power, and places of authority, are called the glory of a man; becauſe they render him honourable, and cloath him (as the oppoſite word ſtript implies) with glory in the eyes of men. Under the Law the High Prieſts ornaments were called garments for glory and beauty. (Exod. 28. 2.) And we may call thoſe things which are our glory our garments.

Theſe are as garments,

Firſt, Becauſe they compaſs and cover us as round as a garment.

Secondly, Becauſe they keep us warm, and fence us from the cold of outward ſufferings.

Thirdly, They are as garments, becauſe there is an ornament as well as an uſefulneſs in them. Chriſt implies that Solomon's Glory was his cloathing and array, while he ſaith (comparatively to the Lillyes of the field) Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of theſe (Matth. 6. 29.) Solomon in his Glory, was Solomon at the height of his outward pomp and greatneſs. When Michal ſaw David dauncing before the Lord at the removal of the Ark; How glorious was the King of Iſrael to day, ſaith ſhe? That is, he was not at all glorious; ſhe thought he had laid his honour in the duſt, and ſtript himſelf of all his Kingly Glory, while he daunced before the Lord with all his might, girded with a linnen Ephod.

Gloriæ dictæ ſunt de te, i. e. quicquid poteſt te glorioſum reddere.

The Church is the City of God; and of that City glorious things are ſpoken (Pſal. 87. 3.) The Hebrew is, Glories are ſpoken of thee, O thou City of God! All the Cities of the world are the Cities of God, by his general Title of Soveraignty: For ſo the whole world is the Lords, and the fulneſs of it (Pſal. 50. 12.) But there is a City which is his by a ſpecial title of propriety: For as the Lord hath a peculiar people, ſo he hath a peculiar City; and indeed, the peculiar City of God is nothing elſe but the peculiar people of God, living in the order of the Goſpel. Now this City of God hath its Glories, that is, many things which make it glorious. The Cities of men have their Glories, and many have ſpoken glorious things of them. Their Glories are, Firſt, A pleaſant Situation. Secondly, Riches. Thirdly, Populouſneſs, or the multitude of Inhabitants. Fourthly, Beautiful Buildings. Fifthly, Strong Walls and Bulwarks. Sixthly, Good Laws. Seventhly, Good Magiſtrates. Theſe are the chief Glories of the Cities of men. But the Glories of the City of God are, Firſt, Truth of Doctrine. Secondly, Purity of Worſhip. Thirdly, The Unity of Profeſſors. Fourthly, and chiefly, The Preſence of God among them; of which the Prophet Ezekiel ſpeaks in the laſt verſe of his Propheſie; The name of that City from that day ſhall be, The Lord is there. Theſe are the Glories of the City of God, and thoſe are the glories of the Cities of men. Now as theſe publick eminencies and advantages are the glory of Cities, both in their civil and ſpiritual capacities; ſo perſonal eminencies and advantages are the glory of a ſingle or particular man: and when he who was rich, is made poor; when he who is ſtrong, becomes weak; when he who had many children, is made childleſs; when he who was exalted in great power and authority, is caſt down and contemned; then he may ſay, as Phineas his wife did when the Ark of God was taken, Ichabod, Where is the glory? Or as Job in the Text; He hath ſtript me of my Glory; and (which carries the ſame ſence and ſcope,)

He hath taken the Crown from off my head.

A Crown and Glory are of ſuch near alliance, that they are often put together as one thing. Solomon exhorts to exalt Wiſdom; and why? She ſhall exalt thee, and a Crown of Glory ſhall ſhe deliver to thee (Prov. 4. 8, 9.) And the Lord promiſeth (Iſa. 28. 5.) That he will be for a Crown of Glory, and for a Diadem of beauty unto the reſidue of his people: Yea, that his people ſhall be a Crown of Glory in his hand (Iſa. 62. 3.) All Crowns are glorious, and Glory is a Crown Hence the Apoſtle ſaith (Heb. 2. 9.) We ſee Jeſus, who was made a little lower then the Angels for the ſuffering of death, that is, that he might be fitted to ſuffer death (which he had not been, unleſs he had been made a little lower then the Angels in one reſpect, namely, by his taking upon him our humane nature; for Jeſus Chriſt was made lower then the Angels, that he might ſuffer death, as well as by his ſuffering of death; now (ſaith the Apoſtle) we ſee Jeſus who was made thus low) crowned with glory and honour. Thus Glory and the Crown are joyned; and therefore as ſoon as Job had ſaid, He hath ſtript me of my Glory; he ſuitably adds, And,

מור
Quod hic vertitur auferre, contrarium eſt verbo אשר quod vincire ſignificat, & veſti poteſt diſſolvit

Conqueritur ſe regno ſpoliatum nonnulli ſuſpicantur Jobum regem fuiſſe, i. e. regulum terræ Uz. Dru.

He hath taken my Crown from my head.] Some render, He hath untied; Crowns being anciently tied to the heads of Princes.

The word Crown may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, Properly, for that Royal Ornament of Kingſhip: Some interpet it ſo here; as if Job had complained that he had loſt his Kingdom, or was diveſted of Kingly dignity. 'Tis undeniable that he was a great man, a chief Magiſtrate, poſſibly a King.

Secondly, The word Crown may be taken improperly, or largely; And then whatſoever a man hath in any eminency, he is ſaid to be crowned with it; or that it is called his Crown. (Pſal. 8. 5.) Thou haſt crowned him with honour and dignity; that is, thou haſt given him abundance of honour and dignity (Pſ. 103. 4.) Thou crowneſt him with thy loving kindneſs and mercy. And when the year is plentifully ſtored with the fruits of the earth, the Lord is ſaid to crown it with his goodneſs (Pſal. 65. 12.) Thus a virtuous woman is a Crown to her husband (Prov. 12. 4.) The husband is the wives head, and a woman of ſtrength (as the Hebrew hath it) that is, a woman of ſtrong and maſculine virtues, is a Crown, that is, an Ornament, or an honour to her head. And thus, Riches are a Crown to the wiſe (Prov. 14. 24.) That is, they give him opportunity to do great things, and make excellent improvements of his wiſdom; he rules in buſineſſes like a King, his counſels are as powerful as commands, and he gives the Law to others; whereas the poor mans wiſdom is deſpiſed, and his words are not heard, Ec. 9. 16.

Again, Some reſtrain Job's Crown to his Children. Thou haſt taken my Crown off my head; that is, my Children. Children (Prov. 17. 6.) are called a Crown: Childrens Children are the Crown of old men, and the glory of children are their Fathers. Children are the Crown of old men in a twofold reſpect.

Firſt, Becauſe it is an honour to have children; and the more children, the more honour.

Secondly, Becauſe they encircle their parents as a Crown (Pſal. 127.) They ſtand as Olive-plants round about the Table; in which ſence, a knot or company of Drunkards are called a Crown (Iſa. 28. 1.) Wo to the Crown of pride, to the Drunkards of Ephraim. Drunkards (as ſome expound) are called a Crown, becauſe they ſit round, or becauſe they drink round, till the houſe goes round with them. Theſe are called the Crown of pride, or a proud company, becauſe as they drink their wits out of their heads, ſo all humility and civility out of their behaviour. This is true of literal Drunkards. Yet that Text may be expounded of Metaphorical Drunkards, whoſe minds are fluſter'd and overcome with the wine of their own preſumption and proud aerie imaginations.

Thirdly, Others refer it to his Acquaintance and ſpecial Friends, who (having been a comfort and an honour to him) he calls his Crown. So the Apoſtle ſalutes the Philippians (chap. 4. 1.) My brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and my crown. He ſpeaks as high of the Theſſalonians (1 Theſ. 2. 19.) What is our hope, our joy, or Crown of rejoycing? Are not even ye in the preſence of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt at his coming? Converſion is the Crown or chief work of the Miniſtry, and converted perſons are the Crown or chiefeſt honour of a Miniſter. What is more deſirable or honourable then to convert, then to win ſouls to Chriſt, and to build them up in Faith? And thus any may call his godly friends and familiars, eſpecially ſuch as he hath been helpful to in their turning to God, his Crown.

Yet I rather take the word Crown here in the general notion of it (as Glory was in the former part of the verſe) for any earthly excellency. In which ſence the whole people of Iſrael cry out (Lam. 5. 16.) The Crown is fallen from our head; or, The Crown of our head is fallen, that is, all our priviledges and dignities are departed, now that we are carried Captives into Babylon.

> Hence obſerve, The beſt of earthly excellencies may ſoon be taken from us.

Glory and Crown expreſs the higheſt of worldly attainments or enjoyments; and yet behold Job ſtript of his Glory, and his Crown is taken away. Not only is all fleſh graſs, but all the goodlineſs thereof is as the flower of the field (Iſa. 48. 6.) The fleſh of man is his natural conſtitution; the goodlineſs thereof is all moral and civil perfections: not only is man of a brittle conſtitution in nature, but all the perfections which he hath, on this ſide Grace, are brittle too. All goodlineſs is fading, only goodneſs or godlineſs is not. As the Prophet (by way of oppoſition) intimates, verſ. 8. But the word of the Lord ſhall ſtand for ever. As the Crowns of all men, or their chief delights, ſo the Crowns of Princes (who are the Crown or chief of men) decay and wither. Former ages have given teſtimony to it, and ſo hath ours. If the Scripture were ſilent in this point, yet experience ſpeaks it; and if experience had never ſpoken it to this day, nor given an inſtance of a decaying Crown, yet reaſon ſpeaks it, and tells us from the nature of all earthly things, that it may be ſo, though in the event it had not as yet ever been ſo. But when not only Reaſon and Scripture tell us this, but many and many experiences witneſs it, who can doubt it? Nor ſhall I here add any more to confirm it, having at the twelfth Chapter, as alſo from other paſſages of this Book, taken occaſion to touch this Argument, the changes of Princes and of all earthly things. Only take theſe two admonitions by way of Corollary from it.

Firſt, Set not your affections upon things here below; ſet them not upon earthly Glories, earthly Crowns. 'Tis no wiſdom to hold that faſt in our affections, which we cannot hold in our poſſeſſion; or love to that much, which may ſpeedily be loſt. Solomon reproves that unadviſedneſs with a vehement expoſtulation (Prov. 23. 5.) Wilt thou ſet thine eyes upon that that is not? for riches certainly make themſelves wings, &c. While rich men make locks and bolts, while they make clogs and ſhackles to keep, yea, to impriſon their riches, their riches are as buſie in making themſelves wings to flie away. And becauſe few will believe or credit this report of riches, but judge it a very ſlander, therefore Solomon doubles the word for confirmation, which we render Certainly, riches do it. We are not certain of any thing that riches will do for us, only we may be certain, that they will do as little for us as they can, and a great deal leſs then we expect, when we hear for certain that they are making (not feet) but wings to be gone, yea, to fly from us. Now ſeeing it is ſo, is there not much reaſon in Solomon's reproof, Wilt thou ſet thine eyes? or (as the Hebrew Text hath it with much elegance) Wilt thou cauſe thine eyes to flie upon that which is not? A covetous mans eye is as greedy after riches, as a ravenous Bird after its prey; and therefore he is, with much ſignificancy ſaid to cauſe his eyes to flie upon riches. But ſhall our eyes, much more our hearts (uſually the eye moves after the heart, though occaſionally the heart may move after the eye; but ſhall either our eyes or hearts) flie upon that which is flying, or make much haſte to get that, which makes ſo much haſte from us when we have gotten it? If our Crown of earthly Glories be not taken from us, yet it will take leave of us, or we muſt leave it.

Secondly, Purſue ſpiritual, and make ſure of heavenly Glory; lay hold upon that which may be held. You ſhall never be ſtript of the glory of the Righteouſneſs of Jeſus Chriſt in Juſtification, nor of the glory of the Graces of Chriſt in Sanctification. Theſe ſpiritual Glories, theſe inward Glories, ſhall not be taken from you. The Soul that is once thus cloathed, ſhall never be found naked. The exerciſe of ſome Graces muſt be left off, becauſe there will be no uſe of them in Glory. But you ſhall never loſe or be ſtript of any Grace. And if we cannot be ſtript of the glory of Grace, then much leſs can we be ſtript of the Grace of Glory, or have the Crown of Glory taken from our heads. And as that Crown cannot be taken violently from our heads, ſo neither will it ever naturally wither or decay upon our heads. The Crown of Righteouſneſs, of which the Apoſtle Paul ſpeaks (2 Tim. 4. 8.) is alſo (as the Apoſtle Peter ſpeaks) a Crown that fadeth not away (1 Pet. 5. 4.) A learned Tranſlator conceives, that the Greek word, which we, with others render, Fadeth not away, is taken from the proper name of a Flower, of which anciently Crowns or Garlands were wont to be made. The flower fadeth (ſaith the Prophet, Iſa. 40. 7.) Yet this flower Amarantus (as Naturaliſts obſerve) fadeth not. Not that it never fadeth, but becauſe it retains its freſhneſs and beauty (though cropt) very long; therefore they call it (beyond the nature of any other flowers) the unfading flower. Whether the Apoſtle (ſome conceive he did not) did allude to this Flower or not in the uſe of this word, or only attended the Radical meaning of it, is not much material to the point; ſeeing this is clear, that his intendment is to advance the glorious ſtate of the Saints after this life, by the everlaſtingneſs of it, having alſo called it at the fourth verſe of the firſt Chapter, An inheritance incorruptible, and that fadeth not away. This Crown, for the beauty and ſweetneſs of it, is like a Crown of Flowers, but in the continuance and laſtingneſs of it, it is like a Crown of Gold, the moſt durable and pureſt Metal. Yea, to ſhew that there is no ſeed or tendency of death or decay in it, it is called a Crown of Life. (Jam. 1. 12.)

Camer. Myroth.

We read of a Crowned Woman (Revel. 12. 1.) Behold, there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a Woman cloathed with the Sun, having the Moon under her feet, and upon her head a Crown of twelve Stars. Every true Believer is cloathed (in his proportion) as this Woman (who is the Repreſentative of all Believers) with the Sun, that is, with Chriſt; and hath the Moon, that is (the Glory, and the Crown) the beſt of earthly things under his feet; as for his head, that's crowned with Stars, celeſtial excellencies, or the truth and purity of that Goſpel-Doctrine which the twelve Apoſtles (thoſe Stars of the firſt or greateſt magnitude) firſt preached from the mouth of Jeſus Chriſt, that bright morning-Star, and hath ſince in all Ages been held forth by all faithful Miniſters, who are Stars in the right hand of Chriſt (Rev. 1. 16, 20.) With this Glory Saints are crowned here, and they ſhall be crowned with the fruit of it for ever hereafter. Job's Complaint ſhall never be heard in Heaven, which hath often been heard on Earth, and may again be quickly heard from their mouths, whoſe crowns in the opinion of the wiſeſt men, ſit faſteſt on their heads; He hath ſtript me of my Glory, and taken the Crown from my head.

VERS. 10, 11, 12.

He hath deſtroyed me on every ſide; and I am gone: and and my hope hath he removed like a tree.

He hath alſo kindled his wrath againſt me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

His troops come together, and raiſe up their way againſt me, and encamp round about my Tabernacle.

JOB ſtill continues his Complaint; he had done it before in divers alluſions, he takes up three more in this Context, to ſhadow his ſorrowful condition.

The firſt is taken from Buildings in the former part of the tenth verſe.

The ſecond from Trees, in the latter part of the ſame verſe.

The third from War, in the eleventh and twelfth verſes.

Verſe 10. He hath deſtroyed me on every ſide.

The word here rendred to deſtroy, ſignifies any ruining work, yet moſt properly the ruining of a Building; He hath deſtroyed me (ſay we.) He hath pulled me aſunder member by member (ſaith another) as a houſe is demoliſht part by part, or room after room, till, as Chriſt foretels the demolition of the Temple, There ſhall not be left one ſtone upon another. Thus (ſaith Job) He hath deſtroyed me. The Hebrew Text is in the Future; He will deſtroy; as if Job's fear had propheſied utter deſtruction to himſelf; yet moſt tranſlate (as we) in the preterperfect tenſe, He hath deſtroyed me. And though Job ſaith me, yet we are not to confine this deſtruction to his perſon, but muſt extend it to his Family and whole Eſtate; as the next words intimate; He hath deſtroyed me נתץ Confringere demolire, deſtruere; exprimit omnimodam deſtructionẽ ædificiis propriè convenit. סבך pro סטבוך Merc.

Round about.] 'Tis ſad enough to be deſtroyed in any one part; but Job was deſtroyed in every part; therefore he adds, He hath deſtroyed me round about: This heightens the ſence. Job ſhewing the care of God in the Fabrick of his Body, beſpeaks him thus (chap. 10. 8.) Thy hands have made me, and faſhioned me together round about: He that is made and faſhioned, is made and faſhioned round about; yet this addition round about, hath its force, noting the exact and particular care of God in ſetting up the whole of his outward man in every part. Here the work of judgment is as large and exact as the work of mercy once was: He was formerly faſhioned round about, and now he was deſtroyed round about.

Further, This expreſſion, round about, may have either its reference ſtrictly to a Building of defence, a Fort or Caſtle, which when it is beſieged (as he proſecutes it in the latter words) when Forces lie round about it, they batter and aſſault it on every ſide, till at laſt they level and ſlight it on all ſides, not leaving one Tower or pinacle ſtanding. Or it may refer to the alluſion of a Tree, in the next clauſe of this verſe, which, when we would root up, we dig round about it, and then pull it down. Thou haſt deſtroyed me round about. It was the envious and malicious complaint of Satan (chap. 1. 10.) that God had made an hedge or wall (which was as an impregnable fortification) about Job's eſtate and perſon. Haſt thou not made an hedge about him, and about his houſe, and about all that he hath on every ſide? He doth not only ſay, Thou haſt made an hedge about him, ſc. his perſon, and about his houſe; and about all that he hath (which is very particular) but he ſubjoynes on every ſide. Job once had an hedge round about him on every ſide, but now his defence was on every ſide removed. This complaint of Job ſtands in direct oppoſition to that of Satan.

Hence obſerve, That even univerſal deſtruction (in regard of outward things) may be the lot of the beſt and holieſt of the ſervants of God.

Job was not only touched (as Satan deſired) but deſtroyed; not only were the pinnacles of his houſe pull'd down, or the battlements and beauty of it defaced, but, the pillars of it looſed, and the foundation razed; all that was deſtroyable was deſtroyed. The ſervants of God have ſomewhat that can never be deſtroyed; 'tis our comfort, that though all round about us is periſhing, yet we have ſomewhat within us that ſhall never periſh.

Thou haſt deſtroyed me round about: and I am gone.

Excedo è vivis, & jam me exceſſiſſe dicas, mortuum, ſc. non moribundum.
Pined.

That is, according to the Arabick Idiom, I am dead; dying is a going away, I am gone; I am a loſt man, I am removing from the land of the living.

I am gone.] He was not gone when he ſpake this, and yet he ſaith, I am gone.

That which we look upon as certainly future, or inevitably to come to paſs, is to us as if it were preſent, or already paſt.

That good which we are ſure to have, is as good as had; and that evil which we either muſt feel, or have deſerved to feel, is as already felt. Abimeleck having deſerved preſent death, the Lord tells him; Thou art but a dead man, becauſe of the woman whom thou haſt taken (Gen. 20. 3.) becauſe in ſtrictneſs of juſtice, 'twas death to take another mans wife, therefore he is ſpoken to as a man among the dead. So becauſe believers are ſure of eternal life, therefore the Scripture expreſſeth them in a preſent poſſeſſion of life, or as being paſt from death to life, as if they had not only ſome beginnings, and foretaſtes of it by faith and hope, but were in the full fruition and viſions of it. Thus here becauſe all outward appearances and probabilities ſpake Job going out of the world and dying, therefore he concludes himſelf gone out of the world and dead. I am gone,

And he hath removed my hope as a tree.

Recedere aut abire facit ſpem.

He hath made my hope to depart, or go away, ſo in ſtrictneſs of the letter; as if he had ſaid, I am gone, and my hope is gone; and the reaſon why he ſaid he was gone, was, becauſe his hope was gone; hope is the moſt ſtayed comfort that we have, the laſt that departs, yea that which can ſcarce depart; hope cannot be reckoned among our moveables, for it is compared to an Anchor, and to an Anchor that will not drag; We have (ſaith the Apoſtle, Heb. 6. 19.) this hope as an Anchor of the ſoul, both ſure and ſtedfaſt; yet, Job perceived his Anchor moving, yea removed.

He hath removed my hope.] My hope is gone; what hope was this which was ſo movable? It was his hope about or for worldly things; Our hope about moveables, is moveable; the hope we have about the world, is like the faſhion of the world, which paſſeth away. Job's friends had laboured much to encourage and revive his hope, the hope of a reſtitution to honour and greatneſs in this life. But, ſaith he, my hope, this kind of hope is removed, 'tis gone; he had given ſufficient proof that he had a hope which was not gone, but was indeed the Anchor of his ſoul, ſure and ſtedfaſt, and that it ſtood faſt as Mount Sion, in the midſt of all the ſhakings of this worldly hope, and could not be removed.

He hath removed my hope.] As we are to take it for a worldly hope in general, ſo ſome reſtrain it to his hope of Children; Parents have much and many hopes about their Children: A good child is uſually call'd a hopeful child; Children hope to have an inheritance from their Parents, and Parents hope to have comfort in their Children. He that hath no hope of Children, is called a drie tree (Iſa. 56. 9.) Here Job bemoans (according to this Interpretation) both the loſs of the Children which he had, and his hopeleſneſs of having any more Children, under the metaphor of a dry tree. He hath removed my hope as a tree.

But I conceive we are not thus to ſtraiten his ſence; for not only (to his apprehenſion) was his hope of Children removed, but his hope of life, and of any good which concerned this preſent life. He hath removed my hope

As a tree.] The word ſignifies both a tree growing, and a tree cut down, or rooted up; here we muſt reſtrain it to the latter; he hath removed my hope as a tree which is removed or pulled out of the ground. Job proſecuted this metaphor (Chap. 14. 7.) There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will ſprout again, and that the tender branches thereof will not ceaſe, though the root thereof wax old. There he ſpake of a hopeful tree, but here he ſpeaks of a tree that hath no hope, or of a tree of which there is no hope; My hope is removed as a tree; that is, as a tree of which there is no hope that ever it ſhould ſprout again; for though a tree that is cut down may ſprout again, the root being left in the ground; yet when a tree is pulled up by the roots, there is no hope that it ſhould ever grow again. Indeed a tree that is pulled out of one ground by the roots, may yield hopes of growing, if it be planted in another ground; and thus tree's are ſometimes removed out of the ground, not to the fire, but to a fitter ſoyl. And thus (though I do give it for the meaning of the Text) Job's hope was indeed removed as a tree, it was removed from earth to heaven, from things ſeen and temporal, to things which are not ſeen, but are eternal. My hope haſt thou removed as a tree.

I have (upon other Texts of this Book) ſpoken of the nature of hope in general, and of hope about worldly things, and therefore I paſs it here; only take this Obſervation,

That worldly hopes are periſhing and looſable.

The Apoſtle aſcribes an eternity to ſpiritual hope (1 Cor 13. 13.) Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, theſe three; Spiritual graces continue, but ſpiritual gifts are ſubject, not only to declining, but to vaniſhing. Charity never faileth (verſ. 8.) But whether there be propheſies, they ſhall fail; whether there be tongues, they ſhall ceaſe; whether there be knowledge, it ſhall vaniſh away: but faith, hope, and charity, are laſting graces, there is no corruptibility in them. In heaven we ſhall be above hope, being taken up to the fruition of that which we hoped for; yet we cannot ſay, that then our hope ſhall be removed, but then we ſhall move in a ſphear beyond hope. Hope is not deſtroyed, but perfected by fruition, as faith is perfected by viſion. Saints may have their hopes of earthly things removed, but themſelves remove into thoſe heavenly things which they hoped for. The tree of this hope ſhall ſtand and flouriſh for ever; but of their other hope, they may ſay as Job, He hath removed it as a tree.

Verſ. 11. He hath alſo kindled his wrath againſt me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

Job proceedeth to ſet forth his affliction by a third Alluſion. His affliction was very great, in that his hope was removed; but this made his affliction moſt grievous, that there was an appearance of the wrath of God againſt him in it, and the kindlings of divine diſpleaſure. God doth ſometimes remove the hopes of his faithful people, in regard of worldly things, and yet manifeſts his love to them, in ſpiritual things; they feel not the kindlings of an enemy-like wrath, but the warm beams of a friendly, yea of a fatherly kindneſs in their fiery tryals; but when theſe two meet, when at once earthly hopes are removed, and a fire from heaven kindled, who can bear it? The Prophet Malachy queſtions (Chap. 3. 2.) Who may abide the day of his coming? and who ſhall ſtand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiners fire. If none can abide the coming of Chriſt with refining fire, then who ſhall abide it, when he comes with conſuming fire? The fire of divine holineſs is very terrible, then O how terrible is the fire of divine wrath?

He hath kindled his wrath againſt me.] In this and the next verſe, the compariſon is taken from War (as before from trees and buildings) in which God is compared to ſome great Monarch of the world, who being exceedingly offended, and provoked, his anger kindles againſt his enemies, and he ſends his Troops and Armies, to incamp againſt them; His wrath is kindled againſt me; and he counteth me as one of his enemies.

War begins at anger and wrath; it ſtirs firſt within, and then it breaks out; Whence come wars (ſaith the Apoſtle James, Chap. 4. 1.) and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your luſts, which fight in your members? Were there not a fight in our ſelves, there would be no fighting with others. There is ſomewhat in the Lord, proportionable to this; Whence are the wars that he hath with the Creature? Their original is deſcribed after the manner of men, from ſome kindlings of jealouſie and wrath in him; not that there is any perturbation in the heart of God, he is infinitely above it; but he is thus deſcribed, after the manner of men, the flame of whoſe wars begins with a fire of wrath; therefore ſaith Job, He hath kindled his wrath.

The word kindled in the Hebrew comes from a root, which ſignifies anger, becauſe anger is the kindling of a fire in our boſoms; and from that Hebrew word it is conceived, that the Latine word ira is derived, it being as near in ſound, as it is in ſence. Wrath is a fire, and is therefore properly expreſſed by a word ſignifying the heat of fire; wrath in it ſelf is hot, and burning, here the fire is made hot, He hath kindled his wrath, theſe put together, note fierce wrath (Pſal. 2. 12.) If his wrath be kindled, yea but a little. The wrath of God is a fire, but ſometimes it is as a fire not kindled; but if his wrath be kindled but a little, it makes a dreadful fire. 'Tis the nature of fire to be hot, but fire is not only hot but fierce when 'tis kindled (Numb. 32.14.) Ye are riſen up in the place of your forefathers to kindle the fierce anger of God; the kindled anger of God, is the extreameſt anger of God.

I ſhall not ſtay upon the deſcription of the wrath of God, having ſpoken of it at large (Chap. 14. 13.) where Job as dreading the appearance of the wrath of God, begs with earneſtneſs, O that thou wouldeſt keep me in ſecret, until thy wrath be paſt. Only note here, that the wrath of God (as was touched before) and the kindlings of it, do not imply any paſſion or change in God, he hath infinite ſerenity and quietneſs in his breaſt for ever: what fires ſoever he kindleth in the Creature, himſelf is alwayes in one mind. The Scripture ſpeaks thus in reference to thoſe effects expreſſed upon man, not in reference to any impreſſion wrought in God. When that is done upon the creature which teſtifies the fierceneſs of anger, then anger is ſaid to kindle in God. One of the Ancients tells us, That the wrath of God againſt ſinners is nothing elſe but the puniſhment of ſin; Or the wrath of God is his holy and moſt bleſſed Will, everlaſtingly burning with hatred againſt ſin, and turning from it in high diſpleaſure; even as man diſcovers his hatred of thoſe things which are againſt his will, and lets out his ſpirit in anger againſt them. Had not ſin broke forth in man, there had never been any appearance of anger in God. As the wrath of God draws out puniſhment, ſo ſin is the occaſion which draws out the wrath of God. Yet the wrath which Job ſpeaks of here, was not kindled upon that account; God himſelf declaring that he was moved to deſtroy him without any ſuch cauſe. That fire was kindled for the tryal and exerciſe of his patience, not for the puniſhment of his wickedneſs. He hath kindled his wrath againſt me.

Ira Dei eſt delinquentium pæna, furor Dei eſt ſupplicium peccatorum. Chryſ.

Hence note, Firſt, The wrath of God is terrible.

A fire kindled to warm is comfortable: Aha (ſaith he in the Prophet Iſa. 44. 16.) I am warm, I have ſeen the fire; but a fire kindled only to conſume is dreadful. The wrath of God is ſometimes as a fire raked up, ſometimes as a fire blown up: The light of Iſrael ſhall be for a fire, and his holy One for a flame, and it ſhall burn and devour his thorns and his bryars (ſuch are all his enemies who ſcratch and tear his people) in one day. The Lord is a conſuming fire to his own (Heb. 12.29) for the burning out of their corruptions; but he is a conſuming fire to the wicked, and unbeliever, for the burning up of their perſons; he is a conſuming fire to theſe, and yet they ſhall not conſume; he is a fire, whoſe heat is unſufferable, and yet they muſt ſuffer it; the fire of his wrath is unquenchable by any thing but the blood of Chriſt; and the fire of the wrath of Chriſt is altogether unquenchable. If his wrath be kindled, who alone quencheth the wrath of the Father, how ſhall his wrath be quenched, or who ſhall quench it? Pſalm 2. 12. Note, Secondly, A godly man may be under ſome preſent apprehenſions of wrath.

He hath kindled his wrath againſt me. Job was not only ſencible of the abatement of his outward comforts, but he felt ſome ſparklings of the wrath of God, in the abſence of inward comforts. Chriſt hath delivered believers from the wrath to come, yet even they may ſee and feel wrath kindling and coming upon them.

Thirdly, The apprehenſions of wrath are more grievous to a believer, then all his other ſufferings.

It is poſſible to bear all ſorrows with comfort, which are ſeparate from wrath. The Plague of Thunder and Hail upon Egypt was grievous, but that which made it very grievous was to ſee Fire mingled with the Hail (Exod. 9. 24.) 'Tis the minglings of the Fire of divine anger with the ſtorm of Thunder and Hail, the troubles of this life, which renders them ſo grievous to be born. 'Tis wrath which makes Hell ſo terrible: the Fire in Hell would be (comparatively to what it is) but as a warm Sun, did not the breath, that is, the wrath of the Lord like a ſtream of brimſtone kindle it, as it is ſaid of Tophet (Iſa.30.33.) As the wrath of God makes Hell ſo hot to the damned for ever, ſo it is ſome appearance of wrath, which makes affliction ſo hot to believers for the preſent. He hath kindled his wrath againſt me.

And counteth me as one of his enemies.

Job ſpake this language before (Chap. 13. 24.) Wherefore hideſt thou thy face, and holdeſt me for thine enemy? there he troubledly expoſtulates the matter with God about it, here he affirms directly; He hath kindled his wrath againſt me, and counteth me as one of his enemies; though the words carry the ſame general ſence, yet we have ſomewhat here worthy our obſervation and diſcuſſion, beſides what was there held forth.

חשב

He hath counted.] That is, He hath reckoned and ſet me down, or caſt me up in the number of his enemies; all thoſe tranſlations the word will bear.

Again, He hath counted me as his enemies.] The Text is plural in the Hebrew, not as we render, As one of his enemies, but, as his enemies. That is, as a deadly, not as a common enemy; as if I were ſuch an enemy to him, as had the enmity of all his enemies contracted together in me; he counts me, not as a ſingle enemy, but as an Hoſt of enemies. It is a frequent Hebraiſm in Scripture, to put a word of the plural number, to note ſome ſpecial thing or perſon in the ſingular. Thus 'tis ſaid of Jephtha, that after he had judged Iſrael ſix years, he died, and was buried in the Cities of Gilead (Judg. 12. 7.) that is, in one of the Cities of Gilead. Again, The godly is like a tree planted by the rivers of waters (Pſal. 1. 3.) That is, as a tree planted by ſome eminent river of water; ſo here, He hath counted me as his enemies, that is, as one of his enemies, yet ſuch a one as may ſtand for all the reſt.

In fonte eſt, ſicut adverſarios ſuos; i. e. ſicut unum ex adverſariis ſuis.

Further, Job doth not ſpeak abſolutely, he hath counted me an enemy; as if God had proceeded againſt him (hoſtili animo) with the heart of an enemy, but he expreſſeth himſelf comparatively or with a qualification, by a note of ſimilitude, he hath accounted me as his enemies, or, like an enemy.

Præclarè dicit tanquam, vel, quaſi. Neq; enim aut Hoſtili animo aut etiā perturbato Deus ſupplicia irrogat. Nicet.

Job did not ſuſpect, much leſs conclude that God had written his name in the catalogue of his enemies, no, he knew God was his friend, and his heart told him that he was Gods friend, that he bare no ill will to God; yet (ſaith he, though ſuch be my ſtate, though I know God loves me, and though he knows I love him, yet) he hath counted me (that is) he hath carried himſelf towards me, and dealt with me as with one of his enemies; his heart is with me, but his hand is againſt me.

Hence note, Firſt, God is really a friend to his people, yet he ſometimes deals with them appearingly, as with enemies.

The love of God is everlaſting and unchangeable to his people, but his diſpenſations towards them have many changes. Hypocrites make a ſhew as if they were Gods friends, and God makes a ſhew againſt the ſincere, as if they were his enemies. Hypocrites are as Gods friends, and God deals with them as with his friends; they give him an outſide profeſſion, and he often gives them outſide comforts, and proſperity, he deals with them as if they were his friends: now (I ſay) as hypocrites declare a formal friendſhip or love to God, ſo God declares a formal enmity againſt many who are ſincere, that is, he gives them the uſage of an enemy, the wounds and ſtroaks of an enemy. As the Lord deſcribes the formal profeſſions and practices of love and ſervice to him (Iſa. 58. 2.) They ſeek me daily, and delight to know my wayes, as a Nation that did righteouſneſs, and forſook not the Ordinances of their God; So, we may deſcribe the Lords outward diſpenſations and providences of wrath to his; he ſmites them daily, and afflicts them in all their wayes, as a Nation that doth unrighteouſneſs, and hath utterly forſaken the Ordinances of God. Thus he is ſaid to count them as enemies when he acts towards them as we do towards thoſe whom we indeed count our enemies, as was more at large ſhewed upon that place before-cited, Chap. 13.

Further, take notice of theſe two things.

Firſt, That God hath enemies; ſome are even fighters againſt God himſelf; And theſe are of two ſorts.

Firſt, Natural enemies, or enemies by Nature, and thus every man that is born, is born his enemy (Col. 1. 21.) Being enemies in their minds, by reaſon of wicked works. All men are enemies, with all their hearts to God, till he doth overcome and change their hearts (Rom. 5. 10.) While we were yet enemies, Chriſt died for us; thus all are enemies.

Secondly, God hath enemies by practiſe, ſuch are all they who live and continue in ſin, theſe upon the matter, proclaim and maintain war againſt God himſelf. Sin is not only a turning from God, but a turning againſt him. Theſe enemies are alſo of two ſorts, either ſecret, or open. Moſt are ſubtle enemies to God, going on cloſely in wayes of ſin, and keeping ſecret correſpondence with the luſts of their own hearts, and the temptations of Satan. Others are profeſſed and open enemies to God, they even ſend defiances to Heaven, and will do what they liſt, let God do or ſay what he pleaſe. Such a one was Pharaoh, and ſuch was Julian, ſuch were they (Luke 19. 14.) who ſaid, We will not have this man reign over us: of whom Chriſt ſaith, (verſ. 27.) But thoſe mine enemies that would not have me to reign over them, bring them forth and ſlay them before me.

Again, What he ſaid before, God hath deſtroyed me on every ſide, and kindled his wrath againſt me, is reſolved into, or wrapt up in this, He hath counted me as an enemy; ſo that, to be an enemy, is made the meaſure, or the ſignification of the worſt eſtate imaginable. He that counts a man his enemy (according to the rule of nature) counts the leaſt good too much for him, and the greateſt evil too little for him. As it implies the greateſt manifeſtation of love and tenderneſs, when it is ſaid, God deals with us, as with ſons (Heb. 12. 7.) And ſpares us as a Father ſpares his Son that ſerveth him (Mal. 3. 17. A Son may expect, by the laws of Nature, the moſt gentle uſage, and kind acceptance from a Father) ſo it implies the hotteſt revelation of wrath and diſpleaſure, when it is ſaid, that God counts us, or deals with us, as with an enemy. God keeps his friends as the apple of his eye, (Pſal. 17.) which notes their ſafeſt keeping; but as for the perſons and lives of his enemies, he caſts them out as out of the midſt of a Sling, which notes their utter periſhing. Hence obſerve,

That it is a moſt dangerous condition to be in a ſtate of enmity againſt God.

Who would live in ſuch a condition as aſſures him of nothing but death? What do enemies expect leſs at our hands? And what can the enemies of God expect leſs at his hand, in whoſe hand the breath of his enemies alwayes is, and all their wayes? God hath given us a rule to love our enemies, If thine enemy hunger feed him, if he thirſt give him drink (Rom. 12. 20.) And in doing this as we obey God, ſo we imitate him, and declare our ſelves the Children of our Father which is in Heaven; for he maketh his Sun to riſe on the evil and on the good: and ſendeth rain on the juſt and on the unjuſt (Matth. 5. 45.) But though God doth this often and long, yet he doth not this alwayes, or ever; nor doth he expect that we ſhould do this alwayes, or to all our enemies. It may be ſin to us not to take vengeance on ſome who are our enemies, even as it would be ſin to avenge our ſelves on any. And if men ſhould quite ſlacken juſtice, and not take vengeance on thoſe who are Gods enemies and theirs, yet God will. But if we be found continuing under a ſtate of enmity againſt God, he will not act towards us according to that law which he enjoyns us, he will not feed ſuch enemies, nor will he give them water to drink; He will not make his Sun to ſhine upon them, but command his fire to conſume them; and he will rain, not fatning and refreſhing ſhowers, but ſnares, fire, and brimſtone, this ſhall be (their drink) the portion of their cup (Pſal. 11. 6.) 'Tis true, When we were yet enemies, he ſent his Son to dye for us, there he acted up to the higheſt degree of that law of love; yet they that believe not on his Son, but ſtand out in rebellion againſt him, ſhall ſurely dye. God hath not prepared bread and water, but fire and brimſtone for preſumptuous ſinners and unbelievers. This abuſed love will turn to the hotteſt wrath. And as God hath ſhewed himſelf the beſt friend to his enemies; ſo he will be their worſt enemy. God will appear an eternal enemy to his enemies in the next life, and he will not ſpare them in this. Moſes gives them a dreadful alarm (Deut. 32. 40.) I lift up my hands to heaven, and ſay, I live for ever: if I whet my glittering ſword, and my hand take hold of judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me: I will make mine arrows drunk with blood (and my ſword ſhall devour fleſh) and that with the blood of the ſlain from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy. Rejoyce, O ye Nations, with his people, for he will avenge the blood of his ſervants, and will render vengeance to his adverſaries. As the love of God, in many paſſages of Scriptures, triumphs in lofty and pureſt ſtrains of rhetorick over all the unworthineſs of man, ſo doth his wrath in this over all the oppoſitions of man. The enemies of God ſhall be ſure to ſmart and fall; and therefore 'tis well for thoſe that have to do with enemies, if they can but make it out, that their enemies are Gods enemies; for as God will ſurely bleſs thoſe who bleſs his people, and curſe thoſe who curſe them: ſo when his enemies are curſed by us, he curſeth them too; and while we oppoſe them, he joyns with us; whenſoever we go forth againſt the Lords enemies, we go forth to the help of the Lord (Judg. 5. 23.) therefore the Lord will help us to deſtroy them. The Lord will deſtroy them according to his own decree, though we ſhould forbear or withdraw our help; much more will he deſtroy them when we help on the execution of his decree. The Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 110. 1.) ſaid unto my Lord (that is, the Father ſaid to the Son, whom he hath given, as for a Mediator to his people, ſo a Lord over them) ſit thou at my right hand, untill I make thine enemies thy footſtool: that is, till I ſubdue them all under thee, or make them fall before thee. All the enemies of God are under this decree, and this decree (as the Prophet Zephany ſpeaks, Chap. 2. 2.) will bring forth. The decree (like a woman with child) will be in travail, till it hath brought forth this judgment againſt all the enemies of Chriſt; yea though they ſit upon thrones, and have the Nations under their feet, yet they muſt be made his footſtool. Job found hard ſtroaks from the hand of God, who did only count him as an enemy; what then ſhall they receive, who are his enemies indeed?

Job proceeds to give us a more particular deſcription of Gods dealing with him, as with one of his enemies, ſtill proſecuting the Allegory of War.

Verſ. 12. His troops come together, and they raiſe up their way againſt me, and encamp round about my Tabernacle.

Here are three things conſiderable.

Firſt, The gathering of the Army; His troops come together.

Secondly, Their march; They raiſe up their way againſt me.

Thirdly, Their Siege; They encamp round about my Tabernacle.

In all which, Job elegantly deſcribes the enemy-like proceedings of God with him.

His troops come together.] The Hebrew is Gad, the name of one of the Patriarchs (Gen. 49. 19.) Gad, A troop ſhall overcome him; but he ſhall overcome at the laſt; Both words are of the ſame root, Gad ſignifies a troop, and to overcome.

His troops come together againſt me.] But what are theſe troops?

I anſwer, They are the ſeveral afflictions and troubles which God muſtered and called together to charge Job with. Many horſemen make a troop, and ſo do many afflictions; Job had ſo many as made not only a troop, but an Army; yea, a great Army. He ſpeaks not only of a ſingle troop, but of many troops; He hath brought his troops againſt me.

Copiæ Dei ſunt omnis generis calamitates. Merl.

Some troops in the Letter aſſaulted Job, troops of Caldeans and of Sabeans; but beſides theſe, his ſickneſs and his ſores, his pains and his poverty, the anguiſh and terrors of his ſoul; all theſe were troops, which came upon him as armed men; yea, his very friends who were about his bed, were as troops of enemies to him; at beſt, they were but miſerable comforters to him.

This coming together of his troops may be taken two wayes.

Firſt, They come together; that is, they come all at once, or at one time.

Vox originalis non ſolum temporis eſt, ſed etiam conſenſus & voluntatis ejuſdem. Ὁμοθυμαδὸν δὲ ἦλθον τὰ πειρατήρια αὐτοῦ ἐπ' ἐμοί. Sept.

Secondly, They come together, that is, they come with one conſent, they have (as it were) made a compact or a confederacy, they are united as one man to afflict my ſoul. So the word is rendred (Pſal. 55. 14.) We took ſweet counſel together, that is, we were of one heart, we agreed ſweetly in our counſels. Job had many troubles, but they were all of a mind; they came all upon him by orders from one hand, and they came with one heart. The Septuagint expreſs it by the ſame word, which is uſed in the Acts of the Apoſtles (Chap. 2. 46.) to ſhew the oneneſs of the pure primitive Church in the worſhip of God. They continued dayly with one accord (or unanimouſly) in the Temple, &c.

Thus the Army is levied, and the troops are come to their Rendevouz, we ſhall ſee them in their march preſently; take only a Note or two from thoſe words, His troops are come together.

First, Afflictions are as Gods Army.

Here are troops of them. The name of God is, Lord of Hoſts; and as he raiſeth his hoſt to ruine his enemies, ſo alſo to chaſten his own people.

Secondly obſerve, The Lord ſends many afflictions upon one man at one time.

Here is not a ſingle affliction to a ſingle man, but a ſingle man to many, to a multitude of afflictions. Here was a man and an Army; Job and a whole Hoſt grapling together: Many are the troubles of the righteous (ſaith the Pſalm) And, now ye are in heavineſs through manifold temptations, ſaith the Apoſtle (1 Pet. 1. 6.) And why were they in manifold temptations? The next verſe anſwers; 'twas for the trial of their faith. It is a ſufficient trial of humane ſtrength and manhood, to combate with one man; he is counted more then a man, a Giant, who contends with two. But for the trial of divine ſtrength and faith, manifold temptations are but ſufficient. A little of God in ono man raiſeth up his ſpirit to do more then many men; even to combat with many troops of temptation.

Thirdly, From this alluſion note, That, Afflictions are all at Gods command.

They are his troops, he is their General; they move according to his orders. As God raiſeth theſ troops, ſo 'tis he that ſends them directions what to do, and whither to go; they come when he bids them, and they go when he bids them; when he ſaith, Charge, they charge; and when he ſaith, Retreat, they retreat; according to the ſound of the Trumpet which they hear from heaven, they move on earth. We may ſay to theſe temptations, as he in the Prophet, to the ſword, (Jer. 47. 6.) O thou ſword of the Lord, how long wilt thou be ere thou be quiet? put up thy ſelf into the ſcabbard, reſt, and be ſtill: Here was a cry to the ſword to be quiet; but the ſword anſwered, or the anſwer was made in behalf of the ſword, How can it be quiet, ſeeing the Lord hath given it a charge againſt Askelon, and againſt the Sea-ſhore, there hath he appointed it. It is to no purpoſe to ſpeak to the ſword to be quiet, you muſt ſpeak to the General, to him that commands in chief, and is cloathed with a Commiſſion for the war. What can the ſword do? It muſt proceed till he that drew and called it forth, recals and remands it back into the ſcabbard. 'Tis thus alſo in this war or fight of afflictions. The ſoul having been long preſſed and aſſaulted by them, may perhaps cry out to them, O ye ſorrows of the Lord, when will ye depart? O ye pains and ſufferings, when will ye ceaſe? But they anſwer, how can we depart? We are Gods troops, he hath given us a charge to come together againſt you; and with you we muſt ſtay till God call us off?

And ſeeing afflictions are at the command of God, be not angry, let not your paſſion riſe againſt the creature, againſt this or that ſecond cauſe by which you are afflicted; look up to the Lord of this Hoſt, to the Commander of theſe troops. He ſends them out as he pleaſeth, and when he pleaſeth, to puniſh and deſtroy his enemies, as alſo to exerciſe the Graces, and try the holy valour of his own children and ſervants.

Fourthly, God is able to raiſe troops of affliction out of any of his Creatures.

He is never at a loſs for an Army. When the wrath of man is kindled, O, if he could get an Army, he would do wonders. The Lord can levie an Army with a word ſpeaking; he can have troops, if he do but ſound his trumpet, and beat his Drum; if he do but hold out his will, and ſay it is his pleaſure, they are preſently at his call. How ſoon did the Lord raiſe Armies againſt Pharaoh, of Flies, and Lice, and Hail? &c. How quickly did the Chaldeans and the Sabeans break in upon Job? How ſoon did an unkind Wife, Scabs and Sores, and what not, that was grievous to a poor man, either within or without, come in troops againſt him at the Lords appointment? His troops come together. Thus they are met and muſtered, now they are upon their March.

They raiſe up their way againſt me.] That is (as ſome interpret it) they make themſelves a large and plain way to come againſt me; and ſo 'tis an alluſion unto Armies, who when they are marching, ſend Pioneers before them, to open narrow wayes, to level thoſe that are uneven, and throw down their banks: The ordinary Road is not fit to march in, Armies muſt have room, therefore they raiſe up or prepare their way. This word is uſed (Iſa. 57. 14.) To prepare and fit a way, a way which before was wayleſs and inacceſſible; Caſt you up, caſt you up, prepare the way. The Baptiſt in a ſpiritual ſence fulfilled that Propheſie, he prepared the way of the Lord, by him the valleyes were exalted, and every mountain and hill was made low, the crooked he made ſtraight, and the rough places plain. 'Tis the the work of the Miniſters of the Goſpel to take out all the ſtumbling blocks and rubs that lie in the way of converſion, and hinder ſouls from turning to the Lord. The troops in the text did not raiſe up a way for Job, but for themſelves, or againſt him.

Significat fore ut Apoſtoli monſtrent, gentibus atque ſternant facilem viam & aditum ad fidem Evangelii, ne hæreant aut deterreantur difficultatibus.

Fecerunt viam ſuper me. Vulg.

עלי poteſt ſuper me exponi, ut ſit ſenſus velut viam tritam reddiderunt ſuper me, ut ſim illis velut via frequenti ambulantium itione trita. Merc.

They raiſe up their way againſt me.] That is, they prepare a way to come upon me, or againſt me. The Hebrew word ſignifies upon, as well as againſt; they make their way upon me, they go over me, and trample me under their feet, they make me their way. The Prophet ſpeaks this Language (Iſa. 51. 23.) implying the extream inſultation of the adverſary afflicting the people of God: I will put it into the hand of them that afflict thee (meaning the dregs of the cup of his fury) which have ſaid to thy ſoul, (that is, to thee) bow down, that we may go over; and thou haſt laid thy body as the ground, and as the ſtreet to them that went over; that is, thou haſt humbly ſubmitted thy ſelf to their proudeſt cruelties. Indeed, wicked men (according to the letter of this text) would have the ſouls of the Saints bow to them, by yielding to, or following their ſinful counſels and commands, but the ſouls of the Saints (in this ſence) are ſtiff and cannot bow; as for their bodies or outward man, they can lay them down and bow, not only to the ground, but as the ground or as the ſtreet, for their enemies to go over. So here, theſe troops (ſaith Job) have made me as the very ground, or as the ſtreet upon which they trod; they have trod upon me. As Joſhua gave order to the people of Iſrael (chap. 10. 24.) when he had overcome thoſe Kings (who were a type of all the enemies of the Church, over whom the people of God ſhall triumph) It came to paſs, that when they brought thoſe Kings unto Joſhua, that he called for all the men of Iſrael, and ſaid unto them, Come near and put your feet upon the necks of theſe Kings; go over them, make them your way, do not ſtand upon it, becauſe they are Kings and great ones, tread upon them and fear not. As to tread upon enemies, and make our way over them, notes the compleateſt victory, and higheſt triumph, ſo to be trodden upon by enemies, and to be made their way, ſpeaks the loweſt ſufferings and contempt.

But I rather follow our own tranſlation; They have made their way againſt me: That is, coming againſt me, they have made or prepared their way. As if he had ſaid, whatſoever lay in the way of my afflictions, they have removed, that ſo they might have a clear mark, and make a full charge againſt me. Hence obſerve,

That, When God ſendeth evils upon a perſon ('tis true alſo when he ſendeth them upon a people) nothing ſhall hinder.

His troops ſhall raiſe up their way againſt the beſt and ſtrongeſt; though it be a barred way, a rough, mountainous way, a craggy way, like the Alpes (which Hannibal paſſed with his Army againſt the Romans) yet the Lords Army will (as he ſaid) find a paſſage, or make one. We have an expreſſion in Pſal. 78.49. very near this; where the wrath of God againſt Egypt, is thus deſcribed; He caſt upon them the fierceneſs of his anger, wrath, indignation and trouble, by ſending evil Angels amongſt them. Moſt interpret theſe evil Angels of wicked Spirits or Devils that vexed them; others of troubleſome men, who vexed them with evils; ſome expound that Text particularly of Moſes and Aaron, who, though perſonally conſidered, were very good, yea, the beſt of men then living; yet they were evil Angels in regard of the effect of their meſſage unto the Egyptians. A good man may (in this ſence) be an evil Angel, he may be a meſſenger of evil, or a means of executing the wrath of God upon wicked men. Thus Moſes and Aaron may be called evil Angels; for they brought ſad meſſages or ill tidings to the Egyptians, concerning thoſe dreadful plagues wherewith the Lord oppreſſed them for their oppreſſions upon his people: For by the Miniſtry of Moſes and Aaron, the Lord caſt forth the fierceneſs of his anger, wrath and indignation. But Egypt was a ſtrong place, and the Egyptians a mighty people, they would not eaſily yield; wherefore (ſaith the Text) when he did ſo, he made a way to his anger: As if the Pſalmiſt had ſaid, if there were not a way for his anger, that is, for the execution of his anger, he forced his way; though he did not find a way, yet he made one, and fought himſelf through all difficulties which ſeemed to oppoſe the deſtruction of his enemies. We put in the Margin, He weighed a path; he made the path as exact, as if he had put it into a ballance; the way was fitted to the largeneſs of his own anger, and it was fitted to the dimenſions of their wickedneſs. Thus he made a way to his anger, both by ſuiting the way to his anger, and by removing all impediments out of the way of his anger. If God will work to ſave, who ſhall let it? And if God will work to deſtroy, who or what ſhall let it? When God will either try his own people, or puniſh his enemies, nothing can hinder; neither the power nor the politick preparations of evil men, no, nor the prayers of good men (which yet are the ſtrongeſt rubs in the way of his anger) he will make his way through their ſupplications, when he is reſolved to puniſh his people; Though Moſes and Samuel ſtood before me, yet my mind could not be toward this people (Jer. 15. 1.) Now with what weapons did Moſes and Samuel uſe to ſtand before the Lord? Surely with prayers and tears; nothing makes ſo real a defence againſt the anger of God, as the prayers of his people do; yet God will break through theſe: he will make a way for his anger through theſe, they ſhall not ſtop him; much leſs ſhall the preparations or ſtrengths of wicked men ſtop him. As the weakneſs of God is ſtronger then man, ſo the weakneſs of prayer is ſtronger with God, then all the ſtrength of man. If prayer doth not ſtop his wrath, humane power ſhall never be able to give it the leaſt check. All our ſtrong holds and Forts will be but as the firſt ripe figs, which being ſhaken, fall into the mouth of the eater, when once the Lords army makes a Battery againſt us. His troops will not turn till they have fulfilled all his pleaſure; They have raiſed up their way againſt me.

And encamp round about my Tabernacle.] The Lords troops being raiſed, they raiſed up their way, and marched, and now they ſit down, and encamp round about poor diſtreſſed Job: They encamp round about my Tabernacle; that is, about all that I have, or my whole poſſeſſions. Here's a ſtrange ſight, an Army encamping againſt a Tabernacle: Job might ſay, What needs ſuch warlike preparations againſt me? Alas, mine is but a Tabernacle; I am not fortified in a Caſtle, or encompaſſed with impregnable walls and bulwarks; They encamp againſt my Tabernacle: A Tabernacle is but a weak houſe, weaker then our ordinary houſes; a Tabernacle can hardly keep out the rain, or ſtand againſt the wind, how then can it keep out an Army, or ſtand their ſtorm? A Tabernacle is a moveable dwelling, faſtened with cords and ſtakes, without foundation; yet here Job ſpeaks as if God had brought all his Artillery, planted his Batteries and Engines of war to beat it down; He hath encamped round about my Tabernacle.

Hence note, All that man hath in the creature, amounts but to a Tabernacle.

Job was a great man, and he had a great eſtate, an eſtate foundation'd and ſetled upon as much ſtrength as the creature uſually can afford, yet all was but a Tabernacle, whoſe cords are quickly looſened, and whoſe ſtakes are ſoon pulled up, and then down it falls. Man himſelf in regard of his natural life, is periſhing, his body is a Tabernacle; Our earthly houſe of this Tabernacle, as the Apoſtle calls it (2 Cor. 5.2.) Now as the body of man wherein his natural life dwells, is a Tabernacle; ſo are thoſe things which concern the ſupport and continuance of his natural life. Who would truſt to, or ſhelter himſelf in a Tabernacle, when we have the Name of the Lord, as a ſtrong Tower, into which we may flee with aſſurance of ſafety? He that gets moſt of the world, hath got but a Tabernacle; and he that loſeth all that he hath in the world, hath loſt but a Tabernacle. A little true knowledge of what the world is, mingled, though with but a little true faith about the things of the world to come, will eaſily carry us above all the good and evil of the world.

Again (in purſuance of the Allegory) we know when an Army encampeth about a City, and layeth ſiege to it, no man can get out; Thus it is with many poor ſouls, afflictions hem them in round, they have never a port to get out at; the way is only open to heaven. The Lord is pleaſed to lay very cloſe ſieges to many of his people, they are ſtraightned in their outward enjoyments, they are ſtraightned in their ſpiritual enjoyments, and can find no comfort. As the ſouls of ſome refuſe to be comforted, ſo comfort refuſeth the ſouls of others; or all comforts are (as by a ſtrong hand, yea, as by a ſtrong hoſt) with-holden from their ſouls. David's mighty men broke through the hoſt of the Philiſtims, when he longed for the water of Bethlehem; but Gods hoſt of troubles and afflictions cannot be broken through by the mightieſt among the ſons of men, though there be a well of water beyond them, which their ſouls long for as much as David did for that of Bethlehem.

Laſtly, Take this Note from the alluſion alſo; They encamp againſt me.

Afflictions may continue long upon us or about us.

There is a difference between the fighting of a Battel and encamping; a Battel is but for an hour or a day; but encampings are for continuance: we have heard of encampings and beſiegings, not only for a few dayes, but for many months; yea, for ſome years. The troops of trouble give ſome only a fierce charge, but they ſit down and encamp againſt the Tabernacles of others. Some particular ſouls have endured longer ſieges then ever any City did. Not only do the terrors of God (within and without) ſet themſelves in array againſt them (as Job complained, chap. 6. 4.) but they are afflicted and ready to die from their youth up, ſuffering thoſe terrors, as Heman complains (Pſal. 88.15.) Therefore let not our hearts faint, though we are beſieged, though ſorrows encamp againſt us. When God ſeems to tell us in the diſpenſations of his providence, that he will batter us down and level us with the ground, yet all this is but to try how we can ſtand our ground in an evil day, how we can maintain our truſt, and hold out a ſiege; ſome give up the ſtrengths under their command at the firſt ſummons, others hold out till the laſt bit of bread; God doth but try his whether they will perſevere to the laſt, to the utmoſt. Let patience have its perfect work, for afflictions will have their perfect work; when they make long work, let patience make long work too. When God encamps againſt us, let us ſpeedily give up the ſtrong holds of ſin, but let us maintain the ſtrong holds of grace, the forts of faith and patience, quitting our ſelves like men, or rather like Chriſtians; let us give proof of holy courage in the hotteſt aſſaults, and in the longeſt ſieges. The Lord doth not intend ruine to our perſons, though he ruine our Tabernacles. Thoſe outward evils ſhall work for our good, which deprive us of all outward good; and if both the Tabernacles which we uſe, and in which we dwell, while we are in the body, as alſo the Tabernacles of our body, be diſſolved and ſhattered to the ground in this war, yet we have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Laſtly obſerve, There is no ſtriving, no contending with afflictions.

God hath whole Troops and Armies of them at his command. As his enemies cannot ſtand before him, ſo neither can his friends, when he appeareth as an enemy. There is no prevailing but by ſubmitting. Who (ſaith the Lord, Iſa. 27. 4.) would ſet the briars and thorns againſt me in battel? I would go through them, I would burn them together. Wicked men are briars and thorns, if they contend with God, they contend with a fire, and are burnt. If godly men ſhould ſet themſelves in battel againſt God, when he ſets himſelf in battel againſt them, how ſoon could he go through them alſo and burn them together? When the Lord of Hoſts ſends his troops to encamp againſt us, he doth not intend we ſhould fight them away, but pray them away; nor is it his meaning, that we ſhould raiſe the ſiege by oppoſing his troops, but by falling down before them. We cannot conquer the leaſt affliction by force, but we ſhall be more then conquerors over the greateſt afflictions, even over all afflictions by faith. When Armies of bloody men invade or encamp againſt the people of God, we cannot (without preſumption) expect victory, unleſs we fight as well as believe; and act courage againſt them, as well as faith in God. But when Armies of affliction encamp againſt us, there is no overcoming, but only by believing in God, and humbling our ſelves. We muſt reſiſt the Devil and his troops of temptations, and he will flee from us: But no affliction ſent by God, did ever depart from him that was found reſiſting it. The Army of ſorrows which encamped againſt Job, was never fully withdrawn, till he ſaid, I abhor my ſelf, and repent in duſt and aſhes (chap. 42. 6.)

Thus we have heard Job bewailing his condition under the Allegory of war, troops of enemies drawing together, and encamping againſt him; in the next place he bewailes his condition, in the withdrawing of his friends: If when evils and enemies come upon us, our friends ſtand cloſe to us, it is a great ſupport; but when many troubles throng about us, and all our friends leave us, this is ſad. Thus Job deſcribes his forlorn eſtate in the next words; He hath put my brethren far from me, &c.

VERS. 13, 14, 15.

He hath put my Brethren far from me, and mine Acquaintance are verily eſtranged from me.

My Kinsfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me.

They that dwell in mine houſe, and my maidens count me for a ſtranger.

JOB hath thus far expreſt his (almoſt) unexpreſſible ſorrows and afflictions by many elegant Metaphors and alluſions; he is now as exact and accurate in ſetting forth the effects of thoſe ſorrows, or what followed upon his affliction.

The firſt effect is deſcribed in this context, to the end of verſ. 19. And that is the unkindneſs and contempt, the unfaithfulneſs and unthankfulneſs of his friends and neareſt relations.

Secondly, He ſhews the waſting of his ſtrength, and the general conſumption of his own body, at verſ. 20. My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my fleſh, and I am eſcaped with the skin of my teeth: The burden of all which preſſures enforced him to make a threefold cry.

Firſt, For pity and compaſſion; Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me, verſ. 21.

Secondly, For ſparing and forbearance, in verſ. 22. Why do you perſecute me as God, and are not ſatisfied with my fleſh?

Thirdly, He cries out for attention to his cry, and ſerious conſideration of his ſad complaint, in verſ. 23, 24. O that my words were now written, O that they were printed in a book, that they were graven with an iron pen and lead in a rock for ever.

Theſe words hold forth the firſt effect which followed his ſorrows and afflictions; namely, the withdrawing of his friends, the unkindneſs or contempt of all thoſe that were about him; and he ſeems to caſt or diſtribute thoſe into four ranks, from whom he received ſuch unkindneſſes.

Firſt, His kindred, or thoſe of his blood; He hath put my brethren far from me, in ver. 13. And in v. 14. My kinſfolk have failed.

Secondly, He complains of the unkindneſs of his own family, in verſ. 15, 16, 17. Which he ſets down, Firſt, In general, in the former part of the fifteenth verſe; They that dwell in my houſe. Secondly, He names them diſtinctly. Firſt, His maid-ſervants; in the cloſe of the fifteenth verſe. Secondly, His men-ſervants; in the ſixteenth verſe. Thirdly, His wife, in the ſeventeenth verſe; thus his own houſe and family had deſerted him, and proved undutiful to him.

Thirdly, He was likewiſe grieved by the contempt which he received from children, the children of thoſe who lived about him; in verſ. 18. Young children deſpiſed me, I roſe, and they ſpake againſt me.

Fourthly, He deſcribeth the unkindneſs and unthankfulneſs of his intimate acquaintance and higheſt confidents, to whom he was wont to open his boſom, and with whom he had maintained cloſeſt correſpondence, both by giving and receiving courteſies, in the nineteenth verſe; All my inward friends abhorred me, and they whom I loved are turned againſt me: Theſe are diſtinguiſhed from his kindred, and may be intended alſo in thoſe words of the thirteenth verſe; My acquaintance; and in thoſe of the fourteenth verſe; My familiar friends. Thus we ſee all were turned againſt him, his kindred, his family, his acquaintance and aſſociates. This was an extream aggravation of his affliction; eſpecially if we conſider two things.

Firſt, The univerſality of this deſertion; it was not ſome one or two of his relations; all his relations failed him; kindred, ſervants, acquaintance, and, who is more then all theſe, his wiſe.

Secondly, Not only did all his common friends, but even they who had made profeſſion, ſerious profeſſion of love to him; there are ſome friends of whom we make no great reckoning, if they fall off from us; but when intimate friends, ſuch as know our hearts, and have been truſted with our ſecrets, ſuch as we love with much entireneſs, and are endeared to us by long familiarity, when theſe apoſtatize from their profeſſed friendſhip, and renounce the Laws of love, how heavy is this croſs? Yet even ſuch was Job's deſertion; as will appear in the opening and proſecution of this context.

Verſe 13. He hath put my Brethren far from me.

In the former verſe we heard of Troops drawing about Job's Tabernacle, and beſieging it: Now in this nick of time, while troops of enemies draw near about him, his Brethren withdrew and departed far from him; He hath put my Brethren far from me. This deſertion of his Brethren is put in equal ballance with the invaſion of his Enemies, and is indeed a heavier burden of affliction, and doth much over-ballance it. Their unkindneſs troubles us moſt, from whom we have leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect unkindneſs.

אח Frater cognationem habet cum אחד unus, quia fratres in uno convenire debent, ac proinde res inanimata, quæ in uno conveniunt, fratres dicuntur.

He hath put my brethren.] The word which we tranſlate Brethren, notes not only nearneſs, but oneneſs: Many brethren, yea, all brethren ſhould be one, and agree in one. They who are near in relation, ſhould not be far off in affection. Job calls himſelf a brother to Dragons (chap. 30. 29.) becauſe his preſent ſtate was like that of Dragons, ſolitary and withdrawn from friends. And Solomon tells us (Prov. 18. 9.) He that is ſlothful in his work, is brother to him that is a great waſter, that is, he is very like him, or ſuch another; yea, things without life, which have a likeneſs, are called in Hebrew brethren or ſiſters (Exod. 26. 3.) becauſe brethren and ſiſters have, or are ſuppoſed to have likeneſs in conditions, and oneneſs in affection; My brethren.

But what were his brethren?

There are ſeven ſorts of brethren.

Firſt, Natural brethren, who are of the ſame blood; and theſe are ſo called, ſometimes in a larger, and ſometimes in a ſtricter ſence: They are called brethren in a large ſence who are of the ſame linage, though they be not immediately ſprung from the ſame loins. Abraham calls Lot his brother, who was only his nephew (Gen. 14. 14.) James and Joſes, Simon and Judas, who were the kinſmen of Chriſt, are yet called his brethren, Matth. 13. 55. But ſtrictly they are natural brethren, who are born of the ſame parents.

Secondly, They are called brethren who are of one Countrey or Nation.

Thirdly, They who are of one Neighbourhood, or are near in habitation.

Fourthly, There are brethren by ſtudy, by courſe of life, or profeſſion.

Fifthly, There are brethren in manners and ſuitableneſs of diſpoſition.

Sixthly, Brethren by friendſhip, by covenant and mutual ſtipulation.

Seventhly, Brethren in Religion and Faith of the Goſpel. We may take all theſe ſorts of brethren into the Text; but ſpecially brethren in blood, and nearneſs of alliance; theſe Job ſeems particularly to intend, while he ſaith, He hath put my brethren far from me. But, how far were they put, or at what diſtance did they ſtand? We may underſtand it of a twofold remoteneſs or diſtance.

Firſt, Of remoteneſs in place; as if he had ſaid, My Brethren came not at me, they will not ſo much as be where I am, one houſe will not hold us, I have little of their company;

Secondly, Of remoteneſs in ſpirit, they are far off in affection, their minds are departed or alienated from me; though I enjoy at any time their bodily preſence, I have a little of of their company, but leſs of their hearts.

הרחיק

Again, He doth not ſay, My brethren are gone from me; but, He hath put my brethren far from me. But who was it that put his friends far from him? Job aſcribes this as much as any other part of his affliction unto God; Job was as ſenſible that God had put his brethren and friends far from him, as he was that he had ſent ſo many enemies and ſtrangers (Chaldeans and Sabeans) in upon him. It was from the ſame hand that theſe invaded him, and that they departed from him.

Hence note, Firſt, Brethren may fail in love to their Brethren, and prove not only forgetful, but unfaithful.
